earliest restriction upon their erection will be Justin, Novell. 67, circ. A.D. 540, which requires both the consent of the bishop, as a safeguard against the multiplication of heretical churches, and a sufficient endowment. In the West there are few traces of them until the 6th century; from that time onwards they became numerous. In some cases they were merely "private chapels," erected for the convenience of the owners of country estates, and the regulation was made that although divine service might for the sake of convenience ("propter fatigationem familie") be performed in them on ordinary days, yet on the greater festivals resort must be had to the church of the parish or the city (Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 21; 1 Arvern. A.D. 535, c. 15). In other cases they appear to have had districts assigned to them and so to have become country parishes; hence, 4 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 26, speaks of "parochiae in potestum domibus;" and c. 33, "Si quis in agro suo aut habet aut postulat habere dioecesim;" and 9 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 655, c. 2, deals with the case of "ecclesiae parochiales" which have been founded by private persons. The two points which were mainly insisted upon in regard to both classes of privately-founded churches were (1) That they should be under the bishop's control; and (2) That they should be sufficiently endowed. The former of these rules probably appears first in 1 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 511, c. 17; the latter was enacted by 4 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 33. A good example of the kind of endowment which was required is afforded by S. Greg. M. Epist. 12, 11, which recites that Anio, "comes Aprutianus," had founded an oratory within his "castellum," and that he wished to have it consecrated in honour of St. Peter. St. Gregory, writing to the bishop of Fermo, allows this to be done if the proper endowment is given, namely, a farm with its homestead, a yoke of oxen, two cows, four pounds of silver, a bed, fifteen head of sheep, and the proper implements of a farm. But the freedom with which in early times churches could be founded in country districts, without interfering with the rights of any other church, came to be restricted when the greater part of the Christianized West came to be covered with the network of not only diocesan but also parochial organization. After a country district had been constituted into a parish, and especially after the payment of tithes and fees by the people of such a district to the church of that parish had become a matter not of voluntary offering, but of legal obligation, the foundation of a new church within the limits or on the borders of such a parish tended to be regarded with disfavour. Pope Zachary, writing to Pippin, circ. A.D. 741, will not allow churches or private estates to have, even when endowed, baptisteries or "cardinal presbyters;" the bishop is to consecrate them without the usual solemn masses, and to send a priest to perform service as occasion requires (S. Zachar. Epist. 7, ad Pippin. c. 15; Migne, P. L. vol. lxxxix. 935). The Carolingian capitularies allow the erection of churches by private persons, with the consent of the bishop, but they are careful to provide that the former dues to the original church of the district shall not be interfered with (Karoli M. Capit. ad Salz. A.D. 803, c. 3, Pertz, vol. i. p. 124; id. Excerpt.

Canon. c. 19, Pertz, i. 190; Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, c. 41; Hludovic. et Hlothar. Capit. c. 6, Pertz, i. 254; Ansegisi, Capit. lib. 2, 45, Pertz, i. 299). The subdivision of the territory and revenues of a parish, which was only allowable in cases of necessity, was entrusted to the discretion of the bishop, by Karoli II. Synod. Tolos. A.D. 844, c. 7; Pertz, i. 379.

iii. Relation of Parishes to Bishops.—The jurisdiction of bishops over parishes, and over the privately-founded churches which, whether within or without the limits of parishes, were within the district over which a bishop's authority was ultimately assumed to extend, was not established without many struggles. In early times presbyters had claimed the right to detach themselves from the church of which they were presbyters, and to set up altars where they pleased. The attempt was crushed partly by the dominance of the Roman instinct for organization, and partly by the overpowering necessity for preserving the unity of the church. A presbyter who set up an altar without the consent of his bishop was, ipso facto, excommunicated; and if this separation from the rest of the Christian community failed to deter him, resort was had, probably for the first time in ecclesiastical history, to the power of the secular arm (Conc. Antioch. A.D. 341, c. 5; Can. Apost. c. 31; 2 Conc. Carth. c. 5). The theory which, from the first, seems to have governed all interpretations of the relations of the original city church to subsequently-formed communities in the same city, and to suburban or rural communities, was that the officers of those communities were still part of the one original organization. The concilium of the bishop was formed not only of those presbyters who assisted him in the ordinary administration of his own church, but of all presbyters who were in the same jurisdiction. In course of time, no doubt, a distinction between these two classes of presbyters was formed, and in the middle ages the presbyters of the cathedral came to assume not only the functions which had originally belonged to all the presbyters of the diocese, but also in some cases those of the bishop himself. But so late as the 8th and 9th centuries the extra-cathedral presbyters of a diocese were not only allowed but compelled by penalties to assist the bishop, as members of his concilium, at least once or twice a year (Pippini Capit. Vermer. A.D. 753, c. 8, Pertz, M. H. G., vol. i. p. 25; id. Capit. Compend. A.D. 757, c. 24; Benedictus Levita, Capit. i. 11, 60). The organization of the city church originally sufficed for all the clergy of the district or districts which were attached to it. When the population increased without a corresponding increase in the number of dioceses, the extra-cathedral clergy were organized separately; but the original type was preserved. The bishop stood at the head of two organizations, each of which was the counterpart of the other. Parallel with the archipresbyter urbanus was the archipresbyter ruralis or vicanus; the former became known in time as the decanus or dean of the cathedral, the latter as the decanus vicanus or rural dean. Parallel with the archidiaconus urbanus was the archidiaconus ruralis, and the struggle for supremacy between the archdeacon and the archpresbyter in the cathedral was repeated in the diocese with different results, inasmuch as in the one case the archpresbyter and in the other the archdeacon succeeded in establishing his claim.

Conversely, the bishop was theoretically an integral part of the parishes which came to be detached from the church in which he personally presided. The parish presbyter had not at first, as he came practically to have in later times, the full powers of the ministry in his parish. In Rome the presbyters of the several tituli had not even the power of consecrating the eucharist; the consecrated bread was sent round to them every Sunday from the bishop's church (S. Innocent. Epist. ad Decent. c. 5; Liber Pontificalis, Vit. S. Melchiad. p. 33): there is a trace of an attempt having been made to make this the rule for all presbyters (cf. Liber Pontif. Vit. S. Siric. p. 55), but Innocent, l. c., expressly disallows the practice in regard to parishes which were remote from the bishop's church, on the ground that "non longe portanda sunt sacramenta," and that presbyters have the right of consecration. In regard to baptism, the co-operation of the bishop became necessary in two respects, (a) the parish presbyter could only use chrism which the bishop had consecrated, and for which he had to send to the bishop once a year; (b) the baptism was incomplete until, as in baptisms in the bishop's own church, the bishop had imposed his hands (see PRIEST, III. Functions of, (2) ii.). In regard to discipline, the probability is that in the earliest period neither a bishop nor a presbyter could act alone, and that the rule of the Jewish synedria which required an ecclesiastical court to consist of at least three members was ordinarily observed. Some details of the long struggle between bishops and presbyters for the right of the latter to act alone are given elsewhere (PRIEST, III. Functions of, (1) c.). This struggle was by no means ended within the period of which the present work takes cognizance, and its later history can only be considered in connexion with the general history of the relations of the Roman see to the Western church in the post-Carolingian period. It may, however, be mentioned here that an interesting survival of the earlier theory is found in the council of Rouen in A.D. 650, c. 16, which clearly implies that the bishop's ordinary visitation of a parish was conceived as the holding of a court in which the local presbyters were his assessors; the purport of the canon is that minor ecclesiastical causes should be determined by the local presbyters before the visitation, and that the graver causes only should be reserved for the more solemn court in which the bishop himself presided.

It is impossible, within the limits of the present work, to enter in detail into the intricate question of the precise periods at which, in the several parts of Christendom, the authority of the bishop of the principal church of a district came to extend over all the towns and villages which were included in that district. That authority was not established without many struggles, and its nature seems to have varied as widely as the extent to which it was recognized. But it came at length to consist in three principal particulars. (1) The appointments of clerks to parochial or other churches were subject to the bishop's approval. (2) Clerks so appointed were subject to the bishop's jurisdiction, which was exercised partly in the course of annual visitations of the several parishes, partly by requiring clerks to repair periodically to the bishop's church for the purpose of being examined. (3) The bishop had the sole right of consecrating churches and altars.

1. The Right of Approval.—In the earliest period, when the clerks of rural churches were only temporarily detached from the city church, the question of the necessity of the bishop's approval could hardly arise, inasmuch as that approval had already been given in the fact of their original ordination. After the first permanent organization of the church, the right of presbyters to detach themselves from the bishop's church, and form communities for themselves, was, as has been pointed out above, speedily crushed. The practical difficulty began with the foundation of places of worship by private persons on their own estates, or in rural districts which were not as yet recognized as forming part of the "territorium" of a city. Those who founded such places of worship claimed the right to appoint anyone whom they pleased to officiate in them without interference on the part of a neighbouring bishop. But the civil law interfered, in this as in other cases, in the interests of orthodoxy. A law of Arcadius and Honorius in A.D. 404, the year of Chrysostom's second banishment, forbids "nova ac tumultuosa conventicula extra ecclesiam" (Cod. Theodos. 16, 2, 37 = Cod. Justin. 1, 3, 15). In the following century Justinian (Novell. 57, c. 2, A.D. 537) forbade founders of churches from appointing anyone whom they pleased to serve them, without the consent of the bishop. Another Novel (123, c. 18) throws a similar enactment into a positive form by providing that founders of churches may nominate clerks for them, subject only to the clerks being found worthy; but the immediate result of these rules appears to have been an attempt, which was also checked, to dispense with clerks altogether in such places (Justin. Novell. 123, c. 32, 131, c. 8). About the same time similar rules were enacted by a Western council. 4 Conc. Auvcl. A.D. 541, c. 7, will not allow "peregrini clerici" to be appointed to oratories without the consent of the bishop of the "territorium." Still later in the East Conc. Trull. c. 31, 2 Conc. Nicaen. c. 10, forbade clerks from serving chapels or oratories without the consent of the bishop, under penalty of deposition. But the question was not settled in the West until the Carolingian period, when it is clear that a determined struggle took place between bishops and founders. The Capitularies re-enact the rule that no layman could either appoint or eject a presbyter with a frequency which shews that it was frequently broken, e.g. Karoli II. Capit. de Presbyt. c. 2, Pertz, vol. i. p. 161; id. Excerpt. Can. c. 2, Pertz, i. 189; Hludowici, Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 817, c. 9, Pertz, i. 207; Capit. Wormat. A.D. 829, c. 1, Pertz, i. 350 (which places laymen who disregard the rule under the ban of the empire, so also Karoli II. Edictum Pistense, A.D. 861, c. 2, Pertz, i. 489). The bishops in the petition, out of which the Capitularies of Worms resulted, complain that the emperor himself had encouraged the practice in regard to the clergy of his own palace (Constit. Wormat. Petitiō, c. 12, Pertz, i. 340). The reason alleged against absolute freedom of appointment on the part of laymen is that the "acephali," i.e. clerks who owned allegiance to no bishop, were often not reputable persons (Hludowic. 2 Convent. Ticin. I., A.D. 850, c. 18, Pertz, i. 399, id. Convent. Ticin. II. A.D. 855, Pertz, i. 431). The general enactments will be found also in Benedict. Levit. Capit. lib. i. 43, 87, 98, 147, 213; Ansegisi, Capit. lib. i. 84, 141). On the other hand the enactment was made, probably as the result of a compromise, that a bishop was bound to approve a clerk whom a layman presented for approval, except in case of evident scandal (Hludowic. et Hlothar. Constit. Wormat. de persona sacerdotali, c. 15, Pertz, vol. i. p. 337).

2. The Right of Visitation and Discipline.—It is probable that when the churches of great cities founded branch churches in their suburbs the bishop of the city church periodically visited such churches for disciplinary and other purposes. This was at any rate the case at Alexandria at the beginning of the 4th century. The bishop made his circuit (περιοδία), and it was in the course of one of these circuits that Ischyra was presented to the bishop by the presbyters of the Mareotic churches as an offender against the ecclesiastical canons (S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 63, 85, vol. i. pp. 143, 158). The existence of the same practice in the 4th century in the West is shewn, e.g. by Conc. Turon. A.D. 397, c. 2, which, in deciding a dispute between the bishops of Arles and Vienne, decides that each of them is to "visit those churches which are shewn to be adjacent to their respective cities." But there is a remarkable absence of conciliar enactments until the 7th century, when 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 36, recites that bishops ought to visit the parishes within their diocese every year, and in enacting that they may do so by deputy, mentions as the purpose of such visitation an enquiry into the revenues of churches, their state of repair, and the manner of life of their ministers. But it is clear from a canon which was enacted at the same place thirteen years later that the bishop not merely enquired into the revenues of parishes, but claimed a portion of them (7 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 646, c. 4). In other words, the bishop appears to have claimed the same rights over the revenues of dependent churches which he possessed over the revenues of the city church. The limitation of the bishop's claims in this respect forms the subject of many canons and capitularies, even after it had become an established rule that he had no claim to the revenues. Enactments were also made for the purpose of limiting his claim to dues and offerings on the score of the expenses of the visitation, e.g. Karoli M. Capit. Langobard. c. 5, Pertz, vol. i. p. 110; Karoli II. Synod ap. Tolos. A.D. 844, c. 4, Pertz, i. 379 (which, in addition to fixing the precise amount of produce—wine, fowls, eggs, &c.—which is to be offered, rules that if a bishop visits a parish more than once a year he is not to claim his dues more than once), Hludowic. 2 Convent. Ticin. II. A.D. 855, c. 16; Pertz, i. 432. When the rite of confirmation became finally separated from baptism, its administration was added to the purposes for which the visitation was made, and is sometimes spoken of as a principal purpose, e.g. Karolomanni, Capitul. A.D. 742, c. 3; Pertz, vol. i. p. 17, "quandocunque jure canonico episcopus circumcivit parrochiam populos ad confirmandos;" but the burden which this entailed on bishops was probably one of the chief causes of the revival in the Frankish kingdom of the earlier system of rural as distinct from city bishops (Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cleric. 1, 5), which was crushed by the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals. The right of visitation, for all purposes except this of confirmation, might be exercised by deputy (4 Conc. Tolet. c. 36, allows the bishop to depute any "probabiles presbyteros aut diaconos"), and ultimately came to be mainly exercised through the rural archdeacons.

In addition to the supervision over the clerks of parishes which was thus exercised by means of annual or other visitations, it was sometimes enacted that such clerks should periodically present themselves before the bishop in his own church, and give an account of their mode of celebrating divine service (Karolomanni, Capit. A.D. 742, c. 3; Pippini Capit. Succession. A.D. 744, c. 4; Karoli M. Capit. General. A.D. 769, c. 8). Some bishops went so far as to require their clergy not merely to present themselves, but to bring with them their instrumenta ecclesiæ, altar-vessels, and service books (e.g. Theodulph. Aurelian, Capit. ad Presb. 4; Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cv. 193), and in England the Liber Legum Ecclesiast. c. 4, Wilkins, vol. i. p. 266.

The jurisdiction which a bishop came to exercise over the clergy of parishes was not different in kind from that which he exercised over the clergy of the city church. It was carefully guarded by a long succession of enactments both of canon and civil law. The accused clerk seems never to have been without a right of appeal; and the primitive theory that the bishop's jurisdiction attached to him not as sole judge, but as president of the presbytery, seems never to have wholly faded away.

3. The Right of consecrating Churches and Altars.—It seems to have been an early custom that churches should be solemnly dedicated, and it may be assumed that the bishop, as the chief officer of a church or of a district, ordinarily took part in such a dedication. But it is clear that when the parochial system took root in the West the presbyters who were in charge of parishes did not at first consider the presence of a bishop indispensable to such a dedication. 2 Conc. Brac. A.D. 563, c. 19, deposes a presbyter who for the future ("post hoc interdictum") consecrates a church or an altar. And in the following century the canons of St. Patrick enact for the churches of Ireland that "if any presbyter has built a church let him not offer (sc. the Eucharist) until he brings his bishop to consecrate it, for thus is it seemly" (Can. S. Patric. c. 19). It was a later series of enactments which limited the original rights of a presbyter in regard to offering the eucharist, by requiring him not to offer it, unless under pressure of urgent necessity, except in a consecrated place. The earliest enactment to this effect is of doubtful date, resting only on the authority of the Liber Pontificalis and the Pseudo-Isidore (Lib. Pontif. Vit. S. Syric. c. 2; Gest. Synod. S. Silvester. c. 9, ap. Hinschius, p. 450). The other enactments are Carolingian, e.g. Karoli M. Capit. General. A.D. 769, c. 14, Pertz, vol. i. p. 32; Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 801, c. 9; Hludowic. 2 Capit. Eccles. A.D. 856, c. 14, Pertz, vol. i. p. 440, and post Carolingian, e.g. Atton. Vercell. Capit. c. 7, ap. D'Achery, Spicilegium, vol. i. p. 403. By a series of enactments which were certainly not earlier than the preceding, it was provided that if a presbyter offered the eucharist, as he might do in cases of urgency, outside a consecrated building, he should only do so upon a portable altar which a bishop had previously consecrated (Karoli M. Capit. General, A.D. 769, c. 14; Conc. Paris, A.D. 829, c. 47; Hincmar Remens. Capit. A.D. 856, c. 3; Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cxiv. 794).

iv. Internal Organization of Parishes.—(a) The evidence which exists as to the earliest organization of parishes is not sufficient to enable us to frame many general statements respecting it. If the instance of the Batanean town, which has been mentioned above, is to be regarded as typical, it would seem as though the principle of the Jewish synedria had been preserved in the East, and that in each parish there were at least two presbyters to form with the rural bishop a court for the administration of discipline, and two deacons for the dispensing of the church funds to those who were upon the roll. In the West the statement of Ambrosiaster is clearly to the same effect: "aliquantos presbyteros (oportet esse) ut bini sint per ecclesias et unus in civitate episcopus" (Comm. in Epist. 1 ad Timoth. c. iii. 12, ap. S. Ambros. Op. vol. ii. p. 295). In Rome each titulus had at least one presbyter, and ultimately also one deacon and one sub-deacon; but the precise relations of deacons to the tituli in early times are extremely obscure. In Gaul and Spain a single presbyter or a single deacon was sometimes put in charge of a parish, and sometimes a presbyter and a deacon took charge on alternate weeks (Conc. Tarracon. A.D. 516, c. 7). That a deacon might be "rector" of a parish is clear from many instances—e.g. Conc. Illib. c. 77, "diaconus regens plebem," S. Greg. Turon. de Gloria Confessor, c. 30, p. 918, of a deacon who "rexit ecclesiam vici," at Issiøre, near Clermont; but if he alone baptized, the baptism was not complete without the subsequent benediction of the bishop (Conc. Illib. c. 77: the rule was afterwards extended to baptisms by presbyters); and 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 15, disallowed the practice which had grown up of deacons offering the eucharist. But the practice of entrusting parishes to deacons was ultimately forbidden, though apparently not until the 9th century (Hludovic. et Hlothar. Capit. Eccles. A.D. 825, c. 1, Pertz, vol. i. p. 250). There are indications that laymen were sometimes placed in charge of parishes. Conc. Cabillon, A.D. 650, c. 5, enacts that "saeculares qui nectum sunt ad clericatum conversi" are not to be entrusted with the government ("regendum") of either parishes or the property of parishes; Conc. Rem. A.D. 625, c. 19, disallows the appointment of archpresbyters who are not clerks; and among the Culdees of the British Islands lay parsons of parishes, though discouraged by the disallowance of some of the emoluments of the office, are not forbidden (Reeves, Prose Rule of the Celi Dè, p. 94). The question of the appointment of monks to the charge of parishes, which was keenly contested in the middle ages, belongs to a later period. Such appointments are allowed by Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 847, c. 14, with the proviso that the monk is to save his vow of poverty by giving up the revenues of a parish to the bishop or his deputy. But the general rule, which required the ecclesiastical head of a parish to be a presbyter, though broken sufficiently to shew that it was not absolute, was no doubt ordinarily observed. Every parish came to have its priest. If there were several churches within a parish (by which, as will be pointed out below, must not be understood in pre-mediaeval times a district with definite boundaries) each of these churches was required to have its own presbyter. Two or more churches could not be committed to the same presbyter, unless the revenues of the single churches were insufficient for his support (Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 19; 16 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 693, c. 5; Conc. Paris, A.D. 829, c. 49; Hludovic. Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 817, c. 9, Pertz, vol. i. p. 207; Ansegisi, Capit. lib. i. 86, Pertz, vol. i. p. 283). But Hlothar. I. Constit. Papiens A.D. 832, c. 1, absolutely disallows the commission of more than one church to one presbyter, and enacts that unless a poor church is shewn to be necessary, it is to be destroyed; if, on the contrary, it is shewn to be necessary, it is to be endowed with lands by the state. It is important to note that in the expressions which are constantly used in reference to the ecclesiastical head of a parish, whether presbyters or others, the sacerdotal idea is almost always in the background. He is not so much the "sacerdos" as the "rector;" he is said "plebi praeesse;" he is sent—not to administer the sacraments, but "ad regendum" (e.g. 9 Conc. Tolet. c. 2; 11 Tolet. c. 3; Pippin. Capit. Eccles. iv. A.D. 789, c. 81; so also when a parish presbyter resigns his office he is said "ab ordine et titulo et regimine plebis se exuere," Conc. Rem. A.D. 874, c. 1; Migne, P. L. vol. cxv. 796).

(b) It does not appear that any other officers were regarded as necessary to parochial organization. In regard to the earlier period there is no evidence except that which has been given above. But there grew up a feeling against presbyters offering the eucharist without the assistance of other clerks; and it came to be enacted in the West that parish presbyters should both have such clerks, and should take them into their houses in order to train them for the service of the church (2 Conc. Vaison, A.D. 529, c. 1, which speaks of this as being a common custom in Italy; Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 18). These "clerici parochiani" varied in number under different circumstances, and their duties were the ordinary duties of clerks in divine service. They survive in the modern "parish clerk."

(c) The question of the mode in which the presbyter or other chief officer of a parish was appointed in early times is one upon which only scanty evidence exists. It is probable upon general grounds that such appointments did not form an exception to the general rule, which at first required an election by the people and an approval by the bishop, and which afterwards allowed the clergy or the bishop to nominate, and the people merely to approve. But the endowment of parishes by private persons, and the interweaving of the parochial with the canonical and monastic system, so far overlaid the primitive practice that there was in the middle ages only a small proportion of parishes in which the people had any real share in either the election or the approval of their parish priest. The question of patronage, so far as it falls within the limits of the present work, is discussed elsewhere. [PATRON.]

(d) The limits of parishes were probably in almost all cases fixed by the previously existing organization. Where the Roman organization prevailed, the parish was the pagus, vicus, or castellum, with its surrounding territorium. Where, as in England, the Roman organization had been almost completely swept away, the parish was identical with the township or the manor (Stubbs, Constitutional History of England, vol. i. p. 227; Toulmin Smith, The Parish, 2nd edit. pp. 16-22). But, in a large proportion of cases, it is probable that these limits were not precisely defined until the legal enforcement of tithes rendered such a definition necessary. Nor was it until a much later period that parishes came necessarily to adjoin each other; between parishes, as between townships, were frequently tracts of more or less unsettled or common land, on which chapels might be erected without trenching on any parochial rights. It is probable that, in England, the final parcelling of the whole country into parochial districts was not effected until the era of the poor-laws.

PARSONAGE. The information about the official residences of the clergy in early times is excessively slight. But it appears probable that they had such residences. Under the Jewish ritual it is well known that apartments were provided for the priests and Levites within the precinct of the temple itself (1 Chron. ix. 27). The earliest Christian churches had annexes called Pastophoria. "Let the house (church) be oblong, turned towards the east, the pastophoria on either side towards the east, seeing it resembles a ship." (Apost. Constit. ii. 57, Labbe.) What the purpose of these pastophoria was is a moot question. But some writers have thought that they were official apartments for the clergy attached to the church. (See Hofman, Lex. Univ. s. v.) Some colour of probability is lent to this hypothesis by the fact that the LXX make use of the word to designate the chambers of the Levites in the courts of the temple. This opinion is adopted by Bingham (Ecol. Antiq. viii. 7, 11); but he is said to be mistaken by Herzog (Real-Encyclopædie, vol. i. p. 729).

One of the earliest notices of a house for clergy is that in the Apostolical Canons (can. 5. al. 4), where it is prescribed that only ears of corn, grapes, oil for the lamp, and incense may be offered at the altar, and that all other fruits shall be carried to the house, as a first-fruit for the bishop and priests.

This dwelling together of bishops and priests is reflected in the language of later English history. The Excerpta of archbishop Egbricht (A.D. 740, ed. Johnson, no. 26) provide that "Bishops and priests have a house (hospitulum) for the entertainment of strangers, not far from the church." Johnson gives his opinion that at one period the house for the reception of guests was not identical with the residence-house, for fear of the infection which the strangers might bring. The next of the Excerpts (no. 27) enjoins, that though the bishop be elevated above the bench of priests in church, yet in the house he must remember that he is but a colleague of the priests. That the custom of bishop and priests dwelling together prevailed in England up to a comparatively late period (7th century) may be seen from the pages of Bede (Hist. Angl. lib. iv. c. 27, p. 366, Gidley's translation).

St. Augustine mentions that after he was made bishop of Hippo he "had with him in his bishop's house a monastery of clerics," with whom he lived according to apostolic tradition. (See Ad Fratres in Eremo, Sermo xiv. near the beginning; also ibid. Sermo v. about the middle.)

The term domus ecclesiae as the designation of the house of a bishop is very common in the writers of the early centuries. (See Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. lib. i. cap. 39, et passim.) When a bishop died, his house (domus ecclesiae) was to be assigned to proper custody by the bishop who came to bury the deceased. (Conc. Aurelian. ii. can. 6, A.D. 533). A similar direction was given as the council of Rheims, A.D. 630, can. 16. Hofman (Lex. Univ.) gives Episcopium as one of the terms for a bishop's house.

The construction of a house for a bishop was the subject of a direction from the pope (Gregory III.) in the case of Boniface the English missionary to Thuringia: "Make therefore a house in which your father (Boniface) may in person be bound to dwell" (Antonius Augustinus, Juris Pontificii, part 2, p. 3).

The episcopal residence (domus ecclesiae) is in later times on such a scale as to be the scene of a banquet to a member of the royal family (S. Greg. Turon. lib. vii. cap. 27). In England the penalty for breaking into the house of the bishop is put next in order, and apparently in magnitude, to the penalty for breaking into the king's house (Laws of king Ine, A.D. 693).

PASCHA MEDIUM, or MEDIUM PASCHAE, was the Wednesday in Easter week. So Alcuin: "Sexagesima inde dici potest quia lx. sunt dies usque ad medium Paschae, quod est feria quarta paschalis hebdomadis" (Epist. ad Cur. M. Hittorp. 300). Similarly, Rabanus Maurus, his disciple (Instit. Cler. ii. 34), and Amalarius (de Ord. Antiph. 32). [W. E. S.]

PASCHA PETITUM. This was a name given, but not generally, to Palm Sunday in parts where the creed was delivered to the competentes on that day: "Diversis vocabulis distinguitur; id est, dies palmarum sive florum, atque ramorum, osanna, Pascha Petitem, sine competentium, et capitulavium" (Ordo Rom. in Hittorp. 46; similarly in the edition of this Ordo, differing in many respects, printed by Gerbert in Monum. Vet. Liturg. Alem. iii. 195). [TRADITIO SYMBOLI.] [W. E. S.]

PASCHAE CLAUSUM (PASCHA CLAUSA, PASCHA CLAUSUM, CLAUSULA PASCHAE). Most modern writers (as Mabillon, Liturgia Gallicana, 148; Gerbert, Lit. Alem. Disq. x. iv. 2; Ruinart in Greg. Taron. Hist. Franc. ix. 44; Du Cange in v.) identify this with the first Sunday after Easter (Low Sunday, Dies Dominicus post Albas, Dominica in Albis depositis, Quasimodo), but early authorities, whom they do not notice, and certain facts bearing on the question, prove that it was a name given to Saturday in the Easter week. Only the Macri (Hierolexicon in v.) within our reading have stated this correctly, and they give no authority. Others have been probably misled by the fact that Low Sunday is now called Pâque close in France, to which and the neighbouring province of Metz the use of the term Pascha clausum was, so far as appears, confined. It was natural that the name should be transferred when the Saturday ceased to be marked by any special observance, i.e. when the great baptisms of Easter ceased.

Amalarius, A.D. 812, says expressly: "Septuagesima perficitur in Sabbato quod vocatur Clausum Pascha" (De Ord. Antiph. 32). Alcuin, about the same time or earlier: "Videtur Septuagesimus dici posse dies propter decem hebdomadas quae sunt ab ipso die usque clausum Pascha in quo alba tolluntur vestimenta a nuper baptizatis" (Epist. ad Car. Magn. Hittorp. 300). Rabanus Maurus (Instit. Cler. ii. 34) echoes the words of Alcuin. But the newly-baptized laid aside their white dress with ceremony, not on the Sunday, but on the Saturday. Thus Amalarius: "De Sabbato . . . Hodie revertuntur ad fontes, ut exuant se albis" (De Ord. Antiph. 51).

That the Clausum Paschae was a great feast in France might be inferred from the foregoing notices; as also from the facts that Gregory of Tours treats it as a well-known note of time: "Eo anno post Clausum Pascha tam immensa cum grandine pluvia fuit," &c. (Hist. Franc. ix. 44), and from the almost absolute use of the word "clausum" alone, as when the same author says of some persons baptized at Rions: "Nullus ad clausum pertingere potuit vivus" (Glor. Conf. 48). [W. E. S.]

PASCHAL EPISTLES were letters written by patriarchs and archbishops to the bishops within their jurisdiction, and in the case of the pope of Alexandria to the bishop of Rome, if not to other patriarchs, containing a notice of the day on which the next Easter should be kept. They were also called "Festal Epistles" (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vii. 20, 21, ἑορταστικά ἐπιστολά), or "Festal Writs" (ibid. 22, ἑορτ. γράφα), from their connexion with the great feast of Easter

(Eus. u. s. 20). At Alexandria they were first delivered as homilies, being afterwards put into the form of an epistle, and so sent to the provincial bishops. Hence they are sometimes called "Homilies" or "Discourses." They were carried by a special messenger (διακομιστής). Synesius begs a correspondent to treat his messenger kindly coming and going, and to provide him means of proceeding both ways (Ep. 13).

The Office of the Bishop of Alexandria.—It is asserted by Baronius (Annal. Eccles. ad ann. 325), Binius (Labbe, Conc. ii. 69), Dupin (Biblioth. Eccles. under Cyril. Alex.), and many others, that the bishops of Alexandria were expressly requested and authorized by the first council of Nicaea to give annual notice to the whole church, through the incumbents of the principal sees, of the day on which the ensuing Easter was to be celebrated. That the pope of Alexandria did at one time give such notice to the bishop of Rome as well as to those of Egypt is not to be disputed, but it may well be doubted whether he did so in pursuance of any decree of that council, and, again, whether he transmitted a similar notice to the other patriarchs of the East. If we are to be guided by the evidence still extant, we shall rather infer that the custom, whatever its extent, arose from the voluntary deference paid by other churches to that of Alexandria in a question of mathematical science. No formal proof of the alleged conciliar sanction or decree has, to my knowledge, ever been attempted, and the only document that I can meet with which ascribes it to any oecumenical synod appears to me of very doubtful weight. This is the Prologus S. Cyrilli de Festi Pasche Ratione, which is found in Latin only, and in a single MS., seemingly of the 9th century. It was first printed by the Jesuit Aegid. Bucherius after his Comment. in Can. Pasch. Victorii Aquit. Antv. 1633 (Prolog. u. s. or Epist. 87, § 2; Opp. Cyr. Al. x. 383; Migne, lxxvii.). But more, perhaps, has been built on a statement of Leo the Great, who however (Epist. 94, c. 1) speaks only of "the holy fathers" in general. If the council made that arrangement, we should reasonably look for some mention of the fact in the paschal epistles of the bishops of Alexandria, of which a large number are extant, especially in those of Athanasius, who was himself at Nicaea, and, becoming bishop of Alexandria within a year of the conclusion of the council, must have been the first to act on its decree. Yet neither in his first festal epistle nor in any subsequent one does he make any mention of it. Those of Theophilus are equally silent, and so are the festal homilies of Cyril. Twice also within a century of the council of Nicaea we find bishops of Rome consulting those of Milan and Carthage, as will be seen presently, when in doubt as to the right day. We observe also that Leo, in the epistle above mentioned, begged the emperor to help him by applying to "the Egyptians, or to any others who were reported to have certain knowledge of this kind of calculation" (Epist. 94). Marcian wrote to Proterius of Alexandria, who in a long reply justified the calculation which Leo doubted (inter Opp. Leon. p. 203). The pope submitted, and thanked the emperor for his interposition (Ep. 108); but it is remarkable that in his paschal letter to the bishops of Gaul and Spain he does not mention Proterius, but tells them of his application to the emperor, "quo rescribente viii. kal. Maias definitus est dies" (Ep. 109). At this period, then, it appears certain that the bishops of Alexandria were not held to have authority to settle the day for the whole church. That they were held in great esteem for their skill in such questions is clear from some of the testimonies already alleged. See also Dionysius Exiguus, Epist. Paschal. i. in Apparat. ad Baronii Annales, p. 248; and later yet Adrian I. ad Equilam seu Joan. Presbyt. Ep. 70 inter Epp. Carolinas.

Methods of Publication in various Countries.—

The practice of the church, both before and after the Nicene council, will receive further light from the following testimonies. Eusebius tells us that Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, A.D. 247, wrote several paschal letters (Hist. vii. 20–22), in one of which he "set forth a canon for eight years, and proved that it is never right to celebrate the feast of Easter except after the vernal equinox" (u. s. 20). A synod of Arles, 314, thus addresses the bishop of Rome: "Touching the observance of Easter Sunday, we have decreed that it be kept by us on the same day and the same time throughout the whole world, and that thou address letters to all according to the custom" (can. 1). The council of Nicaea, held in 325, settled, with regard to the time, "by the common consent of all, that the most holy feast of Easter should be celebrated on one and the same day" in every church (Ep. Constant. ad Ecclesias; Hard. Conc. i. 449); but we cannot, as before said, find that it imposed on any one bishop the duty of publishing the particular day in each year for the instruction of all others. St. Ambrose says, "even after the calculations of the Egyptians and the decision of the church of Alexandria, most of the bishops of the Roman church are, by their letters, still waiting for my opinion" (Epist. 23, § 8). The question was whether Easter could be kept so late as April 25. In 393 the council of Hippo in Africa decreed "that the venerable day of Easter should be made known to all, 'formatarum subscriptione'" (can. 6; Sinn. Conc. Carth. v. can. 7; Codex Afric. 73); but it does not say by whom the FORMATAE were to be issued. The council of Carthage, 397, determined that, "because of the mistake which is often wont to arise, all the bishops of the province of Africa should be careful to receive the day of paschal observance from the church of Carthage" (cap. 1). To this they afterwards added, "et non sub angusto temporis spatio," and that, as there was to be an annual synod at Carthage, "the holy day of Easter should then be published by the legates" (cap. 41). When this was settled, two bishops present said, "We ask now of this assembly that ye deign to inform our province of the day by letters," on which the president, Aurelius of Carthage, said, "It must needs be so." In 413, Innocent of Rome, writing to Aurelius, expresses his opinion that the next Easter ought to be celebrated on March 22 (xi. kal. Apr.), adding, "It will become your wisdom, my brother and partner, with the like-minded and our fellow-priests [consacerdotibus], to consider this same matter in the most religious synod, that if objection appear to our settlement, you may write back to us fully and openly, that we may beforehand prescribe by letters (as the custom is) the observance of the paschal day, so fixed by deliberation at its proper time" (Epist. 11). Cassian, 424, limits the letters of the bishop of Alexandria to Egypt (Collat. x. 2). A fragment is extant, in Latin, of an epistle, said to have been written in 444 by Cyril of Alexandria to Leo, in which this clause occurs, "Simul Pascha celebremus kal. ix. Maii [April 23] propter rationem embolismi anni" (Ep. Cyr. A. 86; Migne, x. 378; or Opp. Leon. i. 602, ed. Baller). See also the letter of Paschasius, whom Leo consulted, "Id verum invenimus quod ab Alexandrinae ecclesiae antistite beatitudinis tue rescriptum est" (Opp. Leon. (Quen.) 111). The council of Orleans, 541, decreed that the day of the feast should be "notified to the people in church by the bishop," and that, if any doubt arose, the metropolitan should consult "the apostolic see," and abide by its decision (can. 1). At Braga, at a council held on Dec. 15, 571, it was resolved that, before the council dispersed, "the coming Easter of the same year [according to us the next, 572]—on what day of the kalends and in what month it should be kept—be declared by the metropolitan bishop, and that the rest of the bishops, and the other clergy noting this down, should announce it to the people each in his own church" (can. 9). The synod of Auxerre, 578, ordered "all presbyters before the Epiphany to send their messengers [to the bishop], that they might inform them of the beginning of Lent" (can. 2). Gregory of Rome, writing in 598 to the bishops of Sardinia, says that it was a custom of the island for the bishops to go themselves or send their messengers to ask for a written notice of the day on which the next Easter would be celebrated; and that whether they knew it already or not. He exhorted them to be faithful to the custom, which some were beginning to neglect (Epist. vii. Ind. ii. 8). The council of Toledo, 633, shows by the language of its fifth canon that the church of Spain did not receive information on the subject, at that period, either from Rome or the East: "In the Spains, a diversity in the announcement of the paschal feast is wont to happen, a difference in the tables of the festival sometimes causing error. It is, therefore, decreed that the metropolitan bishops inquire of each other by letter three months before the Epiphanies, that, being well instructed through their common knowledge, they may inform their comprouncials of the day of Christ's resurrection." It is probable that the publication of tables of the movable feasts had by this time quite put an end to the paschal epistles of the great patriarchs; but created a difficulty when their accuracy could be questioned, or the last year for which they provided had arrived.

Time of the Announcement.—The festal homilies of Alexandria were preached as a rule on the previous Easter, and then dispersed as letters. A trace of the time is found in many of those that are perfect, e.g. Athanasius: "The season calls us to keep the feast" (i. 3); "Again, my brethren, is Easter come and gladness" (ii. 14), &c.; Cyril: "The present is a time of festival" (v. 44); "Our holy feast now shining" (vi. 60) &c.

Cassian tells us that the epistle was issued from Alexandria "after the day of the Epiphany" (Collat. x. 2). I do not think that we can infer a fixed time from the extant examples, and he may have been misled by the customs of the West. In the West the council of Orleans, in 541, orders the notice to be given in church by the bishop "on the day of the Epiphany" (can. 1). The council of Braga, 572, directs the bishops and the other clergy, "each in his own church, to announce it to the people on the approaching day of the Lord's Nativity, that no one might be ignorant of the beginning of Lent" (can. 9). The Epiphany is also fixed as the time by the council of Auxerre, 578 (can. 2).

PASCHAL TAPER. This was a large taper, which among the other ceremonies of Easter Eve ("sabbatum sanctum") was solemnly blessed before the altar, at Rome by the archdeacon, in Spain by two deacons, then lighted from the newly-struck and blessed fire, and carried in procession before the catechumens to the font. It was afterwards placed before the altar, and was to burn incessantly until after the solemn mass, or the second Vespers, or the Compline service, of Easter Day, according to different rituals: that of Soissons requires it to burn for four consecutive days (Martene de Ant. Eccles. Rit. lib. iv. cap. 24). The symbolism is obvious. In its origin the paschal taper was a special observance of the general custom which, through East and West alike, celebrated that night "much to be observed" by a bright illumination, changing the darkness into light. [See EASTER, CEREMONIES OF, Vol. I. p. 595.] The twofold reference to the new rising of the Sun of Righteousness from the darkness of the tomb, and to the illumination of the newly-baptized, is constantly recalled to mind in the office of the Benedictio Cerei. In the procession of the neophytes, and when the taper precedes the pope, as (according to the old Ordo Romanus) it should do during the whole paschal week, it is taken to represent the pillar of fire which led Israel through the Red Sea.

The institution of the paschal taper has been commonly attributed to pope Zosimus (A.D. 417) on the strength of the notice in the life of him in the Liber Pontificalis, "per parochias concessa licentia cereos benedici," or, according to another version, "per parochias concessit ut cereos benedicerent;" but it was pointed out by Baronius (Annal. in ann. 418) that this really implies the extension to the parish churches of a custom already existing in (probably) the great basilicas. The hymn of Prudentius, "Inventor rutili," commonly sung during the office of the benediction of the taper, cannot be relied on as an argument for the antiquity of the rite, for it is in truth only an excerpt of forty lines from a much longer hymn, which according to the best reading is inscribed ad incensum lucernæ, not de cereo paschali, and which, being No. V. of the Cathemerinon hymns, was clearly intended for daily use at the Vesper service when the candles used to be solemnly lighted. It is possibly, however, alluded to by St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xv. 22) where he says, "in laude quadam cerei breviter versibus dixi," &c. where "cerei," and not "creatoris," seems to be the true reading. Ennodius, bishop of Ticino (died 521), has left two forms of Benedictio cerei, from an expression in one of which it is inferred that the practice of preserving particles of the wax of the taper as charms had already grown up by that time. Gregory the Great (Epist. xi. 33) and can. 9, C. Tolet. IV. both speak clearly of the paschal taper; various customs grew up round the rite in later times, such as that of making five holes in the taper, or attaching five grains of incense to it, of stamping upon it the date, the indiction of the current year, or the letters A and Q, or of fastening to it inscriptions of various kinds, of which examples may be seen in Martene (u. s.). (See the various rituals and commentaries on the office in Sabbato Sancto, and Mabillon de Lit. Gall. p. 141.) [C. E. H.]

PASSION SUNDAY. The fifth Sunday in Lent has from ancient times been called Dominica Passionis or de Passione Domini, because from it begins the more special commemoration of the suffering of Christ. An Anglo-Saxon homily (Ælfric's Homilies, ii. 224 f.) for the fifth Sunday in Lent commences by stating that from that day until Easter the time is designated Christ's Passion-tide (Wheatley on the Common Prayer, ed. Corrie, p. 241, n. 6). In token of sadness the Gloria Patri is generally omitted at this season in responsories, invitatories, and introits. The character of the season is strikingly shewn in the Mozarabic Mass for the day. In modern times, in England at least, the name "Passion-Week" is commonly given to HOLY WEEK. [C.]

PASTOPHORUM. A chamber attached to the outside wall of a church, and approached from within, used as a vestry, sacristy, treasury, as well as a living and sleeping room. Παστός being an inner chamber, especially a bridal chamber with embroidered hangings, came to signify the shrine of a deity, and the priests whose duty it was to carry the shrine were called pastophori (Παστοφόροι). (Diod. i. 29; Clem. Alex. Paedag. iii. c. 2; Stromat. vi. c. 4), and the chambers where they resided in the precincts of the temple pastophoria (Παστοφορεία or Παστοφώρα). The word is of frequent occurrence in the LXX in this or an allied sense, usually as the translation of הַכֶּזֶבֶת, and generally to designate the chambers annexed to the tabernacle or temple, for the habitation of the priests and other ministers, or for the reception of the offerings in money, corn, fruits, or other stores (1 Chr. ix. 26, 33; xxiii. 28; xxviii. 12; 2 Chr. xxxi. 11; Isa. xlii. 15; Jer. xxxv. 4; Ezek. xl. 17, 38; Esdr. viii. 59). The Vulgate rendering is usually exedrae, sometimes gazophylacium (Jer. xxxv. 4; Ezek. xl. 17, 38) or tabernaculum (Isa. xlii. 15); in 2 Chr. xxxi. 11, horrea. Its use in Christian nomenclature was equally extensive, sometimes denoting the apartments of the bishop and clergy and ministers and keepers of the church; sometimes a vestry or treasury. Bona regards it as synonymous with the diaconicon or vestiarium, "quod barbara voce sacristia nuncupatur" (Bona, Rer. Liturg. lib. i. c. xxiv. § 2). This is the sense in which the word is used in the Apostolic Constitutions, where after the faithful had communicated in both kinds the deacons were directed to take what was left and carry it into the "pastophorium" (Ap. Const. lib. viii. c. 13; Bingham, Orig. Eccl. bk. viii. ch. vii. § 11; Binterim, Denkwürdig. ii. 2, 143; Schelstrate, Conc. Antioch. p. 186). [E. V.]

PASTOR (1), with his brother Justus, youthful martyrs; commemorated at Complutum in Spain, Aug. 6 (Usuard. Mart.; Florus, Mart. ap. Bed.); Aug. 25 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) And Ambrose, commemorated Dec. 25 in the Sacramentary of Leo (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 467). [C. H.]

PASTOR (ποιμήν). (1) When St. Paul (Ephes. iv. 11) speaks of ποιμένες, "shepherds," he seems to describe not so much those admitted to a distinct order or office, as those who "took the oversight" of the flock, under whatever designation. Thus ἐπίσκοποι are said (Acts xx. 28) to "be the shepherds" of the church; and, again, πρεσβύτεροι are warned (1 Pet. v. 2) to "be shepherds" to the flock of God, even as Christ is "shepherd and bishop" of our souls (1 Pet. ii. 25). And the Latin word "pastor" retained for the most part this vagueness; it designated a minister of the church considered as guiding and governing a flock. More especially it designated a bishop; hence in later times "pastoralitas" came to mean the dignity of a bishop or abbat, and "pastorare" to exercise the functions of a bishop or abbat (Ducange, s. v.).

(2) The ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH was sometimes called "pastor laicus" (Ducange). [C.]

PASTORAL STAFF. (Ράβδος, βακτηρία, νάρθηξ; baculus, virga, ferula, pedum, cambuta, capuita, crocea, crozzia, stampella, crosse.)

The word has assumed a multitude of forms, partly, no doubt, from the vagaries of the copyists: cambutta, cabuta, cambioia, cambuca, cambucca, camputa, capuita, combucca, gabuca, sambuta, &c.

Migne (Dict. Orfèvre s. v., following the learned monograph of Barrault and Martin) traces the word cambuta to the Irish missionaries in the time of the Merovingians. This he considers more probable than its connexion with κάμπτω and καμπύλη, a curved staff.

The name ferula (ferio) points to the correctional use of the staff.

The etymology of crosse is controverted. We have the forms crochia, croqua, crocula, and also crocca, crosssea, croga, crossa. Some of these forms may be traced to croc and crochet, whilst others suggest crus and the Italian croce. Magri observes (Hierolex s. v.) that the pastoral staff was called crocea (Anglicè, crutch), from the use that was made of it as a support in walking.

The most ancient crosiers (sic) appear, says a learned writer, to have been much shorter than those of succeeding ages. That of St. Severinus, bishop of Cologne, who died in the year 400, served him as a walking-stick (Archæologia, xvii. 37).

There are no grounds for saying whether the pastoral staff, when it was first adopted as an emblem, was designed to be the symbol of duty or of jurisdiction; whether it betokened the shepherd's duty of tending the flock of God or (as a form of sceptre) the right and the responsibility of a ruler. Both these ideas seem to be combined in one of the earliest Latin authorities on the subject—the passage of St. Isidore of Seville (A.D. 560–636), who says that the staff was given to a bishop as a token that he "vel regat, vel corrigat, vel infirmitates infirmorum sustineat" (de Officiis Ecclesiasticis, cap. v.).

The term "pastoral staff" seems to point to the shepherd's crook as the prototype of the wand or sceptre which has symbolized the ministerial office from very early times. Indeed, Suicer (Thesaurus Eccles. s. v. βακτηρία) thus unhesitatingly assigns its origin: "Because the ministers of the church are called shepherds, and their duty is to feed the flock of God, namely, the church, therefore to them is given a staff or rod."

There is an undoubted propriety in the symbol so interpreted. But we may not yet have arrived at the bottom of the matter, if we rest here; for there is some reason to think that the pastoral staff of the Christian clergy was but an adoption with a new significance of a religious usage older than Christianity itself. The sculptures and coins of Italian paganism shew us that the augurs of antiquity bore a staff (lituus) very closely resembling the pastoral staff. It was with such a staff, in fact, that the augur divided the expanse of heaven (templum) into regions for the purpose of divination. The annexed figure from an Etruscan sculpture will give an idea of the augur's staff. In connexion with this figure it should be observed that the early form of pastoral staff appears to have been quite short—much shorter than the specimens of mediæval art that have survived to us (Reusens, Éléments d'Archéologie chrétienne, Louvain, 1871). The form of the lituus might in some degree account for this. On the other side, however, it ought, perhaps, to be noticed that the lituus had to be borne in the right hand, whilst the handling of the pastoral staff does not appear to have been so restricted. In extant representations the pastoral staff is held sometimes in the right and sometimes in the left hand. Such a variation, however, will hardly be thought sufficient to negative the possibility of the hypothesis—which has the authority of Mosheim (Instit. Eccl. Hist. pt. ii. chap. iv.)—that the pastoral staff is one of those many things which with but slight alterations the early Christians felt at liberty to adopt from paganism as being accepted symbols of piety and reverence.

According to another theory of its origin, the pastoral staff is a survival in the case of bishops of what was once to be seen in the hands of all. It is, in fact, the episcopal walking-stick. Thomassin, Grancelas, and other liturgists of modern times, have vindicated an origin of this kind for the staff. According to them it is no other than the crutch or staff (sustentaculum, reclinatorium) which at first was permitted to the aged and infirm, and which afterwards became general as a support while standing in church. When seats were introduced into choirs, the reclinatorium was doomed to disappear, and (according to these writers) survived in the hand of prelates alone as emblems of honour. The flaw in this theory appears to be that the reclinatorium certainly remained in general use long after the date at which we can trace the pastoral staff.

We now reach the question by whom the pastoral staff was used.

(a) Pope.—It is commonly said that the pope never carried a pastoral staff. The reason assigned for this custom cannot be better given than in the words of Innocent III. "The Roman pontiff does not use the pastoral staff, because St. Peter the Apostle sent his staff to Eucharius, the first bishop of Trèves, whom he appointed with Valerius and Maternus to preach the Gospel to the German race. He was succeeded in his bishopric by Maternus, who was raised from the dead by the staff of St. Peter. The staff is down to the present day preserved with great veneration by the church at Trèves." (De Sacro Altaris Mysterio, lib. i. cap. 62.) It is sarcastically observed by Cahier, a Jesuit writer, that St. Peter must have repeated more than once the sacrifice of his pastoral staff, for several places claim to have it. The same writer, however, shews that there is reason to think that popes did bear the pastoral staff up to the 11th century, and he gives a figure of Gregory the Great bearing a staff from a miniature of the 13th century. This figure we reproduce here (Cahier, Caractéristiques des Saints, p. 298).

Gregory the Great. (From Cahier.)

Barraut indeed says (p. 25) that the portrayal of St. Gregory with a staff proves only the ignorance of the illuminator in the 13th century. Perhaps however, this is not quite fair. It may shew that the present question was in debate in the 13th century, and the plate before us may be the record of the view which the illuminator took in the controversy.

Another representation of Gregory the Great with a staff (though it is of a different shape, being surmounted with a cross) is published by the Arundel Society. This singular monument, says Mr. Marriott (Vestiarius Christianum, p. 237), is assigned by antiquaries to the year 700 or thereabouts. The figure is easily accessible in Mr. Marriott's work, and therefore need not be reproduced here.

A third figure of Gregory the Great with a staff is that which was given to the brothers

Gregory the Great. (From Macri Hierolex.)

Magri for the Hierolexicon (p. 65, ed. Romae, 1677), and which is believed to be contemporary with St. Gregory himself.

Migne (Dict. de l'Orfèvrerie, s. v. Crosse) denies that the popes ever used the pastoral staff properly so called; but he admits that they had a baton, which was straight as a sceptre. This, however, would hardly differentiate it from the pastoral staff proper, which was not restricted to a particular shape. Baronius, it may be mentioned, concludes that the staff is to a bishop what a sceptre is to a king. It should be borne in mind that, when writers contend that the pope bore a pastoral staff, they do not probably intend to say that the staff was always curved. Krazier indeed (De Liturgiis, p. 353) shews that the oft-quoted words of Innocent III., in which he is understood to disclaim the pastoral staff for the pope, are to be understood as disclaiming only the curved staff of ordinary bishops. By some writers (e.g. Martin and Barrault) a distinction is drawn between the cambuta, the crook or T shaped staff, as the symbol of the pastoral office, and the ferula or sceptre-like staff which betokened sovereign authority. Such writers in the Roman Catholic interest are not unwilling to admit that the pope carried the ferula, whilst denying that he had the cambuta. It would obviously be a great gain to their position if it could be shewn that from the earliest days the symbol of the pastoral care had not been associated with the person of the pope, whilst the emblem of sovereignty had always been so—that, whilst the one character had, of course, been understood, the other had been with the emphasis of the very symbolism pointedly affirmed as attaching to him.

In judging, however, of this vexed question, this point is not to be forgotten, that we do not find any trace of the disposition to repudiate the pastoral staff for the pope until about the 12th century, which is at least a suspicious epoch on a question which in no indirect way concerns the glorification of the temporal sovereignty.

(β) Bishops.—On the early use of the staff by bishops, we may quote the authority of Baronius (ad ann. 504, n. 38), who says that bishops employed the staff certainly in the 4th century. The earliest mention of it given by Maskell (Monum. Rit. iii. 273) as forming a part of the rite of consecration of a bishop is the passage quoted above from Isidore of Spain (A.D. 560-636).

In the early part of the 5th century there seems no reason to doubt, says a competent writer, that St. Patrick took with him to Ireland, when he went to preach the Gospel there, the pastoral staff which afterwards became so famous under the name of the Staff of Jesus (Archæologia, xvii. 36).

In the will of St. Remigius (Flodoard. Hist. lib. i. cap. 18) mention is made of a pastoral staff carved and covered with gold plates.

The earliest mention of the "staff" among Latin writers appears to be in the letter which was addressed by pope Coelestine (A.D. 423-432) to the bishops of the provinces of Vienne and Narbonne on the subject of episcopal dress (Labbe, Conc. ii.). "By dressing in a cloak (pallium) and putting a girdle round their loins, they think that they shall fulfil the truth of Scripture not in the spirit, but in the letter. For if the precepts in question were given with a view to being kept in such a fashion, why are not the subsequent precepts equally observed by holding burning lamps in the hand as well as a staff."

Amongst the Greek writers there is a mention of the pastoral staff as early as the time of St. Gregory of Nazianzum (cent. 4). He says (Oratio 42): "I know the staff which can support and the one which belongs to pastors and teachers, and which corrects the sheep which have reason."

In the Life of Caesarius, bishop of Arles (A.D. 469-542), written by Cyprian, his pupil, mention is made of the pastoral staff being "borne by his chaplain (notarius)" (Martene de Rit. lib. i. cap. 8, x. 18.) So early as the time of Romanus, archbishop of Rouen about A.D. 623, we find the investiture taking place at the hands of the king by giving the pastoral staff ("Rex . . . baculum illi contulit pastoralem").

In modern times a bishop is represented with a crook, an archbishop with a cross or crosier, a patriarch with a cross having two transverse bars, and the pope with a cross of three bars. But there is no appearance of this classification within the epoch embraced by this Dictionary.

The carrying of the crosier before a metropolitan in any place was a token that he claimed jurisdiction there. Hence in later times arose difficulties, when, for example an archbishop of York was not allowed the use of his cross at a coronation (see Archæologia, xvii. 38).

(γ) Abbats and Abbesses.—The proof that in very early days abbats had the staff is found by Barrault (p. 5) in the fact that mention is never made of the staff in the pontifical bulls (of which one is quoted as having been issued by Theodore I. in A.D. 643), granting to abbats the use of episcopal insignia. The gloves, the mitre, the ring, and others are specified, but never the staff. This, Barrault argues, could only be because abbats already had the staff. But whether this be accounted as proof or not, we have explicit mention of the abbat's staff as early as the 7th century. In the Life of St. Gall, who lived in the early part of that century, we have this mention of the abbatial staff of Columban: "Qui et baculum ipsius, quem vulgo Cambottam vocant, per manum diaconi transmiserunt dicentes, Sanctum Abbatem ante transitum suum jussisse ut per hoc notissimum pignus Gallus absolveretur." It appears not to have been till a later period that the privilege of abbats was conceded to abbesses.

The assumption of the staff seems always to have formed part of the ceremonial of investiture in the case of an abbat. It is so mentioned in the penitential of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury in the 7th century. There are many surviving forms of the ritual employed on these occasions; but with the exception of the passage just quoted, it is not easy to say with certainty that any one of them falls strictly within the limit of time embraced in this work. Several, however, belong certainly to a period not much later; and the investiture with the staff is so generally mentioned in them as to lead to the inference that the usage was already a general and accepted one. Pugin, indeed, observes (Glossary, s. v.) that abbats did not borrow the use of the pastoral staff from the episcopal order, as they afterwards did that of the mitre, but that they had this distinction from the beginning.

(δ) Others.—It does not appear that any other persons commonly used what could be properly called a pastoral staff. Hofmann, however (Lex. Univ. s. v. Baculus), quotes Philostratus as an authority for the use of it by priests in the East. But in the Eastern church there is always a risk of mistaking for an official baton the ordinary sub-axillary staff which even laymen carried to church.

Shape.—Owing to the entire absence of primitive representations, there is no absolute proof that the earliest form of the staff was that of a crook (we know, indeed, that in some cases they terminated in a globe or a cross); but, as Pugin observes, the crook form is exceedingly ancient, and as we have seen above in the case of the lituus, was not unknown amongst the emblems of religion, even in pre-Christian times.

The Catacombs furnish no evidence on the subject. There is indeed a figure of Amachius bearing a curved staff (Buonarroti, Vet. Ant. pl. xviii. p. 128), which might be taken for an example of it, but which is more probably a picture of the augur's rod. The earliest forms of the staff cited by Barrault are those put in the hands of two figures of St. John the Apostle, from a MS. in the British Museum, which (he says, on the authority of the custodians of MSS. in that institution) is a copy of a Spanish MS. that belongs to the era of the Goths. If that be so, it need hardly be said that the representations (which we engrave here) are of immense interest and importance in showing the development of the staff at so distant an epoch.

St. John with Pastoral Staff. (Barrault.)

The second of these figures gives an example of the foliated cross. It will be observed that this staff could not be intended for use as a reclinatorium, because it is the full height of the man himself. Similar representations are found elsewhere—in a MS. of the abbey of Elnon, which is conjectured to belong to the latter part of the 7th century; in the staff of Montreuil-sur-mer (fig. 1A), which local tradition assigns to the abbess St. Austrebertha (temp. Clovis II.), and in the ancient carving in the outer wall of the Church of St. Thomas at Strasburg, which is believed to belong to the first half of the 9th century. The extreme antiquity alleged for these monuments will not, perhaps, be accepted with the same confidence in all the several cases, but the details of the Strasburg carving carry upon the face of it the conviction that the date (830) claimed for it (Barrault, p. 22) is not far from the truth.

Independently of the few monuments that have survived, we find that a writer of the time of Charles the Bald (died A.D. 877) could even then speak of the curved staff as an antiquity (Mabillon, Acta SS. Ben. Saec. iii. pt. ii. p. 244).

In the case of the curved staff we can distinguish three constituent parts—the point, the Remigius is an example of early work in precious metal. The so-called staff of St. Augustine (which Gavantus thinks is at Valentia in Spain, while Baronius (in anno 504) places it in Sardinia) is made of ivory. Besides wood, ivory and the precious metals as the material of the pastoral staff, we find mention of horn, brass, iron, lead, and even crystal, both for the volutes and the knobs of the rod. It is possible, however, that the surviving specimens made in base metal were not actually borne, but were rod, and the crook or volute. The purpose of these several parts was embodied in the line which appears on the staff of St. Saturninus at Toulouse—

"Curva trahit, quos virga regit, pars ultima pungit."

Latin bishops, says Magri, bear a staff curved at the top; Maronite bishops a staff surmounted by a globe and cross (which, it may be observed, is also the form of the staff in the figure of Gregory the Great that is engraved with this article; the globe alone is found in an Anglo-Saxon MS. of the 9th century engraved by Dr. Rock); and Greek bishops carry a staff in the form of a T cross. This form perhaps points to the use of the staff as a support (fulcratorium). But in the East, where they do not sit in church, secular persons, as well as ecclesiastics, supported themselves at divine service on a staff of this shape.

Material.—The means of judging what materials were employed in primitive times are excessively scanty. It seems, however, to be generally agreed that wood entered into the fabrication of the pastoral staff. Martigny says that in primitive times it was of wood, and he adds that it was of cypress most commonly (Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Evêques). It may however, be doubted whether any evidence of the cypress is forthcoming which is of an earlier date than the staff sent to Stephen, bishop of Tournai (cent. 12), and afterwards presented by him to the bishop of Orleans. Staves of wood are cited by Barrault as existing at Montreuil-sur-mer, Ratisbon, the treasury of Cologne, and elsewhere. The same writer states that whilst the rod was of wood, the upper part, whether in the shape of a tau or of a volute, was of a more precious material. Ivory was especially used for the tau-shaped staff. The staff of St.

merely copies made for interment with a deceased abbat or bishop.

A question arises as to whether the right or the left hand held the pastoral staff, or whether either did it indiscriminately. We have seen above in this article that the pastoral staff was not in this respect regulated by the laws of the lituus, which had to be held in the right hand. The most common usage, in later representations at least, is for a bishop to hold his staff in the left hand, while he raises the right in the act of benediction. Nor does there appear any reason to suppose that in that solemn act the staff was ever held otherwise than in the left hand. Yet there are many representations of bishops, when not engaged in the act of benediction, holding the staff sometimes in the right and sometimes in the left hand. The truth of the matter appears to be that whilst a bishop in benediction always bore his staff in the left hand, upon any other occasion he was free to hold it in either hand as best suited his pleasure or convenience. The annexed plate (p. 1570), which is extracted from the work of Barrault, is described by him as an abbat blessing his monks. It is of the Carolingian period, and shews the act of benediction at an early date.

Dr. Rock (Church of our Fathers, vol. ii.) has verified a large number of ancient representations, and they fail to bear out the alleged rule either in regard to holding the staff always in the left hand, or in regard to the volute having any particular direction.

It remains only to add that as the giving of the staff was a ceremonial of investiture (De Marca de Conc. Eccl. et Imp.), so the surrender of it was the token of abdication, and the breaking of it was that of deposition. By the fourth council of Toledo (cent. 7) it was ordained that in the restoration of a deposed bishop the baculus should be placed in his hand (can. 28). See Thomassin, Discipline, pt. 2, lib. i. c. 23, s. 7.

In the Celtic Church.—The staff of the bishop and also, at a later date, of the abbat, was the Bachal or Bachuil, and Cambata of the Latinised Celtic church, which frequently appears in the legends of her saints. Thus St. Kentigern and St. Columba exchanged their staves at parting on the banks of the Melendinor (Vita S. Kent, c. 40), and St. Columba on another occasion gave his staff (Mor Bachall) to Scanlann, prince of Ossory (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 433). The Bachall mor of St. Moloc is preserved at Inverary Castle, Argyshire, and the Quigrich of St. Fillan has lately been returned from Canada and placed in the Antiquarian Museum, Edinburgh. The staves or croziers of St. Mun, St. Fergus, and St. Donnan, after having been preserved at Kilmure, Argyshire, at St. Fergus, and at Auchterless, both in Aberdeenshire, and used (certainly the last) for superstitious purposes, are lost with that of St. Serf, and with the Bachall Isa of St. Patrick. But though the Quigrich of St. Fillan is rich in design and workmanship (Wilson, Prehist. Ann. Scot. 664 sq.; Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. xii. 122 sq.) and the Bachall mor of St. Moloc bears traces of a metal covering, the original staves of the saints appear to have been of the plainest description, without a volute and having only a slightly curved head; while it is only the veneration of later ages which has ornamented them with the precious metals and jewels, and carvings of elaborate design. Many of these staves have been carefully preserved, or in later days found, in Ireland, and are to be met with in public and private collections of antiquities, some plain but others richly decorated (Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. viii. 330; Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. ii. 12 sq. xi. 59; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2nd ser. 182-3; Reeves, St. Adamnan, 366-7; Killen, *Ch. Hist. [J. G.]

PATAPIUS, "our father," ascetic of Constantinople, native of Thebes in Egypt; com-

primitive paten differed in little or nothing from a vessel of domestic use; and until the primitive practice of employing the cakes of bread brought as oblations by the congregation was superseded by that of using wafers made expressly, patens were often of large size. Such were the patens weighing from twenty to thirty pounds each which are mentioned in the Liber Pontificalis as given by various popes in the 4th, 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries (v. Lives of popes Mark, Hormisdas, Sergius and Gregory III.).

According to Bona (Rerum Liturgicarum I. xxv. 3) these large patens were ministeriales, and were not used by the priest celebrating, but only in distribution to the people.

Patene chrismales are also mentioned which, according to Bona, were "ad usum baptismatis et confirmationis," but very little would appear to be known as to their use.

It is obvious from what has been said above that patens in the larger churches were in the earlier ages often of great size. Roman silver was extremely massive, but patens weighing 25 lbs. must have been of very considerable dimensions. A modern circular salver 15 inches in diameter may weigh about 5 lbs., and the size of those weighing 20 and 25 lbs. may thence be roughly inferred to have been not less than 2 feet to 2½ feet in diameter, if circular, and very probably much more. If the material were gold, the size would of course be much smaller. Many, doubtless, were much less. The golden paten (if it be one) found at Gourdon measures about 7½ inches by 5½ inches, and the circular paten found in Siberia measures 7 inches in diameter.

Patens were probably usually circular; two so formed are shewn on an altar in a mosaic in S. Vitale in Ravenna, the building of which church was commenced in A.D. 547. In S. Apollinare ad Classem, near the same city, a building of about the same date, two objects, which it would seem are intended for patens, are of a sexfoil shape (Webb, Continental Ecclesiology, p. 440). One octagonal in form is said in the Liber Pontificalis to have been given by pope Gregory IV. (A.D. 827-844) to the church of S. Maria in Via Lata in Rome; mention is made in the same work of a covered paten of gold weighing 25 lbs. which pope Leo III. gave to the church of St. Peter. That of Gourdon is oblong in form, from which fact it has been doubted whether it was really a paten.

The material was most commonly silver, but not unfrequently gold; e.g. the Byzantine emperor Michael sent to pope Nicholas I. "Patenam ex auro purissimo cum diversis lapidibus pretiosis, albis, prasinis et hyacinthinis" (Lib. Pontif. in vita Nicolai). Pope Zepherinus (A.D. 203-221) is said in the Lib. Pontif. to have ordered that patens of glass should be borne before the priests in the churches when masses were celebrated. They were not unfrequently formed of this material. Gregory of Tours (de Mirac. S. Martini, lib. 4, c. 10) mentions a paten of a sapphire colour, which doubtless was of glass; and the "sacro catino" at Genoa of green glass, which, through the middle ages was supposed to be an emerald, may very possibly have been a paten; it is hexagonal. Cav. de Rossi has given engravings (Boll. di Arch. Crist. 1864, p. 80, fig. 5) of fragments found at Cologne of a glass vessel almost a foot in diameter which he believes to have served as a paten; and another almost entire exists in the Slade collection in the British Museum (Cat. of Slade Coll. p. 50), which was originally about 10 inches in diameter; this was also found at Cologne, and may perhaps be assigned to the 4th or 5th century; the decoration of these vessels is described below. In the treasury of St. Mark at Venice are two or three shallow basins of glass, which have probably been used as patens; they are, however, possibly later in date than the period embraced by this work. Other materials were sometimes used; in the same treasury is a Byzantine paten of alabaster, about 13½ inches in diameter, and several shallow vessels, probably once used as patens, of agate, sardonyx, or other semi-precious stones, handsomely mounted in silver gilt with inserted gems. It is impossible to affix precise dates to most of these, but if they do not belong to the period treated of in these volumes, we can no doubt form from them correct ideas as to the forms, sizes, and decorations of patens during some centuries antecedent to A.D. 1204, about which time they were probably brought from Constantinople to Venice with the other spoil obtained when that city was taken by the Crusaders.

As the vessels used in the earliest times as patens were either actually such as had served domestic uses or, as in the case of chalices, were formed upon the same models, and as the Christians of the earlier ages undoubtedly were in the habit of ornamenting their domestic utensils with crosses and other religious symbols, it is often a matter of much difficulty to distinguish between vessels which were and which were not intended to be used exclusively in the rites of the church. Thus it has been doubted by that eminent authority, Padre Garrucci, whether the golden vessel found at Gourdon, and shewn in the accompanying woodcut, was intended to be used as a paten, although it is decorated with a cross. His chief reason for the doubt is its form, there being, he thinks, no instance known of a paten thus shaped. As, however, the form would be by no means inconvenient, and as we have an instance, as mentioned above, of an octagonal paten, the objection does not seem decisive. We have but few examples of early patens, and it seems quite possible that some may have had this oblong form, one not uncommon in Roman silver vessels, for secular examples, probably of the 5th century, may be seen in the British Museum, and the Corbridge Lanx is an earlier instance. In favour of the supposition that it was actually a paten, it may be remarked that it was found with a chalice (v. CHALICE), and that the centre has a cross which is in slight relief, a circumstance which would seem to make it ill-suited for the ordinary purposes of domestic life. That patens were so decorated, we may learn from the passage in the Liber Pontif., where we are told that pope Sergius (A.D. 687-701) gave to the Vatican Basilica "patenam auream majorem habentem gemmas albas et in medio ex hyacintho et smaragdo crucem"). It was found with coins of the earlier part of the 6th century, but may perhaps be still older. The octagonal paten alluded to above was decorated in the centre with the head of our Lord, having on the one side the head of St. Mark, and on the other that of pope Gregory IV., the donor.

The paten shewn in the other cut is of silver gilt, and was found in one of the Berozovoy isles in Siberia, in the year 1867; it weighs about a pound and a half, and measures about 6 inches in diameter. Cav. de Rossi (Boll. di Ant. Crist. 1871, p. 153) is of opinion that it is of Byzantine origin, and dates probably from about the 7th century.

The paten of alabaster mentioned above has in the centre a medallion with a half-length figure of our Lord in cloisonné enamel; on another, also in the treasury of St. Mark's (of agate or sardonyx?) is a similar medallion, with the words, λάβετε φάγετε τοῦτ' ἐστὶ τὸ σῶμα. These may perhaps be assigned to the 10th or 11th century.

The paten of glass found at Cologne, of which only fragments remain, was of clear uncoloured glass ornamented by three concentric circles of medallions of blue transparent glass of varying dimensions. The larger of these are decorated with figures, the smaller with rosettes, all executed by the application of gold leaf, which has been removed except where required to form the figures, which were then completed by a few lines marking out the features, folds of drapery, and other details. The subjects of these medallions are chiefly Biblical—Adam and Eve, the story of Jonah, that of Daniel, the sacrifice of Isaac, &c. In most cases only one figure is to be found in each medallion. The centre was probably occupied by a figure of the Good Shepherd, symbolizing our Lord.

The paten of glass mentioned above as being in the Slade collection in the British Museum is decorated with gold leaf by the same method, and with enamelling in blue, green, and red; but the subjects are not in medallions, but arranged, as will be seen in the woodcut, in eight compartments, divided by slender columns. The subjects of these are—Jonah coming out of the whale, and in the background, reclining under the gourd, Jonah thrown overboard; the paralytic man carrying his bed; the Nativity; the sacrifice of Isaac, or perhaps, more probably, the baptism of our Lord; the three Hebrew youths in the furnace; and Daniel in the lions' den. Of the centre, small fragments only remain, but on them may be distinguished a figure of an animal, apparently a sheep, and the letters EO . . .

DULCIN, The subject was, there can be no doubt, the Good Shepherd.

Another vessel of glass, which may very probably have served as a paten, is in the collection of M. Basilewsky at Paris. It has been figured and described twice in Cav. de Rossi's Bullettino (1874, p. 153; 1877, p. 77), and will be treated of a third time in the same publication. It would appear to be 9 inches in diameter, and is a shallow dish. De Rossi does not call it a paten, but a "piatto"; the central subject, Abraham about to sacrifice Isaac, seems, however, one very appropriate to a paten. Round the central subject are the following subjects: the history of Jonah; the temptation of Adam; the raising of Lazarus; a figure striking a tree, whence issues water; Daniel in the lions' den; the three Hebrew youths in the furnace; and Susanna and the elders. The subjects are accompanied by inscriptions, which contain many irregularities, e.g. Abraham occurs in place of Adam, and that attached to the figure striking the tree reads, "Petrus virga perculit." The lines of the engraving are scratchy and irregular and apparently done with a diamond point. The art is of the lowest order, but Cav. de Rossi thinks that the date may be circa A.D. 400 ("tra il quarto e il quinto secolo"). It was found in Podgoritza, the ancient Doclea, in Dalmatia.

Occasionally patens bore inscriptions commemorating the donor, or containing mention of the church to which they belonged. One of silver, of the 5th or 6th century, which belonged to the Vatican Basilica, has been illustrated by Fontanini (Discus Argenteus rotivus veterum Christianorum, Romae, 1726).

As ancient examples of patens are so uncommon, it is desirable in illustration of the subject to mention examples in which they are represented in works of art of early date. Represent-tations in early art of liturgical or ritual acts are of the greatest rarity, and few can be found in which the celebration of the Eucharist is represented. One of these, that in which Melchisedek is represented as if officiating at an altar, in a mosaic in the church of S. Apollinare ad Classam at Ravenna, has been already adverted to. On the paliotto of the high altar of S. Ambrogio at Milan, in the panel in which the saint is represented at the altar, no paten at all is shewn, but four small round cakes, perhaps 3 to 4 inches wide, disposed in a cruciform order, and marked with two lines crossing each other. This monument dates from A.D. 835. In the Public Library at Frankfort on the Main is preserved a piece of carved ivory formed like the half of a diptych, which probably once formed part of the binding of some service book, from a part of which the annexed cut, representing an archbishop celebrating mass, is taken. The carver may be supposed to have intended to represent a paten about 6 inches in diameter. This carving is probably of the 9th century.

The last example to be noticed is, although of early date, not within the limit of this work; but some mention of it should be made. It is the group which forms part of the embroidery of the dalmatic called that of pope Leo III., but which probably dates from a period not far from A.D. 1200, and is of Byzantine work. In this our Lord is represented as standing behind an altar, and extending to one of His apostles, with His right hand, a loaf or cake of bread, circular in form, and indented by two lines crossing each other, while he holds another similar cake in his left hand. On the altar stands a paten, a circular vessel with upright sides, and less shallow than patens would seem to have usually been; in proportion to the figures, its diameter would seem to be about 12 inches, and its depth about 4 inches. In it are two small circles, and two cakes, each composed of four circles of the size of the lesser ones. The best engravings of this dalmatic are those given in the Kleinodien heil. Röm. Reiches. PATER. [FATHER.]

PATERMUTHIUS, martyr under Julian; commemorated July 9 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 703). [C. H.]

PATERNUS, bishop and confessor; commemorated at Coutances Ap. 16 (Bed. Mart. Auct.; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 427); Sept. 23 (Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

PATIANUS, bishop in the time of Theodosius; commemorated at Barcelona Mar. 9 (Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

PATIENS, bishop of Lyon; commemorated Sept. 11 (Mart. Hieron.; Usuard. Mart. Auct.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iii. 791). [C. H.]

PATRIARCH (Πατριάρχης, patriarcha). The title patriarch seems to have been introduced into the Christian church from the later organization of the Jews. In pre-Christian times the πατριὰ was a subdivision of the tribe (e.g. 1 Esdr. i. 4; ii. 7), and one of the titles of the heads of these subdivisions was πατριάρχης (e.g. 2 Chron. xxiii. 20, where some MSS. have ἐκατον- τάρχους: conversely in 1 Chron. ix. 9 the usual reading is ἄρχοντες πατριῶν, and that of some MSS. πατριάρχει); the same title seems also to have been sometimes given to the head of the tribe itself, 1 Chron. xxvii. 22. How far the tribal organization survived the dispersion is not clear; but as the same title is found under the empire to designate the heads of Jewish communities, or confederations of communities, it is probable that the later use was a continuation of the earlier. The first mention of these later πατριάρχει is probably in a letter of Hadrian, quoted by Vopiscus (Vit. Saturnin. c. 2); they are also mentioned by Origen (Comm. in Psalm. vol. ii. p. 514, ed. Delarue), by Eusebius (Comm. in Isai. c. 3, Migne, P. G. vol. xxiv. 109), by Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. 12, 17), but more particularly by Epiphanius (i. 30, p. 128), who implies that the office was one of considerable dignity. They are also mentioned in the civil law—e.g. Cod. Theodos. 16, 8, 1, 2, 11, 13; but from Cod. Theodos. 16, 8, 29, and Theodoret, Eranistes, op. vol. iv. p. 32, ed. Schulze, Migne, P. G. vol. lxxxiii. 61, it appears that in the first quarter of the 5th century the office came to an end. (On these Jewish patriarchs, see Gothofredus, ad Cod. Theodos. ll. cc.; Wesseling de Judaeorum archontibus, c. 10, reprinted in Ugolini's Thesaurus, vol. xxiv.; Walch, Historia Patriarcharum Judaeorum quorum in libris juris Romani fit mentio, Jenae, 1752; Zornius, de Patriarcharum Judaeorum auro coronario, reprinted in Ugolini's Thesaurus, vol. xxvi.)

The title seems to have been in use in the Christian church before its extinction among the Jews. The earliest references to it are vague; nor is it clear in what sense it was used, or to whom it was restricted. Basil (Epist. 169, vol. iv. p. 258), writing to Gregory Nazianzen about the deacon Glycerius, says that, despising his presbyter and his chorepiscopus, he had invested himself with the name and dress of the patriarchate, by which must probably be meant the episcopate. Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. funebr. in Melet. Antioch., Migne, P. G. vol. xlii. 853) uses it in a rhetorical passage of all the bishops who were assembled at the council of Constantinople. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. xlii. p. 764) appears to use it as a term specially applicable to senior bishops, πρεσβυτέρων ἐπισκόπων οἰκείωτερον δὲ πατριαρχῶν, a use which is confirmed by its use in Isidore of Pelusium (Epist. 2, 47, Migne, P. G. vol. lxxviii. 489). But whether it was at any time applied, except metaphorically, to all bishops is very doubtful, though it was occasionally applied to bishops who would not have been called patriarchs in either of the technical senses which the word came ultimately to bear.

(1) In its most important use the title has been confined to the bishops of the five sees of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. This use grew out of the general tendency to frame the higher organization of the church on the lines which were furnished by the empire. The gradations of rank between bishop and bishop, which corresponded to the gradations of rank between city and city of the same province, came to exist between metropolis and metropolis of the greater divisions of the empire. At the time of the council of Nicaea the great divisions of the East were the four dioceses, Oriens, Pontica, Asiana, Thraciae (this appears from the Veronese MS. which is published by Mommson, Abhandlung d. Berlin. Academie, 1862, p. 491). Each of these dioceses was divided into provinces (ἐπαρχίαι), and each province had one or more metropolises (e.g. in the province of Asia, Ephesus, Sardes, Smyrna, and Pergamum were all called μητροπόλεις; the references in proof are given in Marquardt, Römische Staatsverwaltung, Bd. i. p. 186). Egypt was at this time part of the diocesis Orientis, but the sixth canon of the council anticipates the later civil organization by recognizing it as an independent ecclesiastical division, and subjecting to the bishop of Alexandria not only the bishops of Egypt, but also those of Pentapolis and Libya. There were thus in the East five great confederations of churches, each of which was independent of the other; in the West the see of Rome stood alone in its supremacy. In the following century the council of Chalcedon, c. 28, took away the ecclesiastical independence of the dioceses of Pontus, Asia, and Thrace, and subjected them to the see of Constantinople, thus reducing the number of sees of the highest rank to Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, with which the see of Jerusalem was reckoned, extra ordinem. This action of the council of Chalcedon was vigorously protested against by the Roman delegates, Leo the Great rejected it, and the 28th canon is not inserted in the authorized Latin versions of the acts of the council (see the Actio Sextadecima of the council in Mansi, vol. iv. p. 379; S. Leon. M. Epist. 94 (35), vol. i. p. 1198 d; Epist. 119 (92), vol. i. p. 1215).

But it is remarkable that although the title "patriarch" was not unfrequently given to the bishops of these sees in contemporary extra-conciliar literature, and became in later times their ordinary official appellation, it does not occur in the canons of any of the councils of the first eight centuries; nor is it confined exclusively to them until the time, probably the 9th century, at which earliest Notitiae were compiled. In extra-conciliar literature, it is given (a) to the bishop of Rome, e.g. by Cyril of Alexandria, Homil. Divers. 11, ap. Migne, Patrol. Graec. vol. lxxvii. 1040, by the emperor Theodosius, Epist. ad Gall. Placid. ap. S. Leon. M. Epist. 63, vol. i. p. 989, and by Justinian Contra Monophysitas, ap. Mai, Script. Vet. vol. vii. p. 304; in later times, Hrabanus Maurus addresses the pope as "primus patriarcha per orbem," Commendatio Papae prefixed to the treatise De Laudibus S. Crucis, ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. vol. cvii. 139. (b) It is given to the bishop of Constantinople in the civil law, e.g. Justin. Novell. 3; but the assumption of the title "Oecumenical Patriarch" (ὁ οἰκουμένης πατριάρχης), perhaps first by Mennas in a synodical letter of the council of Constantinople in 536, Mansi, vol. viii. p. 959, and frequently afterward, e.g. C. I. G. No. 8685), raised a strong protest in the West (S. Greg. M. Epist. 5, 43, p. 773; Pelag. II. Decret. ad Universos Episcopos, ap. Hinschius, p. 721), and even before the final separation of the Eastern and Western churches led to the omission of the name of Constantinople from the list of "primae sedes" (see e.g. the Praefatio Nicaeni Concilii in Quesnel's Codes Canon. Eccles. printed in the Ballerini edition of

S. Leo M. vol. iii. p. 22; the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, Anaclet. Epist. p. 8; Hinschius, p. 82; hence in Hincmar Remens. Opusc. in Concilio Hincmar. Laudum. c. 16, ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. vol. cxxvi. 334; see also Cacciari, Exercit. de S. Leon. M. Opera de Eutyphian. Haeres. lib. 2, c. 4, in the Ballerini edition of St. Leo, vol. ii. p. 471, and Migne, Patrol. Lat. vol. lv. 1251). (c) It is given to the bishop of Alexandria, e.g. by Justinian contra Monophysitas, ap. Mai, Script. Vet. vol. vii. p. 309, and by Gregory the Great, Epist. 5, 43, p. 770; for the later history of this patriarchate, see Neale, History of the Holy Eastern Church, Patriarchate of Constantinople; Renaudot, Liturg. Oriental. vol. i.; Vansleb, Histoire de l'Eglise d'Alexandrie; Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium. (d) It is given to the bishop of Antioch, e.g. by Gregory the Great, Epist. i. 26, p. 516, and in an interesting inscription of the 7th century, now at Oxford, Corpus Inscr. Graec. No. 8987, in which Macarius is called πατριάρχης τῆς μεγάλης θεοῦ πόλεως Ἀντιοχείας καὶ πάσης ἀνατολῆς, i.e. of the diocesis Orientis. For the Jacobite Patriarchs who claim to continue the succession of the patriarchate of Antioch, see Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium; Gregor. Barhebr. Nomocanon. 7, 3, ap. Mai, Script. Vet. vol. x. pars 2; and the posthumous fragment of Neale's History of the Holy Eastern Church, edited by G. Williams. (e) It is given to the bishop of Jerusalem, e.g. in Justin. Epist. ad Episcop. Constantin. degentes, A.D. 536, ap. Mansi, vol. ix. 178.

(2) The title was also given to the bishop of the metropolis of a civil diocesis; i. e. of a division of the empire consisting of several provinces. In Conc. Chalc. c. 9, such a bishop is called ἐξαρχος; but (a) Justin. (Novell. 123, c. 22), in referring to this canon, speaks of the same officer as a patriarch; (b) an ancient scholium on the same canon ap. Pitra (Jur. Eccl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 645) says, ἐξαρχον διουκίσσεως καλεῖ τὸν πατριάρχην ἐκάστης διουκίσσεως, and Zonaras ad loc. ap. Migne, Patrol. Gr. vol. cxxvii. p. 420, also mentions this interpretation; (c) Evagrius, H. E. 3, 6, p. 340, probably following the contemporary writer Zacharias Rhetor, speaks of the right of which c. 28 of the same council deprived Ephesus, and which Timotheus Aelurus temporarily restored to it, as τὸ πατριαρχικὸν δίκαιον. It was hence sometimes given to any metropolitan who had other metropolitans under him; e. g. to the bishop of Thessalonica, as head of the vicariate of Macedonia, Theodorus Lector, p. 586, ed. Vales. ap. Migne, Patrol. Gr. vol. lxxxviii. 217 (the status, although not the title, is recognised by S. Leo M. Epist. 6 (4) ad Anastas. Thessalon. vol. i. p. 621; Theophanes, Chron. p. 139, quoting this passage, and knowing only the later use of the title, thinks this use of it to be erroneous); to the bishop of Theopolis (Prusa) in the acts of the council of Constantinople in A.D. 536, ap. Mansi, vol. ix. pp. 191, 206; to the bishop of Bourges (as having beneath him not only his own proper province of Aquitania Prima, but also Narbonensis with its metropolis Narbonne, and Aquitania Secunda with its capital Bordeaux), Nicol. I. Epist. 19 ad Rudolph. Bituric. A.D. 864, ap. Mansi, vol. xv. p. 390, = Epist. 66 ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. vol. cxix. 884; Desider. Cadurc. Epist. 12 ad Sulpit. Bituric. ap. Canisii Thesaurus, vol. i. p. 64; to the bishop of Lyons, 2 Conc. Matic. A.D. 585, præf., S. Greg. Turon. H. F. 5, 21, Petr. Venerab. Epitaph. Rainald. Luydun. ap. Migne, Pat. Lat. vol. clxxxix. 1022. But its use in this sense was ultimately superseded in the West by the use of the title "primate" [PRIMATE]. The two titles are identified in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, e. g. Clement. Epist. i. c. 28; Anaclel. Epist. ii. c. 26, Epist. iii. c. 29; Zepherin. Epist. 2; Annic. Epist. c. 3.

(A passage of Socrates, H. E. 5, i. seems to point to a third use of the title. In his account of the council of Constantinople in A.D. 381 he not only says that it constituted patriarchs, but also gives their names: six of them are metropolitans, but one of them, Gregory of Nyssa, is not even a metropolitan. It may be inferred from this, and from a comparison with the similar account in Cod. Theodos. 16, 1, 2; Sozom. H. E. 7, 9, that the dignity thus conferred was temporary and personal, giving a supremacy to the particular bishops named which did not attach to their sees, and which had reference primarily to the current controversy. But the text of the passage is not certain; some old versions of it, e. g. in Cassiodorus, Hisp. Tripart. 9, 13, Migne, Pat. Lat. vol. lxi. 1129, represent Gregory of Nyssa as having been transferred to Caesarea, in which case the word may perhaps be taken as equivalent to metropolitan.)

Outside the limits of the Catholic church of the Roman organization, it was the title of the head of the Montanist hierarchy, S. Hieron. Epist. 41 (54) ad Marcell. vol. i. p. 189 ap. Migne, Pat. Lat. vol. xxii. 476; it was adopted as the designation of their chief bishop by the Vandals, Vict. Vitens. de Persec. Vandal. 2, 5, p. 15; it appears to have been similarly adopted under the Lombard kings of Italy, and hence the bishops of Aquileia, and afterwards of New Aquileia (Grado), were called patriarchs, Paul. Diacon. de Gestis Langobard. 2, 10, ap. Migne, Pat. Lat. vol. xc. 487; on these patriarchates see e. g. Baronius, vol. xii. ad ann. 729; Ughelli, Italia Sacra, vol. v. pp. 12, 1079; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vol. viii. p. 9, vol. ix. p. 19; the patriarchate of Grado was transferred to Venice in 1451. (For other patriarchates which have existed or still exist both in Eastern Europe and in Asia, but which fall without the limits of the present work, see, among other authorities, Neale, History of the Holy Eastern Church; Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium; Neher, Kirchliche Geographie u. Statistik, Regensburg, 1864; Silbernagl, Verfassung u. gegenwärtiger Bestand sämtlicher Kirchen des Orients, Landshut, 1865.) [E. H.]

PATRICIA, martyr with her husband Macedonius, a presbyter, and her daughter Modesta; commemorated at Nicomedia March 13 (Bed., Wand., Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.). In Hieron. Mart. for this day there occur the following:—Matricia; Patricia and her husband Zeddo a presbyter; at Nicomedia, Macedonius a presbyter, his wife Matricia, and Modesta daughter of presbyter Cion; Macedonius and Patricia. [C. H.]

PATRICIUS (1), bishop and confessor; depositio commemorated at Auvergne Mar. 16 (Usuard. Mart.).

(2) Bishop and confessor, apostle of Scotia Hibernia; commemorated Mar. 17. (Bed., or Wand., Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. ii. 517).

(3) Bishop of Prusa, "holy martyr"; commemorated May 19 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 259.)

(4) Abbat; commemorated at Nevers Aug. 24 (Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

PATRIMONIUM PETRI. [POPE.]

PATRINI. [SPONSORS.]

PATROBAS, mentioned by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 14); commemorated Nov. 4 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

PATROCLUS, martyr at Troyes under Aurelian; commemorated Jan. 21 (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 342). Jan. 2 (Notker). Another Patroclus, bishop and martyr in Gaul, occurs on this day in De Saussaye's Gallic Martyrology and Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1110. [C. H.]

PATRON. There are no traces in the early church of any considerable departure from the mode of appointment to ecclesiastical office which has been described elsewhere [ORDINATION]. The people or the clergy presented to the bishop the person whom they had elected: the bishop had the right of examining him in order to ascertain whether he fulfilled the requisite conditions, and of declaring the election to be complete. The person so elected ministered in the midst of the community which had elected him, and as a coadjutor of the bishop who had admitted him to office. Even when outlying districts came to have churches of their own, which had not a complete organisation, but were dependent upon the church of the neighbouring city, the same system continued without substantial change. The first modification of that system arose from the practice, which was at first encouraged more in the East than in the West, of building places of worship on country estates for the benefit of those who resided upon such estates: (see the eloquent appeal of Chrysostom to landowners, Hom. 18 in Act. Apost. c. 5, Op. ed. Migne, vol. ix. 147). So different were these places of worship in both their origin and their purpose from the churches of ordinary Christian communities, that the ordinary internal organization of such churches seemed inapplicable to them. They were neither disciplinary nor eleemosynary, and consequently had no need of either the officers of discipline or the officers of almsgiving. They were not always within the territorium (χώρα) of any city, and in such cases were as much outside the jurisdiction of the bishop of a city as the estates upon which they were built were outside the jurisdiction of the municipal magistrates. The owners of the estates consequently claimed an absolute control over them. Nor does there appear to have been in the first instance any interference with such control. It is not until the 6th century, and even then not in canon but in civil law, that any enactments are found on the subject. Probably in the interests of orthodox belief, Justinian enacted on the one hand that no church or oratory should be erected without the consent of the bishop or without a sufficient endowment (Novell. 67), and on the other hand that the founders of churches should not appoint clerks to minister in a church without first presenting them to the bishop for examination (Novell. 57, c. 2). Almost the only other eastern regulation is that of the Trullan Council, which virtually repeats the second of these regulations, and in doing so shews by implication that it had come to be disregarded (Conc. Trull. c. 31). [ORATORIUM.]

In the West the canons of Spanish and Gallican councils shew that the respective rights of the owners of estates and the bishops of neighbouring cities were subjects of frequent dispute. The earliest regulation is that of the first council of Orange (1 Conc. Arausic. A.D. 441, c. 10) which enacts that if a bishop has built a church upon an estate belonging to him which lies within the territory of another bishop, he shall have the right of nominating clerks for that church, but that the actual appointment of such clerks, and also the dedication of the church, shall rest with the bishop of the territory. This enactment implies that in a similar case a layman had no absolute right of nomination, but that the bishop within whose territory the church was built could either accept or refuse the clerks whom the founder wished to appoint. A century later, within the Frankish domain, and after Teutonic conceptions of the rights of the owners of land had entered with the Franks into Gaul, the fourth Council of Orleans passed a series of enactments, the tenor of which shews that the owners of estates upon which churches were built claimed large powers over such churches: it enacts that those who build them are to endow them with sufficient lands, and appoint a sufficient number of clerks; that they are not to appoint such clerks against the will of the bishop "ad quem territorii ipsius privilegium noscitur pertinere;" and that the clerks, when appointed, are to be amenable to ecclesiastical discipline, and not to be impeded by the owner of the estate or his agents in the discharge of their ecclesiastical duties (4 Conc. Aurelian. A.D. 541, c. 7, 26, 33). But in the 7th century the council of Châlons-sur-Saône makes it clear that the owners of such estates had again asserted a right both to appoint and to govern their clerks, independently of the bishop, and enacts that this usage is to be reformed, so as to give both the ordination of clerks and the disposal of the revenues of oratories to the bishop (Conc. Cabill. A.D. 650, c. 14). None of these or any other Gallican canons deal expressly with the case of ordinary parish churches; and this must probably be taken as negative evidence in favour of the supposition that the primitive usage had not been altered. There is, however, a Spanish canon which gives to the builder, and apparently to the restorer, of a parish church the right of presenting clerks to the bishop for ordination, and disallows any ordination which is made by the bishop to such a church in defiance of the founder's nomination (9 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 655, c. 2); but the absence of any mention of heirs in this canon, coupled with the express mention of them in the preceding canon, establishes a presumption that the right of nomination was personal to the founder, and did not descend to his heirs. With the exception of this canon, there is no evidence of the recognition in the Western church before Carolingian times, of any right on the part either of a founder or of any other person to nominate clerks to a parish church; (the instance quoted in the canon law, Gratian, Decret. pars ii. caus. 16, quaest. 1, 31, and ascribed to pope Pelagius, is clearly of much later date).

The policy of the popes from the time of Gregory the Great was even more decidedly in the same direction. That pope, writing to Felix of Messina, requests him to consecrate a church which has been built upon private property, if he finds that it has been sufficiently endowed, but expressly denies to the founder any rights, except the right of admission to service, "which is due to all Christians in common" (S. Greg. M. Epist. ii. 5, ad Felic. Messan.). This letter, which was afterwards ascribed to Gelasius (Append. ad Epist. Gelasii Papae, ap. Mansi, vol. viii. 133, Migne, P. L. vol. lix. 148), became the basis of the canon law on the subject (Gratian, Decret. pars ii. caus. 16, quaest. 7, 26), and its substance is embodied in the form of petition which is given in the Liber Diurnus for the consecration of an oratory (c. 5, 3, p. 92, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. cv. 88). In order still further to secure churches erected on private estates from interference on the part of the owners of the estates, and to prevent, as it were by anticipation, the abuses to which the later system of patronage gave rise, Gregory, although he required an endowment for such churches, declined to allow presbyters to be permanently appointed to them: they were to be served by presbyters sent by the bishop from time to time (S. Greg. M. Epist. ii. 12 ad Custor. Arimin. ix. 70 et xii. 12 ad Passiv. Firman., ix. 84 ad Bonen. Tundarit., cf. Mabillon, Comm. Praef. in ord. Rom. in Mus. Ital. vol. ii. p. 19; the rule is also found in a fragment printed by Holsten, Coll. Rom. vol. i. p. 234, and Migne, P. L. vol. lix. 414, and ascribed, without sufficient ground, to pope Pelagius). And a century and a-half afterwards, immediately before the great change which we are about to describe, pope Zachary lays down a similar rule in almost identical terms: (S. Zachar. Epist. 8 ad Pippin. c. 15, ap. Migne, P. L. lxxxix. 935, xlviii. 87, Codex Carolinus ed. Jaffé, p. 26; in contrast to this may be noted the later policy which disallows "presbyteros conductitios" where a church has funds enough to have "proprium sacerdotem:" Conc. Remens. c. 9, sub Innocent. II. A.D. 1131, ap. Mansi, vol. xxi. 460).

But although these earlier relations of founders or owners of churches to the clergy cannot properly be passed over, they are essentially distinct from, although they have often been confused with, the later system of patronage. That system is an outgrowth of feudalism. Both the name and the thing belong to the Frankish domain, and to the period of the Carolingians. At that period the church had become the greatest landowner in Gaul: it has been computed that a third of all the real property in Gaul belonged to it: (for some particulars, see e.g. Roth, Geschichte des Beneficialwesens, p. 248 sqq. Erlangen, 1850). From time to time laymen had been allowed to have the usufruct of some of these lands, on condition of paying an annual rent to the churches to which they severally belonged. In the troubled times of Charles Martel and his sons (Roth. p. 315, and appendix v., combats the common view which is defended by Waitz, that it was under Charles Martel himself: see Hegel in von Sybil's Zeitschrift, Bd. 5, 227), this use of church lands became almost a necessity of state. In a capitulary of A.D. 743 (Capit. Liftin. ap. Pertz, M. H. G. Legum, vol. i. p. 18; Gengler, Germänische Rechtsdenkmäler, p. 601), it is enacted that some part of the church lands shall be for a time appropriated to the crown as an assistance to the army ("at sub precario et censu aliquam partem ecclesiastice pecunie in adiutorium exercitus nostra cum indulgentia Dei aliquanto tempore retineamus"). The lands so appropriated were assigned as "beneficia," i.e. as revocable and conditional grants to individual soldiers. The system of appropriation soon became general, and the appropriations when general also tended to become permanent. Not long after his conquest of the Lombards, Charles the Great confirmed previous beneficiary grants of church lands, reserving only to the king himself the right of recalling them (Capit. Langobard. A.D. 779, c. 14, ap. Pertz, i. 38). A certain revenue was reserved to the church: in the capitulary of 743, it was fixed at one "solidus" for each "casata" or homestead: afterwards it became a fixed proportion of the produce, usually a ninth or a tenth (whence the later system of "tithes"). The holder of such a benefice was entitled senior, dominus, or patronus. The modern "patron" of a church living thus preserves the name as well as some of the functions of a feudal "lord." (The identity of "patronus" with "dominus" and "senior" in this sense is shewn (1) by the convertibility of "dominus" and "patronus" in the civil law, e.g. in the text and title of a law of Valentinian and Valens in A.D. 365, Cod. Theodos. 5, 11, 1; (2) by express later statements, especially Rutherius Veronensis. Præloquia, lib. i. tit. 10, ed. Ballerini, p. 28, ed. Migne P. L. vol. cxxxvi. 165, "patronus, sive ut usitatus a multis dici ambitur, senior es"; this use of patronus has descended to modern times in the Italian padrone. See also Waitz, Die deutsche Reichsverfassung, Bd. ii. 40).

It was not long before the ecclesiastical duties for the performance of which the lands had originally been intended to provide were regarded as subordinate to the general privileges of the ownership of land. The lesser lords followed in the wake of the king. Just as the latter claimed a supreme right of nominating to bishoprics and abbeys (see e. g. Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, Bd. 2, 205; Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, Bd. iii. 196, 354; id. Deutsche Reichsverfassung, Bd. iii. 194; Friedberg in Zeitschrift f. Kirchenrecht, Bd. iii. 70), and also a right to determine who should be presented to churches upon the crown lands (Karol. M. Capit. de Villis, A.D. 813, c. 6; Pertz, vol. i. 181), so also the former asserted the right of both nominating and dismissing the clerks of churches which were within their fiefs. The ancient right of the people to elect tended to disappear before the claim of the beneficiary holder of church lands, in the same kind of way as, in England, one township after another became the manor of a feudal lord. Within little more than half a century after the death of Charles Martel, this tendency had become so strong that not only the people but also the bishop was ignored. Charles the Great strongly interfered to support the rights of the bishops; he wrote in a tone of indignant rebuke to those who were guilty of the "immoderate presumption" of refusing to present presbyters to bishops, and daring to appoint to parishes without their bishop's consent (Karol. M. Edictum pro Episcopis, ap. Pertz, vol. i. 81, and Jaffé, Monumenta Carolina, p. 371). But the frequency of the enactments in the early part of the 9th century, against the practice of omitting to obtain the sanction of the bishop in appointments to parishes, shews that that practice was neither uncommon nor lightly abandoned; e. g. Karol. M. Capit. Generale Aquense, A.D. 802, c. 13, "Ut nullus ex laicis presbiterum vel diaconem seu clericum secum habere præsumat vel ad ecclesias suas ordinare absque licentiam seu examinatione episcopi sui"; Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, c. 29, 30, ap. Mansi, vol. xiv. 72; 6 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 813, c. 4, 5, ap. Mansi, vol. xiv. 59; Excerpt. Canon. 2 ap. Pertz, vol. i. 189; 2 Conc. Cabill. A.D. 813, c. 42; 3 Conc. Turon. A.D. 813, c. 15; Hludowic I. Capit. Aquisgran. A.D. 817, c. 9, ap. Pertz, vol. i. 207. (6 Conc. Paris. A.D. 820, lib. 1, c. 22, ap. Mansi, vol. xiv. 554, and Constit. Wormat. c. 15, ap. Pertz, vol. i. 337, protect a patron against a bishop by requiring "diligens examinatio et evidens ratio" on the part of the bishop before the rejection of a clerk.)

It is important to note, although the subject cannot be pursued at length within the limits of the present work, that the usurpations of the beneficiary holders of church lands, and of the other feudal lords within whose domains churches were situated, were not limited to the usurpation of the right of appointment of clerks. They began to claim a share of those funds which were left to the churches after the alienation of their lands. In doing so they were supported by the state. Charles the Great directed the bishops to determine what tribute presbyters should pay for their churches to their lords (Capit. de Presbyteris, A.D. 809, c. 3, ap. Pertz, vol. i. 161, "Ut episcopi prævideant quem honorem presbyteri pro ecclesiis senioribus tribuant"; and Lewis the Pious, after specifying the amount of land which parish presbyters might hold free, enacted that if they had more, they should pay "debitum servitium senioribus suis" (Hludowic I. Capit. A.D. 817, c. 10, ap. Pertz, vol. i. 209). A later decretal, falsely attributed to pope Damasus, which is incorporated in the corpus of canon law, speaks with reprobation of the growing custom of laymen claiming part of the oblations which were offered in church (Gratian, Decret. pars ii. c. 10, quæst. i. 16). In one point only were patrons checked with any degree of success. Their assertion of the right to nominate clerks was closely followed by the practice of selling nominations, or at least of accepting presents for them. This practice, although it was not altogether suppressed, was at least checked and discouraged. It is disallowed by Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, c. 30 (which forms c. 7 of the Statuta erroneously ascribed to Boniface of Mainz, and printed as his in D'Achery, Spicilegium, i. 508).

Later in the 9th century Hincmar of Rheims is especially distinguished for the stand which he made against it: he expresses his determination in every case to make inquiry, and in no case to ordain a clerk on the presentation of a patron, if the clerk has given a single penny for his presentation (Hincmar, Remens. Epist. 43, ad Teudulf. Comit. ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. vol. cxxvi. 264; id. Capit. in Synod Remens. A.D. 874, c. 5, ap. Migne, Patrol. Lat. vol. cxxv. 800).

The system of patronage which thus grew out of the introduction by the Carolingians of the system of granting church lands as fiefs was supported by two other circumstances, which also resulted from the Frankish rule.

(1) A freeman who built a church upon his own land had an almost absolute right of property in it. In direct opposition to the Roman rule, according to which, as has been shewn above, the founder of a church had no special rights whatever in the church which he had built, but in full accordance with the spirit of Frankish jurisprudence, Charles the Great enacted that such a church might be assigned and sold: "de ecclesiis quae ab ingenuis hominibus construuntur licet eas tradere, vendere, tantum modo ut ecclesia non destruat sed serviuntur cotidie honores" (Capit. Francofurt. A.D. 794, c. 54, Pertz, vol. i. 75). Accordingly the gift of a church to a monastery or a bishop was accompanied with the same forms as the gift of any other real property (see Rettberg, Kircheng. Deutsch. vol. ii. 617). This right of ownership carried with it the right of appointment of its ministers, subject, however, to the approval of the bishop; the right was not personal, but descended with the estate, and if the estate were divided, and disputes arose as to the right of appointment, the bishop could not interfere otherwise than by suspending the services of the church until the joint owners or co-heirs had agreed to present to him a single presbyter (2 Conc. Cabillon. A.D. 813, c. 26, ap. Mansi, vol. xiv. 98; so in effect Conc. Tribur. A.D. 895, c. 32; for some questions arising from this rule of joint patronage see Hinschius, in the Zeitschrift für Kirchenrecht, vol. vii. pp. 1 sqq.). At first, provision was made that the foundation of such churches should not interfere with the rights of previously existing churches to tithes and other dues (Karoli M. Capit. ad Salz. A.D. 803, c. 3, Pertz, vol. i. 124, and Excerpt. Can. c. 19, Pertz, vol. i. 190; Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 813, c. 41; Hludowici et Hlotharii Capit. c. 6, Pertz, vol. i. 254; Ansegisi Capit. lib. ii. 45, Pertz, vol. i. 299); but in time the distinction between these privately-founded churches and parish churches proper was broken down, and the original rights of owners in the one case became indistinguishable from the usurped rights of feudal lords in the other.

(2) All holding of land under the Frankish rule involved military service. The full rights of a freeman could only be claimed by one who could defend those rights by arms. In some instances it would appear that clerks did not hesitate to take the field (e.g. Annales S. Anandi, A.D. 712, Pertz, M. H. G. Scriptorum, vol. i. 6; Einhardi, Annales, A.D. 753, ibid. vol. i. 139; Ruodolfi Fuldens, Annales, A.D. 844, ibid. vol. i. 364); but there was a strong feeling against their doing so, and enactments were passed to prohibit it, e.g. Karlmanni Capit. A.D. 742, c. 2; Pertz, Legum, vol. i. 16; Pippini, Capit. Vermer. A.D. 753, c. 16, ibid. vol. i. 22; Karoli M. Capit. General, A.D. 769, c. 1, ibid. vol. i. 32, and Capit. Ecclesiast. A.D. 789, c. 69, ibid. vol. i. 64. It was, in other respects, desirable for clerks to avoid some of the personal burdens which attached to freemen, and it not infrequently became necessary to protect their privileges and their lands against usurpation. Consequently those churches and monasteries which were large landowners frequently put themselves under the protection of a neighbouring secular lord. The common name for the tie which thus came to exist was "advocatia," but with this "patrocinium" is interchangeable (on this point see Waitz, Deutsche Reichsverfassung, Bd. ii. 450, iii. 321). The powers of the "advocatus," or "patronus" in this sense, came in time to be considerable [ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH, Vol. I. p. 33], especially in relation to abbeys, and in the course of the middle ages, though so far from the period embraced in the present work as not to admit of being stated in detail here, included the right of presentation. In our own country this system prevailed to so great an extent that the word "advocatia," under its modern form of "advowson," has come to be synonymous with the right of presentation.

PATRON SAINTS. For the general doctrine of the influence of glorified saints over human affairs, see the DICT. OF CHR. BIOG. &c. What is here given relates simply to the actual practice of Christians in adopting saints as patrons whether of places or persons.

I. Nomenclature.—A martyr supposed to have a special interest in a place and its inhabitants was called their patron first in the latter half of the 4th century. St. Ambrose is probably the earliest extant witness to the usage, when, in 386, he calls Gervasius and Protasius the "patrons" of the orthodox at Milan (Epist. xxii. 11). Somewhat later he says of departed kings and martyrs, "Illi fiunt supplices, hi patroni" (Expos. in Ev. S. Luc. x. 12). Paulinus of Nola frequently gives the title to Felix, to whom his church was dedicated, and under whose peculiar protection he believed himself and his people to live. Thus, writing in 395 (Carm. ii. in S. Fel. 26)—

"O felix Felice tuo tibi praesule Nola, Inclita cive sacro, caelesti firma patrono!"

Similarly Carm. in S. F. iii. 105; v. 316, vi. 5;

but especially in the later Natalitia, which reach to the year 408. The usage was probably much extended by Paulinus. It was taken up by Prudentius, whose hymns, De Coronis, were written some time after 405 (see Hymn. ii. 539, vi. 145, xiii. lin. ult.). St. Augustine late in life, about 421, makes an approach to the usage with which others must have made him familiar, viz. when he speaks of commending the dead to the saints near whom they are buried, "tanquam patronis" (De Cura pro Mort. iv. § 6; see also xviii. § 22). We find the word used absolutely in the books De Miraculis S. Stephani, claiming to be drawn up at the request of Evodius, the bishop of Uzalis, probably not long after the year 420. E.g. (in Prologo): "Ea quae per patronum nostrum Stephanum primum martyrem suum operatus est apud nos Christus" (comp. i. 1; ii. 14). By the year 461, when Paulinus Petricordius wrote his metrical Life of St. Martin, the usage must have been thoroughly established (see lib. 1; Migne, 61, col. 1016; ii. 1028-9, &c.). The last-named author gives the title to St. Martin, even when speaking of events that occurred in his lifetime (iv. 1041, 1048), as does Floardo to St. Remigius (Hist. Eccl. Rem. i. 13). The correlative to patronus is cliens. Early Christian writers, however, did not, if my observation may be trusted, make this use of it. Paulinus of Nola, in one of his latest poems (A.D. 405), calls himself the alumnus of Felix (Carm. xiii. in S. Fel. 355; comp. 95). Similarly the little town of Abella, "tanti memoratur alumna patroni" (ibid. 793). With Prudentius, the Romans are the "alumni urbici" of St. Lawrence (de Cor. ii. 530). This word does not occur in the very long poem of the younger Paulinus above mentioned. As the patron of this church, Paulinus of Nola calls St. Felix dominacudius (Epist. v. 15, xviii. 3, xxviii. 9, xxix. 13, xxxii. 10; Poem. xxiii. 109). This is peculiar to Paulinus, but the patron saint was commonly called dominus (Paul. Carm. in S. Fel. i. 10). In Lucian's account of the discovery of the body of St. Stephen, he is called "dominus Stephanus" (Revelatio, 34, 8, in App. vi. ad Opp. Aug.). The saints who reveal its site in a vision call themselves "the lords of the place" (ibid. 7), and two of them are "dominus Gamaliel" (4, 7), and "dominus Nicodemus" (3, 4). The saint being dominus, the votary was servus, as we learn from Paulinus and Gregory; but the more common phrase was famulus, especially in the later part of our period. Thus Alcuin of Stephen (Carm. 31 ad Aram S. Steph.) Similarly Hincmar and Abbo.

The Roman relation between patron and client being unknown to the Greeks, they did not fall into the conventional use of any single word to denote the tutelary saints of a place or person. They were "champions" or "patrons" (προστάται, Chrys. Hom. de SS. Bernice et Prosdocoe, § 7), "advocates" (παράκλητοι, Greg. Nyss. in xl. Mart. App. 214, or συνήγοροι, Chrys. Hom. c. Ludos, 1; Hom. in Mart. ii. 669); "intercessors" (πρεσβευταί, Greg. Nyss. u. s.; Bas. Or. xix. 8; Theodoret, Gr. Aff. Cur. viii.; Opp. iv. 921); "keepers of the city and guards" (πολιούχοι καὶ φύλακες, ibid. 902); "chiefs of men, champions, and allies, and averters of evil (πρόμοι ἀνθρώπων καὶ πρόμαχοι καὶ ἐπίκουροι, καὶ τῶν κακῶν ἐποπρόταιοι, ibid. 912), &c.

II. The Choice of Patrons.—At first the possession of a relic was thought enough to constitute the saint patron of its possessors. To give an instance: when the body of St. Boniface was brought to Fulda, "the venerable abbat Sturm with his brethren gave thanks to Christ that they had obtained so great a patron" (Vita Sturmii, 16; comp. 15). This was so fully recognised that relics were commonly called patrocinia. It often happened that a miracle alleged in connexion with human remains raised the person to the dignity of a saint and local patron (Paulin. Petr. Vita S. Mart. v. 106). When the bodies of Gervasius and Protasius, discovered at Milan, were found to heal demoniacs, St. Ambrose said, "Brethren, we have escaped no slight burden of reproach. We had patrons, and did not know it" (Epist. xxii. 11). In the course of time, however, persons chose a patron. Thus, e.g. "Theodelinda, about 600, built a church at Monza, near Milan, in honour of St. John the Baptist, that he might be an intercessor for her husband and children." She promised yearly gifts to his oratory, that through his prayers they might have the aid of Christ both in battle and wherever else they might go." "From that day they began to invoke St. John in all their actions" (Paulus Warnefridus de Gestis Langobard. i. 22, ed. Hamb. 1611, p. 371; see Mus. Ital. i. 210). Such freedom of choice as is here shewn has been restricted by late decrees of Rome, when a public patron is to be elected. He must have been the "first bishop of the place," or one whose "body has been found buried there," or who "sprang from the place and was a citizen of it," or one who has "in some wonderful way protected and helped the people in their times of need" (Ferrari. Prompta Biblioth. in v. Patr. 88.)

III. Patrons of Places.—Several saints are expressly declared by early writers to have been the "patrons" of certain places. The name is not given by Prudentius to the saints enumerated by him (as the glories of Africa and Spain (de Cor. iv.); but the functions which he assigns to them prove that they were so regarded. In another poem (de Cor. v. 145) three of those mentioned—Fructuosus and his deacons—receive the name patronus. Leo taught that St. Peter and St. Paul were the special patrons of Rome (Serm. 80, § 7; compare what he says of St. Laurence, 83, § 4). Genesius was the "nursling of Arles by right of his birth there; its patron, by virtue of his death." (Auct. Inc. Passio S. Gen. Arel. 1, 13, inter Opp. Paulini Nol. ad Calc. Epp.) Alcuin tells us that, while saints should be honoured and imitated throughout the church, "yet in certain places they are honoured more familiarly among their fellow-citizens with a certain special veneration, because of some one of them having commonly dwelt there, or because of the presence of his sacred relics, which have been given to such or such inhabitants for a comfort." He then proceeds to name several such patrons of cities and regions, as St. Peter and St. Paul of Rome; St. Ambrose, the "defensor" of Milan; the Theban Legion, the glory of the Pennine Alps; Hilary of Poitiers; Martin of Tours; St. Denys and St. Germain of Paris; Remigius of Champagne, the people of which whole province "hastened to the city of Rheims, offering their vows there as if to a present patron. Thus hath the divine goodness provided for the whole world by giving to the several provinces or peoples a special patron in whom to rejoice" (Hom. de Nat. Willibrordi, 1). In the age of Alcuin, we observe, certain honours were claimed for a martyr in every church, though special honours were paid to him, and special trust reposed in him in those places of which he was the patron. But at first the honours paid to them and other saints were entirely local. A curious illustration of this occurred when Julian separated Constantia from Gaza, of which it was a suburb. As a consequence, says Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. v. 3), "each has its bishop and clergy by itself, and its celebrations of martyrs and memorials of the bishops who have belonged to it."

The saints protected the church dedicated with their relics:

"Ita suis meritis jam tecta sacrata tuetur, Ut procul effugiat hostis ab aede sacra."
(Alcuin, Carm. 35 ad Orat. S. Andr.)

Similarly Carmina 42, 77-79, 85, 95, 98, 115. They afforded a general protection to the people who worshipped in their churches:

"Martyris egregii Quintini altare triumphis Hoc fulget, populo hic qui ferat auxilium."
(Id. Carm. 64 ad Ar. S. Qu.)

"Adjuvat hic nos
"Cujus honore sacro constant laeae templa dicata."
(Id. Carm. 83 ad Eccl. S. Petri.)

Specimens of the Dedication-formulae of churches (e.g. "in honorem S. Joannis Baptistae") may be seen under INSCRIPTIONS, p. 848.

IV. The Angels Patrons.—When St. Michael, St. Gabriel, and St. Raphael were first chosen by authority as patrons of a church or oratory, we are unable to say. A church dedicated to St. Michael was built at Ravenna in 545. (Ciampini, Vet. Monum. ii. tav. xvii. in vol. i. p. 87). The Besançon Sacramentary, a Gallican book modified by Roman influence, of which the MS. belongs to the 7th century, gives a "missa in honore Sancti Michael," which was evidently used on his day in oratories, &c., named after him, or possibly, as the Gallicans of that age had very few saints' days, on the anniversary of their opening whenever it was ("in honore beati archangeli Michaelis dedicata nomini Tuo loca," Mus. Ital. i. 356). There is no similar mass in any other Gallican missal, but we find examples in all the old Roman sacramentaries, to which we infer from the Besançon that they belonged at an early period. The Gelasian assigns to iii. kal. Oct. "Orationes in Sancti Archangeli Michaelis" (Liturgia Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 669), which contain no reference to the dedication of the church; but the so-called Leonian gives five missae for pridie kal. Oct., under the heading, "Natale Basilicae Angeli in Salaria," of which two (i. iv.) allude to his being the patron of the church (Murat. u. s. 407). The early copies of the Gregorian all have such a mass (iii. kal. Oct.), and they all by the title (Dedicatio Basilicae S. Michaelis, Mur. S. Angeli) intimate that

St. Michael was the patron of the church in which it was to be used (see Rocca's copy in Opp. Greg. M. V. 151, Antv. 1615; Pamelius, Rituale SS. PP. ii. 345; Murat. u. s. ii. 125; Ménard in Opp. Greg. ed. Ben. iii. 135). Among the poems of Alcuin are two on churches dedicated to him (29, 168), three on altars of St. Michael (37, 64, 77), and a sixth (186) "ad aram sanctorum archangelorum," i.e., as the verses shew, of Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael.

V. Patrons of Classes.—In the middle ages every trade and profession had its patron, and every disease a saint especially gifted for its cure. The germ of this distribution of offices appears even from the very introduction of saint-worship. Thus Justina, persecuted by the magician Cyprian, "implores the Virgin Mary to aid a virgin in peril" (Greg. Naz. Hom. 24 in Cypr. § 11). St. Agnes is addressed by Prudentius (De Coron. 14, in fine) as the especial patroness of female chastity. St. Nicetius, the patron of Lyons, was the especial friend of prisoners (Greg. Turon. Vitae Patrum, viii. 7). St. Sigismund cured the ague (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Mart. 75). In the Besançon Missal found at Bobio, belonging to the 7th century, is a mass of St. Sigismund, "pro frigiditibus" (Mabillon, Musae. Ital. i. 344). Phocas was the patron of sailors (Aster. Amas. Encom. in Phoc. 5 in Combesis, Auctar. i. 180, par. 1686). Sailors at their mess would by turns deposit in money the cost of a meal as the share of Phocas, and when they arrived in port distribute it to the needy in his name (ibid.).

VI. Good Offices expected from Patron Saints.—(1) That most frequently assigned to them was one, the fulfilment of which was least open to dispute. They seconded the prayers of their votaries, and thus often led to their accomplishment, where without such aid they would have failed. St. Basil called them δεήσεως συνεργοί (Hom. xix. 8, xliii. 7). Leo of Rome exhorts his people to keep vigil in St. Peter's, "who will deign by his prayers to assist our supplications and fastings and almsgivings" (Serm. xi. 4). Gregory I. calls patron saints "adjutores orationis" (In. Evang. ii., Hom. 32, § 8; comp. Bas. above). In fact the constant hope and request of their clients might be expressed in the words of Alcuin,

"Iste preces nostras adjuvet, opto, suis."
(Carm. 61 ad Aram, S. Joann. Bapt.)

Similarly Carm. 28 ad Sepulcr. Amandi: "Adjuvat iste preces populi;" and Carm. 47 ad Aram SS. Greg. et Hieron.

(2) There was no danger or difficulty in which their aid was not invoked with success. "Let us keep vigil," says Leo, "in the church of the blessed apostle Peter, by whose merits aiding us, we may obtain release from all tribulations" (Serm. 84, § 2; comp. 81, § 2). Some of the instances in Paulinus are, even by his own confession, calculated to raise a smile rather than to edify. For example, a rustic who had lost two oxen by theft, instead of pursuing the robbers, flies at once to the church of St. Felix, whom he declares responsible for their restoration (De S. Fel. Carm. vi. 290).

(3) The martyrs were the especial protectors of those who were named after them. Thus Theodoret says that Christians "make a point of giving the appellations of the martyrs to their children, by that means procuring safety and guardianship for them" (Graec. Aff. Cur. Disp. viii. u. s. 923).

(4) The active assistance in battle of some long departed hero was the subject of many a Greek and Roman myth. Among the semi-converts of the 4th century, there could not fail to be many on whom these romantic traditions had made a deep impression, and we cannot be surprised at their speedy reproduction under a Christian guise. The patron martyr was regarded as a faithful ally, both in aggression and defence of those who served him well. It is, in short, in the heathen myth that we discover the germ of the mediaeval romance which culminated in the conversion of the apostles into knight-errants. Theodoret relates that on the night before the battle in which Theodosius overthrew Eugenius, A.D. 394, St. John and St. Philip appeared to him "in white garments and riding on white horses" and told him that they had been "sent as his allies and champions" (Hist. v. 24). St. Ambrose had promised that he would often visit Florence. After his death in 397 "he was frequently seen praying at the altar in the Ambrosian basilica which he had himself built there," and when the city was besieged by Radagaisus in 406, he appeared to a citizen of the place and foretold its safety. The next day Stilicho came to its relief (Vita Ambrosii, a Paulino conscr. 50). During the war with the Goths, A.D. 410, the Romans refused to repair a weak part of the city wall, "affirming that Peter the apostle had promised them that the guardianship of that place should be his care. For the Romans reverence and worship this apostle above all" (Procopius de Bello Gothico, i. 23; ed. Nieb. ii. 110). St. Augustine, 421, heard and believed that when Nola was besieged, St. Felix, its patron (ed. Nieb. ii. 110), appeared (De Cur. pro Mort. xvi.). Leo of Rome, 440, asks triumphantly, "Quis hanc urbem reformavit salutis? Quis a captivitate eruit? Quis a caede defendit? Ludus Circensium, an cura Sanctorum?" (Serm. 81, § 1). Venantius, A.D. 560, says of St. Peter and St. Paul (Poem. iii. vii. 19),

"A facie hostili duo propugnacula praesunt."

A part of the poem from which we quote, including this claim of protection, is said to have been inscribed by Ina, A.D. 639, on the walls of his church at Glastonbury (Bolland. Feb. tom. i. p. 906). Compare RELICS.

(5) But more alien still from the spirit and faith of the Gospel was the dependence placed on the patron from protection from the consequences of sin, even at the day of judgment. We find even blasphemous expression, as I think it must be deemed, of this dependence at the earliest period of patron worship. Thus Prudentius declares that he desired to be on the left hand of the judge, that Romanus may come to his rescue (De Coron. x. in fine). The patron is a mediator with Christ, as Christ with the Father (ibid. ii. 578). This extravagance may be partially ascribed to the improper licence which the Christian poets allowed themselves; but the fundamental error is common.

VII. I am not acquainted with any book that treats exclusively or especially of patron saints. Works on the general cultus of the saints are, among others, J. Camerarius de Invocatione Sanctorum, Graece, Lips. 1545; R. Montagu (bp.), Treatise of Invocation of Saints, 1624; Will. Forbes (bp.), Considerationes Modestae de Invoc. Sanct. Lond. 1658, Helmst. 1704, Frankfurt, 1707; Oxf. A. C. L. 1856; G. Morley (bp.), *Epistolae duae de Inv. PAUL, APOSTLE; FESTIVALS OF, ETC.

(1) FESTIVAL OF ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL. See PETER, APOSTLE, FESTIVALS OF. Commemoration of St. Paul on June 30, ibid.

(2) Festival of Conversion of St. Paul.—The observance of this festival dates from a much later period than the preceding, though it is not at all easy to approximate to the time with any degree of certainty. The reason for such a commemoration is not far to seek: a conversion such as that of St. Paul stands on an altogether different footing from the call of any other apostle, and when it is considered how different, humanly speaking, Christianity would have been, had God not thought fit to employ St. Paul as He did, we may allow that there is a sense in which Renan is justified in calling St. Paul "the second founder of Christianity."

Besides the general importance of the event herein commemorated, there was also probably a desire to bestow a further commemoration on St. Paul, as though he had hardly received sufficient recognition by the festival of June 29, of which the commemoration of St. Paul on June 30 is also evidence; a need which would be the more felt inasmuch as other important festivals soon became associated with the name of St. Peter. It may be noted that the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul is peculiar to the Western church, the special necessity of which we have spoken as tending to its origination being, on the whole, peculiar to the West.

In inquiring as to the date at which we can first find traces of the observance of this festival, we shall do well in the first place to clear the ground of fictitious instances. Baronius (Mart. Rom. Jan. 29) appeals to sermons of St. Augustine for this festival, an appeal which, if substantiated, would give a decidedly early date. The sermons in question are those given by the Benedictine editors as 278, 279 (Putrol. xxxviii. 1268), and also 189 of those rejected by them as spurious (ib. xxxix. 2098). As regards the first of these, while it is true that the conversion of St. Paul is dwelt on, the particular part of the Acts containing that history having, it would seem, been the lecture in the service; yet the heading which connects the sermon with the festival [pro solemnitate conversionis S. Pauli] is certainly late, for the sermon is cited in the Indiculus of Possidius (c. 8) as "de vocatione apostoli Pauli et commendatione orationis dominicæ," and it seems to have been one of those made for the paschal season, when the Acts was regularly read. It may be added that the Calendarium Carthaginense makes no mention of this festival, a weighty argument against its celebration in Africa in Augustine's time.

Not unnaturally, in the course of time, when the festival was actually established, the subject matter of the sermon led to its receiving its later title. Thus Florus (Expos. in Epp. Pauli; 1 Cor. iii., 1 Thess. iv., 1 Tim. i.; Patrol. cxix. 324, &c.) invariably cites it as Sermo de Conversione Apostoli Pauli. Assuming the authorship of this expositio to be established, the above is the earliest allusion we are acquainted with to the existence of the festival, bringing it to about the middle of the 9th century.

The second sermon is entitled in some MSS., it is true, in Conversione S. Pauli, but Florus always cites it merely de Paulo Apostolo (op. cit.; Rom. i. viii. ix.; Phil. ii.). The third sermon is merely a cento made up from other sermons of St. Augustine.

No homily for the day is found in the works of Leo, Maximus of Turin, Bede, &c. The festival is given, however, in some forms of the Gregorian Sacramentary (col. 22, ed. Ménard), where the service includes a 'solemn' benediction. On the other hand, however, Pamelius obelizes it, and the Cod. Reg. Suecicæ (Vat. 1275) of the Benedictine edition omits it altogether. This MS. is, however, of about the date 900 A.D., and Ménard's Cod. Theodericensis i., a century earlier, gives the festival, but puts it after the commemorations on the same day of SS. Emerentianus and Macharius. It may be noted that the festival is altogether wanting in the Gregorian antiphony. Almost identical with the form in the Gregorian Sacramentary is that in the Ambrosian, the only differences being that the latter has a prayer super sindonem, and that the benediction is shorter. In the Comes Hieronymi it is entirely absent, Jan. 25 being merely recognised as the Natale of Macharius and Emerentianus. Taking then into account the reference of Florus, and assuming the date of the Cod. Theodericensis to be rightly given, it will follow that the festival was existing at the beginning of the 9th century, but its absence from MSS. of the sacramentary of a later date will suggest that it came but slowly into recognition. Thus there is no allusion to it in the capitulum of Ahyto, bishop of Basle early in the 9th century.

On turning to the martyrologies, we find in the Mart. Hieronymi for Jan. 25, after the entry "Nicomediae, Biti," the further notice, "Romæ, Translatio Sancti Pauli Apostoli" (Patrol. xxx. 455), a suggestion, it would seem, of a different kind of origin for the festival. The metrical martyrology of Bede gives a notice of the day, "Octavas merito gaudet conversio Pauli" (Patrol. xciv. 603). This, however, is wanting in some MSS., and may be summarily dismissed as an interpolation. Moreover, in the ordinary martyrology of Bede, in its true text as edited by Henschenius, there is no mention of the conversion of St. Paul, though this occurs among the additions of the late texts (Acta Sanctorum, March, vol. ii. p. xi.). The martyrology of Rabanus

Maurus mentions, on Jan. 25, both the translation and conversion (Patrol. cx. 1130); see also Notker (Patrol. cxxxi. 1039). Wandalbert, in the 9th century, commemorates the festival, "Octavo ex Saulo conversum gloria Paulum" (Patrol. cxxi. 587). Some 9th-century calendars, however, do not recognise the festival (see, e.g., the Kal. Floriacense, in Martene and Durand, Ampl. Coll. vi. 650). We may perhaps approximate to the date of the introduction of this festival into England by noting that, while there is no mention of it in the pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York (732-766 A.D.), yet it is given in the sacramentary of Leofric (bishop of Exeter, 1050-1072 A.D.). The MS. of this, however, now in the Bodleian Library, is of the 10th century (Surtees Society's Publications, vol. lxi. p. xi.).

(3) Apocryphal Literature.—Of apocryphal works connected with the name of St. Paul there is a considerable quantity. There are Acts of Peter and Paul, published by Tischendorf (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, pp. 1. sqq.; cf. p. xiv). There are also Acts of Paul and Thecla (ib. p. 40; cf. p. xxi.) referred to as early as Tertullian (de Baptismo, c. 57). A Syriac version of this has been published by Dr. Wright (Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles).

Two spurious letters exist in Armenian, one purporting to be from the Corinthian church to St. Paul, and the other the apostle's answer. A Latin translation of these is given in Fabricius (Codex Pseud. Vet. Test. iii. 667, sqq.). An English translation by Lord Byron is also given in Moore's Life of Byron. We have also a spurious letter to the church of Laodicea, in Latin (for which see Lightfoot's Colossians, ed. 2, pp. 281, sqq.), and a series of letters in Latin, forming a correspondence between St. Paul and Seneca. These are given by Fabricius (op. cit. i. 871; cf. Jerome de Viris illustr. 12; Aug. Ep. 153 ad Macedonium, § 14; reference may also be made to the essay in Lightfoot's Philippians).

Further, we have an Apocalypse of Paul, first edited by Tischendorf (Apocalypses Apocryphæ, pp. 34, sqq.) from a Greek MS. in the Ambrosian Library. A Syriac text also exists, of which an English translation has been published (ib. p. xvii.). [R. S.]

PAUL, ST. (IN ART). [PETER.]

PAULA (1), martyr at Byzantium under Aurelian, with her husband Lucianus and their children Claudius, Hypatius, Paulus, Dionysius; commemorated Jan. 19 (Cal. Byzant.). Basil. Menol. places her under Jan. 3, naming the children as above, but the husband Lucillianus, and attributing the martyrdom to the reign of Aurelian. The Cal. Byzant. has Paula and her children (who are not named) and her husband Lucillianus under June 3. In Hieron. Mart. a Paula with numerous others at Rome occur under June 3.

(2) Domitio; commemorated at Bethlehem Jan. 26 (Hieron. Mart.); Jan. 27 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.).

(3) Virgin martyr at the city of Malaca in Spain; commemorated June 18 (Usuard Mart.).

(4) Commemorated with Sabinus, Maximus, and others at Damascus July 20 (Usuard Mart.). This name occurs as Paulus in Hieron. Mart.

[C. H.]

PAULINA, martyr with her parents Artemius and Candida at Rome; commemorated Jun. 6 (Usuard Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.).

[C. H.]

PAULINUS (1), martyr with Heraclius and others at Athens; commemorated May 15 (Basil. Menol.).

(2) Martyr with Felicissimus, Eraclius, and others in Etruria; commemorated May 26 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard Mart.).

(3) Bishop of Nola, confessor; commemorated June 22 (Usuard., Wand., Hieron. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Florus, Mart. ap. Bed.).

(4) Martyr; commemorated Aug. 25 (Wright, Syr. Mart.).

(5) Bishop of Trèves under Constantius, confessor; natalis Aug. 31 (Usuard Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 668); depositio Sept. 4 (Hieron. Mart.).

(6) Martyr with four others; commemorated Sept. 7 (Wright, Syr. Mart.).

(7) Bishop of York, confessor; commemorated in Britain Oct. 10 (Usuard Mart.; Bed. Mart.).

[C. H.]

PAULUS (1), the first hermit in Thebais; commem. Jan. 10 (Usuard., Wand., Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed., Notk.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 602); with Johannes the Calybite Jan. 15 (Cal. Byzant.; Dan. Codex Liturg. iv. 251).

(2) Martyr with Pausirion and Theodotion at Cleopatra in Egypt under Diocletian; commemorated Jan. 24 (Cal. Byzant.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 591).

(3) Bishop of Trois Châteaux; commemorated Feb. 1 (Usuard Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 92).

(4) Martyr with Cyrillus, Eugenius, and others; commemorated in Asia Mar. 20. (Usuard Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 83).

(5) Bishop of Narbonne, confessor; commemorated Mar. 22 (Hieron. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Florus, ap. Bed.; Wand.; Boll. Acta SS. Mar. iii. 371).

(6) Commemorated with Isidorus, monks at Corduba, Ap. 17 (Usuard Mart.).

(7) Martyr with Petrus, Andreas, Dionysia; passio commemorated at Lampsacus May 15 (Usuard Mart.; Hieron. Mart.).

(8) Commemorated at Nevers with Heraclius and others May 17 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard Mart.).

(9) Presbyter; commemorated at Autun with bishop Reverianus June 1 (Usuard Mart.).

(10) Bishop of Constantinople, martyr under Constantius; commemorated June 7 (Usuard., Wand., Hieron. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 13).

(11) Martyr with Cyriacus, Paula, and others at Tomi; commemorated June 20 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iv. 8).

(12) Martyr with his brother Joannes under Julian; commemorated at Rome June 26 (Hieron. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Usuard Mart.).

(13) Deacon and martyr; commemorated at Corduba July 20 (Usuard Mart.). Under this day occur in Hieron. Mart. Paulus at Corinth and Paulus (Paula in Usuard.) of Damascus.

(14) Martyr at Nicopolis; commemorated Aug. 11 (Wright, Syr. Mart.).

(15) Junior, patriarch of Constantinople; commemorated Aug. 30 and Nov. 6 (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 267, 273). Under Nov. 6 a Paulus occurs for Africa in Hieron. Mart.

(16) Patriarch of Constantinople; commemorated Oct. 3 (Cal. Ethiop.).

(17) Commemorated with Paulina Dec. 5 (Cal. Ethiop.). In Hieron. Mart. a Paulus occurs for this day, with many others, but no Paulina.

[C. H.]

PAUSIACUS, bishop of Synnada in the 7th century; commemorated May 13 (Basil, Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai, iii. 240).

[C. H.]

PAUSILYPUS, martyr under Hadrian; commemorated Ap. 8. (Basil, Menol.). [C. H.]

PAUSIRION, martyr with Paulus and Theodotion under Diocletian; commemorated Jan. 24 (Basil, Menol.; Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

PAVEMENT. Although scarcely to be included among Christian antiquities, the platform or pavement on which Roman governors of provinces and other like officials were accustomed to place their chairs when sitting in judgment comes under our notice on one occasion of such pre-eminent interest that some mention of it can hardly be omitted. It must be almost needless to say that the occasion referred to is that in which our Lord was brought before Pilate—"in the place called the Pavement" (εἰς τόπον λεγόμενον λιθόστρωτον, St. John xix. 13). It appears that it was the practice for Roman officials of high rank to cause such a pavement to be constructed as an adjunct to a praetorium wherever one was established. Suetonius (in Vita Jul. Caes.) says that it was related of Julius Caesar that in his expeditions he carried with him pavements sectile and tessellated ("in expeditionibus tessellata et sectilia pavimenta circumtulisse"). Casaubon remarks upon this passage, that what he carried with him were probably the materials with which such official pavements might be constructed.

A representation in art of such a pavement may be found on the top of the reliquary of carved ivory [RELIQUARY] preserved in the Biblioteca Quiriniana at Brescia, in the subject of Christ brought before Pilate, the seat of the latter being placed on a slightly raised platform or dais. This casket is probably of the 4th century.

The pavements of churches were in the earlier ages usually either of mosaic, or tessellated, or of sectile work, the latter being made up of pieces of marbles, porphyries, or granites, cut so as to fit together and form patterns. One of the earliest examples of the former is probably the pavement in the basilica of Reparatus, near Orleansville, in Algeria, probably circa A.D. 325. (See woodcut.) The two kinds of work were occasionally mixed, as in the pavement of the chapel of St. Alexander, on the Via Latina, a few miles from Rome, discovered about twenty years ago. In this instance slabs of marble enclose squares of coarse mosaic of white marble, in which were a sort of quatrefoils, roughly formed by tesserae of dark stone. This pavement probably dated from the 5th or 6th century. One of very similar character, and probably of the same date, was discovered in 1858, when the original level of the north aisle of the choir of S. Lorenzo-fuor-le-Mura, at Rome, was reached by excavation. The pavement of the earlier church of San Clemente, at Rome, was found to consist of slabs of marble arranged in a somewhat simple pattern. The churches of St. Sophia and St. John Studios, at Constantinople, both retain portions of their original pavements: large slabs of marble, circular or quadrangular, are enclosed by bands of interlacing ornament, chiefly executed in strips of marble, but in part in mosaic (v. Salzenberg, Byzantinische Constantinopels, &c.). A good, though small, example of a sectile pavement will be found in the triforium of the cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, being no doubt a portion of that brought by Charles the Great from Rome or Ravenna.

Mosaic pavements not unfrequently contained inscriptions recording the names of the donors. The remains of such an inscription were found in the ruins of the basilica of Reparatus mentioned above. In this occurs the names of Paulus, Pomponius, Rusticus, and Adeodatus with the additions "votum solvit," "voti comp." &c. The pavement is one of considerable elegance; it is divided into compartments, in which are figures of stags, goats, sheep, &c. An engraving will be found in Les Carrelages émaillés, by M. Amé, pp. 15-28, borrowed from that given in the report of the Commission Scientifique de l'Algérie (Beaux-Arts, I. i. pl. liii.). Another instance of a pavement provided by the contributions of the members of the church is afforded by a recent discovery at Olympia, mentioned in a letter printed in the Times of April 16, 1877. It is there stated that the ruins of a large Byzantine church, "perhaps as early as the 5th century, had been found." The pavement of this church was formed of large marble slabs, on one of which, in the centre of the nave, was inscribed, "Kyriakos, a most discreet Anagnostes, who for the salvation of his soul ornamented the pavement."

In the crypt of the cathedral of Verona are remains of a tessellated pavement of elegant design, probably not later in date than the 5th century (v. engraving in Museum Veronense by Maffei, p. cviii.). In the compartments of this are inscriptions containing the names of the contributors to the work and stating the quantities paid for by each, as "Eusebia cum suis tessallavit P. CXX."

Another remarkable instance of an early pavement is that of the church of Dedamoukha, in Mingrelia (The Crimea, &c. by Capt. Telfer, p. 123), which is attributed to the 6th century. In this instance forty small circular slabs are let into the floor near the south entrance, and are asserted to be placed over the heads of the "ἄγιοι τεσσαράκοντα," the forty saints martyred in Armenia, in the time of Licinius, by being exposed to the rigour of a winter frost in a marsh.

Nor were pavements made use of for memorials only, for Gregory of Nyssa (in Theod. Orat. 25) says, "Nor do the walls alone of this temple read us lessons of piety, for the very pavement, in its mosaics like a flowery mead, promotes our instruction." That few examples have remained to our time will not appear surprising, when it is remembered that the pavement is the part of the church of all the most exposed to injury.

One example of a tessellated pavement requires mention as being one of the few instances of the occurrence of Christian symbols in Roman remains in England; the pavement discovered at Frampton in Dorsetshire, an engraving of which has been given by Lysons (Reliquiae Britanniae-Romanae). The ruins in which it was discovered were apparently those of a villa; it covered the floor of an apartment of a square form with a semicircular projection or apse from one side. In a compartment occupying the central part of the arc of the apse remained the two handles with portions of the lip of a vase which if complete would probably have borne the form of the vases or chalices often found in early Christian art (v. CHALICE); while in the centre of the chord of the semicircle was the labarum forming the centre of a band of foliage; immediately, however, beyond this band was one which ran round the room, and was decorated with figures of dolphins. In the centre of this band and in contact with the labarum was a large head of Neptune, while a figure of Cupid occupied a like position on another side. It is difficult to form a satisfactory conclusion as to the destination of this apartment in view of this remarkable collocation of Pagan deities and Christian symbols.

PAX VOBISCUM. [DOMINUS VOBISCUM.]

PEACE, KISS OF. [KISS.]

PEACOCK. See LAMPS, p. 921. The peacock was a favourite ornament from the 1st century; it is found, with other birds, at Pozzuoli (see new frescoes in the South Kensington Museum, nos. 1270-73), at Pompeii and Herculaneum, and repeatedly in the Jewish catacombs of the 1st century (Parker's Photographs, nos. 561, 562). Martigny says it was a symbol of the Resurrection, from the annual moulting and renewal of its beautiful tail-feathers, referring to Bosio (R. Sott. p. 641) and Aringhi (R. S. II. lvi. c. 36, p. 612). Mamachi (Antiq. Christ. l. iii. p. 92) says there is neither authority for, nor objection to, the symbolism, a view in which we concur; and Martigny quotes a sentence from one of St. Anthony of Padua's sermons (5 post Trin.) which compares our body to all the trees of the wood as well, and with equal plausibility.

St. Augustine (de Civit. Dei, l. xxi. c. iv.) speaks of this bird as an emblem of immortality, from the opinion of his time that its flesh was in part or entirely incorruptible. For this or whatever reason it is made in the cemeteries to accompany the Good Shepherd and the symbolic Orpheus, see FRESCO, p. 696, Bottari, iii. tav. lxiii. Like the Vine and the Good Shepherd, it was part of the repertory of heathen decoration. The fact is, as any draughtsman will see, the peacock with outspread tail is specially adapted to ornament circular vaultings and walls beneath them, as in Aringhi, R. S. col. ii. p. 59. Its radiating plumes make it a geometrical centre for circles or curves of decoration, and it is equally well suited to be a centre of colour. It was probably one of the earliest ornaments adopted by Christian painters, but it may have been one of the latest invested with sacred meaning.

The writer cannot find it in Garrucci's Vetri, but it seems to have been particularly in favour as a fresco subject for walls or roof ornament. Martigny gives an example from the cemetery of SS. Marcellinus and Peter (see woodcut) of a peacock with circular train displayed standing on a globe, with the remark that the artist "evidently" means to symbolise the winged soul rising above the earth after the resurrection. There is a similar painting in St. Agne (Bottari, t. iii. pl. 184). He is strengthened by Boldetti (Cimiteri, &c. p. 164) and by Lupi (Dissert. ii. t. i. p. 204) in the conviction that the casks or dolia painted near this latter [DOLIUM] represent the blood of martyrs interred in the immediate vicinity, and the peacock their resurrection.

A peacock with two chicks is represented in fresco on a vaulted monument in the catacombs of St. Januarius at Naples. The latter seem to be issuing from a kind of nest-shaped basket (D'Agincourt, Peinture, pl. ii. no. 9). The peacock and young are also found in a Christian catacomb discovered at Milan in 1845 near the basilica of St. Nazaire, for which Martigny refers to Polidori sopra alcuni Sepolcri antecristiani in Milano, 1845, p. 57.

One reason for believing the figure of the peacock to be rather ornamental than symbolic is that it is but rarely found in sculpture. Two peacocks are found with a verse on the epitaph of the priest Romanus in the Musée Lapidaire at Lyons, and this ornament was frequently used in after days in the Byzantine sculpture of Venice (Ruskin, Stones of Venice, vol. i. p. 235. M. Leblant (Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule) says he has only found it three times on monuments, and Martigny only knows two examples in Rome—one on the tombstone of Aurelia Proba (Boldetti, p. 361). There is one on an end of the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (Bottari, t. i. p. 1). The peacock is sparingly used in a merely decorative way in Carolingian ornament. There are two rather conventionally but beautifully arranged in an evangeliary of Charlemagne's (Bastard, vol. ii. pl. 2). [R. St. J. T.]

PEARL. [MARGARITA, p. 1090.]

PECTORAL CROSS (Greek, ἐγκόλπιον; Lat. Cruz Collaria, pectorale, rationale, formarium, logium, firnale, firnaculum; Ital. formale, fermaglio). The names rationale, logium (λόγιον), were adopted by Christianity from the high-priest's breast-plate. They may be best explained in Magri's words (Hieroglossicon, s. v.): "quia miraculose futura demonstrabat, et quasi loquebatur ac ratiocinabatur, ideoque rationale etiam dicebatur." The word is used by Gregory of Tours.

The earliest account of the pectoral cross given by Hofmann (Lex. Univ.) dates from the 9th century. It is that of Anastasius, the librarian, "Crucem cum pretioso ligno vel cum reliquiis sanctorum ante pectus portare suspensam ad collum, hoc est, quod vocant Encolpium."

Pope Innocent III. traces its use by the pope to the vesting of the high priest under the Mosaic law (De Sacro Altaris Mysterio, lib. i. cap. 53).

In the East the custom began of all Christians, and not bishops alone, wearing a cross hung about the neck. [ENCOLPION; RELIQUARY]. Gregory of Tours relates that he once put out a fire by drawing from his breast a cross of gold which inclosed some relics of the Virgin, the Apostles, and St. Martin.

It should be noticed that neither Durandus nor Thomas Aquinas includes the pectoral cross amongst the official vestments of a bishop; yet it appears that, though it was not a part of the exclusively episcopal vesture, bishops were in the habit of wearing a pectoral cross in the time of Durandus. The prayers which are usually recited on putting the cross upon the breast are not anterior to the 14th century, at which date the pectoral cross seems first to have taken rank amongst episcopal ornaments.

Pugin (Glossary) observes that the pectoral cross is now considered an emblem of jurisdiction, hence when a bishop enters the diocese of another he wears the cross concealed.

[H. T. A.]

PECTORALE, PECTORALIS. These words are used in a variety of senses to describe things worn on or covering the breast. We may mention, for example, (1) the band or fillet encircling the breast of women. See e. g. Jer. ii. 32, where the Hebrew קִיָּאִים (σκηνοδεσμός, LXX) is rendered by Jerome fascia pectoralis; cf. also Isa. iii. 24 (Vg.); (2) its use as equivalent to Rationale (see the article), but no instances occur of this sufficiently early for our purpose; (3) Gregory the Great, in one of his letters, uses pectoralis [al. pectorale] simply for a great-coat, which he sends as a present to Ecclesius, bishop of Clusium, who, having no winter coat, suffers from the cold (Epist. xii. 47; Patrol. lxxvii. 1251).

PELICAN. The pelican is sometimes used as a Christian symbol, in consequence of the myth which relates that when a serpent has bitten her young, she tears open her breast and revives her brood with her own blood. The application of this symbol to the Saviour, who gave His own blood for perishing man, was readily made (Alt, Die Heiligenbilder, p. 56).

PENITENCE. The penitential discipline, in its original conception, required a delinquent to pass through three stages, beginning with a confession of his guilt [EXOMOLOGESIS], and ending with absolution, and a restoration to his forfeited privileges [RECONCILIATION]. The intermediate stage of penance is treated in this article in the following order:—

I. NAMES. ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT.

The original meaning of the Latin word penitentia, with its Greek equivalent μετάνοια, was repentance—implying change of heart, contrition, and amendment. In this sense it was frequently used by early ecclesiastical writers. The transition from this meaning to that of penitential discipline is not difficult to trace. Along with the inward feeling of contrition, there came to be combined, in the theological idea of repentance, an outward act of self-abasement. Gradually the outward act was accepted as a sign of the inward sorrow, and ultimately took the place of it. Isidore (ii. 16, de Poenitentibus), following Augustine (Ep. 54), derives the word from the penal idea underlying penitence: "Poenitentia nomen sumpsit a poena." In Raban. Maur. Instit. ii. 29, the derivation is: "A punitione poenitentia nomen accepit, quasi punientia, dum ipse homo punit poenitendo, quod male admisit." The author of the de vera et falsa Poenit. c. 19, which bears the name of Augustine, slightly varies the etymology: "Poeniter est poenam tenere, ut semper puniat in se, ulciscendo quod commisit peccando." This explanation is adopted by Peter Lombard (sentent. iv. dist. 14), and by Gratian (de Poenit. dist. 3), and is the accepted etymology of the Roman canonists (Morinus Poenitent. i. 1).

The Latin word in universal use to express penitential discipline in all its stages and degrees was poenitentia, with its corresponding concrete noun poenitens, a penitent, and the verb poenitere, to do penance. In Cyprian and in the Conc. Eliber. the noun is generally used with some adjective, as "agere, facere poenitentiam plenam, veram, legitimam." At a later date, poenitentia was employed as equivalent to the discipline of the kneelers, the third and principal station of penance (1 Conc. Tolet. c. 2; Conc. Agath. c. 60; Felix, iii. Ep. vii.) In the Latin penitentials the verb is used by itself absolutely. 2. Exomologesis. A Greek word adopted by Tertullian (Poenit. c. 9), and used by Cyprian and Pacian, and occasionally later. 3. Abstinere, communionem privari, communionem non accipere. The lightest form of censure, consisting in rejection from participation in the sacred elements for a period; a frequent formula in the Latin councils. 4. Segregatio, separatio; the translation of the Greek ἀφορισμός. 5. Flere, audire, substrari, consistere—the terms of the four stations.

The Greek equivalent of poenitentia is μετάνοια. This word retained for the most part its original meaning of change of heart. Basil uses it (c. 34) to signify the penitential course (see Conc. Laodic. c. 19); in another place (c. 22) to express the principal station of the ὑποπίπτοντες. In the latter instance it precisely corresponds with a similar use of the Latin poenitentia. In the later Greek rituals μετάνοια is a prostration. In the penitential ascribed to John the Faster, at the end of the "Ordo," the penitent is instructed to say the trisagion eight times . . . and to make eight μετανολας. A little before it is directed that women μόνον προσκυνήσεις ποιήσας χωρίς μετανοιών. The word μετάνοια here must signify some laborious and humiliating posture. 2. ἐξομολόγησις. The word employed by all Greek canonical writers to signify the course of discipline. It occurs in this sense in the Ep. ii. ad Corinth. which bears the name of Clem. Rom. 3. ἀφορισμός—the ordinary term of the Can. Apost. and also of the canons of Conc. in Trull. It signifies separation from the faithful (compare St. Luke vi. 22), involving either simple rejection from the eucharist, or in addition to rejection the performance of certain penitential acts and rites, the nature of which was not defined, but depended on the custom of the church. 4. προσκλαίνοντες, ἀκροώμενοι, ὑποπίπτοντες or γονυκλίνοντες, συνιστάμενοι. The four stations. (Gregory Thaumaturgus. Ep. c. 11; Basil ad Amphiloc.; Conc. Ancyran. &c.) 5. ἀκοινωνήτος εἶναι. The penitential censure of Conc. Ephes. (c. 6); Conc. Chalced. (cc. 4, 8, 16, 23) 6. ἐπιτίμιον. An ecclesiastical penalty (Basil, Ep. cc. 71, 74; Sozomen, H. E. vii. 16). ὑποκείσθαι ἐκ τῶν κανόνων ἐπιτίμοις (Conc. Chalced. cc. 3, 8, 9; Conc. in Trull. cc. 44, 49, &c.) In the Greek penitentials the prayer over those whose penance was at an end is called εὐχή τῶν ἐξ ἐπιτίμων λυομένων. 7. κανονίζειν, to impose a penalty according to the canons, a later Greek usage (Euchologion, Goar, p. 678).

The theory of penitential discipline was this: that the church was an organised body with an outward and visible form of government; that all who were outside her boundaries were outside the means of divine grace; that she had a command laid upon her, and authority given to her, to gather men into her fellowship by the ceremony of baptism; but as some of those who were admitted proved unworthy of their calling, she also had the right, by the power of the keys, to deprive them, temporarily or absolutely, of the privilege of communion with her, and, on their amendment, to restore them once more to church membership. On this power of exclusion and restoration was founded the system of ecclesiastical discipline. It was a purely spiritual jurisdiction. It obtained its hold over the minds of men from the belief, universal in the catholic church of the early ages, that he who was expelled from her pale was expelled also from the way of salvation, and that the sentence which was pronounced by God's church on earth was ratified by Him in heaven. No body of heretics ever ventured to claim this power. Ambrose was not merely taking high sacerdotal ground, but stating an historical fact, when he said (De Poenit. i. 2), "Hoc jus sibi recte Ecclesia vindicat, quae veros sacerdotes habet; haeresis vindicare non potest, quae sacerdotes Dei non habet. Non vindicando autem ipsa de se pronuntiat, quod cum sacerdotes non habeat, jus sibi vindicare non debeat sacerdotale." Penitence had at once its origin and sanction in the New Testament, and primarily in the promise of Christ Himself (St. Matt. xviii. 18). A system of discipline was undoubtedly in force among the Jews at the Christian era, and was recognised by our Lord (St. John xvi. 2; St. Luke vi. 22). In the development of church organisation which the apostles were appointed to carry out, penitential discipline was assigned its place (1 Cor. v. 3-5; 2 Cor. xiii. 10; 1 Tim. i. 20; Tit. iii. 10). Two of the great "mortalia delicta," moechia and idololatria, in the case of the incestuous man at Corinth (1 Cor. v.), and of the heretics Hymenaeus and Alexander, were visited with apostolic censure. The former example contains the elements of the future discipline. It was a distinctly spiritual sentence. The decision emanated from the chief pastor: "I have judged already." It was announced before the congregation: "When ye are gathered together." Its effect was to expose the delinquent to some bodily mortification: "Delivered unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh." Its object was his amendment: "That the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord." And its result, his ultimate restoration, on his repentance, to the fellowship of the church (2 Cor. ii. 6, 7). Many of the fathers saw in this expression—"delivered unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh," a sanction for the austerities of penance (Origen, in Levit. Hom. xiv. 4; Pacian, Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 18; Basil, c. 7; Ambrose, de Poenit. i. 13; August. de Fid. et Opp. c. 26). The references to ecclesiastical discipline in the earliest writers are naturally rare and fragmentary. The organization of the church was no less incomplete in this than in other matters. Clemens Roman. (Ep. ad Cor. c. 57, ed. Jacobson) has the following passage: ἄμεινον ἔστιν ὑμῖν ἐν τῷ ποιμνίῳ τοῦ Χριστοῦ μικροῦς καὶ ἑλλογιμῶς εὐρεθῆναι, ἢ καθ' ὑπεροχὴν δοκοῦντας ἐκριφθῆναι ἐκ τῆς ἑλπίδος αὐτοῦ. The reference of this to some simple form of discipline is unmistakable. The Shepherd of Hermas, which is probably a generation later than the Clementine Epistles, speaks clearly and fully at the beginning of the 2nd century of the practice of separating an offender: (Herm. Pastor. vis. iii. 5; see Ibid. Similitud. vii.) An evidence for the existence of penitential discipline in these early times, which is, perhaps, stronger than any isolated passage, is the universal tradition of the church. The origin of Montanism is dated by Epiphanius in one place (Haeres. li. 33) as far back as A.D. 126. Other authorities fix it about A.D. 150 (Robertson, Ch. Hist. i. 5). That is to say, Montanus was only one generation removed from the apostle St. John. He separated from the church chiefly on the ground of the claims of the church with regard to discipline. In other words, discipline was so widely prevalent, and so firmly established, as to create a schism within a generation of the last of the apostles. The inference from this is well drawn out by Thorndike (Laws of the Church, iii. x. 2; Works, Lib. of Anglo-Cath. Theol. vol. iv. pt. 1). After Montanus there can no longer be any question on the discipline of penance being part of the regular organisation of the church. In the early ages the necessity for church censures must have been comparatively rare. As the need arose, the bishops with their priests dealt with each case in some simple manner, after the model, no doubt, laid down by St. Paul. The treatment of those who lapsed during the Decian persecution gave the first impulse to a more systematic and uniform organization. Crimes were classified, penalties promulgated, and the duration of penance was defined. The correspondence between the Roman and African churches, which appears in the epistles of Cyprian, gives some insight into the method in which a degree of uniformity was gained. Local needs and circumstances, no doubt, had their influence on the decisions of the early synods. The system in the West does not appear to have been so rigidly defined as in the East. The canonical epistles of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Basil, and his brother Gregory of Nyssa, were at once the expression and the support of this more inflexible rigidity. Under their influence the elaborate system of the penitential stations took its rise. These stations were taken into the canonical code, but they never appear to have entered into the practical administration of the Western discipline. The 3rd, 4th, and the beginning of the 5th centuries may be regarded within general limits as the flourishing period of the penitential system. It was then complete and regular, and at the same time had not ceased to be sustained by the zeal and belief of the church. The extent to which it entered into the routine of Christian legislation, is manifest from the space which penitential directions occupy in the writings of that period. The austerities were genuine and voluntary, endured from a firm conviction that only by such endurance could sin be expiated. "I have known many," says Ambrose (de Poenit. i. 16), speaking as of facts which had come under his personal knowledge, "who have furrowed their cheeks with continuous tears, who have laid themselves in the dust for all to tread upon, and whose faces, thin and pallid from fasting, have presented the appearance of living ghosts." With the beginning of the 6th century the framework of the system was still unaltered, but the substance of it was rapidly decaying, more rapidly in the East than in the West. Through the 7th century public penitence was all but dead. It revived for a time under the ecclesiastical rule of the Carolingian princes, but the real life of penitence resided in the private system administered through the penitentials. Milman (Lat. Christian. iii. 5), in a passage on the power accruing to the clergy through ecclesiastical discipline, thus sums up the value of the system founded on the penitentials: "However severe, monastic, unchristian, as enjoining self-torture; degrading to human nature, as substituting ceremonial observance for the spirit of religion; and resting in outward forms which might be counted and calculated; yet as enforcing, it might be, a rude and harsh discipline, it was still a moral and religious discipline. It may have been a low, timid, dependent virtue to which it compelled the believer, yet still virtue. It was a perpetual proclamation of the holiness and mercy of the Gospel. It was a constant preaching, it might be, of an unenlightened, superstitious Christianity, yet still of Christianity."

II. PRIOR TO THE SPREAD OF THE NOVATIAN HERESY.

The chief characteristics of discipline prior to the spread of the Novatian heresy, as compared with those which afterwards prevailed, were the shortness and mildness of the censures, and the simpler forms by which the system was administered. The Stations of Penitents had not yet been elaborated. The earlier censures no doubt corresponded with those imposed afterwards in the stations, but the technical names of the stations, and the systematic division of penitents connected with them, are of later date. In the first three centuries there appear three distinctly marked degrees of censure—(1) exclusion from participation in the elements, (2) exclusion from the sight of the sacrament and from the eucharistic prayers, (3) exclusion from the church altogether, that is to say, excommunication, although of the faithful, and excommunication, although this latter term was not yet in use. An examination of the principal sources of information for that period will serve to shew clearly the nature of these penalties. The Apostolic Canons employ four terms to express church censure—1, ἀφορίζεσθαι, separation, which applies equally to clergy and laity; 2, καθαιρεθαι, deposition, which was confined to the clergy; 3, ἀφορίζεσθαι καὶ καθαιρεσθαι, which was also peculiar to the clergy; 4, τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἀποβάλλεσθαι, excision from the church, to which all were subject. The severity of this last sentence was still more increased in two canons (cc. 27, 28), which direct that a priest ministering in holy things after deposition παντάπασιν ἐκκοπτέσθω. In the Apostolical Constitutions there is no record of any organised system, but only the mention of lighter and weightier censures. In Apost. Const. ii. 16, after some general directions that the bishop shall encourage and not repel penitents, there is given the mode of treating a delinquent. He was to be ejected from the church, and the deacons meantime were to visit him and remonstrate with him, and if he appeared contrite they were to come to the bishop and intercede for him, the bishop then was to allow him to enter the church, and, when satisfied of his earnestness, to reinstate him after a penance of a few weeks' fasting. In further directions in the same chapter, the bishop was to refuse the penitent the holy communion for a period, the length of which was to be adjusted to his offence, and afterwards receive him as a father would a repentant son. For ordinary purposes of discipline, and for light offences, this was the censure employed. The heavier penalty given in the Constitutions corresponds with the excision from the church of the Canons. Here is evidently the germ of the system of stages of penitence which was afterwards the law of the church. Tertullian refers only to one degree of censure, and that, as might be expected from his character and writings, a severe one. He takes no note of the simple rejection from communion which was the common penalty in the Apostolic Canons. Censures, he states (Apolog. c. 39), exclude men from the communion of prayer, from the solemn assembly, and from all holy fellowship. Penitence with him was laborious outward self-abasement, no mere loss of a holy privilege. It was an exomologesis, a confession of sin by act as well as by word; and in what this confession consisted he shews vividly (Poenit. c. 9): "Exomologesis is a discipline for the abasement and humiliation of man, enjoining such conversation as inviteth mercy; it directed also even in the matter of dress and food—to lie in sackcloth and ashes, to hide his body in filthy garments, to cast down his spirit with mourning, to exchange for severe treatment the sins which he hath committed; for the rest, to use simple things for meat and drink, to wit, not for the belly's, but for the soul's sake; for the most part also to cherish prayer by fasts, to groan, to weep, and to moan day and night unto the Lord his God; to throw himself upon the ground before the presbyters, and to fall on his knees before the beloved of God; to enjoin all the brethren to bear the message of his prayer for mercy." The same method of penitence which the writings of Tertullian disclose appears in the epistles of his disciple Cyprian. The stations had not found their way into Africa in his time. Cyprian's usual terms for expressing penitence were "agere poenitentiam," "facere exomologesim," which signify the performance of definite penitential acts. He rarely or never saw occasion to use the censure, which consisted only in expulsion from the Eucharist, and not often the great sentence of excision from the church.

The decrees of the council of Elvira, circ. A.D. 305, throw great light on the course of discipline at the close of the 3rd century. The canons were of exceptional rigour, but the system on which they were promulgated no doubt followed the general lines of discipline then prevailing in the West. They use three grades of censure. For various minor offences the penalty was simple rejection from participation. In these cases no outward acts of penance were performed. The beginning and end of the penalty was the denial of the sacred elements. The second grade of censure consisted in the infliction of strict penitence, the "poenitentia" and "exomologesis" of Tertullian and Cyprian. The mode of carrying out the penance was not defined. It was enough that it should be full and canonical—"vera, legitima, plena," that is to say, according to the rites and austerities then in practice in that province. This penitence was of two degrees—one leading to reconciliation at the end of so many years, the other only at the end of life. A third censure, employed by the Conc. Eliber., was that of expulsion from the church. It was reserved for such great crimes as retaining images in a house (c. 41), or contumacy (c. 20), or a relapse into infamous modes of life (c. 62). In c. 49 the offender was to be absolutely cut off, "penitus abjiciatur," the force of which may be, either that in addition to the ecclesiastical censure he was to be debarred civil and social intercourse with Christians, or that he was to be cut off without a hope of return. This last interpretation would coincide with the remarkable harshness exhibited by the Spanish fathers. Of their eighty-one canons, no less than fourteen specify offences for which excommunication was to be final, "nec in fine dandum esse communionem."^a On a review of these early authorities there appear to have been up to the close of the 3rd century three distinct ecclesiastical censures—1, rejection from participation for a fixed period; 2, rejection from communion and the prayers of the faithful, together with certain definite acts of penance: this is penitence strictly so-called; 3, excision from the church, whether final or with the understanding that the offender might be readmitted by means of penitence; this censure is excommunication.

1. Duration of Penance.—The duration of penitence in the earliest ages is uncertain. The Apost. Const. ii. 16, permit a delinquent to be restored after two, or three, or five, or seven weeks of fasting. That the period was short, and did not approach the ten, fifteen, or twenty years which were inflicted for graver offences after the 4th century, is rendered probable from the absence of any mention of long periods of exclusion in the writings of Tertullian. The same inference may be drawn from the silence of the Apostolical Canons. They affix no period whatever to their penalties.^b The teaching of Montanus and his great convert, Tertullian, who seceded from the church partly on account of her laxity, had the natural effect of rendering the catholic discipline more severe. Still, in Africa under Cyprian, and in Rome under Cornelius, it does not appear that a sentence often exceeded one or two years. The demand of the lapsed to be admitted without penitence, and the curtailment or remission of the period of exclusion by a commendatory letter from a martyr, are clear indications that the sentences were not long. In one instance there are the materials for determining the actual length. In a synod held under Cyprian, in A.D. 251, after Easter certainly, and most probably in the summer, it was resolved among other matters that those of the lapsed who had even sacrificed should be admitted after a term of penance. Cyprian foreseeing signs of the renewal of persecution, directed through another synod on the Ides of May of the following year (Ep. lix. 12) that these lapsi should be at once re-admitted (Ep. lvii.). Their penitence therefore had not exceeded nine months. It is true that they were reconciled under circumstances of particular urgency; but one or two centuries later, an idolater would not have been admitted in less than several years, under any circumstances. In general it may be stated, that up to the time of Montanus the duration of penitence was very short; after Tertullian it became longer; but frequently in urgent cases it was curtailed, both by councils and bishops, and in some instances remitted entirely. The contrast between this leniency in the African and Roman churches and the crushing severity of the Spanish fathers at Elvira, about a generation later, shews that the system of discipline was not yet organised on a uniform basis.

^a These canons have sometimes another reading, "in fine," in place of "nec in fine," and also in c. 63 of "vix in fine;" but the harsher reading is the more generally received one. Chiefly on account of the similarity of these canons to the Novatian heresy, Morinus (ix. 19) endeavours to prove that the council must have been held prior to the condemnation of Novatus, in fact before the age of Cyprian.

2. Rites and Usages.—Although in the earliest ages the term of penance was short, and part of it was frequently remitted, there was greater strictness than afterwards prevailed in granting it. No one was admitted who did not beg admission from the bishop, with all the outward signs of deep contrition. From the time of Novatus onwards admission was easier, for when penitence was known to involve long years of public humiliation, less scruple was shewn in opening its privileges to all who were content to submit to it. After the 4th century it came to be laid down that penitence was to be denied to none who sought it. Innocent I. A.D. 402–417 (Ep. xxv. init.; Labb. Conc. ii. 1288), declared that he held it to be an act of impiety to refuse imposition of hands; an opinion upheld by Celestine I. A.D. 422–432 (Ep. ii. ad Episc. Gall.

c. 2; Labb. Conc. ii. 1620). Similar resolutions were passed by some of the Frankish councils (Conc. Andegav. A.D. 453, c. 12; Conc. Epau. A.D. 517, c. 36). But in earlier times penitence was regarded more in the light of a privilege and concession than of a right, and more caution was used in granting the privilege, from the fact that it was administered once only; if the penitent afterwards relapsed, there was no door by which he could return.

The earliest records exhibit the delinquent outside the door of the church, clothed in sackcloth, and with ashes upon his head, asking the worshippers as they entered the church to implore God on his behalf, and make intercession for him with the bishops and presbyters and the whole congregation. In the Apost. Const. ii. 16, already cited, it is directed that the offender is to be kept outside the church, and detained there till he has given evidence of genuine repentance. The length of the exclusion rested absolutely with the bishop. He too was the sole judge of the sincerity of the repentance. The locality of the repentant man who was seeking the peace of the church was outside the door (Tert. de Pudicit. 3); there, in his remorse, he threw himself in the dust before the feet of the priests (Tert. de Poenit. c. 9), and before the brethren (ibid. c. 10), with weeping and supplications for mercy. His self-abasement was a request to be admitted to the grace of penitence; it was the first act of the repenting sinner, begging his repentance might be accepted. The behaviour which befits the repenting sinner is drawn out by Cyprian, in language which there is no reason to suppose is not to be accepted literally (de Laps. c. 21): “Men must pray, and entreat with increased continuance; pass the days in mourning, and the nights in vigils and weeping; employ their whole time in tears and lamentations; lie stretched on the ground; prostrate themselves among ashes, sackcloth, and dust; after Christ’s raiment lost, wish for no garment beside; after the devil’s feast, must voluntarily fast; give themselves to righteous works, whereby sins are cleansed; apply themselves to frequent almsgiving, whereby souls are freed from death.” Compare Eusebius, H. E. v. 28. The next stage was, that the bishop, satisfied of the man’s repentance, and yielding to the intercessions addressed to him, sent the deacon to bring him into the church (Apost. Const. ii. 16), and solemnly laid his hands upon his head, and admitted him to penitence. Whether his public confession, which had necessarily been uttered during his abasement outside, was repeated now, or at some later stage, or was spoken again and again at different stages, there is no evidence clearly to shew. [EXOMOLOGESIS, p. 644.] What is certain is, that an open acknowledgment of guilt, was required at the beginning of penitence. The imposition of hands, as in confirmation and ordination, was invariably accompanied with prayers, the form of which no doubt varied in different churches. One example is given in Apost. Const. viii. 9, of what date is uncertain; and such forms of prayer are found in all the penitential rituals of the 9th and following centuries. At the time of imposition of hands, the bishop assigned to the delinquent his term and degree of penance, and thenceforth, and until he was reconciled, he became a penitent, properly so called. After the performance of the various acts of contrition, the fastings and self-mortifications, the penitent was received back into the church. And this reception in the first three centuries took place immediately after the conclusion of the penance, and carried with it all the privileges of full communion. This appears to have been the undoubted use of Cyprian, and of the Roman and African bishops of his age.

^b There is one exception to this statement: c. 23 inflicts an exclusion of three years on laymen who mutilate themselves. Morinus iv. 9, without giving any definite reasons, regards the words ἐτη τρία as an interpolation.

III. THE PENITENTIAL STATIONS.

After the close of the 3rd century, discipline became more systematic and more rigid. The Novatian controversies had had a twofold effect on the Catholic system. On the one hand, penitence was very rarely denied to any offender; on the other, its duration was longer, and its austerities sharper. It came to be regarded less and less in the light of a privilege, and more exclusively as a penalty—a weapon in the hands of the rulers of the church, to punish her criminals. In the earliest ages, and before the zeal of Christians was cooled by the influx of the mixed multitude which the cessation of the persecutions introduced, the fastings and mortifications of a repentant sinner were voluntary for the most part, the natural expression of inward grief. There was no fixed time for their continuance, this was determined solely by the earnestness of the repentance, and the discretion of the bishop. But now penitence became a penal sentence, which was to be worked out by certain appointed stages—so many years to be passed in one stage under certain conditions, so many more in another with a relaxation of the conditions, the later stage not to be begun till the earlier was completed; and so, step by step, the outcast was restored to full communion. The stages were the well-known penitential stations. The East was their birthplace. In the councils of Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, c. 3, and Ancyra, A.D. 314, c. 20, 21, 25, reference is made to the ᾠρισμένοι βαθμοί of penance, proving that there were certain stages which were so well known and well established in the church that it was not necessary to define them. The earliest mention of them by distinct names is in the last chapter (c. 11) of the Canonical Epistle of Gregory Thaumaturgus. This canon is commonly regarded as of a somewhat later date than the rest of the Epistle, but it expresses the view of a period shortly subsequent to that of Gregory of what was then believed to have been the course of discipline in Gregory's age. The definition there given of the stations is this: "Fletus est extra portam Oratori; ubi peccatorem stantem oportet fideles ingredientibus orare ut pro se precentur. Auditio est intra portam in Narthece, ubi oportet cum qui peccavit stare usque ad Catechumenos, et illinc egredi. Audiens enim, inquit, scripturas et doctrinam, ejiciatur, et precatione indignus censeatur. Substratio autem est ut intra portam Templi stans cum Catechumenis egrediatur. Consistentia est ut cum fidelibus consistat; et cum Catechumenis non egrediatur." In the system of discipline carried on by Basil (cc. 22, 56, 57, 58, 64, 66, 75, 77, 80, 81, 83), and his brother, Gregory of Nyssa (Can. Ep. passim), the stations bore a prominent place; and their use seems to be taken for granted in the councils of the early part of the 4th century—Ancyra, Laodicea, Neocaesarea, Nicaea. They had then become a recognised, and, so to speak, a canonical branch of the penitential organization of the church. Their working will best be seen by taking the penitent through the several stages. At the outset it is supposed that the delinquent, either by confession or notoriety, or after an examination, stands convicted of a grievous sin; that he has made an open acknowledgment of it, whether before the bishop or the presbytery, or the whole congregation [EXOMOLOGESIS]; that he has received imposition of hands from the bishop, and is then to undergo his penance through each step of the series. The strict letter of the law sentenced him to begin at the first and lowest of these, but this strictness must in practice have been frequently relaxed. Even when the system was in its greatest force, that is to say, in the Eastern church through the 4th century, some countenance was given to this laxity by the canons themselves. Thus the Conc. Nicaen. c. 12, decrees that those who shew their repentance by their dress, and by fear, and by tears, and by submission and good works, may, after a time among the "audientes," share in the communion prayer; the principal and laborious station of the "substrati" being thus omitted. Basil (c. 4) in the same way curtails the penance of one who has been thrice married. The Conc. Ancyra. (c. 7) permits certain delinquents, after two years among the "substrati," to leap over the stage of the "consistentes," and be received to full communion. Analogous instances occur in Greg. Thaumaturgus, c. 9; Basil, cc. 13, 61, 73, 80, 81. It was only in rare cases that an offender was sent at all to the mourners or the hearers. The ordinary course, almost universal in the Latin church, and very general in the Greek, was to remit him at once to the great station of the "substrati." This was the course enjoined by the Council of Ancyra, cc. 5, 7, 8, 16, 24. In Basil, however, a strict adherence to the four consecutive stations was decreed for all great crimes. In the Canonical Epistle of Gregory of Nyssa, the station of "consistentia" does not occur. The penitent is allowed by him to pass from the station below to full communion. These variations are found during the full vigour of the system. When once it had been weakened, it must have been impossible to restore it, and to recall delinquents back to submission to this ideal severity.

1. THE MOURNERS, fletes, προσκλαίοντες.—This was the first stage through which the penitent was to pass. It is to be distinguished from the mourning and weeping outside, to which reference has already been made in the discipline of the earlier centuries. The station of the mourners was the position of those whose penitence had already begun. The mention of the name is rare among the early authorities; and it is not likely that the thing itself was frequently imposed. It was part of the scheme and framework of the system, held in reserve rather than commonly inflicted. Reference is made to it directly in the last canon (c. 11), which is attributed to Gregory Thaumaturgus, and indirectly, in c. 8 of the same epistle, where certain robbers are held to be undeserving even of hearing; that is to say, they were not to be allowed inside the building. The only station then remaining for them would be among the mourners. Basil introduces the station by a similar paraphrase. "Polygamists," he says (c. 80), "are not to be received for three years;" and a short time afterwards sentences other culprits to be ejected for three years, and in each case adds, "then they are to be hearers for two, kneelers for three," &c. The terms "to be ejected," and "not to be received," signify some stage below that of hearers, which can only be among the mourners. In many of his canons (cc. 22, 56, 57, 58, 59, 64, 66, 75), the station is mentioned directly, and by name. But this is not the case in the Canonical Epistle of Gregory of Nyssa. He remarks that there is a canon of that sort that habitual fornicators are to be expelled for three years altogether from prayer, and afterwards be hearers for three years, &c. The being expelled from prayer is an indirect way of describing the lowest station.

i. Their Position.—In the appointment of the ancient churches there was an open area or space set apart in front of the door. All who entered the church necessarily came through this area or approach. This was the place assigned to the mourners, and beyond it they were forbidden to pass. The removal of delinquents outside the very doors of the church was a practice as old as Tertullian, who states (de Pudicit. c. 4) that for certain monstrous crimes the criminal was not allowed to cross the threshold of any part of the sacred building. At a later period Chrysostom warns (Hom. xvii. in Matt.) some of his hearers, that if they continue contumacious they shall be prohibited from entering even the porch, as adulterers and murderers are prevented. Morinus is disposed to think that ejection from the building and exposure to the elements is the interpretation of the disputed c. 17 of Conc. Ancy. which sentences those guilty of unnatural crimes to pray eis τοὺς χειμαζομένους, inter hyemantes.

ii. Duration and Mode of Penance.—The mourners being placed outside the very doors of the church, could take no part in what was going on inside. They were cut off from all sacred rites whatever. They could hear neither the reading of the Scripture nor the preaching; still less could they join in the prayers or in the sacred mysteries. So far as public worship was concerned, they were to all intents and purposes aliens from the church. There remained to them only their personal devotions, and their hopes by earnestness of repentance and amendment of life to obtain a mitigation of their sentence. Still there were certain duties attached, not exclusively to this station, but to a state of penance generally, and which would be more rigorously enforced in this station whenever it was occupied, by the performance of which the penitent was led to expect that he might make a favourable impression on the church from which he had been expelled. The foremost of these was an open and frequent acknowledgment of his guilt. And this self-abasement, as Ambrose points out (Poenit. ii. 10), was not inflicted merely for the humiliation of the offender, but as proof and fruit of his contrition. If pardon, he says, has to be obtained from one in secular power, you go about, and canvass and supplicate people, and cast yourself at their feet, and kiss their very footsteps, and bring forward your innocent children to plead for their guilty parent; and need you be ashamed to use the same earnestness in beseeching the church to intercede to God for you? (See Pacian, Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 6.) The dress of the mourner was to correspond with his language and position. There were no special regulations allotting a distinctive garb to him, but whatever dress was held to be suitable to severe penance must be held to apply to the station in which the greatest severity was exercised. For a fuller account of the penitential dress see below, under the section Kneelers, p. 1593. It remains to point out the length of time for which delinquents were remitted to this lowest depth of penance. Basil, c. 56, assigns twenty years to a murderer, four of which are to be among the mourners. For the same crime the code of Gregory of Nyssa places the murderer for nine years in the lowest station. For manslaughter, (Basil, cc. 58, 59), two of the eleven years of exclusion are to be among the mourners; for adultery, four out of fifteen; for uncleanness, two out of seven. One canon (c. 73) sentences an apostate to spend the remainder of his life a mourner.

2. HEARERS, audientes, ἀκροούμενοι.—The notices of this second station are scanty. There is no express mention of any rites or austerities peculiar to it, nor of any ceremony by which the penitent was promoted to it from the stage below. With many of the Latin Fathers—Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine—the "audientes" were the catechumens, and these writers do not use the term at all to express a penitential station. In fact, it is doubtful if the station itself ever obtained a general use in the Western church. It was unknown in Africa; it is not mentioned by Ambrose as part of the Italian system; it is altogether omitted in the Collectio Canon. of Martin of Braga, and therefore presumably was not in use in Spain. The only precise and direct reference to the hearers among Latin writers is to be found in one of the letters of pope Felix III. A.D. 483-492 (Ep. vii. ad Episc. Univers. Labbe, Conc. iv. 1075), who decrees that those who submitted to a second baptism should undergo the same penalty which c. 11 of Conc. Nicaen. laid upon the lapsed, that is to say, three years among the hearers, &c. In the East the station was a recognised part of the organization of discipline from the beginning of the 4th century (Gregory Thaumaturgus, c. 11; Basil, cc. 22, 56, 75, &c.; Gregory Nyssa, c. 3; Conc. Ancy. cc. 4, 6, 9; Conc. Nicaen. cc. 11, 12; Apost. Const. viii. 5).

i. Their Position.—The c. 11 of Gregory Thaumaturgus places the hearer within the door in the narthex of the church. His position, strictly speaking, was in the porch (προπάυλαιον, πρόθυρον, πρόναος), but this could not always be enforced in practice. The object of this station was, that he should be a listener to the Scriptures and the sermon. In some buildings he might be able to hear while standing in the vestibule; but as a rule his place must have been assigned within the building at the lowest end of the church. Inside the church was the position as interpreted by the Greek canonists (Balsamon in can. 11, 12, Conc. Nicaen.; Zonaras, in c. 4 Conc. Ancyr.; Harmenopolus, Epitom. Canon. sec. v. tit. 3). He was so far in advance of the mourner that he was spared the abject self-abasement and supplication expected in the lowest stage, and he had moreover the privilege of hearing the Word of God, but he did not as yet receive any imposition of hands, nor share in any intercessory prayer. He was admitted within the walls of the church, but on the same footing with Jews, and heretics, and heathen, and the first order of catechumens; for against none of these classes who wished to enter to listen to the Scriptures were the doors of the church to be closed (4 Conc. Carthag. c. 84).

3. KNEELERS (substrati, ὑποπίπτοντες).—This was the third and principal station in the Eastern system; in the Western, it was not only the principal, but in general practice must have been the only one, with the exception, perhaps, of the consistentes. When the Latin fathers speak of penitence, it is the position and the penance of the kneelers that they have in their mind. It has already been seen that the two earlier stages entered little into the practical administration of the discipline of the West. The Latin versions by Dionysius Exiguus, and by Martin of Braga of the canons of Ancyra, translate ὑποπίπτοντες and ὑπόπτασις by poenitentes and poenitentia. And so the pontifical letter of Felix III. (Ep. vii.), already cited, renders the ὑποπερόντας of c. ii. Conc. Nicaen. by "subjaceant inter poenitentes." It therefore appears that, generally, when the word penitence was employed in the West during the period under review, it referred not to the four stations in succession, but to this particular one of the kneelers. In this station also was performed the exomologesis of the earlier fathers, and the "plena, legitima poenitentia" of Cyprian and the Conc. Eliber. In one of Basil's canons (c. 22) this station is called pre-eminently μετάνοια, poenitentia.

i. Their Position.—The position of the penitent, or the kneeler, is stated by Gregory to be within the door of the church, so that he may go out with the catechumens. He stood within the walls of the building in the part below the ambo. And this position agrees with the decrees of Basil (cc. 22, 56, 75), and is the one assigned by the Greek commentators on the canons (see, for instance, Zonaras and Balsamon in can. 11, 12; Conc. Nicaen. can. 4, 5; Conc. Ancyr.) The ambo thus served as a point of demarcation between the penitents and the faithful; if the number of the faithful was so great as to extend below the ambo, the penitents were thrust lower still.

ii. Rites and Prayers.—In the two lower stations the delinquents were outside the care of the church; as mourners they could not enter the building, as hearers they could only listen to the reading and preaching of the word; but in the stage of kneelers they were again recognised as a part, though an erring part, of the Christian fold. In the first place, they underwent frequent, if not constant, imposition of hands. The 3 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 589, c. 11, orders penitence to be administered according to the form of the ancient canons, which appoint, as it proceeds to explain, that the penitent should frequently resort to imposition of hands. And long before this, the 4 Conc. Carthag. A.D. 398, c. 80, had ordered the hands of the priest to be laid on penitents at every time of fasting; and even on days of remission (id. c. 82), when other Christians were accustomed to stand during their prayers, penitents were not to be exempt from kneeling. Together with imposition of hands, special prayers were offered on his behalf; c. 19 of Conc. Laodic. A.D. 320, gives an early account of these prayers. After the catechumens have gone out, the prayers of the penitents shall be offered, and when they have come under the hand of the priest and departed, then the prayers of the faithful. The order of the service is related fully in the Apost. Const. viii. 8, 9. After the dismissal of the candidates for baptism, the deacon cried out, "Orate poenitentes, and let us pray earnestly for our brethren who are undergoing penance; that the God of mercy would shew them the way of repentance, and admit their contrition and confession, and bruise Satan under their feet," &c. When the prayer was finished, the deacon bade them rise and bow their heads to receive the bishop's benediction. The order of prayer accompanying this rite is then given. At the conclusion of this, the deacon exclaimed, "Depart ye who are penitents." The 3 Conc. Carthag. A.D. 397, c. 32, directs these rites, in the case of notorious delinquents, to take place "ante apsidem." An earlier and simpler account of the dismissal of the penitents from church is given in Apost. Const. ii. 57. There is distinct reference to this service in Chrysostom. "The first prayer," he says (Hom. 71 in Matt. p. 624), "which we pray for the energumens, is full of mercy; the second prayer likewise, when we pray for the penitents, is for mercy." Bingham, Antiq. XIV. v. 13, raises the question whether these prayers, which were an undoubted part of the Eastern offices, were in use also in the West, but concludes that the usage was the same in both branches of the church. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16) gives a graphic account of what he had himself, perhaps, witnessed in a Roman church. "In the Western church, and especially in Rome, the place in which the penitents stand is visible to all; they take up their position in it distressed and sorrowful. When the liturgy is finished, as they may not share in the sacred mysteries, they throw themselves prostrate on the ground with cries and tears, when the bishop, in his compassion, coming to them, falls likewise by their side, raising his voice with theirs, till at length the whole congregation is dissolved in tears. After this the bishop is the first to rise and to take them by the hand; and when he has offered the prayers suitable for sinners performing penance, he dismisses them from the church." The same ceremony of assigning the penitents a special place, and uniting with them in prayer, and dismissing them with the catechumens, was in use in the Frankish church (Conc. Agath. c. 60; Conc. Epaon. c. 29).

iii. Dress.—The delinquent in this stage of penance was to be arrayed in sackcloth. Whether he was required to wear this at all times while under sentence, or only during his public prostration in the church, does not appear. So Ambrose (ad Virg. laps. c. 8) exhibits a virgin who had fallen into sin, undergoing penance, clothed in sackcloth, and with ashes sprinkled upon her head. And so Jerome (Ep. 30 ad Ocean.) describes the garb of Fabiola, while doing penance in the Lateran church in presence of the clergy and people of Rome, with a garment of sackcloth, with her hair dishevelled, and her face and hands unwashed. So Gregory of Tours (Hist. viii. 20), depicts the penance of bishop Ursicinus. It was one of the decrees of the council of Agde (A.D. 506, c. 15), that an offender, from the beginning of his penance, should wear "cilicium," as was the custom throughout the church; and that if he had neglected to change his dress, he should not be admitted among the penitents. The "sicut ubique constitutum est" of c. 15, Conc. Agath. is illustrated by Tertullian de Pudicit. c. 5; Cyprian de Laps. c. 19; Caesarius Arelat. Hom. i.; 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 12, and by the subsequent directions of the rituals of the 8th and 9th centuries. The sordid garb of penance was to be worn as long as the exclusion continued (Pacian, Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 19). Another austerity, enjoined by c. 15, Conc. Agath. was cutting off the hair—a direction also found in 1 Conc. Barcinon. A.D. 540, c. 6, and 3 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 589, c. 12. A man was to shave his head; a woman to wear a veil. This veil was the general dress of a female penitent (Optatus ii. in fin.). Ambrose (Virg. laps. c. 8) had ordered his penitent virgin to cut off that hair which before she had used as a blandishment. The shaving the head gave place, at a later date, to the opposite practice of neglecting the hair and the beard, and suffering it to grow long and heavy, as a symbol of the weight of sin resting on the penitent's head (Isidore de Eccles. Off. ii. 16).

iv. Penitential Exercises.—In addition to the public submission to the appointed course of discipline—the prostration in the church, the open confession, the penitential dress, the rejection from the Eucharistic service—certain special acts of self-mortification were required from the penitent. In the earlier ages, and when zeal was warmer, these acts of contrition were left to the conscience of the contrite sinner. All that was absolutely demanded of him by ecclesiastical usage was obedience to the rites of the public censure. Still it was thought becoming, and a suitable token of sincerity, that the private life should be in accordance with the public profession. So Pacian (Paraen. ad Poenit. c. 19), speaks of it as a daily duty of a penitent to weep in sight of the church, to mourn a lost life in sordid garb, to fast, to pray, to fall prostrate, to refuse luxury, to hold the poor man by the hand, to entreat the prayers of the widows, to fall down before the priests, to essay all rather than to perish. But, as will be seen when a later period is reached, these private acts of penance came more and more to be added on to the public discipline, till, ultimately, they usurped its place. A still later stage will shew these acts redeemable by money payments. The chief of these penitential exercises was fasting, borne sometimes as a self-imposed austerity, sometimes as an additional penalty inflicted by authority. At a later date these special fastings were an invariable accompaniment of the censures of private penance. In the 4th and 5th centuries, if not invariable, they were always expected (Ambrose, ad Virg. laps. c. 9; de Poenit. ii. 10; Caesar. Arelat. Hom. i.) Sozomen, continuing his account (H. E. vii. 16) of the practices of the Western church, states that, in addition to the public formalities, the penitent voluntarily exercised himself in fastings, and in abstinence from meat and from the bath, or in other mortifications which had been commanded him. These austerities were usually assigned, as Sozomen relates, by the penitentiary; but as that office was altogether abolished in the time of Nectarius, the more general practice in the church must have been that the bishop, or priest, under whose ministrations the delinquent ordinarily lived, allotted them. By the end of the 5th century, special penitential fastings were the common practice (Felix III. Ep. 7). Towards the middle of the following century, other restrictions were added. The first council of Barcelona, A.D. 540 (cc. 6, 7), not only orders penitents to pass their time in prayer and fasting, with a shaven head and a religious dress, but also forbids them to be present at banquets or to take a part in public affairs, but to lead a frugal life in their own homes. The length to which these deprivations and macerations were carried may be gathered from what is told of a visit to the penitential cells of a monastery by John Climacus in the 6th century (apud Morin. vi. 11). After relating the laborious penance of the prisoners, he adds, "What I saw and heard among them filled me with despair, when I compare my easy ways with the rigour of those saints, and consider what the aspect of the place, and of their whole dwelling was, how dark, and foetid, and sordid, and squalid," &c. In addition to fasting and abstinence from the ordinary enjoyments and luxuries of life, there were two other restrictions laid upon penitents, one of which cut them off from marriage, or, if they were married, from conjugal intercourse; the other, from the profession of arms or any other secular calling. These two restrictions were curiously confined, both as to the date and the part of the church in which they were in force. In the first place, they are not met with in any of the authorities prior to the conversion of the empire. Neither Tertullian, nor Cyprian, nor Pacian, nor the councils of Elvira or Arles, make any reference to penitents being excluded from marriage or marriage-rights, or from bearing arms, or carrying on business, or taking any part in public affairs. So, with regard to the restrictions on public or professional life. Christians were undoubtedly prohibited from undertaking certain public offices (Conc. Eliber. c. 56; 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 7), not because they were penitents, but because of the taint of idolatry attaching to the offices in question. What has been said with regard to the absence of these restrictions in the West in the first three centuries, applies to the Eastern church absolutely. Neither celibacy, nor retirement from secular life, was ever imposed in connexion with public penance in the East. Such prohibitions were frequently laid upon the clergy, but upon the clergy alone (Con. Apost. cc. 81, 82; Conc. Chalced. c. 3). Coming to the Western usage, the Latin fathers no doubt counsel seclusion and continence during the time of penance (for example, Ambrose de Poenitent. ii. 10), but they do not make them obligatory. The earliest decision on the subject is in a letter (Ep. i. 5) of pope Siricius, A.D.

384-398, in reply to Himerius, bishop of Tarragona (Lab. Conc. ii. 1017), which prohibits participation in the elements, although it sanctions communion in prayer, to those who, after their penance, had returned to military life and contracted a second marriage. There was always a tendency in such restrictions to increase in severity. Accordingly, the 2 Conc. Arlat. A.D. 443, c. 21, casts out altogether from the doors of the church a penitent who, during his penance or afterwards, entered upon marriage a second time. And 3 Conc. Aurelian. A.D. 538, c. 25, prohibits a penitent from resuming arms or secular pursuits under penalty of being denied communion to the hour of death. Still severer is a decree of 2 Conc. Barcinon. A.D. 599, c. 4, which places marriage during penance on the same footing as the marriage of a nun, and orders both to be utterly expelled from the church. Some of the Frankish councils (2 Conc. Arlat. c. 22; 3 Conc. Aurelian. c. 24) forbade married people even to be received as penitents. The latest canon appointing these restrictions is the one of Barcelona just quoted. These special penalties may therefore be said to have been in use through the 5th and 6th centuries, and only in the Western church. They will reappear later in connexion with the Western discipline; no longer, however, as an ordinary part of public penance, but rather as special punishments for special great crimes. It is manifest that this discipline strictly enforced would not only lay a heavy burden on those who submitted to it, but would also lead to great practical inconvenience. The number of penitents at this time was very large, and if they were to be excluded, not only during their penance, but for the remainder of their lives, both from carrying arms and from all secular pursuits, their means of livelihood would be cut off. The necessities of the case led to a system of dispensation, upon which much light is thrown in one of the epistles of pope Leo I. A.D. 440-461 (Ep. xcii. Lab. Conc. iii. 1408, where both the questions and replies are given). He is writing in answer to questions put to him by Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne. In reply to interrog. 10, asking how penitents who plead in a law-suit are to be treated? Leo answers, that a man who is seeking pardon for spiritual wrong must be content to forego his civil rights; and in fact, he prohibits the penitent from appearing in court. In reply to the next question, with regard to trade and business, he decrees that although all matters of buying and selling are likely to stain the soul, still that there are some trades which are honourable, and he gives no decision in the matter. In practice this distinction appears to have held good, that a respectable trade or profession was open to a penitent; but that if he resumed any questionable, still more any discreditable business, he again exposed himself to ecclesiastical censure. And this is in accordance with the language of Gregory (Hom. 24 in Evangel.), that there are certain trades which can scarcely be carried on without contamination with sin, and it is obligatory on a repentant sinner not to adopt one of them. The restriction with regard to war did not involve the same practical difficulty as secular business, and to this Leo was not disposed to grant any dispensation declaring (Ep. xcii. interrog. 12) that it was contrary to all ecclesiastical usage for any one at the conclusion of his penance to resume arms. With respect to continence, the councils in the canons cited above insisted upon strict self-control, both during penance and afterwards. This strictness Leo (ibid. interrog. 13) would rather relax, and allow a married man to return to his wife when his penance is over. This decision of Leo is cited with approval by the sixth council of Toledo (A.D. 638, c. 8) where the continence of penitents is the subject of a long disquisition.

4. The BYSTANDERS, consistentes, συνιστάμενοι.—The fourth and last penitential station. The ecclesiastical term σύστασις is given in the c. 11 of Gregory Thaumaturgus, and frequently in the canons of Basil. The Conc. Ancy. uses the word once only, c. 25. The signification of the term is, standing together with the faithful and communicating with them, but in prayer only, and not being dismissed before the Eucharistic service. In the earlier Greek canons the station is more frequently expressed by some paraphrase. The c. 12 of Conc. Nicaen. decreed that after an offender had expiated his allotted sentence among the hearers, he might communicate in prayer. This communion to which the “consistentes” were admitted, extended no further than the right to share in the Eucharistic prayers. All the other rites of the sacrament, and more particularly reception, were forbidden. Among the prohibited rites was that of bringing oblations. The Conc. Ancy. frequently (cc. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 16, 24) describes this fourth station by the expression “let them be present at the Eucharist without oblation” (χωρὶς προσφορὰς κοινωνήσασθαι). The c. 11 of Conc. Nicaen. expresses the last stage by similar language. See also Felix, Ep. iii. 7. Communion in prayer, without the privilege of making an oblation, was therefore tantamount to rejection from actual participation. And this appears to have been the extent of the ἀπορίσσειν of the apostolic canons and the abstinere of Cyprian and of the councils of Elvira and Arles. The consistentes comprised several degrees and classes of penitents. 1. Those who had worked their way up through one or more of the lower stages. 2. Those whose censure only excluded them from participation, either because their offence was a light one, as in the case of the inhabitants of cities absenting themselves from church for three Sundays, or of gamblers (Conc. Eliber. cc. 21, 79; 1 Conc. Arlat. cc. 3, 4, 5, 6, 11), or because the offender had at once confessed his crime and obtained a remission from penance. (Gregory Thaumaturgus. c. 9; Basil, c. 61). 3. Penitents, who, after reconciliation, had resumed their secular trades, and who had re-married, and who by a decree of pope Siricius, A.D. 384-398 (Ep. i. 5), were to be denied participation. Of these classes, the second, which contributed probably the greater part of the whole, were in no strict sense penitents; the third was an exceptional case. The first were the consistentes proper. They were admitted once more into communion with the faithful, with the exception of the right of making oblations, and receiving the elements. Whether or not they were exempt from all penitential exercises there is no evidence to shew. Whatever disabilities in the matter of marriage, and arms and public affairs and trade, were imposed upon other penitents, were laid also upon these, although it is most probable they were spared the humiliation of a penitential dress, and of public imposition of hands.

i. Their position.—The position of the consistentes was above the ambo with the rest of the congregation. This may be taken as a matter of course. It is nowhere expressly so stated, but as all those below the ambo, catechumens, penitents, energumens, were dismissed before the beginning of the eucharistic service, and the consistentes were permitted to remain, it is natural to conclude that their position in church would be above those who were dismissed. But whether they mixed indiscriminately with the faithful, or were set apart by themselves, is not so clear. Basil decrees (c. 4) with regard to some who had contracted a third marriage, that after so many years among the Hearers and Co-standers, they were to be restored to the place of communion (τῷ τόπῳ τῆς κοινωνίας), which would seem to imply that the actual communicant occupied a distinct place in the church; and bearing in mind the orderly arrangement of an ancient Christian congregation, the men on one side, and the women on the other, the monks, the virgins, and the sacred widows, in the front, it seems more likely that the penitents, even when they had reached the highest station, had a separate locality in the church.

IV. FROM THE SEVENTH CENTURY TO THE NINTH.

1. In the East. With the beginning of the 5th century, the Eastern system entered upon a new stage. The abrogation of the office of the PENITENTIARY priest, which took place some time during the episcopacy of Nectarius at Constantinople, A.D. 381–397, may be taken as the point of departure from the earlier practice. The reason and the circumstances of the removal of this church officer are given in Sozomen, H. E. vii. 16; Socrates, H. E. v. 19. The changes which may be traced to this act of Nectarius are—1. The removal of the presbyter whose office it was to superintend confession and penance. 2. The decline of the custom, which dated from the earliest ages, of acknowledging certain crimes openly before the congregation, the supervision of which had been one of the duties of the penitentiary. 3. The selection by the penitent of his acts of penance, instead of their assignment by the penitentiary. 4. The gradual cessation of public penance for secret crimes. 5. The cessation of the public rites of daily imposition of hands and prayers for the penitents, which were the chief ceremonies in the ritual of the station of the ὑποπίπτοντες. Of these changes, the first four followed as a matter of course from the abolition of the penitentiary's office. The public imposition and prayer did not long survive; they may be said to have ceased with the termination of the observance of the stations, and they formed no part of the Eastern discipline at the close of the 5th century. The solemnities observed towards the kneelers, who comprised the great body of those who were undergoing public penance, consisted of two parts; the first, the laying on of hands and the prayers; the second, the formal dismissal from the church. The latter of these continued in force after the former had fallen into disuse. Morinus (Poenitent. vi. 22) discovers a mention of this solemn dismissal in the Ecll. Mystagog., c. 14, of St. Maximus, who wrote in the 7th century. The disappearance of all the solemnities peculiar to the stations is coincident with the omission of any mention of the stations from the canons of councils. The one exception to this statement is Conc. in Trull. c. 87, which sentenced an adulterer to be a Mourner one year, a Hearer two, &c., &c. Martene (de Rit. Antiq. i. 6) suggests that this canon points to the existence of the stations in the 7th century. Morinus, with more reason, regards it rather in the light of an historical reference by the fathers in Trullo, than of a canon on existing discipline. The absence of any reference to the rites and solemnities of penitents is equally marked in the Greek liturgies, as in the canons already cited. Those of Basil and Chrysostom are altogether silent with regard to them. So are the liturgical writings of Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, about A.D. 720. The Syriac liturgies of Antioch and the Nestorians, in common with all the oriental liturgies, mention the ritual of the catechumens, but not that of the penitents. Equally silent is that of St. Mark, which is said to have been used by the churches of Jerusalem and Alexandria. The liturgy of St. James has one direction which may refer to the dismissal of penitents. After the reading of the Gospel, the deacon is to say, Let none of the catechumens, none who are yet uninitiated, none who are unable to pray with us, be present at the mysteries. It is not improbable that the expression "those who are not able to pray with us," may refer to delinquents undergoing penance, but they are not mentioned by name. The same direction occurs in the Abyssinian liturgy (Morinus, Poenitent. vi. 22). In the age of the compilation of these liturgies, the old penitential rites of public prayer and imposition of hands, and to a great extent of solemn dismissal, had apparently vanished. In the time of the Greek canonist Balsamon, the 12th century, every vestige of them had completely departed, and they are spoken of in c. 19, Conc. Laodic., as customs of the early ages. It is difficult to determine with any fulness the penitential rites which took their place. The chief source of information is the Penitential book which bears the name of John the Faster, who succeeded to the patriarchate of Constantinople, A.D. 585. The Penitential is published in the Appendix (pp. 615–644) of the great work of Morinus, together with the Canonarium of John the Monk, who in the title is called a disciple of Basil, which can mean no more than that the treatise contains some of the traditionary teaching of Basil, or carries on his system. If the date commonly assigned to these books could be depended upon, there would be no difficulty in sketching the outline of the penitential system in the East, in the 6th and following centuries. But the books manifestly contain much later additions, and modern criticism has not yet determined how much is genuine, and how much spurious (Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, p. 4, note). There is little doubt that John left behind him a collection of penitential canons, which for some ages had wide authority in the Eastern church. Nicephorus Chartophylax (Ep. ad Theod. Monach.) writing about the year 800, testifies to the general reception of the canons. A council of Constantinople, held under Alexius Comnenus about A.D. 1085, replying to certain questions of some monks, condemns (quest. 11), the canonical system of the Easter for having destroyed many souls by excessive indulgence. The book appears to have passed through the same history as some of the more familiar Penitentials of the West. In its present form it probably contains most of the original instructions of John, but with so much of accretion that it is unsafe to rely upon it in matters of detail. The use and encouragement of minute secret confession are unquestionable, if the Penitential is to be accepted as authentic in any shape. To stimulate confession, the priest was instructed to examine the delinquent in the utmost detail. Then there followed the delivery of the sentence, consisting mainly of fastings, and continuing sometimes for a number of years. Lastly, there came the singular practice, which may be dated from this age, and which continued peculiar to the Eastern discipline, of granting a preliminary absolution immediately after the confession, and after the imposition of penance, but deferring full restoration to communion till the completion of the penance, however long or short it might be. The only vestige of the public penance remaining was the retirement of the penitent (ἀπὸ τοῦ ναοῦ) from the choir of the church into the narthex while the Mass was being celebrated. He was under instructions to retire at the same time with the catechumens, but he was not, like them, solemnly dismissed, although his retirement was doubtless a remnant of the old rite of formal dismissal. Reference to this practice of the penitent retiring is made in a MS. of Simeon of Thessalonica, In Sac. Liturg., about A.D. 1000, published by Morinus, Appendix, p. 470. The order of conducting the confession in the Greek Penitential was this: first, the confession, accompanied by a certain ritual of posture and prayer, then a minute interrogation of the delinquent, then a short precatory absolution, and afterwards the assignment of a penance to be performed without any public ceremonial. [See EXOMOLOGESIS, Vol. I. p. 650.] The sentence sometimes extended to ten or fifteen years; the ἐπιτήκια (or penitential exercises) were chiefly confined to restrictions on matters of food and drink. [See FASTING, Vol. I. p. 663.] As, however, the ἐπιτήκια were precise and elaborate and sometimes of long duration, and, on certain festivals, might be omitted entirely, it was customary to assign them in writing. Slaves and servants of all classes were to receive only half the penance imposed upon their masters. The ritual described in the Penitentials was the model for the practice of penitence in the East throughout the middle ages (Leo Allatius, Consens. Eccl. Orient. cum Occident. iii. 9).

2. IN THE WEST.

1. Public Penitence.—The changes which came over the Eastern discipline in the 5th century were longer in making their appearance in the West. But when the change came the same general results followed. The ritual of public imposition of hands, and an order of prayer and solemn dismissal before the eucharistic service, fell into disuse. Morinus infers from the absence of a penitential ritual in any of the early Latin liturgies, the Gregorian or Gelasian sacramentaries, the Ordo Romanus, the Ambrosian liturgy, or of any reference to one in the early liturgical commentators, Walafrid Strabo, Raban Maur, Amalarius, that the public rites in the treatment of penitents came to an end about A.D.

700. Another change, dating from about that period, and coincident with the introduction of the Penitentials, was the definition of the distinction between public and private penance. The latter, which was unknown in the early ages, now almost entirely usurped the place of the former; and it grew to be accepted as a custom of the church that public penance should be reserved for notorious offenders, but that for secret sins private penance sufficed. No exact date can be fixed as to the time in which public penance fell into abeyance. It declined with the gradual decline of primitive church order. In the English church it had disappeared altogether before the close of the 7th century. There is a decree in the penitential of Theodore (A.D. 669–690, I. xiii. 4), which states that reconciliation was not to be publicly granted in his province, because public penance was not in existence. Even as early as the 6th century private penance had made an inroad on the public discipline; there is a canon of 1 Conc. Masticon. A.D. 581, c. 18, which deprives certain delinquents of communion till they had made satisfaction by public penance. In the stricter system of former centuries, the deprivation itself would have been a public penance. Morinus (vii. 1) quotes a decree from Conc. Leptin. A.D. 743, which he states to have been confirmed by pope Zacharias, that an offender who privately and spontaneously confessed should be dealt with privately; if he was openly convicted, or made a public confession, then he was to pass through penance publicly, in the presence of the church, according to the canons. This decree, which does not appear among the four extant canons of Lestines, was inserted in the later collections of the Capitularies, v. 52; and taken with other indirect indications of the decay of public discipline, it may be regarded as representing the general practice of the West at the close of the 8th century. Thus the 2 Conc. Remens. A.D. 813, c. 31, called attention to the distinction which ought to be observed between those doing public and private penance: a distinction also made by 6 Conc. Arelat. c. 26 in the same year, and repeated in the Capitulary issued by Conc. Ticin. A.D. 855, (Labbe, Conc. viii. 149), and in Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 847, c. 31, under Raban. Maur. When once the custom became general that some might be exempt from public penance, there naturally arose a difficulty in enforcing it in cases which had no claim to exemption. In different provinces, zealous and energetic bishops insisted upon the observance of the canons. Thus among the Capitula issued by Hincmar, A.D. 852 (Labbe, Conc. viii. 585), to the clergy of the diocese of Rheims, was one to the effect that if, in defiance of clerical admonition, a notorious criminal refused to submit to public penance, resort was to be had to the extreme censure of excommunication. Hincmar allows a criminal fifteen days' grace, after which, if he still refuses submission, he is to be excommunicated. In England (Theod. Penitent. I. xiii. 4) public penance was in abeyance as early as the close of the 7th century. In France, Jonas, bishop of Orleans (de Instit. Laic. i. 10), writing at the beginning of the 9th century, states that a public penitent was scarcely ever seen in the churches, and that the vigour of the ancient discipline was almost dead. It is not, however, to be supposed that the primitive system was quite gone. Public penitents were still to be seen, who were separated from the faithful in dress, and by their position in the congregation. An evidence of their existence is to be found in the laws passed for their protection. It was a criminal offence in a priest or layman to compel a public penitent to eat flesh or drink wine (Capitular. i. 157); to slay him was a crime of special enormity (ibid. iv. 18). The 9th century witnessed some revival of the old discipline. The organisation of the stations became again, in a modified form, the rule of the church (see Martene, de Rit. I. vi. art. 4). The Conc. Vornat., A.D. 868, c. 30, appointed a penitent to pray for a certain time outside the church doors; at the end of that period he was to be solemnly introduced, but still separated from the faithful, and be placed in a conspicuous corner of the church, and there to stand, unless he had special permission to sit (Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 888, c. 16); afterwards he was permitted to mix with the congregation, but reception of the elements came later (Capitular. v. 136). If the third stage of non-participation was prolonged, communion was granted on Christmas Day and Easter. Detailed directions for dealing with particular delinquents will be found in the pastoral letters of pope Nicholas I. A.D. 858–867; Ep. xvii. ad Rivol. Episc.; Labb. Conc. viii. 503; Ep. xxiv. ad Hincmar.; ibid. p. 513; Conc. Nanneiens. A.D. 895, c. 17. In the matter of dress it does not appear that any change was made from the penitential garb in use in the earlier centuries. In some provinces it was the custom for the hair and beard to be shaven, in others to be neglected and suffered to grow long. All the penitentials and rituals to which an “ordo” is attached, speak of hair-cloth and ashes as appropriate to the time of penance. A penitent was also to go barefoot, as appears from the Ep. xvii. ad Rivol. Episc. of Nicolas I. just cited, which makes an exceptional concession in favour of an individual offender to wear boots or sandals. Conc. Tribur. c. 55, forbade also the use of linen. In addition to these austerities, a rigid and long-continued system of fasting was imposed. Gregory III. (A.D. 731–741, Ep. i. 7; Labb. Conc. xi. 1469) decided, in reply to a question of Boniface, that a parricide should be denied communion till death, should fast the second, fourth, and sixth days of each week, and abstain from flesh and wine as long as he lived. A man who murdered his own son was enjoined by Nicolas I. (Ep. xvii. ad Rivol. Episc.) to abstain from flesh all the days of his life, for seven years to drink wine only on Sundays and festivals, and the remaining five years of his penance four days a week. He was allowed intercourse with his wife, but forbidden to bear arms except against the pagans, and if he had occasion to travel he must go on foot. Another criminal was ordered by the same pontiff (Ep. ad Hincmar.) to fast till evening all the years of his penance, except at Easter and on the festivals; an exemption extended in another case to the fifty days from Easter till Pentecost. These disabilities and austerities are enforced with some variety in the councils of that period (Conc. Vornat. cc. 26, 30, 36; Conc. Tribur. cc. 56, 58). Morinus sums up the penalties inflicted after the beginning of the 7th century, as distinguished from those of an earlier date, under four headings. 1. Those which concern dress and habits, including the obligation to go with bare feet, and to wear no linen and to travel on foot. 2. The observance of specified days and modes of fasting. 3. Corporal punishment. 4. Exile. [See CORPORAL PUNISHMENT, EXILE, FASTING, FLAGELLATION.] To this may be added a fifth of incarceration, or SECLUSION in a monastery, involving, of course, an abandonment of secular life. An ancient MS. from Beauvais (Martene de Rit. i. 6) gives an account of rites of public penance, which can hardly be later than the 9th century. It is interesting to note in it the vestiges of the old ritual, the detention without the door, the imposition of hands, and the solemn dismissal. “At the beginning of Lent, all delinquents undergoing, or about to undergo, public penance, should present themselves to the bishop before the door of the church, clothed in sackcloth, with bare feet and downcast looks. There the penitentiary priest should be present to examine their cases, and impose penance according to the appointed grades. The bishop should then bring them into the church, and prostrating himself on the ground, together with all the clergy, should sing the seven penitential Psalms; afterwards rising from prayer, he should lay his hands upon them in accordance with the canons, and sprinkle them with holy water and place ashes upon them, and cover their heads with sackcloth, and with groans and sighs announce to them that as Adam was cast out from Paradise, so must they be cast out from the church. He was then to order the deacon to conduct them outside the door, the clergy following them, and saying the sentence, “In the sweat of thy face,” &c., and the bishop shall close the door upon them; and so they remain outside till the Coena Domini.” A Noyon MS. of the 9th century gives a short “ordo” for public penance, which is repeated by the Pseudo-Alcuin, and many rituals of a later date. “Take the penitent on the fourth day in the morning in Capite Quadragesimae, and cover him with sackcloth, and shut him up till Coena Domini.” The same codex contains a form for the benediction of ashes, with the direction that when the ashes are laid on the head of the penitent, the priest is to say, “In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, remember that thou art dust, and that to dust thou shalt return.”

ii. Private Penitence.—The whole system disclosed by the penitentials points to the prevalence of private penance. In the Greek penitentials the delinquent makes a private acknowledgment of his sins to the priest, he is questioned in private, and the various rites and ceremonies which precede final reconciliation are also private. The Latin, no less than the Greek, penitentials are entirely silent on the essential elements of public discipline. Their contents bear out the statement of Theodore (Penitent. I. xiii. 4) that public penance did not exist in the province for the discipline of which he published his book. The clergy had sufficient hold upon the consciences of their flock to compel them to submit to many severe acts of self-abasement and self-denial for their sins. But the converts of the independent northern races shrunk from the open humiliation of appearing before the congregation with a shaven head, and with the arms and the attire and the characteristic ornaments of a free man laid aside. The whole transaction, the imposition of the penance on the one side, and its performance on the other, was, as it were, a secret one between the delinquent and his priest or bishop. The church, as such, took no part in the matter. The nature of the sins censured varied from some trivial carelessness up to horrible and unnatural crimes. But each offender was alike subjected to penance whether his offence was labouring on the Lord's Day (Theod. Penitent. I. xi. 1) or murder (ibid. I. iv. 2) or heresy (ibid. I. v. 9). For the first of these offences the censure was seven days' penance; for the two last ten years. But in either case the delinquent became a penitent. The sentence was passed by the bishop or the priest, or even by a deacon, but there was no open or public rite connected with it. Fasting and abstinence were the usual penalties, and these were generally expressed in the disciplinary canons of all the penitentials, Irish, Anglo-Saxon, or Frankish. To these the Irish books especially added EXILE from the native land for a fixed period, alms to the poor, and the emancipation of a certain number of servi or ancillae, and in the case of bodily injuries satisfaction to the parents or friends (Poenitent. Vinnia, Wasserscheleben, pp. 108-224). As discipline decayed, the notion of REDEMPTIONS began to be accepted, and other and easier penalties were introduced, such as the singing of so many psalms, the payment of so many solidi to the poor, so many strokes of a rod, or genuflexions (Beda Poenitent. xi. x. Cummean, Poenitent. "de divite vel potente quomodo se redimit pro criminalibus culpis," Wasserscheleben, p. 464). Both Beda and Cummean give their sanction to the employment of a substitute by any one who was unable to say his psalms, an evasion which sounds perhaps the lowest depths to which the rigour of the primitive system had sunk. In most of the penitential books the quadragesimal season of the year and the legitimæ feriae of the week were periods when more severe abstinence was imposed. See below, Season of Penitence. On certain days the penitent was free from his punishment; these are stated by Cummean at the conclusion of his prologue, to be all Sundays, Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, Pentecost, St. John Baptist, St. Mary Ever-virgin, the twelve Apostles, and St. Martin, because his body was reposeing in that province. Several of the Frankish penitentials have attached to them a "ratio" or "ordo ad dandam poenitentiam." These are doubtless of a later age than the body of the canones to which they are appended. They are apparently of a sufficiently early date to throw some light on the system of private penance in the 8th century. The Penitential. Pseudo-Roman., the text of which belongs to the 7th century, has a long prologue, "Quomodo penitentes sunt suscipiendi sive reconciliandi" (Wasserscheleben, p. 360). In it the priest is exhorted to fast one or two weeks with the penitent, and even with cries and tears to join in supplication with him. In this latter direction there is a trace of the custom of the earliest ages (Soz. H. E. vii. 16). When the penitent comes to confess his sins the priest is to bid him wait a little till he has entered into his chamber for prayer, and if he has no chamber, the priest should say the prayer that followed in his heart. After the prayers, are given further details on the fasting to be imposed and on almsgiving, the alms to be used either for the redemption of captives or the relief of the poor, or to be placed on the altar. Then follow "orationes ad dandam poenitentiam;" and, finally, the prayer, which was to accompany the imposition of hands. This ordo is also published by Martene (de Rit. i. 6), from a pontifical from the Benedictine monastery of Jumièges of the 8th century. Communion was not invariably delayed till after the final reconciliation. In prolonged penitence Theodore permits communion "pro misericordia" after six months or a year. A MS. from the church of St. Gatianus of Tours, attributed by Martene (de Rit. i. 6) to the 9th century, contains an "ordo privatae seu annualis poenitentiae," which discloses some variety of ritual. It directs all priests to exhort their flocks to come to confession the first day of Lent, and if from being on a journey or from being engaged in any business, they are unable to come for reconciliation on Coena Domini, the priest may reconcile them at once. When each one comes to confess, if a layman, he is to lay aside his staff, and, whether a clergyman or a monk, he is to bow himself to the priest, who will then order him to sit before him. Then follow the profession of faith and confession of sin, after which the penitent is to prostrate himself on the ground with groans and tears (proust Deus dederit). The priest is to suffer him to lie there for a time, and then raise him and assign him his penance; then comes a second prostration, and then supplication for the priest's intercession.

V. SINS AND PENALTIES.

1. SINS SUBJECTING TO PENANCE.

i. Open Sins.—Only mortalia delicta exposed the delinquent to penitence in the early ages. Lesser offences were punished by the rejection of oblations and the refusal of the elements in holy communion. The faults and defects of daily life were considered to be fully satisfied by daily prayer. Penitence, strictly so-called, which involved an open acknowledgment of sin and a performance of certain acts of austerity and a special dress and a separation from the faithful in church, was restricted to certain grievous sins as defined by the canons. The model on which the penitential code was founded was the decision of the apostles with regard to the newly-converted Gentiles (Acts xv. 28, 29). For the first 400 years the three great sins of idolatry, murder, and adultery, or such as were closely allied to them, and clearly fell under the same category, were in general the only crimes punished by public penance. The slight or apparent exceptions to this statement will be investigated presently. In the moral and homiletical writings of the fathers of that period, the classification of sins and the enumeration of those which could only be expiated by penance are made with more fulness than in the canons of councils. Tertullian, in his tract De Pudicit. c. 19, which represents the most rigid notions of that age, yet admits that some sins were matters of daily occurrence to which all were subject, and which consequently needed no penance. Among such he reckons anger and quarrelling, and a rash oath and a failure to keep an engagement, and an untruth told from modesty or necessity. But the three capital crimes he arranges on a level above all others (ibid. c. 12), and endeavours to prove, in accordance with the tenets of Montanism, that the church had no power to absolve them, as, he infers, she claimed to do through penance. Nearly all the references to penitence in Cyprian are in connexion with the lapsed, that is to say, idolatry. Although there are two passages which intimate that penance was allotted in the African church to less heinous sins. In Ep. xvi. 2 he condemns the laxity with which the eucharist was granted to the lapsed, whereas in lesser sins (minoribus peccatis), sinners do penance for an appointed time, and, according to the rules of discipline, come to confession, &c. In the following, Ep. xvii., he speaks again of penance being done for an appointed time for lesser offences which are not committed against God, contrasting, that is, such offences with idolatry, which is directly against the majesty of God. But the general rule of the church was that public penance was restricted to mortal sins. So it is stated by Pacian in his treatise on penance, which manifestly reflects the teaching of Cyprian. Other sins he considers (Paroen. ad Poenit. c. 9) may be cured by the compensation of good works, but idolatry, murder, adultery are capital crimes. Augustine clearly lays down that only the gravest sins were visited by public penance. There are some sins, he says (de Fid. et op. c. 26), so great as to deserve to be punished by excommunication; others which need not the infliction of that humiliation of penance which is imposed upon those who are properly called penitents in the church; a third class, again, from which none can escape, for which our Lord has left us a remedy in the daily prayer, "forgive us our trespasses." This distinction of light sins, for the cure of which daily prayer is sufficient, occurs again and again in his writings (Enchiridion. c. 71; Hom. xxvii. t. 10, p. 177; Hom. cxix. de Temp. c. 8; Ep. lxxxix. ad Hilar. quaest. 1; Ep. cviii. ad Seleucian., cited by Bingham). He tells the catechumens (de Symbol. ad Catechumen. i. 7) that those who are seen doing penance have been guilty of adultery or some such grievous act. He distinguishes between peccatum and crimen, the former, sinfulness from which none is free, the latter, an act of grievous sin (Tract. lxi. in Joan. t. 9, p. 126; De Civ. Dei. xxi. 27; de Symbol. i. 7). Ambrose (de Poenit. ii. 10) confines penance to graviora delicta. The canonical epistle of Gregory of Nyssa is an elaborate treatise on the nature of crime and of the ecclesiastical discipline suitable to it. Like the Latin fathers, he starts with murder, idolatry, and uncleanness as the three mortal sins, but he bases his classification, not on the decision of the apostolic council (Acts xv. 28, 29), but on the threefold division of the faculties of the soul, the rational, the irascible, and the concupiscible; and all sins punishable by penance he ranks under one of these three headings. Under the first are reckoned idolatry and apostasy, either of which, if committed wilfully and through instability of faith, must be expiated by a life-long exclusion; if under fear or compulsion, then a nine years' penance is sufficient. Under the second heading he includes adultery, which involves the disgrace or injury of another, and simple uncleanness, the former crime requiring double the penalty of the latter. To the irascible faculty he assigns murder, with the distinction of voluntary and involuntary homicide. He then discusses covetousness, which, in the language of St. Paul, he calls a species of idolatry, and which he says springs from a combination of all these faculties, but the censure of which, he adds, has been overlooked by the fathers before him. Of the branches of covetousness he considers robbery with violence and the spoiling of graves for the sake of the clothes and ornaments contained in them, to be the only offences requiring public penance. Simple theft and the robbery of tombstones were marked by no ecclesiastical censure. He declines to attach a penalty to usury and extortion, on the ground that the ancient canons have not done so. By usury, however, he must have meant usury by a layman; in the case of a clergyman it had been distinctly condemned by Conc. Nicaen. c. 17. The three capitalia delicta are the principal objects of Basil's canons. He has, in addition, one on perjury (c. 64), another on robbery (c. 61), and another on rape (c. 30); each of which might, without any violence, be brought under the heading of one of the three fundamental sins. The councils of Elvira, Ancyra, Neocaesarea impose penance on these three mortal sins only. In Conc. Eliber. cc. 73, 75, the crime of an informer was held to involve murder, and was punished accordingly. And in the same light, to judge from the extreme penalty attached to it, it was regarded by 1 Conc. Arclat. c. 14. In course of time, and apparently towards the close of the 4th century, the number of sins for which public penance was exacted began to be enlarged. As in the case of covetousness, in the passage just quoted, Gregory of Nyssa states that it had been overlooked by the ancient fathers, and that therefore he adds it to the list of delicta. Basil (c. 30) says the same of rape, and of polygamy (c. 80), that he had no ancient canons to guide him, and that he made them penal by his own judgment. Still these and similar additions did not materially alter the definition of ecclesiastical crimes, and as long as public penance was in force, the description of 1 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 398, c. 2, held good: "that a penitent was one who either on account of murder or various crimes and most heinous sins was doing public penance." Excommunication for small faults was strictly forbidden by Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 3. The 5 Conc. Aurelian. A.D. 549, c. 2, and 2 Conc. Arvern. A.D. 549, c. 2, laid a like prohibition on suspension from communion for light causes; an offender was to be suspended only on those grounds which the ancient fathers had decreed. As the boundaries of the church were enlarged and her relations with the state became closer, the ecclesiastical was framed more in accordance with the civil law. Thus the 2 Conc. Turon. A.D. 567, c. 20, inflicted long penance on the abduction of a sacred virgin, on the ground that the Roman law had made it a capital crime.

And the spoiling of graves by clergymen was to be punished by deposition by 4 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 46, because such an offence was defined to be sacrilege by the public law. Hence it became an axiom of the church that any crime punishable by death by the code of the state was to be expiated by penance. This was the language held by pope Pelagius II. A.D. 578-590, Ep. ii., and by Gregory the Great, x. Ep. 13, ad Episc. Passiv. Firman. (Morinus, v. 5). Under the system administered in England by Egbert the list of mortal sins became considerably enlarged. The following enumeration is given in the Archbishop's Penitential, c. 1, "de capitalia crimina." "Nunc igitur capitalia crimina secundum canones explicabo. Prima superbia, invidia, fornicatio, inanis gloria, ira longo tempore, tristitia seculi; avaritia, ventris ingluviæ, sacrilegium, id est sacrarum rerum furtum, et hoc maximum est furtum, vel idolatricis servientem, id est auspiciis et reliqua, adulterium, falsum testimonium, furtum, rapinam, ebrietas assidua, idololatria, molles, sodomita, maledici, perjuri." His second chapter treats "de minoribus peccatis," but the distinction between minora and capitalia in his list is altogether arbitrary and unmeaning. The complete account of the sins which required formal penitence must be sought in the penitential books themselves.

ii. Secret Sins.—No distinction was made so long as public penitence was in force between secret and notorious crimes. The same penalty was required for each. In the earlier ages, when public confession was practised, it followed as a matter of course that the ensuing penance should be public too. There is nothing to shew in the first four centuries that secret sins, after once they had become known to the church, were treated in any other way than sins which were detected. The only distinction was that, if the offence was spontaneously confessed, the penance was lighter (see below PENALTIES, iv. Alleviation of), but it was none the less open penance. Many of the offences censured by the canons could only have been known to the doers of them; for instance, Conc. Neocaesar. c. 9; Conc. Eliber. c. 76; Basil, Ep. cc. 69-71. The very exception which Basil (c. 34) states was allowed in the case of a married woman, implies that open penance was the rule. Her sin, if it was unknown to her husband, must have been expressly a secret one. She was spared open disclosure, not because of its secrecy, but to save her from her husband's vengeance. The Epistle of Leo to the bishops of Campania (Ep. lxxx.; Labb. Conc. iii. 1373), which is generally regarded as marking a departure from the early practice of open confession, is written throughout on the supposition that, whether the sin was open or secret, the penance was the same. Morinus gives some conspicuous instances of the admission of secret sins being followed by severe sentences. One was that of Potamius, archbishop of Braga, who wrote to the bishops assembled in the tenth council of Toledo, A.D. 656, confessing that he had been guilty of fornication. The crime was altogether unsuspected and the confession spontaneous, yet he was sentenced by the council to life-long penance. See Morinus, v. 11, where this and other instances are detailed at length.

2. PENALTIES.

i. Whether exclusively spiritual.—The different penalties inflicted by ecclesiastical discipline may be divided into three degrees: i. excision from the church; ii. penance; iii. exclusion from communion. The second of these includes all the austerities and disabilities imposed by the penitential system. The extent and duration of them have been sufficiently discussed in the body of this article. Prior to the conversion of the empire the church had no power to interfere with the civil rights of her members, and her censures must have been exclusively spiritual. "The weapon by which the proud and contumacious are stricken," says Cyprian (Ep. iv. 4), "is a spiritual sword." [Compare LAW.] Yet sometimes the rulers of the church did not hesitate to apply to the heathen emperors to uphold their discipline. In answer to such an application, Aurelian commanded the judgment which deposed Paul of Samosata to be enforced by the civil power (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30), the emperor's authority being confined to compelling Paul to give up the house and church of his see. At a later date the bishops still more readily called in the power of the magistrate, when spiritual censures failed to maintain ecclesiastical order (Conc. Antioch. c. 5; 3 Conc. Carthag. c. 38; Codex African. cc. 68, 93); and no inconsiderable part of the ecclesiastical legislation embodied in the Theodosian Code, and at a later period in the capitularies of the Carolingian kings, had for its object the maintenance of the discipline of the church. What may be termed the natural rights of man were not touched by spiritual censures. A parent under penance did not lose his authority over his children, nor were subjects absolved from their allegiance to a prince, who was censured. One of the Christian emperors was a penitent, others heretics, and another an apostate, but this did not loosen the submission of the church to their imperial authority. With respect to other disabilities affecting penitents, there is no mention of any direct refusal of funeral rites. The 1 Conc. Vasan. A.D. 442, c. 2, decrees that penitents dying suddenly in the field or on a journey before the priest could be brought to them might be buried with a sacred service if they were leading satisfactory lives; by implication denying Christian burial to the contumacious and impenitent. The absence of any commemoration after death would follow from the refusal of the rites of burial.

ii. Persons on whom inflicted.—All baptized Christians were subject to the censure of the church. Over Jews or heathen outside her jurisdiction of course did not extend. Catechumens who were, as it were, in a middle state, never became penitents. If they were guilty of an ecclesiastical crime they were degraded to a lower class of their own order. The clergy were dealt with on a different footing to the rest of the community (see below, Penitence of Clergy). Penance was imposed equally upon women as upon men. Bingham quotes Valesius in Socrat. H. E. v. 19; Bona, Rer. Liturg. I. xvii. 5, in favour of the opinion that although women fasted and mourned in private, they were not exposed to open penance for the first three centuries. But no such exemption appears in Tertullian or Cyprian; and in the Spanish church at any rate, women were sentenced to penance. Conc. Eliber. c. 5 decrees that a mistress beating her slave to death shall be restored at the end of five years "acta legitimâ poenitentia;" and c. 14, in the case of a fallen virgin, makes a broad distinction between her exclusion with or without penance (compare Ibid. cc. 8, 10, 12, 13, 63, 65; Conc. Ancyr. c. 21). The statement of Basil (c. 34) that the fathers had decreed that an adulteress should not be compelled to publish her crime, could hardly have been inserted if public penance of women had not been the rule—as in the 4th century there can be little doubt it was the rule. The penitential exercises of Fabiola were commended by Jerome (Ep. 30, Epitaph. Fabiol.) not because she was a woman, but because they were undertaken spontaneously. A woman submitting to penance was no special object of commendation. (See the instructions given by Ambrose ad Virg. laps.) The 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 12 gives directions for the penitential dress of a woman. A man under penance was to shave his head, a woman to wear a veil. Female penance must have been so common as to require regulating where the rule prevailed that a married woman could not become a penitent without her husband's consent (2 Conc. Arelat. c. 22). (For special female delinquencies, see Theodor. Poenitential. I. xiv. "de poenitentia nubentium;" Egbert, Poenitential. c. 7, "de machina mulierem.")

Neither wealth nor office was allowed to exempt a delinquent from the censure of the church. Under the heathen empire the mere acceptance of certain magistracies, inasmuch as they involved their holders in idolatrous ceremonies, was an ecclesiastical offence (Conc. Eliber. cc. 2, 3; compare the note of Gothofred on Cod. Theod. XV. v. "de spectaculis"). By 1 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 314, c. 7, all Christian governors of provinces were ordered to take with them commendatory letters, and bring themselves into communication with the bishop, so that if they transgressed against discipline there might be no difficulty in expelling them from communion. Although in the 4th and 5th centuries no consideration of rank checked the great bishops from censuring offenders in high places, as, for instance, the condemnation of Andronicus, governor of Ptolemais, by Synesius (Ep. 58), and the governor of Libya by Athanasius (Basil, Ep. 47), and the famous expulsion of Theodosius from communion by Ambrose (Bingham, Antiq. XVI. iii. 4), yet in practice the right was rarely exercised. (For reasons for this forbearance see Barrow, Of the Pope's Supremacy, p. 12.) The age at which a young person came under the discipline of penance is nowhere defined. It is not likely that the church would excommunicate a boy or a girl. A Roman synod under Felix III. (A.D. 487, c. 4) decided that boys who had been baptized by the Arians should remain a short time only under the imposition of hands, and then be restored; for it was not reasonable that their penance should be prolonged. The Conc. Agath. c. 15 exempted the young from severe penance because of the weakness of youth. In the discipline of a monastery a delinquent under age was flogged (Macar. Reg. c. 15; Benedict, Reg. c. 70; Gregor. Ep. ix. 66, quoted by Bingham). And probably in the church at large the weapon of penance was used only against those who had passed their minority.

iii. Uniformity of.—It is laid down in the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 48), that great care and discretion were to be exercised in treating offenders; some were to be dealt with by threats, some by terrors, some by being urged to almsgiving, some to fasting, and some by ejection from the church. And for a long time no doubt this discretion was vested in the bishop, assisted perhaps by his presbytery. As the church grew, and intercourse increased between her different branches, a more uniform scale of penalties was adopted. The frequent communications which passed between Rome and Africa, traces of which are preserved in Cyprian's epistles, are the first important efforts after uniformity of discipline. The decisions of the councils of the succeeding age were a further advance in the same direction. Nearly all the twenty-five canons of Ancyra and the eighty-one of Elvira treat of the penalties suitable to ecclesiastical crimes. The same may be said of the twenty-two canons of the first council of Arles, and to a certain extent of the canons of the Apostles. These various judgments of the assembled fathers represent, in fact, so many penitential codes, whose decrees would be the model, if not the rule, for the administration of discipline throughout the church. The appointment of the PENITENTIARY officer in the dioceses of the Greek church would also tend to produce a uniform standard of penalties. The treatise which more perhaps even than the decrees of councils helped to establish a system in the East was the epistle of Basil. For many ages this canonical letter of Basil was the standard which governed the discipline of the East. Hardly less authoritative was the epistle of his brother Gregory of Nyssa. The decisions of the popes on questions referred to them were a further contribution to a body of penitential law; for example, Syric. Ep. i. 3, 5, 6; Innocent, Ep. i. 7; ii. 12, 13; iii. 2; Leo, Ep. lxxix. 4, 5, 6; Felix III. Ep. vii.; Nicolas, Ep. ad Rivol. The Penitential books were an additional attempt to codify the law. Originating either from famous monasteries, or embodying the decisions of great prelates, they spread far and wide through France and England, and in a less degree through all the churches of the West in the 7th and 8th centuries. The 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 11 in the 6th century, and the Conc. Mogunt. c. 31 in the 9th, alike complain of the difficulty of maintaining penance at the true canonical standard. The penitentials were no doubt designed to meet the difficulty. The principle laid down by Conc. Mogunt. was, that penalties were to be based on the ancient canons, or the authority of scripture, or the custom of the church. The penitentials in themselves possessed no canonical authority, and their multiplication was in some instances regarded with jealousy. "Their errors," said the bishops in 2 Conc. Cabilon. A.D. 813, c. 38, "are certain, and their authors uncertain." With the growth of the papal power and the centralization of ecclesiastical jurisdiction at Rome, discipline tended to become more and more uniform.

iv. Alleviation of—

a. By repentance.—Although the church aimed at uniformity of discipline, the same penalty was not always imposed on the same crime; or if the penalty was originally the same it was not carried out alike in all cases. There would be practical difficulties in the way of insisting on the completion of a merely spiritual sentence extending over twenty or twenty-five years. But in addition to the necessities of the case a mitigation of the penalty was openly granted in certain instances. The first ground of relaxation was earnestness of repentance over and above the formal submission to censure. Conc. Ancy. c. 5 orders the bishop to examine the present and past life of a penitent and shew clemency accordingly. By Conc. Laodic. c. 2, perseverance and prayer and confession, and a total abandonment of evil habits, were allowed to move the rulers of the church to pity (see Conc. in Trull. c. 102). Conc. Nicaen. c. 12 decided that a delinquent who proved his amendment by fear and tears, and submission and good works, and labour and dress, should, after his appointed time among the Hearers, join in communion of prayer; that is to say, the laborious station of Kneelers might be omitted; those, on the other hand, who thought it sufficient to shew their repentance by merely coming to the church door, were to complete their full sentence. The 4 Conc. Carthag. c. 75 speaks to the same effect on “negligentiores poenitentes.” Basil (c. 74) considers it an act of duty that those who have the power of binding and loosing should remit part of the penalty of the earnest and diligent. The same sentiment which appears several times in the epistle of Gregory of Nyssa, regulated the administration of discipline throughout the church (Innocent I. Ep. i. 7; Leo, Ep. lxxix. 6; Conc. Vornat. c. 75).

b. By confession.—One who spontaneously confessed his crime was generally treated more leniently than after detection. Conc. Eliber. c. 76 made a wide distinction in the case of a deacon who allowed himself to be ordained after the commission of mortal sin. If he made a voluntary confession, he might be reinstated at the end of two years, but if others convicted him, he was to do penance for five years, and then be restored to lay communion only. In Martin Bracar. (Collect. Conc. c. 25), a priest confessing under similar circumstances might retain the name of priest, but not celebrate; if he was convicted, even the name was to be taken from him. Gregory Thaumaturgus (Ep. cc. 18, 19), with reference to robberies which had occurred during the confusion arising from a Gothic invasion, made the station of a delinquent depend upon the manner in which the theft was revealed, whether by conviction or by confession and restitution. Basil (c. 61) diminished the penalty of a thief who confessed by one-half. The same authority, at the beginning of his treatise, gives to spontaneous confession and lapse of time and ignorance an equal power in alleviating penance. (See Ambrose, Virg. laps. c. 8; de Poenitent. ii. 8; Prosper, Vit. Contemplat. ii. 7.) In some flagrant instances, as in the case of an adulterous clerk (3 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 538, c. 7), confession was of no avail.

c. By intercession.—The accounts of public penance during the first three centuries frequently represent the delinquent imploring the congregation and the widows and the virgins and the clergy to intercede with the bishop for him. And when the length of penalties was undetermined by canon, and rested practically with the individual bishop, such intercessions were a recognised channel by which to obtain a mitigation of penance. With the elaboration of the system which began with the 4th century, these intercessions are rarely heard of, although Augustine mentions incidentally (Ep. liv. ad Macedon. p. 93), a custom of magistrates interceding with the church for offenders. In Africa a practice arose, which quickly became abused, of granting alleviation of penance to the intercession of martyrs, that is to say, of Christians in prison expecting death during persecution. [LIBELLI, p. 981.]

3. PENITENCE DENIED.

I. Sometimes to the first Commission of mortalia Delicta.—The grace of penitence appears to have been withheld from certain delinquents in the early centuries, not because the church had any doubt about her authority to grant it, but on the ground that the power of binding was vested with the same sanction as that of loosing, and that to open the door with equal readiness to all great criminals alike would only bring discipline into contempt. This seems the probable explanation of the undoubted effect of some of the early decisions. Cyprian has left it on record (Ep. lv. c. 17) that among his predecessors some entirely closed the place of penance against adulterers, and by implication against the other two mortal sins which were of a still graver character; but he adds that in doing so they did not break the verity of the church. How far this exclusiveness was followed in other provinces is one of the many vexed questions of the primitive discipline. See Albaspin. Observat. II. vii. 20; Bona, Rer. Liturg. I. xvii. 1; Fell not. in Cypr. Ep. vii. p. 17, cited by Bingham. By the clear testimony of Tertullian (de Pudicit. c. 1), pope Zephyrinus, A.D. 202–218, granted penance to the sins of uncleanness and fornication, and Tertullian founds upon this a charge of inconsistency against the bishop because he was not equally indulgent to murder and idolatry. Morinus (ix. 20) holds that the evidence of Tertullian in this treatise on the usage of the Roman church is not worthy of credence. Martene (de Rit. i. 6), on the contrary, cites him as a trustworthy witness. If the ordinary reading of “nec in fine” in many of the canons of Elvira is to be accepted, there can be no doubt that penitence was denied in Spain to idolatry and to murder (see for instances cc. 1, 6, 63, 73, 75). With regard to moechia the decisions were more lenient (cc. 13, 14, 31, 69, 72); except in aggravated cases (cc. 12, 66, 71), when communion was refused absolutely. It may be well to enumerate the exact crimes for which communion was denied by the council of Elvira even at death; idolatry in an idol temple after baptism (c. 1); a baptized flamen sacrificing again (cc. 2, 17); adultery after penance (cc. 3, 47); killing by witchcraft (c. 6); if a woman deserted her husband without cause and re-married (c. 8); parents selling a child for prostitution (c. 12); dedicated virgins becoming prostitutes (c. 13);

betrothal of a daughter to an idol priest (c. 17); adultery by clergy—on account of the scandal (c. 19); murder by a woman of her child born in adultery (c. 63); clergy retaining adulterous wives (c. 65); unnatural crimes (c. 71); aggravated adultery (cc. 64, 72, 79); giving information which leads to a Christian being put to death (c. 73); malicious charges against the clergy (c. 75). These decisions appear to have had at the most only a provincial authority, and not to have governed the general discipline of the church. For the Conc. Ancy. (cc. 9, 16), which was contemporary with Conc. Elber. or only a few years later, granted penance to each of the three mortalia delicta even in their most aggravated forms. And, indeed, throughout the Eastern church, with the exception of a decision of Conc. Sardic. c. 2, which rejects certain fraudulent bishops from even lay communion at death, there does not appear any trace of the refusal of the rites of penance for the first commission of any sin sincerely repented of. Nor does any trace of such severity occur later than the Conc. Elber. in the West.

ii. Generally to a Repetition of Sin once expiated.—The refusal of penance a second time was one of the unwritten canons of the early discipline. No council passed a decree against its repetition, but in practice its refusal was almost universal from the very beginning. Hermas (Pastor, Mandat. ii. 4), considering whether an adulterous wife ought to be received by her husband, determined that she should be taken back, but not often, for to be servants of God there is but one penance (compare Id. Similit. iii. 9). This decision of Hermas is cited and approved by Clem. Alexand. (Strom. ii. 13, p. 459, ed. Oxon.). The language of Tertullian is very explicit (de Pudicit. c. 7); "God hath placed in the porch a second repentance, which may open to those who knock, but now for once only, because now for the second time, but never again." The "first repentance" which he had in his mind was baptism. A little later (ibid. c. 9), he speaks of the "second and only remaining repentance." A passage in Origen (Hom. xv. in c. 25 Levit.) gives a clear account of the general practice. "In graver sins the peace of repentance is granted but once only, or seldom; but those common sins which men frequently commit, always admit of repentance, and are redeemed at once." The words "or seldom" are generally regarded as a later interpolation; the date of their insertion probably coinciding with the growth of greater laxity in the Eastern church. There appears some reason for believing that Chrysostom did not hesitate to grant penance more than once. Socrates (H. E. vi. 21) states that he taught that though a synod of bishops had decreed that relapsed penitents should not be readmitted, he was willing to receive them a thousand times. On the accuracy of this statement with reference to Chrysostom see Morinus, v. 37. At the beginning of the 5th century the privilege of frequent penance was taken away from the Massalian heretics by a synod of Constantinople, A.D. 426 or 427, under Sisinnius, one of Chrysostom's successors, because it had been so often abused. From this Bingham concludes (Antiq. XVIII. iv. 7) that a repetition of penance was not unknown in the metropolitan province. The relaxation of the early rigour may be partly attributable to the excessive length of the sentences imposed in the Eastern church after the 3rd century. If a delinquent had done penance for fifteen or twenty years, and was willing to pass through the ordeal a second time, it would be almost impossible to reject him. In the Latin church the discipline of a single penance survived longer. The Conc. Elber., which was so severe in refusing reconciliation even once was not likely to grant it a second time (cc. 3, 7, 74; Pacian, Ep. iii. contr. Sempron. c. 27). They are rightly reprov'd, says Ambrose (de Poenitent. ii. 10), who think that penance can be performed often, for they wait on against Christ. Augustine (Ep. cliii. ad Maccedon. c. 7) is a witness that even the lowest place in the church was refused to a relapsing penitent. The manner of dealing with such lapsers in the Western church is laid down by pope Siricius (Ep. i. ad Himer. c. 5); they were not to have the benefit of a second penance, but might be present, without communicating, at the celebration, and be allowed a viaticum at their death. By 2 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 443, c. 21, a penitent repeating his sin was to be cast out of the church. By 1 Conc. Turon. A.D. 460, c. 8, he was ejected, not only from the church, but from the society of the faithful (Conc. Venet. A.D. 465, c. 3). By the 6th century penance began to be conceded frequently. For the 3 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 589, c. 11, complains that in many of the Spanish churches discipline was no longer administered according to the canons, but as often as men sinned and applied to the priest, so often penance was granted. This abuse the council checked. The disappearance of the early rule dates probably from the decline of public discipline, and the substitution of a private system by which a sinner obtained reconciliation as often as he confessed his sin and submitted to penance.

iii. Till the Hour of Death.—The ordinary course of penance in the 4th and 5th centuries held an offender in its trammels for half a lifetime for certain mortal sins; if the sins were especially heinous, the penalty extended over the whole life, however long its duration. This severity was not confined to one province. In Spain the Conc. Elber. c. 3, withheld communion till death from a converted flamen who, abstaining from sacrificing, merely exhibited a shew; and all his life he was to be under canonical penance. A consecrated virgin who had fallen was allowed communion at last only if she had passed a life-long penance (ibid. c. 13). At a later date the Conc. Nerd. A.D. 523, c. 5, sentenced any of the inferior clergy who, after penance, relapsed into the same sin, to exclusion till death. In France a similar sentence was passed by 1 Conc. Arelat. A.D. 314, c. 14, on false accusers of their brethren; and by Conc. Valentin. A.D. 374, c. 3, on lapsers into idolatry. In the East the Conc. Ancy. A.D. 314, c. 6, attached this penalty to unnatural crime; and the Conc. Neocaesar. c. 2, decreed that a woman marrying two brothers was to be expelled till the approach of death, and then only to be admitted on her assurance that should she recover the marriage should be dissolved. And finally, in Rome Felix III., A.D. 483–492, decided in Conc. Rom. c. 2, with regard to the African clergy, who had suffered themselves to be rebaptized in the Vandal persecution, that they were to con-time under penance all the days of their life, and not be present during the prayers of the faithful or even of the catechumens, and be admitted to lay communion only at death. (See Ambrose, Laps. Virg. viii. 38.)

4. PENITENCE OF THE SICK.—The sick under discipline may be divided into three classes:—i. those who for some grievous crime had been ejected from the church and fell sick while outside her pale; ii. those who were conscious of undetected sin, and asked for penance on their sickbed; iii. those overtaken by illness while undergoing penance. With regard to the first class, there seems little doubt that for about the first 300 years the full grace of penance was denied to them absolutely. Cyprian (Ep. ad Anton. lv. 19) does not shrink from stating this positively. The great council of Arles, A.D. 314, c. 22, at which most of the Western churches were represented, decreed that apostates who had not sought penance in health were to be debarred from it in illness, unless they recovered, and had an opportunity of proving their sincerity. The denial of penance at the hour of death to those who had scorned it in life was continued in the case of condemned criminals for a long period in France. In Germany this rigour was relaxed in the 9th century by Conc. Vornet. 2. 80, Conc. Tribur. c. 31; in France it was not repealed till Feb. 1396, by a decree of Charles VI. It does not appear that the refusal of reconciliation was necessarily a refusal of all the benefits of penance; for Innocent I. A.D. 402–417 (Ep. iii. ad Exuper.), states that the old custom of the church, in the case of repentant delinquents at death, was to grant penance but deny communion, and that this was done in order to maintain a high standard of discipline during the times of persecution, and that afterwards, when persecutions ceased, both penance and absolution were conceded to the dying, and that this henceforth was the law of the Catholic church. There is a saying of Cyprian (ad Demetrium, c. 15), “Nunquam sera est poenitentia si sit vera.” None the less the great African father denied communion to grievous sinners in their last illness, not however because he doubted the efficacy of death-bed repentance but its sincerity. After the close of the persecutions full reconciliation was granted to all dying men seeking it, whatever their previous career; and the question was authoritatively set at rest by a decree of Conc. Nicaen. c. 13. [See RECONCILIATION.] The treatment of the second class of sick, those whose sin had not been detected or confessed till their last illness, was more uniform. Penance and reconciliation were on no account to be refused them (Conc. Andegav. A.D. 453, c. 13). Pope Celestine I., A.D. 422–432 (Ep. ii. ad Episc. Vienn. et Narbon.), says that he knew of some having denied penance to the dying, but that he was “horrorstruck at such impiety.” Leo I. A.D. 440–461 (Ep. cviii. ad Theod. Episc. c. 4), not only decided that penance was to be granted to the sick, but adds that “if they have lost their voice and could only express by signs their desire for penance, or even if they were motionless as well as speechless, and any trustworthy witnesses could testify that they had signified the desire before the arrival of the priest, it was in all cases to be conceded.” The first council of Orange, A.D. 441,

c. 12, passed a similar decree, having in view probably the case of those overtaken by paralysis, or any similar affliction. The 4 Conc. Carthag. A.D. 398, c. 76, had carried the concession even farther, it had granted penance, not only to the helpless, but even to the insensible, if there was evidence that it had been desired by the patient while he was rational (see 12 Conc. Tolet. c. 2, 13 Conc. Tolet. c. 9). These decrees governed the administration of the penitence of the sick during the middle ages. The third class of sick contained those who were overtaken by illness during their penance. In the 4th and 5th centuries when sentences sometimes extended over twenty years, this class must have been a numerous one. They were on the supposition already penitents. The matter remaining to be considered is the time and manner of their RECONCILIATION. One point in connexion with the penitence of the sick is involved in some obscurity. If a penitent recovered who had been absolved on his sick-bed, was he to complete his original sentence? In the case of light sins, for which an offender had been merely debarred communion, it would follow that when communion was conceded the penalty was at an end. Morinus (x. 14) is disposed to extend the same principle, at any rate up to the time of the spread of the Novatian heresy, to delinquents guilty of greater crimes, and who had been made penitents strictly so-called. He considers their absolution a satisfaction of all ecclesiastical censure. The treatment of the lapsed in the Roman and African churches, and also the silence of the canons of Elvira with regard to the completion of a sentence after reconciliation in extreme sickness, bear out the inference. He makes the same statement, though with some hesitation, with respect to the Greek church in the period prior to the organization of the stations. With the beginning of the 4th century the question becomes clearer. The severity which spread through the treatment of all penitents was extended to convalescents. The sentence left unfinished at the time of a sickbed remission was to be taken up on recovery. This rule was enforced, not only as a matter of principle, but to meet the cases of those, which appear to have been not infrequent, who feigned dangerous illness in order to escape part of their penalty. Originally a penitent once reconciled was sent back on recovery, not to his former position, but only to the station of consistentia. The council of Nice (c. 13), after resolving that no one on the threat of death was to be denied his ἐφόδιον (viaticum), goes on to decree that should the man revive after receiving it, he was henceforth to communicate in prayer only till his original sentence was finished. In some parts of the church this middle course was the one adopted for a long period. It was approved by Felix III. (Ep. vii.), in the treatment of the rebaptized, who in anticipation of death had been permitted to communicate, and is inserted by Martin of Braga in his Collect. Can. c. 82. In other provinces greater severity prevailed. Gregory of Nyssa laid it down, that a patient who had been granted participation in the holy mysteries should, if he recovered, return to the station in which his danger and necessity had found him. Synesius (Ep. 67) attached the same condition to conceding communion to a certain Lamponianus.

The 4 Conc. Carthag. A.D. 398, c. 76, with regard to penitence being given even to one insensible, made it the duty of those who had been witnesses of his contrition, to take care that if he recovered he fulfilled his canonical penance, the duration of which was to rest with the discretion of the priest. By ibid. c. 78, no sick man who had received his viaticum was to consider his penitence satisfied without imposition of hands; and as this was one of the rites of the substrati, it would involve his being remitted to that station. The completion of penance after a sick-bed absolution was for a long time the general rule (1 Conc. Arausic. A.D. 441, c. 3; Conc. Epaon. A.D. 517, c. 36). The rule was to some degree modified by a decision of 1 Conc. Barcinon. A.D. 540, c. 8, that the length of a convalescent's penance should depend on the discretion of the priest, but should in no case involve imposition of hands. From the 6th century, and up to the beginning of the 12th, severity towards the sick increased rather than diminished. An indication of this is seen in 3 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 589, c. 12, which required sick penitents, equally with those in health, to shave their heads if they were men, and if women wear a veil, and put on haircloth or some other penitential dress. This injunction, which appears to have been confirmed by 12 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 681, c. 2, and by 13 Conc. Tolet. A.D. 683, c. 9, must manifestly have depended on the nature of the sickness.

5. Season of Penitence.—The godly custom that persons convicted of notorious crimes should be put to open penance, was not confined to the beginning of Lent in the primitive church. Bingham (Antiq. XVIII. ii. 2) says there is a perfect silence in the more ancient writers about it. Morinus (vii. 19) traces the origin of the restriction to the quadragesimal seasons to the 7th century, when public penance had ceased to be exacted for secret sin. For the first half of the 5th century Hilary of Arles is a witness (Vita, c. 13) that penitence was granted every Sunday. The primitive custom appears to have been to receive the penitent whenever he was brought to the bishop. In the Greek church this custom was never restricted; but in the Latin the various pontificals and rituals of the 8th and 9th centuries disclose a practice of reserving the penitential rites to the beginning of Lent, whether the first Sunday or the previous Wednesday. Even at that date penitence was not exclusively confined to the Lenten season. The caput jejuni was held to be the usual and most appropriate time, but there was no law of the church prohibiting the imposition of a state of penance at any season of the year if the case required it.

6. Minister of Penitence.—In the administration the bishop had supreme if not exclusive power. The statement, however, of Martene (de Rit. i. 6), that he alone received confession, and he alone imposed penance, is too unqualified. For it seems undoubted that the presbyters shared the bishop's jurisdiction. Still, the power resided in the bishop alone, if he saw fit to exercise it. Cyprian frequently claimed and used the sole right of discipline (Epp. xvii. xix. xxv. xli. xlii. xlii. &c.) and his presbyters acknowledged his claim (Ep. Caldonat. ap. Cyprian, xxiv.) The Apostolical Constitutions, which deal so largely with discipline, are addressed to the bishop. He was to preside over all, as entrusted with the power of binding and loosing (Apost. Const. ii. 18); upon him the blame was to be laid if he neglected to exercise his power (ibid. c. 10), for he was set in the church to sit in judgment on offenders. [BISHOP, p. 231.] But although Cyprian and others did not hesitate to vindicate their episcopal authority, they frequently acted in conjunction with their presbyters in the difficulties disturbing the church. From the earliest ages there are indications of this association of presbyters with their bishops. Some such association appears in the sentence issued by St. Paul against the incestuous Corinthian (1 Cor. v.). The excommunication emanated from the apostle, but it was to be decreed by the assembled church, "when ye are gathered together," at Corinth. The apostle was present only in spirit to preside over their assembly.

Ignatius, whose epistles shew the great authority possessed by presbyters in the 2nd century, refers (ad Philadelph. c. 8) to the penitent coming to the bishop's consistory, εἰς συνέδριον τοῦ ἐπισκόπου. The Constitutions, after speaking of the presbyters as the advisers of the bishop, and the council and senate of the church, go on to say that the presbyters, and the deacons shall sit in judgment with the bishop (Apost. Const. ii. 28). Tertullian's definition of exomologesis (Pœnitent. c. 9) comprised submission and supplication to the presbyters. Humiliation before the presbyters is related of Natalis the confessor (Euseb. H. E. v. 28). In Conc. Eliber. c. 74, the "conventus clericorum" is made the judge of the gravity of a perjurer's offence. Cyprian has numerous allusions (Epp. xvi. xix. &c.) to the presbyters uniting with the bishops in the administration of discipline. For himself, he said (Ep. xiv.), from the beginning of his episcopacy he had resolved to do nothing of his private judgment without their concurrence. Cornelius similarly (Ep. xlix. ad Cyprian) would not decide the case of the confessors who had sided with Novatian till he had summoned his presbytery. The councils which condemned Origen (Pamphil. Apolog. ap. Phot. Cod. cxviii.), Novatian (Euseb. H. E. vi. 43), and Paul of Samosata (ibid. vii. 28), were composed of bishops and presbyters, the last-mentioned synod containing deacons also. The first step in the prosecution of Noetus (Epiphanius. Haeres. lvii. 1), and of Arius (ibid. lxi. 3) was to bring them before the presbytery. Before Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, issued his circular letter to the other bishops against Arius, he had previously summoned the presbyters and deacons, not only to hear the letter, but also to give their assent to the judgment (Coteler, ad Const. Apost. viii. 28). On the condemnation of Jovinian by Siricius (Ep. ii.) a presbytery was summoned, and the presbyters and deacons were associated in the promulgation of the sentence. Similar steps were taken by Synesius (Ep. lvii.) in excommunicating Andronicus. The fourth Conc. Carthag. c. 23, prohibited a bishop from hearing any cause alone without the presence of his clergy; but it is not clear whether the causes in view were clerical or lay. In many instances of ecclesiastical censures the laity appear to have been present, not in any judicial capacity, but as witnesses, and to stamp the sentence as issuing from the whole body of the faithful.

After the conviction of an offender, it rested with some one to see that the sentence was carried out. In such public rites as imposition of hands and a special locality in the church, there could be no need of supervision. The case would be different with the more private disabilities and austerities. Generally speaking, the superintendence rested with the bishop. This is clear from the numerous passages referring to his authority over penitents; and further evidence in the same direction may be gathered from the laws forbidding a bishop to receive a penitent, without recommendation, from another diocese. (Can. Apost. c. 12; Conc. Nicæn. c. 5; Conc. Eliber. c. 53; 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 16.) It would have been impracticable for the bishop to have long maintained this supervision personally. In the earliest ages, when every member of a church was known to the bishop and to each other, he probably did so; the congregation would supply all needful evidence of the performance of an erring member's penalty. But as the dioceses increased in size, he must have found it necessary to delegate his authority. In the East it was transferred to the PENITENTIARY presbyter, appointed by the bishop, and acting for him. In the West the duty of supervision appears to have been committed to a great extent to the deacon. The Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 16) appoint the deacon to attend to an expelled member, and keep him out of the church, and afterwards bring him to the bishop. In the 9th century rituals, this duty is laid, not on the deacons generally, but on the archdeacon. He it was who collected the penitents and admonished them, and introduced them to the bishop, and afterwards bore testimony that their penance had been duly performed. Morinus (vi. 17) conjectures that, for at least 300 years prior to the date of these rituals, these same duties fell to the charge of the archdeacon. In the larger dioceses the rural deans shared the duty; and subsequently, as appears from the visitation articles of Hincmar, it became one of the functions of the parochial clergy.

The power of remitting the length or severity of a sentence was one of the privileges of the bishop. He, said the council of Ancyra (c. 5) was to examine the life and conversation of the penitent, and increase or mitigate his penalty. A similar power was recognised by a succession of councils (Conc. Nicæn. c. 12; Conc. Chalced. A.D. 451, c. 16; Conc. Audegar. A.D. 453, c. 12; Conc. Clerd. A.D. 523, c. 5; 4 Conc. Aurel. A.D. 541, c. 8). As the number of penitents increased, more discretion was vested in the presbyter, but always with a reference, and, if necessary, with an appeal to the bishop. Basil, c. 74, gives the power of alleviating penance to those who have the gift of binding and loosing; language which was also used by Conc. in Trull. c. 102. By 4 Conc. Aurel. c. 28; 1 Conc. Cabilon. c. 8, the "sacerdos" was the judge who determined the extent of penance. In the Eastern church, from the time of the Decian persecution till the episcopacy of Nectarius of Constantinople, the penitentiary must have been the executive minister of discipline

7. Penitence of Clergy.—The penitential discipline as it affected the laity was medicinal rather than penal. In its treatment of the clergy, the penal element predominated. Not only was a delinquent clerk exposed to the humiliation of a public censure, but he was also deprived, temporarily or absolutely, of his office, and the rank and emolument of office. And the sentence was the more severe, that in the early ages a degraded clerk was never reinstated. Hence a charge against a clergyman was required to be proved with legal formality, as his guilt involved not only a moral stigma, but a loss of privilege and means of livelihood. This twofold effect, the spiritual and the temporal, of an ecclesiastical censure on the clergy, naturally regulated the administration of discipline towards them. One of the Apostolical Canons (c. 24) laid it down, that a bishop, priest, or deacon, for certain crimes, was to be deposed, but not excommunicated, because the Scriptures had said that a man was not to be punished twice for the same offence. The rule was repeated by Basil, cc. 3, 32, 57. Still it does not represent the unvarying discipline for the first three centuries. In general a clergyman was degraded in cases in which a layman was excommunicated. And where this rule held good, a clergyman was not subjected to penitence. But in the primitive ages it frequently occurred that no difference was made between the penance of clergy and laity. The penalty followed the same course as if the delinquent had not been in orders—ejection from the church, and re-admission by penance. (See council of Neocaesarea, c. 1.) The Elviran canons afford a still clearer illustration of clerical penance. A deacon confessing a pre-ordination crime might receive communion at the end of three years, acta legitimâ poenitentia (Conc. Eliber. c. 76). For instances of public penance, see the account given of Natalis (Euseb. H. E. v. 28); and of the presbyter Felix (Cyprian. Ep. xxv. ad Caldon.; Ep. Caldon. ap. Cyprian. xxiv.); of Novatus (Id. Ep. lii. 3); of Trophimus (Id. Ep. lv. 8); of bishop Fortunatus (Id. Ep. lxxv.); and of bishop Basilides (Id. Ep. lxxvii. 6). Nor did open clerical penance, which was part of the stricter system of a time of persecution, altogether cease with the close of the 3rd century. The first council of Orange, A.D. 441, c. 4, followed by the second council of Arles, c. 29, determined that clergy should be admitted to penance if they sought it. The first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, c. 12, mentions a presbyter, "sub professione poenitentis." The third council of Braga, A.D. 675, c. 4, threatened a clergyman with six months' subjection "legibus poenitentiae." (See also 1 Conc. Turon. cc. 3, 5; Conc. Venet. c. 16; Conc. Agath. cc. 8, 42; Conc. Clerd. c. 1, 5; 2 Conc. Tolet. c. 3; 3 Conc. Aurelian. cc. 4, 8.) On the other hand, a statement of Pope Leo, 441–461, seems difficult to reconcile with these authorities. He lays it down (in Ep. xcii. c. 2, ad Rustic.; Labb. Conc. iii. 1408) that it is not in accordance with ecclesiastical custom for a presbyter or deacon to obtain the grace of penance by imposition of hands. One explanation is that the "ecclesiastica consuetudo" alleged by Leo was prevalent only in the Roman church. Another, that the words of Leo were strictly correct, and that no presbyter or deacon as such was ever subjected to penance, because he was first degraded and had ceased to be a clergyman. But this explanation, while reconciling the pope's language with canonical decisions, reduces it to a mere truism. The privilege, or inability, in whichever light it may be regarded, which as a general rule protected the higher clergy from open penance, was not extended to the lower orders. The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, decreed in two canons (cc. 2, 8), that for purposes of discipline monks were to be regarded as laity; a decision repeated by 1 Conc. Barcinon. A.D. 540, c. 10; Conc. in Trull. c. 81; 2 Conc. Nicæen. cc. 5, 13. For a further account of clerical penalties, see BISHOP, p. 228; DEGRADATION; DISCIPLINE; ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1492. [G. PENITENTIAL BOOKS: LIBER POENITENTIALIS; POENITENTIALE; CONFESSIONALE; POENITENTIALES CODICES, CODICELLI, LIBELLI; LEGES POENITENTIUM; PECCANTIUM JUDICIA. The term is applied to collections of penitential canons issued under the name and with the authority of some eminent ecclesiastic, with a view to establish a uniform rule for the administration of discipline; the best known are the Anglo-Saxon penitentials of the 7th and 8th centuries.

The early history of canons of discipline is involved in some obscurity. It is probable that each bishop, with his presbytery, administered the discipline of his diocese on certain general principles which left the details to local regulation. Afterwards, as individual bishops by weight of character gained a reputation in the church, their decisions on matters of discipline obtained more or less the force of church law. Hence the epistles of Basil and his brother Gregory of Nyssa on penance were received as of something like canonical authority. In this view they may be regarded as the earliest penitential books. Of these two sets of canonical laws, that of Gregory is in the form of a letter to Letoius, bishop of Melitine. It attempts to trace the source of all sin to one of the three faculties of the soul, which he designates the rational, the concupiscible, and the irascible, and for each a separate mode of treatment is to be adopted; but there is no regulated scale of penalties for different degrees of sin. The epistle of Basil contains more direct penal enactments. It deals principally with the three capital crimes of idolatry, murder, and fornication, and allots to each form of sin its appropriate punishment. Although stamped with no canonical authority, Basil's epistle evidently had a wide influence on the administration of the discipline of the Eastern church, and eventually received the synodical sanction of the council in Trullo, A.D. 692. Other rudimentary penitentials are to be found in the numerous decretals of the Roman bishops, although no one of these deals systematically with the subject. After the 3rd century the chief authority for the regulation of discipline was in the penitential canons of the councils. In addition to the general council of Nice, the Oriental councils of Ancyra, A.D. 314, Neocaesarea, A.D. 314, Gangra, A.D. 362, and the various African councils of the 4th and 5th centuries, and the Spanish and Frankish from the 4th to the 7th century, contain a copious legislation for the administration of penance. The decrees of these councils had only a provincial, or at most a national, force, and there was no attempt to establish a universal code of penitential law. The nearest approach to systematizing the laws of discipline is in the Codex Ecclesiae Africanae, emanating from Carthage, A.D. 419. The full development of the penitential system is usually attributed to Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 649-690. But recent investigations have established the genuineness of fragmentary British and Irish penitentials, which indicate that the system was flourishing in the Celtic churches in these islands at a period anterior to Theodore. The nature of the contents of the various penitentials, wherever there is any peculiarity to call for remark, will appear as the list proceeds; but in general it may be said that they had one common characteristic, varying little with the nation for whose guidance they were compiled. They maintain a complete silence on the dogmatic controversies which shook and disunited the Eastern church; in many of them there is little or no reference to the ordinances of the church; their whole purpose and strength are concentrated on the enforcement of practical duties. Among the rude tribes of the north and west, the outward profession of their newly-acquired Christianity was by no means invariably followed by an abandonment of the ferocious and licentious passions of the old heathen life. It was the object of the penitential book to allay, and gradually to extirpate, the vices of heathenism. The pictures which they disclose, especially of the sins of the flesh, is a dark one. But the public denunciation of these crimes and passions in the church, and the determination of her rulers to restrain them, was a step towards the light. The drawing out a catalogue of different vices, and appending a proportionate punishment to each, no doubt fostered the notion that each vice had its price, by the payment of which it might be expiated, and so far tended to blunt the moral sense of the iniquity of sin. On the other hand, the church, by declaring that it was her function to discover and punish vice because it was vice and against God's law, brought home to the people, in the only way these simple races could understand, a belief in God's moral government of the world. An undue multiplication of the books was jealously watched. In the Gallic church, where, to judge from the number of Frankish penitentials which survive, their influence must have been widespread, the council of Châlons, A.D. 813 (c. 38) passes upon them a formal censure; they are said to clash with the authority of the canons; their authors are declared to be uncertain, but their errors are certain.^a The discipline of the penitentials was that of the cloister, classifying sin, and pursuing it into every detail; the monastic rules being relaxed, and adapted to the conditions of life of a free people. In the list which follows it will be convenient to arrange the books under the headings of the different national churches in which they were published.

^a The decrees of the Gallican councils against penitentials are very severe. Thus the council of Châlons, A.D. 813, c. 38: "Modus enim poenitentiae peccata sua confitentibus aut per antiquorum institutionem aut per sanctorum scripturarum auctoritatem aut per ecclesiasticam consuetudinem imponi debet, repudiatis ac penitus eliminatis libellis, quos poenitentiales vocant, quorum sunt certi errores, incerti auctores." Compare Conc. Mogunt. A.D. 847, c. 31; Conc. Paris. A.D. 829, c. 32. In the latter the bishops are ordered to burn the penitentials wherever they find them: ["Ne per eos ultrius sacerdotes imperiti homines decipiant."] A

I. BRITISH AND IRISH PENITENTIALS.

1. Excerpta quaedam de Libro Davidis.—The date of these fragmentary extracts from the 'Liber' of David, bishop of Minevia, the present St. David's, lies between A.D. 550 and 600 (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Eccl. Documents, i. 118). They consist of sixteen canons treating of drunkenness, fornication, homicide, perjury, robbery, usury; and may be considered as the earliest penitential book connected with the British islands.

2. Sinodus Aquilonalis Britanniae.

3. Altera Sinodus Luci Victoriae.—Two synods held under David, in the year 569. The first contains seven penitential canons, the second nine.

The locality of the synods was probably Llanddewi Brefi, in the neighbourhood of Cardigan (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 117). The state of morals exhibited by these early canons was degraded. The 'Liber Davidis' opens with the penalty for excessive drinking among priests about to minister in God's temple.

4. Poenitentie Vinniai.—This book was first printed by Wasserscheleben (Bussordnungen, &c. pp. 108–119) from a comparison of the MSS. Cod. Sangall. No. 150, saec. ix.; Vindob. Theol. Lat. No. 725, saec. ix.; Sangerm. No. 121, saec. viii.; and the Irish canons of the Cod. Paris. No. 3182, saec. xi. xii. It is difficult to identify the Vinniaus, or Finian, whose name it bears. Wasserscheleben conjectures the author to be the Finianus mentioned by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. i. p. 391) who, born in Ireland in the year 450, lived for some time in Gaul, then went to Wales, to bishop David, whence, in the end of the 5th century, he returned to Ireland, in order to uphold the faith and discipline which had declined since the death of St. Patrick. If this Finian was a contemporary of David, he lived a century later, but even so he would be earlier than Columban, which corresponds with the conclusion which would be drawn from a comparison of this confessional book with that of Columban, where the greater part of Finian's work is repeated. Wasserscheleben divides the book into fifty-three paragraphs. This penitential enumerates the principal crimes of the clergy and laity, with their appropriate punishments. Like the synods under St. Patrick, and the Liber Davidis, it shews the influence which the clergy had obtained in temporal matters among the Celtic nations.

5. Prefatio Gildae de Penitentia.—The date of similar feeling is apparent in a letter of bishop Ebbo of Rheims, circa A.D. 830, to Halitgar of Cambrai (Canisius, Lectt. Antiq. ed. Basnage, tom. ii. pt. ii. p. 87): ["Et hoc est, quod hac in re valde me sollicitat, quod ita confusa sunt iudicia poenitentium in presbyterorum nostrorum opusculis atque ita diversa et inter se discrepantia et nullius auctoritate suffulta, ut vix propter dissonantiam possint discerni, unde fit, ut concurrentes ad remedium poenitentiae tam pro librorum confusione, quam etiam pro ingenii tarditate, nullatenus eis valeant subvenire."] this fragment must be placed somewhere before the year 570 (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 113). It comprises twenty-seven sections, several of which are repeated in Cummean and Bede, and in the so-called Roman Penitential. The mode of penance to be inflicted is strictly stated at the outset, and is much more in detail than the penance to be found in any other early book.

6. Canones Adamnani (Addamnari vel Ad-dominari).—The canons of Adamnan, abbot of the monastery of Hy, the date of which must lie between the years 679 and 704, were probably passed by some Irish synod under Adamnan's influence (Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 111). They consist of thirty chapters, treating almost entirely of unclean food.

7. Canones Wallici.—These canons are a collection of national rather than ecclesiastical law. They are found in the Cod. Sangerm. No. 121, saec. viii. with the title "Incipit iudicium culpam;" in the Cod. Paris. No. 3182, from whence they were taken by Martene (Nov. Thes. t. iv. col. 13), they are called "Excerpta de libris Romanorum et Francorum." For the argument for their Welsh origin, see Haddan and Stubbs, i. 127. Their date is probably the first half of the 7th century.

8. Canones Hibernenses.—These canons are found in the same French MSS. with the preceding collection. They are all of great antiquity; some, as apparently iii. "Synodus Hibernensis decrevit," being decisions of synods over which St. Patrick presided. The canons are interesting as specimens of early penitential rules, and as the sources from which later compilations were derived. Wasserscheleben (pp. 136–144) has published six collections:—i. "De disputatione Hibernensis sinodi et Gregori Nasaseni sermo de innumerabilibus peccatis incipit." Many of these canons are afterwards used by the compiler of the Penit. Bigotianum [infra, p. 1612]. Their spelling of Latin terminations, is remarkable; there are also traces of the use of the old vernacular, as, for example (c. 4). "Poenitentie magi vel votivi mali, si credulus id dem ergach vel praeconis." ii. "De Arreis." This is the earliest notice of redemptions to be found in penitential books, and was the parent from which many later developments of the system drew their origin. The first canon gives a fair instance of the nature of the commutations: "Arreum superpositionis C. psalmi et C. flectiones genuum vel iii. quingenta et cantica vii. iii. "Synodus Hibernensis decrevit." iv. "De jectioe." A curious scale of payments to be made by one who turns a poor man adrift or refuses to succour him. The "jectio" shall be a certain proportion, from a fifth to a ninth, of the composition for murder. v. "De canibus sinodus sapientium." vi. "Item synodus sapientia sic de decimis disputant."

II. FRANKISH PENITENTIALS.

The discipline of the Frankish church from the 4th century was regulated by the decrees of provincial councils, which are remarkably full of disciplinary canons. It was not till the 7th century that anything approaching to a systematic compilation of the different acts of councils in the form of a penitential was attempted. How well the ground was prepared for such a compilation appears from the numerous penitential works, which were at once drawn up on the basis of the first which was published.

1. Poenitentie Columbani.—This earliest Frankish penitential was the work of the Irish monk Columban, born in the first half of the 6th century, in the province of Leinster. He lived for some time in the great monastery of Bangor, and then crossed to Gaul in the year 590; a few years later he penetrated to Italy, and founded the monastery of Bobbio at the foot of the Apennines, where he died, A.D. 615 [DICT. CHR. BIOG. i. 605]. Among his writings are two penitential books, one 'Regula Coenobialis,' designated in some MSS. 'Poenitentie,' 'Regula fratrum Hibernensium;' in others, 'Columbani Liber de quotidianis poenitentis monachorum.' This work, framed on a severe standard, contains a code of monastic rules, and has no concern with the general administration of church discipline. It is remarkable for the frequency with which corporal chastisement occurs among its penalties. Six, ten, or even two hundred strokes might be laid on a careless or offending monk. Columban's other work is entitled 'Liber de Poenitentia,' or 'de Poenitentiarum mensura taxanda.' The work was first published by the Minorite friar Fleming, in the year 1667, from a codex of the monastery of Bobbio. This Cod. Bobbiensis is the only MS. of the penitential known to exist. It consists of two parts, which can never have been intended to form one consecutive set of canons. The first part contains twelve chapters on miscellaneous offences, some of which are also dealt with in part two, and not, in all cases, carrying the same penalty. The second part, which is the true penitential rule, begins with the introduction, "Diversitas culparum diversitatem facit poenitentiarum;" then follows an elaborate comparison between bodily and spiritual disorders. After the introduction come twelve sections on the "capitalia crimina" of the "clerici et monachi;" cc. 13-25, on the "crimina" of "laici;" and the remaining cc. 25-30 on the "minutae monachorum sanctiones." The last chapter of Columban (c. 30) is an injunction laid upon the monks to confess before mass not only actual offences, but thoughts and desires. It is interesting as one of the earliest examples of a practice which was afterwards to be stringently enforced upon the whole church.

In the introduction to the penitential, Columban states that he has composed his work partly from his own discretion, and partly from the "traditiones seniorum." Among these "seniores" must be placed Vinniaus, from whose Irish penitential Columban has borrowed no less than thirteen of his thirty sections. Compare Columb. Poen. cc. 1, 2, 4-9, 11, 16, 20, 21, 23, with Vinniaus. Poen. 23, 12, 11, 22, 18, 19, 20, 25, 26, 27, 8, 9, 17, 36, 22, 9.

Columban's book which, from the name of its author, has usually been regarded as an Irish work, Wasserscheleben pronounces to be Frankish, composed after he had crossed to the continent. The grounds for deciding against its Irish origin are certainly very strong:—(1) Monkish rules and penalties always emanated from the superiors of cloisters, or from some one in high authority; it is highly improbable that Columban would have been allowed to publish a work of this importance while he was occupying a subordinate position in the monastery at Bangor. (2) No trace of Columban's canons is observable in Theodore, while, on the other hand, they form the basis of numerous undoubted Frankish collections. (3) C. 25 forbids communicating with the heretical sect of the Bonosiaci,^b who were spread over Gaul and Italy, but were unknown in the British Isles. (4) The arrangement of the materials shews an independent undertaking. At the head of the capitalia crimina, Columban places homicide; afterwards follow fornication, perjury, &c., and this order was adopted by most of the Frankish penitentials; whereas those which rest upon Theodore's work begin with drunkenness. This arrangement was probably due to the prominence which these various vices and crimes attained among the respective races. With the inhabitants of the British Isles drunkenness was the prevailing sin—with the German tribes, murder, and crimes of violence.

2. In close connexion with Columban's work, Wasserscheleben (Bussordnungen, pp. 360-429) has printed eight anonymous penitentials, all of which show a Frankish origin.

(a) Poenitentie Pseudo-Romanum.—This was first published by Halitgar, bishop of Cambray, in the 9th century, and may be found in Canisius, Lectiones, ed. Basnage, ii. 2. Halitgar styles it the Roman penitential, and states, in his preface, that it is one "quem de scrinio Romanæ ecclesiæ adsumpsimus." It is also printed at length by Morinus (de Sacrament. Poenitent. appendix, pp. 565-568). Wasserscheleben (Bussordnungen, &c. p. 58) is disposed to doubt this statement of Halitgar with regard to the Roman archives, and adduces several reasons for believing it to be an entirely Frankish work. (1) Use is made of Gildas (Ps.-Rom. ix. 1-5; Gild. 9, 12, 21-24). (2) Undoubted reference is made to the Gallic council of Auxerre, A.D. 578 (Conc. Autis. cc. 1, 3, 4; Ps.-Rom. vi. 3, 4, 5). (3) A considerable part of the book is borrowed immediately from Columban, and it is itself the source of several chapters of the Merseburg Penitential (Mers. 47-51. Ps.-Rom. iii. 4; vi. 8, 9, 10).

(b) Poenitentie Hubertense.—First published by Martene and Durand (Ampl. Coll. vol. vii. col. 37) from a MS. from the monastery of St. Hubert at Audain in the Ardennes. The full title is, 'In nomine sanctæ Trinitatis incipiunt judicia sacerdotalia de diversis criminibus ex canonica auctoritate sumpta.' It contains a number of decrees, strung together without any connexion or rubrical arrangement.

(c) Poenitentie Merseburgense.—This penitential is a long treatise, comprising 149 sections, and is chiefly interesting from the numerous references to heathen manners and customs: c. 22 denounces those who seek auguries by birds or any other evil devices; c. 23, divination by soothsayers, because they are the works of evil spirits; c. 26 prohibits "sortes sanctorum," which are contrary to reason; c. 27 denounces as sacrilege the resorting to trees, or fountains, or "cancelli," or any other place except to a church, in order to make a vow, &c. [PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF.]

^b Bonosus, bishop of Sardica, A.D. 392, denied the perpetual virginity of our Lord's mother; of the tenets of his followers in the 7th century little is known.

(d) Poenitentie Bobiense.—From a MS. of the monastery of Bobbio, of the 7th or 8th century. It is headed "Judicius poenitentialis." It contains 47 sections on miscellaneous offences, and concludes with two prayers for the penitent.

(e) Poenitentie Parisiense.—From a Parisian MS. of the 8th century. It contains 61 sections of the ordinary character.

(f) Poenitentie Vindobonense.—This is from a Vienna MS. of the 10th century. It has a short instruction, headed "Judicium patrum ad penitentes." The greater number of its 102 sections are identical with those of the Merseburg book.

(g) Poenitentie Floriacense.—From a Fleury codex, which was first printed by Martene (de Rit. Antiq. ii. 61, ed. Rotomag.) "ex pervetusto codice Floriacensi." It opens with a long "Ordo ad dandam poenitentiam," according to which the priest is to receive confessions. The penitential proper is styled "Judicium poenitentiae;" of its 50 original canons only 10 are extant.

(h) Poenitentie Sangallense.—Taken from a St. Gall MS. of the 9th century. It is introduced by the same "ordo" as the preceding Poen. Floriac. It contains 19 short canons, nearly all of which are to be found either in the Merseburg or the Parisian books.

All these anonymous penitentials, with the exception of those from Vienna and Merseburg, bear the mark of the 7th or, at latest, of the first half of the 8th century. The "ratio" or "ordo" appended to Pseud.-Rom., Merseburg, Floriac., Sangall., are, perhaps, of the 10th or 11th century (Wasserschleben, Bussord. p. 56). They treat throughout of private penance, consisting chiefly of fasts on bread and water; sometimes the penance of exile, almsgiving, or psalm-singing occurs. In the Pseudo-Roman and St. Gall collections, there is a division of the subject into chapters according to the principal crimes; in the remainder, the canons are strung together without any system whatever. Different from the Anglo-Saxon practice is the ratio appended to the Pseudo-Roman and Merseburg collections, in which the deacon is permitted to receive the penitent, at least if the priest is not present, or in a case of necessity.

3. Poenitentie Cummeani.—The history of this penitential is involved in much obscurity, and the identification of the Cummean (Commean, Cumian, Cumin, Comin) whose name it bears, is no less perplexing. The Acta SS. Hibernens. xii. Januar. mention twenty-one Irish ecclesiastics of that name, but no intimation is given of any of them having written a penitential. In two Swiss MSS. St. Gall, 550 and 150, a penitential is found with the preface, "Cummeani Abbat in Scotia orti;" and from this it has generally been concluded that both Cummean and his work were of Irish or Scotch origin. Mone (Quellen und Forschungen, p. 494, cited by Wasserschleben), suggests that Columba, abbat of Iona, circ. 597, compiled the work, and that Cumin, one of his biographers, wrote the preface. Theiner (Disquisit. Sacrae, p. 280) attributed it to a Cummean, abbat of Iona, who died at the end of the 6th century. Kunstmann (Die Lateinischen Pönentialbücher der Angelsachsen, p. 22), although not expressing himself decidedly which Cummean he considers to be the author of the treatise, regards it as the principal source of Theodore's Penitential, and remarks that Theodore's use of it is a further proof of the consideration enjoyed by Irish teachers in England. Wasserschleben (p. 62), with more critical acuteness, points out that the designation "Abbas in Scotia ortus" clearly indicates that Cummean was not in his own country when he composed his book. He therefore looks for some ecclesiastic of that name who lived on the continent, and finds him in a Cummean mentioned in Acta SS. Hibernens. 4 Jun. p. 244; in Annal. Benedict. ii. p. 282, and in Ughellus, Ital. Sacr. t. iv. col. 959, 960, who emigrated to Italy, and died in Columban's monastery of Bobbio in the reign of the Lombard king Luitprand, which extended from A.D. 711 to 744. The fact that this Cummean is called "episcopus" in the Chronica Bobiens. quoted in Ughellus, and the agreement of the date of his death with the date which the internal evidence from the penitential bearing his name indicates, render it highly probable that he is the "Abbas in Scotia ortus." Wasserschleben has published (pp. 460-491) a text taken from the following MSS.—Cod. Sangall. 550, saec. ix.; Cod. Sangall. 675, saec. ix.; Darmst. 91, saec. ix.; Vindob. Theol. 651, saec. x.; Frising. 43; Windbergens. 88. Of these MSS. only the first bears Cummean's name; and it is not clear whether some older MS. has not yet to be discovered of which these are copies. As to the date, it is manifest that, presuming this to be the authentic penitential, Cummean took his work from Theodore, and not the converse; for many passages of the former, in cc. i. ii. iii. iv. v. refer to Theodore by name as the authority for the decisions given. The date, therefore, cannot be earlier than Theodore's death in A.D. 690. On the other hand, Cummean was the source from which Egbert drew some of his canons. Compare Egbert. Pen. iv. 14; vii. 7; xii.; with Cum. Pen. vii. 8; vi. 8; xiii. This would give the middle of the 8th century as the limit of time on the other side. And this date coincides with that of the Cummean who died at Bobbio in the reign of Luitprand. There is a curious association of Cummean's work with the name of Jerome, the origin of which is of old date. In an Avignon MS. saec. xiii. it is distinctly ascribed to Jerome. In the Cod. Vindob. Theol. No. 725, saec. ix. fol. 40, is contained an "Inquisitio S. Hieronimi de penitentia," followed by two chapters from Theodore, almost the whole of Cummean, and some other additions, the whole, however, anonymous. This is also found under the title "Hieronimi fatentur" in Cod. Merseb. fol. 23, and with the superscription "de duodecim triduanis" in Cod. Vindob. jur. can. No. 116, fol. 21; also in the Cod. Cotton. Vespas. D. ii. 1, p. 3, are some "Canones poenitentiales secundum Hieronymum," which are undoubtedly borrowed from Cummean. And it is remarkable that Egbert, in his preface, mentions Jerome in company with Augustine, Theodore, and others, as authorities on the subject of penitence, but does not mention Cummean; he borrows, however, both from Cummean and Theodore, and it is not improbable that the work of the former was known to him under the name of Jerome.

The Penitential is headed by a long introduction comprising (1) "de diversis criminibus." (2) "De modis poenitentiae," which prescribes the scale of scourging, psalm-singing, and almsgiving, &c. by which penance could be redeemed, borrowed apparently from Irish sources, see Canones Hibernenses de Arreis, p. 139. The code of dispensations concludes with the declaration, which is also found in the Appendix to Bede's Penitential (x. 8), that he who does not know his psalms and cannot fast must look out some respectable man to do it for him, whom he must recompense either by labour or money. (3) "De divite vel potente, quomodo se redimit pro criminalibus culpis." The title of the treatise is "Exscarpus de aliis plures poenitentiales et canones."

4. Poenitential Bigotianum.—This penitential was first printed, but not completely, by Martene (Thes. Nov. tom. iv. col. 22-30), under the title 'Libellus de remediis peccatorum,' which is a variation from that found in the MS. Wasserschleben has printed his edition (pp. 441-460) from Cod. Paris. Reg. 3182 (olim Bigot. 89) fol. saec. xi. pp. 286-299. No name is attached to it, and Wasserschleben gives it the title Bigotianum, that being the only MS. in which it is found. The same MS. contains most of the Irish and British fragments, and the compiler has evidently drawn largely from Irish sources. He quotes "canones sapientium et Gregorii" (see supra, Canones Hibernenses, p. 1609), the Canones patrum, Vinniaus, Theodore, the Frankish penitentials, Cassian, and the Vitae Sanctorum, from which he adduces the examples of the Abbas Pastor, Moyses, Peritus, Antonius, St. Synectica, and others. This element in the penitential would lead to the conclusion that, like Columban and Cummean, the author was one of the many Irish missionaries who settled in France. The work appears to have been made use of by Cummean, unless, as is not improbable, both were derived from a common source not yet discovered. It is especially rich in material, and the writer has shewn unusual originality in the arrangement of his matter.

5. Poenitential Vindobonensis.—This is another anonymous penitential published by Wasserschleben pp. 493-497, from Cod. Vindob. Theol. Lat. No. 725 (olim 667), 8vo. saec. ix. fol. 1-82. It contains part of Cummean's introduction, the same part which is also found in Cod. Sangall. 675, and is designated here "Praefatio Cummeani Abbatis in Scotia orti." Then follow the titles of twenty-four chapters, borrowed from Cummean, Theodore, and Vinniaus. Then the "Inquisitio Sancti Hieronymi de penitentia," mentioned above; after that the titles of seventeen more chapters from the same sources as the earlier ones, and concluding with "Interrogat. Augustini et respons. Gregorii."

6. Poenitential Remense.—Another book based on Cummean, found in Cod. Paris, 1603 (olim regius 4483; Remens. 264) saec. viii. 8vo. fol. 104-138. It is an anonymous work of sixteen chapters.

7. Poenitential XXXV. Capitulum.—This is a very systematic compilation of penitential canons published by Wasserschleben (pp. 505-526) from the Cod. Vindob. jur. can. No. 116, 4to, saec. x. fol. 22-41, and Cod. Sangall. 150, fol. 285-318. The work is founded on Theodore, Cummean, and the Frankish Penitentials connected with Columban, and the decisions of the two former authorities, under the designation "Judicium Cummeani,"

"Judicium Theodori," or "Judicium Canonum," are frequently cited in succession for the same offence. From the preponderating use made of Cummean's work, and Irish and Anglo-Saxon sources, and from the citation of a "Judicium Scotorum," it is a probable conjecture that the penitential was compiled by some Scotch missionary. The treatise appears to have had a wide circulation, for large excerpts from it appear in a MS. of the Austrian Cistercian Monastery of Holy Cross, saec. x. in the Cod. Valicell. saec. xiii. in the so-called Collectio Saviniana, and in the Collectio Anselmi Lucens (Wasserschleben, Beiträge zur Geschichte der vorgratianischen Kirchenrechtsquellen, pp. 34, 151).

ANGLO-SAXON PENITENTIALS.

1. Poenitential Theodori.—The treatise which bears the name of Theodore is the most important of the penitential books, but it is only within the last few years that a genuine text of the work has been published. Whether Theodore was himself the author of the book, and what it was, and whether any set of canons existed which could be proved to be drawn up under the authority of the great archbishop—these till quite recently were open questions. This obscurity is the more remarkable as there was a unanimity of tradition for many centuries that Theodore's was the first Anglo-Saxon Penitential, and it long had a widespread influence in England, and was long the source and model of the penitential regulations in France and Germany. This influence was partly due to the nature of the work itself, and partly to the learning and commanding character of Theodore, whose primacy, extending from A.D. 669 to 690, was a memorable one in the English church. The evidence for the belief that a Penitential did emanate from Theodore is as follows: (1) Egbert, who was consecrated bishop not later than A.D. 733, and who must have been born consequently soon after Theodore's death, twice in his undoubted Penitential quotes Theodore by name; in the preface he speaks of him in company with Augustine, Gregory, and other Fathers, as one of the great authorities on penitence; and in the body of his work (v. ii.) he takes a canon almost verbatim from Theodore's treatise, with the introduction "Theodorus dixit." The Liber Pontificalis (ed. Vignol. Rom. 1724, tom. i. p. 270) which was first published in the second half of the 8th century, states, "Theodorus Archiepiscopus peccantium iudicia, quantos scilicet annos pro unoquoque peccato quis poenitere debeat, mirabili et discreta consideratione descripsit." Identical testimony is given by Paul Warnefrid (Paulus Diaconus) cited by Wasserschleben, p. 15. (3) The Codex Canonum Hibernicorum, the date of one MS. of which lies between A.D. 763 and 790 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 174), quotes the work by name, as do also many of the French penitentials and collections of canons. (4) It is spoken of by Rabanus Maurus (De judic. poenit. laicorum, c. 6; opp. Colon. 1626, tom. vi. p. 119) as "Poenitentialis quem Theodorus constituit." And Regino of Prüm, in his Visitation Instructions requires the ecclesiastics under his jurisdiction to be provided with a copy of either the Roman Penitential, or Theodore's or Bede's. On the other hand (1) Theodore's contemporaries are silent; Bede, who speaks fully of the archbishop's activity in the English church, has not a single reference to Theodore's Penitential, either in his own treatise or in his History; (2) by the twelfth century the work was unknown, or forgotten, in England.

Before coming to that which can now be confidently accepted as the authentic work ascribed in the 8th century to Theodore, it will clear the ground to give a list of the imperfect or spurious editions of the book that have been published.

(1.) In A.D. 1639 Spelman, in the first volume of the Concilia, published the headings of 78 chapters under the title of "Poenitentiale Theodori Archiepiscopi." He took them from a MS. of the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and expressly states that he was not permitted to make a copy of the whole. This MS. seen by Spelman, C. C. C. C. 190, was published, with six chapters at the beginning and twenty-two at the end omitted, by the Record Commission, Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, p. 277, seqq. edited by Thorpe. The C. C. C. C. 190 MS. was taken as the text, and MSS. Cotton. Vesp. D. 15, C. C. C. C. 320, were collated with it to supply various readings. In favour of this being the original work there is only the title, which is comparatively modern, and the authority of Spelman founded on a glance at the MS. Against this supposition are these fatal objections: c. 20 consists for the most part of canons from the second Roman council under Gregory II. A.D. 721; c. 38 contains a long passage from a capitulary of Charles the Great, A.D. 789; in almost all the chapters use is made of the Collection of Canons by Halitgar of Cambrai, circ. 829; there are numerous citations from the French councils of Orleans, Agde, Châlons. The conclusion from this evidence is, that Spelman and Thorpe's Penitential is a French compilation not earlier than the ninth century. This edition was again published by Kunstmann (Die Lateinischen Pönitentialbücher der Angelsachsen, Mayence, 1844), who also published from a Ratisbon MS. a series of 193 canons, under the name 'Canones Gregoriani.' The full title in the MSS. is "Canones Sancti Gregorii Papae urbis Romae," the origin of which heading is doubtless to be found in the replies given to Augustine by Gregory on the ecclesiastical government of England. These "Canones Gregorii" are reprinted by Wasserschleben (pp. 160-180). They consist of a disorderly selection from the genuine work of Theodore.

(2.) D'Achery in the Spicilegium, vol. ix. published (A.D. 1669) 120 chapters from various Parisian MSS. under the title "Capitula Theodori." In A.D. 1671 they were republished by Labbe and Cossart (Concilia, vi. 1875), and again in A.D. 1723, in the new edition of the Spicilegium (i. 486), edited with the notes of Baluze and Martene, when the 120 original canons were increased to 168, of which however the last twenty came from the Irish book of Adamnan (supra, p. 1609). In Wasserschleben's collection these canons are printed (pp. 145-160) as "Capitula Dacheriana." The "capitula" are a mixed collection, arranged without any method, containing few canons on penance, and possess no claim whatever to be regarded as the original treatise.

(3.) Jacques Petit published in Paris, in A.D. 1677, with the title Theodori Poenitentiale, a work in fourteen chapters, taken from two MSS. from the library of De Thou, together with the "capitula" of D'Achery, and sixty other canons communicated to him from various MSS. by one Nicolas Favier. These fourteen chapters constitute what is now recognised as the second book of the original penitential. The capitula of Favier have no connexion with Theodore, but are from sources as late as the 10th century. This selection of Petit was reprinted by Migne in A.D. 1851, in vol. 99 of the Patrologia.

(4.) The obscurity which so long hung over the Penitential of Theodore was at length dispelled by the learning of Dr. F. W. H. Wasserschleben, Professor of Law in the University of Halle. In the introduction to his work, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, published at Halle in A.D. 1851, he has demonstrated (pp. 13-37) that Theodore himself wrote no penitential, but that the treatise which bears his name contains his original decisions, the name of the writer being unknown. Rejecting all previous editions, he has instituted a fresh search into the chief continental libraries, and as the result of his labours, has brought to light a book which he is satisfied is the original treatise issued under Theodore's name. For his text he has made use of the following MSS.: (a) Cod. Vindob. no. 2195 (Salisb. 324), fol. saec. ix. x. fol. 2-40; (b) Cod. Vindob. jur. can. no. 116, 8vo, saec. viii. ix. fol. 1-16; (c) Cod. Sangerm. no. 940 (ol. 912): this is an "apographum" of the Corpus MS. 320, to be mentioned below; (d) Cod. Heribopol. Theol. no. 32, 4to, saec. viii. ix., containing an index of both books, but only the text of the first. The remaining MSS. contain only the second book: (e) Cod. Paris, no. 1603, 8vo, saec. viii. fol. 92-103; (f) Cod. Paris, no. 3846 (ol. Regius, 3665, Teller. Remens. 262), fol. saec. ix. x.; (g) Cod. Paris, no. 1455, fol. (ol. Colbert, 3368, Reg. 3887), saec. ix.; (h) Cod. Sangerm. no. 366, 4to, saec. ix.; (i) Cod. Darmst. no. 91, 4to, saec. ix. fol. 84, seqq.; (k) Cod. Sangerm. no. 1365, 4to, saec. x. xi.; and 2 Codd. Thuan., from which Petit's fourteen chapters were taken.

(5.) Soon after the publication of Wasserschleben's edition, and before they had themselves seen his text, Professor Stubbs and the late Rev. A. W. Haddan discovered a copy of the true work in England, which only differs from Wasserschleben's text in various verbal readings. This text was published by them in A.D. 1871, in Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, iii. 176-203. It is taken from MS. 320 in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, an earlier MS. than any of those which are the source of Wasserschleben's publication, being probably not later than the 8th century; although even in this a reference (l. viii. 5) to "quibusdam codicibus" indicates that the original MS. has not yet been discovered. The Corpus MS. is one of those which Thorpe used without seeing its value; but of which Wasserschleben had only an imperfect transcript in Cod. Sangerman. 940. The fact that the researches of English scholars have brought them to the same conclusion as that reached by the eminent German investigator into Penitential literature may be regarded as decisive on this long-vexed question. We now possess a substantially accurate text of the treatise which was known in the early part of the middle ages by the name of the Penitential of Theodore.

The exact date and name of the writer of the Penitential will probably never be discovered. In some of the Parisian and the two Vienna

MSS., the work is described as "Poenitentie Theodori," or "Canon Theodori de ratione poenitentiae et diversis quaestionibus." In another Paris MS. (Cod. Sangermanens. 1365) it is called "Libellus quem Theodorus archiepiscopus de diversis interrogationibus ad remedium temperavit poenitentium, de quaestionibus conjugiorum cap. xxvii." The full title of the original is wanting altogether in the early Corpus MS., which has lost its first folio; in the only MS. in which it is entire, Vienna 2195, it stands thus—

PRAEFATIO
IN NOMINE DOMINI

INCIPIT PRAEFATIO LIBELLI QUEM PATER THEODORUS DIVERSIS INTERROGANTIBUS AD REMEDIUM TEMPERAVIT PENITENTIAE. DISCIPULUS UMBRENSIUM UNIVERSIS ANGLORUM CATHOLICIS PROPRIAE ANIMARUM MEDICIS SANABILEM SUPPLEX IN DOMINO CHRISTO SALUTEM.

This title is followed by a long preface, written in particularly barbarous and corrupt Latin. Nevertheless it throws considerable light on the authorship of the work. The treatise purports to be a series of decisions on ecclesiastical discipline given by "venerabilis Antistes Theodorus" in answer to the questions of the priest Eoda, surnamed "Christianus." In it use has also been made of a "libellus Scotorum," afterwards referred to (I. vii. 5), the author of which is expressly stated to have been an ecclesiastic. Of this Eoda, who submitted the questions to Theodore, nothing whatever is known; he cannot be satisfactorily identified with bishop Haeddi mentioned at the end of the Penitential, nor with any of the many persons of the age who bore similar names. The identification of the "discipulus Umbrensis," who is represented as the editor of the treatise, is equally remote. The designation signifies either that he was a native of Northumbria who had been a disciple of Theodore, or, more probably, an Englishman of southern birth who had studied under the northern scholars (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 173). The conclusion which is clear, and which can be drawn from the preface, is that Theodore was not the author of the Penitential in the sense of having written it himself, but that it contains his judgments, was drawn up under his personal direction, was published with his authority and during his lifetime, and has always borne his name. The priest Eoda is spoken of as "beate memoriae," and was therefore dead before the publication; but that Theodore himself was yet living seems highly probable, from the verses, first published by Kunstmann, in which, at the conclusion of the Penitential, he commends his soul to the prayers of bishop Haeddi.

For his decisions, next after Holy Scripture, Theodore is indebted to the current ecclesiastical law, and particularly the Codex Canonum of Dionysius Exiguus. Comp. Theod. Poenit. I. i. 1, with Can. Apost. 42; T. Poenit. I. ii. 6, with Conc. Ancy. c. 9; T. Poenit. I. v. 10, with Conc. Nicaen. cc. 11, 12; T. Poenit. I. xv. 4, with Conc. Ancy. c. 23. In T. Poenit. I. v. 2, pope Innocent is quoted by name, with a reference to a decision of his in Ep. ad Episc. Macedon. which is contained in the Dionysian codex. There is further evidence that this collection of canons was known in England in the 7th century: at the council of Hertford, A.D. 673, Theodore brought forward certain "Canones patrum" in order to select those which were suitable for the needs of the English church; and these "canones" in all probability were the collection of Dionysius Exiguus. Traces of Theodore's Greek training are seen in his frequent references to Basil's Epistle to Amphilochius. Five times he quotes Basil by name, in addition to many indirect appeals to his decisions. (Conf. Theod. Pen. I. ii. 7, viii. 14, xiv. 3, II. vii. 3, xii. 6; Basil, Ep. cc. 58, 18, 4, 9, 21.) A further evidence of Eastern learning appears from his many allusions to Greek practices; one chapter (II. viii.) contains nothing else but a comparison of the different customs and opinions of the Greeks and Romans. Justinian's Novells are another Eastern source on which he drew. (Conf. Theod. Pen. II. xii. 7, 11, 12, 21, 23, 32; Novell. Justin. cxi., xxxiv. 10, xx. 5, 7, 6.) Theodore must also have been conversant with the British and Scotch sources of ecclesiastical law. Theod. Pen. I. ii. 1 is apparently taken from the Liber Davidis, c. 6; Theod. Pen. I. ii. 7 from the Sinodus Luci Victoriae, c. 8. Theod. Pen. I. ii. 16 imposes fifteen years penance on incest, but adds that according to another standard life-long exile has been allotted; this is in reference to the Sinod. Luc. Vic. c. 6, which inflicts exile on incest. The one canon of Theodore which sanctions commutation of penance (I. vii. 5) is also founded on a Celtic authority; it comes from that same "libellus Scotorum" to which allusion was made in the preface. [REDEMPTIONS.]

2. Judicium Clementis.—This fragment was first printed by Kunstmann (Die Lateinischen Pönentialbücher der Angelsachsen, pp. 176, 177) from an Augsburg MS. no. 153. With this Wasserschleben has collated a 10th century MS. from the Austrian Cistercian convent of Holy Cross. Kunstmann identifies this Clement with Willibrord, one of the Anglo-Saxon missionaries to Frisia, in A.D. 692. Willibrord is known to have borne the name of Clement from one of the letters of Boniface to pope Stephen (Ep. 107, edit. Jaffé). Haddan and Stubbs have printed (Councils, &c. iii. 226) the canons as a fragment illustrating the Anglo-Saxon system of penitential discipline. Wasserschleben, however, without giving his reasons, appears to doubt whether the identification can be authenticated, and has appended the "Judicium" to the Frankish penitential. It comprises twenty sections of no special interest.

3. Poenitentie Bedae.—There is no clue to the exact date of this work. Bede died on Ascension Day, A.D. 735, and assuming, as there is no reason to doubt, that the treatise was written by him, the date of it must be fixed in the early part of the 8th century. The penitential was first published in the Amplissima Collectio of Martene and Durand, vol. vii. col. 37, taken from a MS. in the monastery of St. Hubert, at Andain in the Ardennes. This edition is incomplete, containing only the latter half of the work. A later and more perfect edition was printed by Wasserschleben (Bussordnungen, &c. pp. 220–230) from a Vienna MS. no. 116, 8vo, saec. viii. ix. fol. 17–22, collated with two other codices, Frising. no. 3, and Ransh. no. 73. In this edition the chapters were first divided into sections. It is reprinted with various readings from the issue of Martene and Durand, by Haddan and Stubbs (Councils, &c. pp. 326-334). In this form it may be accepted with little hesitation as the genuine production of Bede. It bears the title, INCIPIT EXSCARPUS DOMINI BEDANI PRESBYTERI. It contains twelve chapters. In addition to this authentic treatise of Bede, another has been printed bearing his name. It appears in several editions of his collected works under the heading "Liber de remediis Peccatorum." It is printed in the Concilia of Spelman and Wilkins, the former of whom appears to have had some doubt of its authenticity, and to have omitted considerable portions of earlier editions. The best text is that printed by Kunstmann (Pönentialbücher, &c. pp. 142-175) from a Munich MS. of the 11th century (Cod. August. 153), and adopted by Wasserschleben, in whose collection it bears the title "Penitentiale Pseudo-Baedae." Haddan and Stubbs regard it as a compilation from two distinct works, the Penitential of Bede and the Penitential of Egbert.

4. Penitentiale Egberti.—Several treatises have been published bearing the name of Egbert. The discovery of the authentic work involved a no less complicated investigation than was necessary in the case of Theodore's Penitential. Among the documents which, wholly or in part, have been attributed at various periods to the archbishop are—

1. In Wilkins's Concilia (i. pp. 113-143) there is printed a work in five books in parallel columns, Anglo-Saxon and Latin, under the title, "Poenitentiale Egberti Archiepiscopi Eboracensis." This is reprinted by Thorpe in the Monumenta Ecclesiastica appended to the Ancient Laws (pp. 343-392), but with a different division. The first is named "Confessionale," the remaining four "Poenitentiale." In addition to which, under the title of Addimenta, Thorpe gives a collection of thirty-five other canons in Anglo-Saxon and Latin. A further edition of part of this work is given in Cooper's Appendix B to the Report on the Foedera, with the title, "Poenentialis Egberti Archiepiscopi Eboracensis, liber iv^{tus}." The grounds for rejecting the claim of any part of this to be accepted as the original work are:—(1) The first three books of Thorpe's "Poenitentiale" are, with one slight exception, a translation of the third, fourth, and fifth books of the Penitential of Halitgar of Cambray, circ. A.D. 829. (2) The fourth book of the "Poenitentiale" is a compilation from Theodore and Cummean. (3) The "Confessionale" is composed of extracts from Theodore, the genuine Penitential of Egbert, and a few additions from the Poen. Bigotianum and Poen. Remense; although it is not possible altogether to exclude the supposition that Egbert may have translated into Anglo-Saxon some of the older passages both in the "Confessionale" and the fourth book of the "Poenitentiale."

2. Thirty-five canons, purporting to be extracted from the second book of the Penitential, were published by Spelman in the first volume of the Concilia; these were adopted both by Labbe and Cossart (Concilia, iv. 1601-1604) and by Mansi (Concilia, xii. 459). They are taken, without any critical attempt to distinguish what is genuine, from a Bodleian MS. to be mentioned hereafter.

3. In addition to the Penitential, a collection of Excerptiones has been published by Spelman (pp. 258-278), Labbe and Cossart (vi. 1586-1588), Thorpe (Ancient Laws, p. 326 et seqq.), and in a translation in Johnson (Canons, ed. Baron. i. pp. 184-223) under the name of Egbert. The source from which these excerpts are taken is MS. Cotton. Nero, A. 1. The fact that they contain extracts from the capitularies of Charles the Great is alone fatal to their claim to be regarded as Egbert's.

4. The Liber de Remediis Peccatorum is ascribed in some MSS. to Egbert. On its true history see above, Poen. Baedae.

5. The Pontificale which was published in 1853 by the Surtees Society, from a Paris MS., bears the name of Egbert, and there is no reason to doubt its authenticity. It is, however, as the name implies, a ritual and not a penitential book. Another work, the Dialogus, which is equally authentic, has an indirect bearing upon penitence. It is in the form of a series of decisions on ecclesiastical matters in reply to sixteen "interrogationes" submitted to the archbishop (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 403-413).

6. The genuine Penitential was first printed as an anonymous work by Martene and Durand (Amplissima Collectio, vii. coll. 40-48) from the same MS. in the monastery of St. Hubert in which Bede's tract is found. The independent researches of Wasserschleben have led him to the conclusion that this must be the original work. His edition is printed in his Bussordnungen, &c. pp. 231-247, taken mainly from the Cod. Vindob. jur. can. no. 116, fol. 77-87; it is also found in the following MSS.: Cod. Frising. no. 3, Ranshov. no. 73, Sangall. no. 677, Vat. Palat. no. 485. The genuine Penitential is also to be found in the Bodleian MS. 718, which comprises four books; of these books the first, containing twenty-one capitula, which are the first twenty-one capitula of the so-called "Excerptiones Egberti" of Thorpe, then the genuine work, then certain confessional prayers of a later date; the remaining three books belong probably to the 10th century. The first book concludes with the words "Finis libri Poenentialis Egberhti Archiepiscopi." Haddan and Stubbs have reprinted (iii. 416-431) Wasserschleben's text, with various readings, from the Andain MS. of Martene and Durand, the Bodleian MS. 718, and the fragment printed in the Surtees edition of the Pontificale. The identification of this edition as Egbert's rests on the ground that it contains no reference to anything of a later date, that it is cited as his by Rabanus Maurus, a pupil of Alcuin, and that it is declared to be the work of the archbishop by the compiler of the Bodleian MS. 718. The exact date of the Penitential cannot be fixed with any accuracy. It was no doubt published while Egbert was archbishop. He died A.D. 766, in the thirty-fourth year of his pontificate, and he probably received the pall as early as 734, for at this date he is known to have consecrated bishop Frithbert of Hexham. The limits of time within which he issued the Penitential cannot then be drawn closer than A.D. 734-766. The full title of the book, with some variation in the Bodleian MS., is EXSCARPUS DE CANONIBUS CATHOLICORUM PATRUM

VEL PENITENTIALE AD REMEDIUM ANIMARUM
DOMINI EAMBERTHI ARCHIEPISCOPI EBURACAE CIVITATIS.

SPANISH PENITENTIAL.

In the Codex Vigilanus, or Alveldensis, in the library of the Escorial (ff. 148, scr. 976) there is a penitential book of Spanish origin, the greater part of which consists of excerpts from Theodore, Cummean, and Frankish penitentials. The substance of the book, therefore, contains nothing noteworthy, but the spelling is remarkable for the interchange of the letters b and v; for instance, prevent for praebent, serbandum, obserhari, inebriabent, noberca, abunculus, coberit, calueberit, and decanus for diaconus. There is a trace of national customs in chapter 84: "Qui in saltatione femineum habitum gestiunt et monstruose se fingunt et majas et orcum et pelam et his similia exerceant, 1 ann. penit." Majas is probably connected with the majo, maja, a boy or girl affectedly and shamelessly dressed; orcum, the orco of the old Spanish romance, the ogre or wild man of the woods; pelam signifies in Spanish a richly-dressed boy, carried with dancing on a man's shoulders. See Wasserschleben, p. 71.

GREEK PENITENTIALS.

A critical investigation into the history and sources of the Greek penitential books has not yet been made. Morinus (de Sacramento Penitentiae, appendix, pp. 616-664) has published two Greek books, one of which has the name of John the Faster, Gregory's contemporary and opponent at Constantinople. Morinus has taken his edition from a 13th century MS. at the "Bibliotheca Atempiana" at Rome; he professes himself unable to decide to what extent the MS. contains later interpolations into the original work; but he finds extracts in the works of Harmenopolus and Matthew Blastares of the 14th century, which profess to be taken from John's Penitential, but which do not exist in the Roman MS. The title of the edition of Morinus is Ἀκολουθία καὶ τάξις ἐπὶ ἐξομολογούμενων συνταγέῖσα ὑπὸ τοῦ ὁσίου πατρὸς ἡμῶν Ἰωάννου τοῦ ἡστένοῦ.

The other book, which he has published as a separate penitential, taken from a Vatican MS. which he had not seen himself, is styled: Ἰωάννου Μονάχου καὶ Διακόνου, μαθητοῦ τοῦ μεγάλου Βασιλείου, οὗτινος ἡ ἐπωνυμία, τέκνον ἱπακοῆς, Κανονάριον, διαγορεύον περὶ πάντων λεπτομερῶς τῶν παθῶν, καὶ τῶν τούτοις προσφῶρον ἐπιτιμίων, περὶ τε τῆς ἁγίας κοινωνίας, βρωμάτων τε καὶ πομάτων καὶ εὐχῶν λίαν συμπαθέστατον.

In addition to these Morinus has published an Ἀκολουθία τῶν ἐξομολογούμενων, taken from a 10th century MS. from the Barberini Library in Rome. He calls it a breviary or enchiridion of a penitential. It comprises three headings: the rite of making and receiving a confession, the form of examining the penitent, and the manner of giving absolution; it contains no list of penalties for sins, but refers to an index, from which Morinus infers that at the time when this breviary was in use there was well known in the Eastern church some penitential book, in which the penalties of sins were classified.

The methods and contents of these Greek books have little in common with the Latin penitentials; they bear a closer resemblance to the later "ordo" or "ratio" appended to some of the Frankish books. Morinus has printed the Penitential of Joannes Jejunator and the Canonarium of Joannes Monachus as distinct works. Whether they have any claim to be considered as original and separate treatises, or whether they are based on authentic books not yet discovered, or whether they are altogether productions of centuries as late as the 10th or even 12th, are questions which cannot be satisfactorily determined, till some scholar shall examine the MSS. which survive in the Eastern church with the same completeness and diligence which have been bestowed upon the penitential records in the monasteries and libraries of the West.

For the chief contents of this article the writer is indebted to the very learned work of Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, Halle, 1851, and to the critical notes introducing the Anglo-Saxon Penitentials published by Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, vol. iii. Oxford, 1871. [G. M.]

PENITENTIARY. For our knowledge of the office of the Penitentiary Priests, Presbyteri Penitentiarum, ὁ ἐπὶ τῆς μετανοίας πρεσβύτεροι, we are indebted to the account which Socrates (H. E. v. 19) and Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16) give of the abolition of the office. The appointment dates from the time of the Novatian schism. The number of penitents, particularly of those who had lapsed during the Decian persecution, who flocked to obtain absolution from the church, gave a handle to the Novatian party to denounce the system of Catholic discipline. Penitents also frequently made confession of sins before the congregation which were unfit to be recited in public, and were a cause of scandal, both to the bishop who published them and to the congregation who listened to them. To obviate these difficulties, a special officer called the Penitentiary was added to the ecclesiastical roll, whose duty it was to determine what crimes were too scandalous for public acknowledgment, and particularly to decide what offences excluded the offender from partaking of the Holy Communion, and generally to superintend, under the authority of the bishop, the administration of discipline. The office was in force only till the time of Nectarius, Chrysostom's predecessor in the see of Constantinople. During his episcopacy it was abolished, at least in that part of the church which acknowledged the jurisdiction of Constantinople. The occasion which gave rise to the abolition does not appear to have implicated the Penitentiary personally. A certain lady of rank, who was doing penance under his direction, afterwards confessed that she was at the same time carrying on an intrigue with a deacon of the church. The scandal caused a great outcry, and Nectarius, to prevent similar disorder for the future, formally abrogated the office. This was in A.D. 391. There hangs some obscurity over the question whether the office was at any time a universal one. Sozomen (H. E. vii. 16) implies that it existed throughout the West, and was particularly held in esteem in the church of Rome. But the more general opinion seems to be, from the absence of any mention of the Penitentiary among Latin ecclesiastical writers, that the office was confined to the Eastern church. Compare however, Augusti, Christ. Archæol. ix. 122. The chief interest attaching to the abolition of the office is the bearing which it has on the Roman controversy of auricular confession. Both Socrates and Sozomen expressly state that upon the discontinuance of the office, each one was to be allowed to partake of the holy mysteries as his own conscience dictated. From which it seems to follow, that whatever may have been the practice while the Penitentiary Priest was one of the recognised officers of the church, henceforth secret confession was discontinued, and that there was to be nothing approaching to compulsory confession before coming to the holy sacrament. To weaken the force of this inference it has been suggested that Socrates and Sozomen were Novatians, or at any rate wrote in the interest of the Novatian party; but this suggestion has no foundation. For some account of the controversy, see Hooker, Ecol. Pol. VI. iv. 8; Bingham, Antiq. XVIII. iii. 12.

Ducange quotes Anastasius Bibliothecarius for the authority that pope Simplicius, A.D. 468–483, appointed an officer called Poenitentiarius Ecclesiae Romanae, with the duty of superintending the penitents and hearing their confessions, and that this is the origin of the office in the church of Rome. In modern times the chief of the Penitentiaries, Magnus Poenitentiarius, is a high official in Rome, and one of the cardinals.

The regular cathedral officer in the Roman Catholic church called the Penitentiary, is one of the appointments of the council of Trent.

PENSIONS. Certain allowances appear from very early times to have been granted from ecclesiastical revenues to ecclesiastical personages under certain circumstances, such as to the clergy who were disabled by sickness or old age, and to bishops who had been driven from their sees, or forced to resign them through bodily infirmity. Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 2, c. 29, § 1) says that these were usually given in two different forms, either simply as an annual stipend, or by granting the usufruct of lands belonging to the church; the latter chiefly in the case of strangers who had sought refuge in the diocese. Examples of both kinds of pension will be found in the instances that follow.

The first recorded case of a pension granted by authority is found in the acts of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (act. 10), where Domnus, who had been ejected from the see of Antioch by the "Robbers' Meeting," was, at the request of his successor Maximus, allowed an annual sum from the revenues of the see sufficient to keep him from want, and that his claims might not be a cause of disturbance in future years. The same council (acts 11, 12) allowed Basianus and Stephen, who had both been uncanonically elected to the see of Ephesus, pensions of 200 aurei each from the property of the diocese.

Abundant instances of the causes for which pensions were allowed, and the different ways in which they were granted, are found in the writings of Gregory the Great. Thus (Epist. i.

42) in sending certain clergy to monasteries to do penance for incontinence, he orders that they should receive a sufficient allowance for their subsistence, in order that they might not be a burden to the houses into which they were received. In another place (Epist. i. 43) he directs the bishops of Illyria to obey the mandate of the emperor, who had ordered that the bishops who had been expelled from their sees by the war should share homes and revenues of those who had remained undisturbed, but adding a special provision that they only receive sufficient for their sustenance, that they were only to be regarded as guests, and that they should have no authority whatever given them which should even approach to a partition of the see. Again, a pension of forty pieces of gold (Epist. ii. 53) was assigned, on the ground of common humanity, to Agathon, bishop of Lipara, who had been deprived of his see by canonical judgment. When a certain Felix, a deacon, who had ceased communion with the church from mistaking the intention of the fifth oecumenical council, applied for readmission, Gregory (Epist. iii. 14) entreats the bishop of Syracuse either to restore him to the office of a deacon or to allow him a part of the stipend belonging to it, adding that, in order to take himself a share in the good work, he would add a small annual allowance from the funds of the church of Rome. A bishop of Gaul (Epist. xi. 7) who was unable to perform his duties from pains in the head, was to be persuaded to retire, but his maintenance provided from his church.

John the deacon, in his Life of Gregory the Great, says that pensions were allowed to bishops for two reasons. First (Vit. Greg. iii. 16) when they were driven from their sees and allotted to other bishops for maintenance; second (id. iv. 39) when bishops retiring were allowed to receive from their successors a sum sufficient for their maintenance.

An instance of the usufruct of church lands being assigned as a pension is recorded by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 36) in the case of Euphrasius, bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, who allotted to Quintianus, bishop of Rodés in Aquitania, who had been driven from his see by the Goths, gifts of houses, fields, and vineyards; and the bishop of Lyons also allotted to him certain possessions of his diocese which were situated in the province of Auvergne. A more curious kind of pension comes to light by the same historian, who records (id. viii. 20) that when Faustinus, bishop of Aix, had been deposed by the council of Mâcon, it was also ordered that the bishops by whom he had been ordained should each allow him an annual pension of 100 aurei.

An instance of another kind of pension is found in a letter of Hincmar of Rheims to pope Nicholas I. (Ep. 17, Opp. ii. p. 249), in which he says that Rothadus, bishop of Soissons, having been obliged to relinquish his see, he had procured for him the gift of a good abbey; and that all his fellow bishops had given him assistance in his calamity, partly from motives of pity, and partly that he might not give any further trouble to the see, "ut molestus et seditiosus ecclesiae cui prae fuerat esse non deceretur."

Another class of pensions appears to have existed in connexion with the cathedral clergy. The third council of Orleans, A.D. 538 (c. 18), leaves it entirely to the discretion of the bishop to permit or to refuse a share in the revenues of the cathedral to clergy who had left it for the purpose of entering monasteries or serving other churches. On the other hand, the council of Merida, A.D. 666 (c. 12), provides that the bishop shall have the right of selecting his cathedral clergy from the parish priests and deacons, and that such clergy shall retain the revenues of their parishes on condition of making an adequate allowance to the presbyter who has taken charge of the parish, and to the other clergy connected with the church. The stipend in such cases accruing from the cathedral revenues being described as a gift from the bishop conditional on the good behaviour of the recipient. Thomassin (Vet. et Nov. Eccl. Discip. iii. 2, c. 29, § 22, 23) thinks that the stipend derived in these cases from the cathedral was called an allowance (pensio) in order that such clergy might not be charged with holding a plurality of benefices.

In these cases the allowance of pensions was right and equitable. Abuses, however, appear to have soon crept in, especially from the right assumed by the Frankish sovereigns of granting pensions at their will settled on property belonging to the church. On the representation of Leo III. this evil was checked by a capitulary of Charles the Great (Addit. iii. c. i.) positively forbidding any division or partition of the property of the church, either in his own lifetime or by his successors.

Another class of pensions, attended ultimately with great evils, arose from the practice of appointing bishops, under various circumstances, to at least titular possession of more sees than one. [P. O.]

PENTECOST. The word πεντηκοστή (in Latin writers sometimes Quinquagesima) was used in a twofold sense by the primitive church, both for the whole period of fifty days between Easter and Whitsun Day, and also more strictly for the single festival of Whitsun Day.

In the early church the whole of the fifty days between Easter and Whitsun Day was regarded as one continuous festival. Thus Tertullian says that all the festival days of the heathen put together will not make up the Pentecost of the Christians, "Excerpe singulas festivitates nationum et in ordinem exserere; Pentecosten implere non poterunt" (de Idololatr. c. 12), and speaks of Pentecost as a very large space of time, "latissimum spatium," appointed by the church for the administration of baptism (de Bapt. c. 19). In the same sense the canons of the council of Antioch in Encaeniis, A.D. 341, speak of the quarta septimana pentecostes, medio pentecostes (can. 20, Labbe, ii. 579). The Ordo Romanus lays down that "Tempus Pentecostes inchoatur a primo die resurrectionis et currit usque ad diem quinquagesimum post Pascha," and the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. v. c. 20, ad fin.) extend the term to the whole period as one of festal joy (see Beveridge, Pandect, tom. ii. Annotat. 27; Cotelierus, Patr. Apostol. tom. i. p. 466). Basil the Great speaks of the seven weeks, τῆς ἑπτάς πεντεκοστῆς (de Spirit. Sanct. c. 27). From the continuous festal character of the period, fasting and kneeling in prayer were prohibited, as on Sundays. Tertullian says, "We count it unlawful to fast or to worship kneeling on the Lord's Day, and we rejoice in the same immunity from Easter Day to Pentecost (Tertull. de Coron. Milit. c. 3). The same rule was laid down by the council of Nicaea, A.D. 325 (can. 20, Labbe, ii. 37). Ambrose also describes the fifty days as each like a Sunday, when "jejunium nescit ecclesia," and which the tradition of the ancients appoints to be regarded "ut Paschae" (Ambros. in Luc. lib. vii. tom. ii. p. 1016). In Sermon 61 (falsely attributed to him) the same prohibition of fasting in Pentecost is found; and in the Praefat. ad Ps. 50 it is spoken of as the Christian jubilee, when the debt of sin is remitted, the handwriting against us blotted out, and all Christians rejoice with alleluias. We have also the authority of Epiphanius (Expos. Fid. c. 22) for the cessation of fasting and kneeling during this period. Augustine speaks of "dies illi quinquaginta post Pascha usque ad Pentecosten quibus non jejunatur" (Epist. 86), though he elsewhere speaks with some doubt as to whether the rule was universally observed (Epist. 119, ad Januar. c. 17). During this period the alleluia, which had been silent during Lent, was heard abundantly in the services of the church (August. ibid.). Isidore has a long passage (De Offic. Eccl. lib. i. c. 32) on the mode of observing the period, and the absence of all marks of mourning. Cassian is also very full on this subject (De Institut. lib. ii. c. 6, 18; Collat. xxi. c. 8, c. 11, c. 20). Honorius Augustodunus, in his Gemma Animae (lib. iii. c. 136), writes: "Tempus inter Pascha et Pentecosten Quinquagesima nominatur quia a Sabbato quo duo alleluia inchoantur usque ad Sanctam Pentecosten quinquaginta dies computantur quibus alleluia in cantu frequentatur" (cf. Vales. ad Euseb. Vit. Constant. lib. iv. c. 64; Balsamon in can. Nic. xx., apud Beveridge. Pandect. tom. i. p. 84; Mendoza, in Concil. Illiber. c. xvii. in can. 43, apud Labbe, Concil. i. 1261).

Early in the 5th century an ordinance of the youthful devotee Theodosius II., A.D. 425, doubtless emanating from his sister Pulcheria, prohibited all stage-plays, Circensian games, and public spectacles during the period of "quinquagesima" on account of its great sanctity (Cod. Theod. lib. xv. tit. v. de Spectaculis, leg. 5 tom. v. p. 253). By a custom of the church which was ancient in the time of St. Chrysostom (Homil. lxxiii. [lxxvi.] cur in Pentecoste Acta legantur), and which is still retained in the Greek church, the Acts of the Apostles were read between Easter and Whitsun Day (August. Tract. in Joann. VI. § 18; Serm. 315; de Praedest. Sanct. c. ii. § 4; Chrysost. Homil. xxxiii. in Gen. 12. In the church of Spain and Gaul the Apocalypse was commanded also to be read at this season under pain of excommunication (Concil. Tolet. iv. can. 16, Labbe, v. 1711). In a more restricted sense Pentecost stood for the festival of Whitsun Day alone. In this sense it closed the cycle of the Festivals of our Lord, semestre Domini, among which it held the third place, after Easter and Christmas. The earliest occurrence of the word in this sense is in the forty-third canon of the council of Elvira, A.D. 305 (Labbe, i. 975), which, referring to the erroneous custom prevailing in some churches of Spain of celebrating the fortieth day after Easter instead of the fiftieth, i.e. Ascension Day, not Pentecost, ordained that "juxta auctoritatem Scripturarum cuncti diem Pentecostes celebremus," warning those who did not do this that they would be regarded as bringing in a new heresy (Hefele, Councils, vol. i. p. 155, Clark's transl.). This canon appears to have been ineffectual in checking the irregularity, and Pentecost continued to be observed prematurely in the Spanish church. The first of the canons of the tenth council of Toledo, A.D. 656, insists on observing the right number of fifty days, without which they could not look for the full gift of the Spirit (Labbe, vi. 460). Pentecost, as the anniversary of the descent of the Holy Spirit, the birthday of the church of Christ, was observed as one of the chief Christian festivals from a very early time. It is mentioned by Origen (Contr. Cels. lib. viii. p. 392), and, if we give any weight to the doubtful authority of the supposititious work ascribed to Justin (Quaest. ad Orthodox. No. 115), still earlier, by Irenaeus. It is clearly defined in the Apostolical Constitutions: "After ten days from the Ascension, which, from the first Lord's Day is the fiftieth day, do ye keep a great festival on that day the Lord Jesus sent on us the gift of the Holy Ghost" (lib. v. c. 20). There is a sermon of Gregory Nazianzen's (de Pentecoste Orat. xlv. tom. i. p. 712, in which he calls it the "day of the Spirit"—τῆμοςον τὴν ἡμέραν τοῦ πνεύματος). Chrysostom designates it μητρόπολις τῶν ἑορτῶν (Homil. de Pent. ii. p. 469). Augustine also mentions it as one of the chief Christian anniversaries (Contr. Faust. lib. xxxii. c. 12), and in his letter to Januarius (Ep. 54) speaks of it as one of the unwritten ordinances observed by the whole world, appointed either by the apostles (which was the unfounded opinion of Epiphanius, Haer. lxxv. § 6) or by oecumenical councils. Among the sermons of Leo the Great are three (Serm. 75-77) de Pentecostes, and four (Serm. 78-81) de Jejuniis Pentecostes. It was regarded as a day of chief observance, of equal dignity with Easter and Christmas, on which it was the duty of all Christians to communicate, and that not in the smaller country churches, but in the mother churches of the cities (Concil. Agathens. A.D. 506, can. 18, 31; Labbe, iv. 1386; Concil. Aurel. i. A.D. 511, can. 25; Labbe, iv. 1408). Eusebius designates it (de Vit. Constant. lib. iv. c. 64) μεγίστη ἑορτή, πάνσεπτος καὶ παναγία πεντηκοστή. The celebration originally lasted the whole of the following week, to the Octave, to which effect a decree was passed by the synod of Mentz, A.D. 813. The vigil of Pentecost was one of the chief seasons for the administration of the sacrament of baptism, second only to Easter Eve. These two were indeed the only times when baptism was permitted in the Western church, except in the case of the sick (grabatarii). To those in the Eastern church the Epiphany was added (Greg. Naz. Orat. xl. de Bapt.). In the time of Tertullian it is evident that baptism was permitted during the whole of the fifty days which were known as Pentecost in its wider sense (Tertull. de Bapt. c. 19); but subsequently it appears to have been restricted to the actual vigil of the festival (Bingham, Orig. XI. vi. 7). Jerome also speaks of Pentecost being, like Easter, one of the solemn times for baptism (Hieron. Comment. in Zach. xiv. 8; Epist. lxi. ad Pammach. § 16; BAPTISM, 69, Vol. I. p. 165).

Fasting being prohibited by the earliest church ordinances during the whole of the Pentecostal period, including the following week, called Hebdomas Spiritus Sancti, the usual stationary fasts on Wednesdays and Fridays were originally not resumed till the week succeeding the Octave. Afterwards, when the Ember weeks became fixed, the week succeeding Whitsun Day was observed as a time of fasting and prayer (EMBER DAYS). Leo the Great, in his Pentecostal sermons, lays great stress on the observance of the Pentecostal Fast on the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday (Serm. 75-81). The Rogation days date from the time of Mamercus bishop of Vienne, c. A.D. 450, and established by the first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, were unacceptable to the Spanish church as violating the old rules against fasting in Quinquagesima, and they therefore deferred their litanies and processions till after Whitsun Day (Wal. Strabo, de Offic. Eccl. c. 28; Concil. Gerund. can. ii.). [ROGATION DAYS.] [E. V.]

PENTECOSTARION. The Πεντηκοστήριον, says Neale (East. Ch. Intr. p. 877), "is to the weeks between Easter and All Saints' Sunday what the TRIODION is to those between the Sunday of the Publican and Pharisee and Easter;" i.e. it is the ordinary office-book of the Greek church for that period of the year. PENULA. [PAENULA.]

PEOPLE. [LAITY.]

PEPUZA or PUZA (in Phrygia), NOVATIAN SYNOD OF, A.D. 375. According to Socrates (iv. 28), at which it was agreed to keep Easter on the same day as the Jews. But this, he adds, was not the act of the collective body (Mansi, iii. 451). [E. S. FF.]

PERA. This word seems to be used by Cassian in an unusual sense for the sheepskin which formed part of the monk's dress: "pellis caprina, quae melotes vel pera appellatur" (de Coenob. Inst. i. 8; Patrol. xlix. 74; cf. Collat. xi. 3, ib. 150). Hence the word has found a place with Isidore: "Melotes, quae etiam pera vocatur." &c. (Etym. xix. 24; Patrol. lxxxii. 691). It can hardly be supposed that Cassian uses the word in its ordinary Latin sense, for it is not at all likely that the monks under such a rule would be allowed to carry a wallet.* Gazet (not. in loc.) suggests that pera is a transcriber's error for paenula; others would read diphthera, and Ducange would transfer appellatur to follow melotes. This, however, seems decidedly feeble. It is perhaps just possible that the word may be Egyptian. [R. S.]

PEREGRINATIO. [PILGRIMAGE.]

PEREGRINUS (1), martyr with Hiereneus or Irenaeus, and Hirenis; commemorated at Thessalonica May 5 (Usuard. Mart.; Vit. Rom. Mart.); with Hereneus and Herena (Hieron. Mart.).

* We find πίρα conjoined with μηλότης in Hist. Lausiaca, c. 83 (Patrol. Gr. xxxiv. 1185), but here there is more chance of the word being used in the ordinary meaning.

(2) Bishop, martyr; commemorated at Autun May 16 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 561).

(3) Martyr with Isaurus and others; commemorated July 6 (Basil, Menol.).

(4) Martyr with Lucianus and others; commemorated July 7 (Basil, Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 457).

(5) Presbyter at Lyon; commemorated July 28 (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vi. 543).

(6) Martyr at Rome with Eusebius and others under Commodus; commemorated Aug. 25 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.). [C. H.]

PERFECTUS, presbyter, martyr at Cordova; commemorated April 18 (Usuard. Mart.). [C. H.]

PERGAMOS, SUPPOSED SYNOD OF, A.D. 152, when seven bishops under Theodotus condemned the heretic Colarbasius or, as Tertullian calls him (De Praesc. c. 50), Colarbasus. But the only record of it is preserved in a work on heresies of doubtful authorship, and even more doubtful credit (Mansi, i. 669). [E. S. Ff.]

PERGENTINUS, martyr with Laurentinus at Arretium; commemorated June 3 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 271). [C. H.]

PERIAPTA. [PHYLACTERY.]

PERICOPAE (περικοπαί) are the sections into which the Scriptures have been divided for the purpose of reading in public. See LECTION, LECTIONARY. [C.]

PERIODEUTAE (περιοδευταί). Assistants to bishops, with the duty of itinerating in country districts. The council of Laodicea, A.D. 320 (c. 57), enacts that no bishop shall be appointed in villages or country districts, but only "periodeutae;" but that those bishops already appointed shall perform no act without the authority of the bishop of the city (τοῦ ἐπισκόπου τοῦ ἐν τῇ πόλει). It does not appear that the discharge of these functions implied admission to the episcopal office, since at the council of Chalcedon (act. 4) Valentinus and Alexander sign themselves "presbyter and periodeutes." There is no further information about the duties of these officials, or as to the portion of episcopal function they were permitted to discharge. [Compare CHOREPISCOPUS.] [P. O.]

PERISTERIUM. [DOVE, THE EUCARISTIC, p. 576.]

PERITRACHELION. [STOLE.]

PERJURY. The Christian code, following the old Roman law set a special brand of infamy on perjury (Cod. Theod. II. ix. 8). It was visited with no less severity by the discipline of the church. Chrysostom (Hom. xvii. in Matt. p. 182; Hom. xxii. de Irâ, t. i. p. 294) placed it in the same category with murder and adultery. By Basil (ad Amphiloc. c. 64) a perjured person was allotted eleven year's penance. The first council of Mascon, A.D. 581, c. 17, enacted that he who instigated another to perjury should be debarred from communion for the remainder of his life, and that his accomplice should be incapable for the future of giving testimony. The crime occupied a chapter in each of the early English penitentials. In the penitential of Theodore (I. vi.) it is declared (c. 1) that he who commits perjury in a church shall do penance eleven years; but (c. 2) if under compulsion (the compulsion of his lord, Bed. Poenit. v. 1), then only for three quadragesimae. He who breaks a vow taken at the hands of a layman (Theod. Poenit. I. vi. 3; Egbert. vi. 7) is left unpunished by the Greek canons. But if the vow had been taken at the hands of a bishop, priest, or deacon, or on the altar or a consecrated cross, the penance for breaking it was three years, with a remission of two years if the cross was not consecrated (Theod. I. vi. 4; Bed. v. 2; Egbert. vi. 2). The penance for simple perjury was three years. By the penitential of Bede, v. 4, the false witness was to be punished according to the circumstances of the case; and one (ibid. c. 5) who had unwittingly been guilty of perjury and afterwards confessed his offence was to do penance a year. In the Frankish penitential of Cummean, founded on that of Theodore (Wasserschleben, Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche, p. 460, seq.), the punishment is graduated to the offender's rank. A perjured layman (Pen. Cum. v. 1) was to do penance three years; a cleric, five; a subdeacon, six; a deacon, seven; a priest, ten; and a bishop, twelve. By another clause (c. 9), a false witness is punished less severely, but on a corresponding scale. In c. 4, a layman committing perjury through covetousness was to sell all his goods and distribute them to the poor and retire to a monastery; but if covetousness did not lead to the crime, then for three years he was to live in exile, not bear arms, and fast on bread and water, for two more abstain from wine and flesh and give freedom to a slave, for two more years distribute alms, and at the end of seven he might be restored to communion.

The breaking of oaths which ought never to have been made was not a matter likely to come under canonical supervision. There are, nevertheless, a few decisions of councils. The Spanish council of Lerida, A.D. 523, c. 7, declared that any litigant binding himself by an oath to remain at enmity with his adversary should on account of his perjury abstain from communion for a year, and hasten to be reconciled. The lawfulness of breaking such oaths is discussed at length by the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653, c. 2. The council supposes one or two extreme cases, such as a man having sworn to slay his father, or compass the pollution of a sacred virgin, and resolves that it is far better he should break his oath than keep it. The opinions of Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory, and Isidore, are cited in support; from the last of whom several decisions are quoted (Isidor. ii. 31; sent. 10, 22) to shew that sometimes it is better to break an oath than observe it. PERSIA, NESTORIAN SYNODS IN. (1) A.D. 499, under Babeus, patriarch of the Nestorians, at which leave was given to all the clergy to become "husbands of one wife" (Mansi, viii. 239).

(2) A.D. 544, under Abas I., Catholics of the Nestorians, which passed eleven canons and asserted in the last of them that they had all been based on the faith of the 318 fathers, i.e. the Nicene (Mansi, ix. 125).

(3) A.D. 588, under Iesujabius, patriarch of the Nestorians, which passed thirty canons, and declared in the first for receiving the Nicene faith, the canons of the Apostles, and of the other fathers, besides repudiating the heresies of Arius and Macedonius on the Trinity, and of Eutyches and Manes on the Incarnation (Ib. 975).

PERSONIFICATION (IN ART). The fashion of representing the virtues and moral feelings by human figures is one of great antiquity both among writers and artists, e.g. Paulinus of Nola (Epist. 16, c. 4) tells us that "et spes et nemesis et amor atque etiam furor in simulacris coluntur"; and Christian poets in like manner have embodied the virtues and vices in their verses. Prudentius, for example, in his "Soul's Conflict" (Psychom. v. 21), gives this warlike representation of Faith:

"Prima petit campum dubia sub sorte duelli
Pugnatura Fides, agresti turbida vultu,
Nuda humeros, intonsa comas, exserta lacertos."

The middle ages are the period which is more especially rich in the representation of the virtues by human figures; and, although they are beyond the limits of this book, it is worth while to cite the case of the bronze gates of the baptistry at Florence, executed in 1330 by Andrea Pisano, because they preserve the type of representation which is met with in earlier times. Faith is here personified as a female with clasped hands, and Charity, also as a female, with a lighted torch.

An example of personification may be seen on a rich sarcophagus from the cemetery of the Vatican (Bosio, Rom. Sott. p. 75), which contained the remains of the popes Leo I. II. III. IV. On a frieze which runs along over a graceful arch surmounting a standing figure of our Lord surrounded by His disciples, are seen two half-length figures, supposed to represent Hope and Charity; the former with clasped hands and eyes raised to heaven, the latter with a lighted torch.

Among similar representations of artists are to be seen Penitence as a female figure in a MS.

of Genesis in the Imperial Library at Vienna, and in a MS. of Dioscorides written early in the 6th century (pp. 4-5), a woman holding a mandrake in her hand personifies Invention, proved by the title in Greek character ΕΥΡΕΚΙΑ over her head. On p. 6 of the same MS. Juliana Anicia, daughter of Anicius Olybrius, is represented with female figures embodying Prudence and Magnanimity (Φρόνησις and Μεγαλοψυχία) on either side of her, while Thanksgiving (Ευχαριστία) bows to the ground before her and seems to kiss her feet. Licetus (de Lucernis Antiq. lib. iii. c. 10) says that he found an ancient lamp with figures, representing, in his opinion, Faith and Hope depicted on it; and what gives probability to this view is that Hope is standing in the same attitude and using the same gesture as the figure on the sarcophagus cited above. Such allegorical figures became no doubt more common in the middle than they were in the earlier ages; but there appears sufficient grounds for thinking that they were not rare, if not very common, in the first eight centuries; and that the same attitudes, gestures, and other accompaniments were employed to represent the same ideas in the earlier as in the later centuries (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Vertus et Vices).

PERVIGILIAE. [VIGIL.]

PETER AND PAUL, SS., IN ART. Representations of the two chief apostles—St. Peter as the apostle of the Circumcision, and St. Paul as the apostle of the Gentiles—had a very early place in Christian art. Eusebius speaks of having seen many such, attributed to the grateful feeling of those who had been converted by these apostles to the faith (H. E. vii. 18). Constantine's vision of the two apostles recorded in the acts of St. Sylvester (ap. Fuhrmann de Bapt. Const. tom. ii. p. 68), however apocryphal, is a proof that at that time these personages had acquired a recognised type. The earliest known examples of this traditional type, as shewn in the gilded glasses of the catacombs, the bronze medals, the mosaics and sarcophagi, as well as in the early statues and statuettes of St. Peter, correspond in their main features to the portraiture given by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. ii. 37). St. Peter is usually represented as tall and upright, his hair and beard short and crisp, his face round and somewhat undignified, with a long flat nose and arched eyebrows. St. Paul is shorter in stature and a little bowed, his forehead bald, his beard long and pointed, his face oval, with low eyebrows, and the nose straight and long, and his physiognomy characterized by greater delicacy and refinement. The portraits given in the Greek Menaea (Buonarroti, Vasi antichi, p. 76) correspond with this type in almost all points, except that they represent St. Peter, as well as St. Paul, as suffering from baldness. Some rare examples, on the other hand, assign to St. Paul a brow well covered with hair.

The earliest representations of the two apostles are those found in the gilded glasses of the catacombs. They are sometimes depicted alone—St. Peter (Garrucci, Vetri ornati, tav. x. n. 5, tav. xiv. n. 3), where by a singular caprice of the artist the apostle appears as a beardless, smooth-faced young man, and St. Paul (ibid. tav. vii. n. 5) where the usual type is maintained. In by far the larger number of examples the two apostles are depicted together, either in bust (ibid. tav. x. xii. xiii. xiv; Buonarr. tav. x. xi.) [GLASS, p. 731] or standing (Garrucci, tav. ix. xi.) or seated (ibid. tav. xiv. xv. &c.). In an example of this last attitude (ibid. tav. xv. n. 1-5), the two apostles appear to be engaged in a lively discussion, such as that recorded at Antioch (Gal. ii. 11). Each holds a codex, and St. Peter presents his roll to his brother apostle with a degree of eagerness in keeping with the ardency of his character. The two apostles are in innumerable instances portrayed standing on either side of our Lord, either in person or symbolized by his monogram (ibid. tav. xvi. n. 5), according to the custom spoken of St. Augustin as prevailing in his day in Africa (de Consens. Evangel. 1-10). [PHOENIX.] In many cases Christ is bestowing on His apostles the crown of life (ibid. tav. xii. nn. 1-7). The central place is not unfrequently occupied by a female orante. We have instances of the Virgin (?) (ibid. tav. ix. 6, 7), St. Agnes (ibid. tav. xxi. 1-3), St. Peregrina (ibid. n. 6). St. Lawrence also fills the same place (ibid. tav. xx. n. 7; Buonarr. tav. xvi. 2). Other saints are sometimes associated with them, e.g. St. Pastor and St. Damas (ibid. tav. xxiii. n. 2), and St. Philip, St. Simon, and St. Thomas (ibid. tav. xxv. n. 6). In the room of the central figure in some instances we see a chaplet of victory (ibid. tav. x. n. 2, 4; Perret, tom. iv. pl. xxi. 3), or a flower (ibid. tav. x. nn. 6, 8), or several codices (ibid. tav. xiii. nn. 2-6). St. Peter is once represented seated, preaching to a standing female (ibid. tav. xvi. n. 2). Instead of the more usual PAVLVS, we sometimes find St. Paul designated by his earlier name SAVLVVS (ibid. tav. xi. n. 3; tav. xvii. n. 7).

Next to the gilded glasses the class of objects on which the two apostles most frequently occur are the sarcophagi and sepulchral slabs of the catacombs. The engravings of Bosio, Aringhi, Bottari, Garrucci, Perret, Maffei (Mus. Veron. p. 484), Allegranza (Mon. Christ. di Milano, tav. iv. vi.), Bugati (Mem. di S. Celse, tav. 1), Millin (atlas, pl. xxxviii. lix. lxiv. lxix.), Le Blanc (Sarcophages d'Arles), may be referred to for a large and instructive series of examples. The type is almost invariable. Our Lord stands on a hill, from which issue the four rivers of Paradise; on one side St. Peter, with covered hand, receives from Him a half-opened codex; on the other St. Paul bows in reverence (Bottari, tav. xxv.; Marangoni, Act. S. Vict. p. 42). A somewhat different arrangement appears in a sarcophagus at St. Apollinare in Classe, Ravenna. Our Lord is seated, and gives a roll with His right hand to St. Paul, while St. Peter holds the key and cross on the left. Both apostles are approaching Christ with hasty strides, their garments flying behind them in the wind. A sepulchral slab from the cemetery of St. Callistus, commemorating a Christian named Asellus (Boldetti, p. 193; Perret, vol. v. pl. xi.), bears the busts of the two apostles, rudely incised, with the sacred monogram between them. The hair and beard correspond to the usual type.

Another class of examples is found in the mosaics of the basilicas, for which we may refer to Ciampini's Vetera monumenta and our own article on MOSAICS. The frescoes of the catacombs furnish few, if any, instances (Boldetti, p. 64; Bottari, tav. clxvi.). Examples of mosaics will be found in St. Sabina (Ciamp. tom. i. tab. xlviii.), St. Agatha (tab. lxvii.), St. Maria in Cosmedin (tom. ii. tab. xxiii.), St. Lorenzo (tab. xxxviii.), St. Praxedes (tab. xlvii.), St. Cecilia (tab. lii.), the baptistry at Ravenna (ibid. p. 234), and at Capua (ibid. tab. liv.); the former basilica of the Vatican (de Sac. Aedific. tab. xiii.), and the later mosaics of the side apses at St. Costanza (ibid. tab. xxvii.). A bronze medallion found in the cemetery of St. Callistus, engraved by Boldetti (p. 192), and more faithfully by De' Rossi (Bullettino, 1864, Nov. Dec.), preserved in the Vatican Library, presents the heads of the two apostles embossed in a style of unusual excellence [see woodcut, and MONEY, p. 1307].

Medallion of SS. Peter and Paul. (Martigny.)

It is difficult to point to an example in which the normal type is depicted with so much dignity and beauty. This fine work of art is placed by De' Rossi in the first half of the 3rd century.

There was no invariable rule as to the position of the two apostles when represented together. In the earlier glasses and other works of art St. Peter generally occupies the right-hand place, and St. Paul the left. In later examples the order was frequently reversed, and this disposition became the rule, especially in the papal bulls (Mamachi, Orig. et Antiq. Christian. tom. v. p. 503). It is evident that no dogmatic importance can be assigned to this change of position.

On the identification of St. Peter with Moses, in the scenes of the Striking of the Rock and the Apprehension, the article OLD TESTAMENT IN ART may be consulted, and that on SCULPTURE for a description of the existing statues of St. Peter. An onyx given by Perret (tom. iv. pl. xvi. 85) represents the apostle walking on the water and our Lord seizing his hand to rescue him. The warning of his Denial is a frequent subject on sarcophagi. There is a very remarkable example on one of the ends of the magnificent sarcophagus of the 4th century discovered in the Vatican (Bosio, 85, 87; Aringhi, i. 317, 319), now preserved in the Lateran Museum. In this and in some other examples the cock stands on the summit of a fluted pedestal. The washing of St. Peter's feet by Christ is found on a sarcophagus at Arles almost precisely similar to one given by Bottari (tav. xxiv.)

(Millin, Atlas, lxiv. no. 4). Le Blant, Sarcophages, pl. ix. The raising of TAMIHA [see that heading] is sculptured on a few sarcophagi. There are examples at Fermo (de Minici's Monum. di Fermo, p. 83); St. Maximin (Rostan, Monum. iconogr. de l'Eglise de St. Max. fig. xii.), and Arles (Le Blant, u. s. pl. ii. fig. 2, p. 4).

The delivery of the keys to St. Peter appears on a sarcophagus from the Vatican (Bottari, tav. xxi. v.), where the subject is well executed. Another example is found on sarcophagi in the crypt of St. Maximin (Monum. de S. M. Mad. tom. i. p. 771), in the museum of Arles (Le Blant, u. s. pl. ii. fig. 1), and De' Rossi speaks of having found it on one in the cemetery of St. Priscilla. It also appears on a vase of uncertain age, to which Bianchini assigns a very early date (Not. in Anastas. Vit. S. Urban. n. 18), given by Bottari (tom. i. p. 185), and on the mosaic of St. Agatha in the Suburra, A.D. 472 (Ciampini, Vet. Mon. tab. xxvii.). The apostle usually receives the keys or key (in some instances there is but one) in a fold of his garment with marks of the greatest reverence. [KEYS, p. 900.] The apostle carries the keys as a symbol of authority on a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, Mus. Veron. p. 484), in the mosaic of the triumphal arch of the basilica of St. Paul (A.D. 441) (Ciampini, tom. i. tab. lxxviii.), and that of St. Maria in Cosmedin at Ravenna (A.D. 553), where he is in the attitude of offering them at the throne of the Lamb (ibid. tom. ii. tab. xxiii.). The sword does not appear as a symbol of St. Paul till a comparatively late period. The earliest example known to Martigny is in a mosaic belonging to the tomb of Otho II. (d. A.D. 983), preserved in the crypt of St. Peter. [E. V.]

PETER, ST., APOSTLE, FESTIVALS OF. Several festivals connected with this apostle have long been observed in the church, the commemoration of the martyrdom, in which he is associated with St. Paul, of his episcopate, commemorated on two separate days, and of his imprisonment.

(i.) THE FESTIVAL OF ST. PETER AND ST. PAUL.

1. Early History of Festival.—A joint festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, primarily and especially connected with the Roman church, can be traced back to the 4th century after Christ. The discussion as to the whole question whether St. Peter ever visited Rome, and if so for how long, and the evidence for Rome having been the scene of his martyrdom, will be found at length under the article POPE. It may suffice here to remark that Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. ii. 25) cites Dionysius of Corinth, who, in a letter to the Roman church, speaks of Peter and Paul having taught in Italy and having borne witness to the truth κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν. Eusebius (in loc.) also cites the Roman presbyter Caius, as testifying to Rome as the scene of these apostles' triumphs—ἐὰν γὰρ θελήσῃς ἀπελθεῖν ἐπὶ τὸν Βατικανόν, ἢ ἐπὶ τὴν ὁδὸν τὴν Ὑστίαν, εὐρήσεις τὰ τρόπαια τῶν ταύτην ἰδρυσμένων τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν. The same testimony is also borne by Tertullian (contra Marc. iv. 5; de Praescript. 36).

We have said that a festival in commemoration of this martyrdom can be traced back to the 4th century, the Natalis Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, observed on June 29. A hymn of Prudentius, on the passion of these two apostles (Peristeph. 12), is evidence of the early celebration of the festival in Rome. We cite the first four lines in evidence:

"Plus solito coeunt ad gaudia; dic, amice, quid sit;
Romam per omnem cursitant ovantque.
Festus apostolici nobis redit hic dies triumph
Pauli atque Petri nobilis cruore."

Later on we find among the works of St. Leo three homilies (Hom. 82-84; vol. i. p. 321, sqq. ed. Ballerini), the first of which dwells on the double commemoration, the second refers to St. Peter alone (relegated to the appendix by Quesnell, as partly spurious, partly a mere cento from the works of St. Leo), and the third is for the octave of the two apostles, the heading, however, being perhaps not genuine. At the beginning of the first of these, St. Leo claims that "in the place where the departure of the chief of the apostles was made glorious, there on the day of their martyrdom should the rejoicing take its rise." The Leonine Sacramentary contains masses for the day, to which we shall again recur (vol. ii. 35 sqq.). We also have sermons for the festival by St. Augustine (Sermm. 295-299; Patrol. xxxviii. 1348), by Maximus of Turin (Sermm. 66-69; Patrol. lvii. 663), &c.

It seems also pretty certain that the ancient Kalendarium Carthaginense includes this festival, though the MS. is somewhat defective at this point. After St. John the Baptist's day (June 24) come two entries partly lost, then "... Jul. Sanctorum ... Apostolorum." After another illegible line comes the ides of July. As no other festival of apostle is known to have occurred at this time, it seems safe to refer this line to St. Peter and St. Paul (Patrol. xiii. 1222). The calendar of Bucherius, which Muratori (de Rebus Liturgicis, c. 4; Patrol. lxxiv. 877) refers to A.D. 355, has the entry: "iii. calend. Julii Petri in Catacumbas et Pauli Ostiense, Tusco et Basso Coss."^a It is hardly necessary to add that all Western martyrologies and calendars agree in their recognition of this festival, as the different forms of the Mart. Hieronymi, Bede, Florus, Usuard, &c.

On the other hand, the Apostolic Constitutions, a work of distinctly Eastern origin, makes no definite mention of the day, perhaps due to the festival having had a Western origin and gradually finding acceptance in the East. The order is merely given (viii. 33) that slaves are to rest on the great festivals of the Saviour, and also on "the days of the apostles," to which is added a special mention of that of the protomartyr Stephen. As regards the Eastern church, we find a direct statement, valeat quantum, made by Theodorus Lector (Hist. Eccles. ii.

^a Since the consulship of Tuscus and Bassus fell in A.D. 258 (Clinton, Fasti Romani, in loc.), the assigned date is either altogether erroneous, as Baronius thinks, or is to be referred to some other event than the martyrdom. Pearson (Annal. Cypr. in ann. 258) suggests that it may be the date of the translation of the apostles' remains in the time of the Valerian persecution; and it has even been suggested that the translation fell on the same day as the martyrdom, but this is, of course, mere conjecture.

16; Patrol. Gr. lxxvi. 189), to the effect that a Roman senator named Festus, being sent to Constantinople on political matters, exhorted that "the commemoration of the chief of the apostles,^b should be held with great honour and reverence." Theodorus adds that the festival had been kept at Constantinople before, but now received a great additional splendour (πολλῶ πλέον ηὐξήθη τῆς τοιαύτης τῷ φαιδρὸν πανηγύρεως). This is put in the reign of Anastasius I., who died A.D. 518.

What credit we are to assign to the remark of Theodorus, that a festival of St. Peter and St. Paul had been kept at Constantinople before the time of Anastasius I., or indeed to his whole story, it is impossible to say. The absence of any homily for a festival, afterwards so important, in the genuine works of St. Chrysostom, is conclusive against any general celebration of the festival in the East in his day. We may take this opportunity of adding that in the older editions of St. Chrysostom (e.g. Saville, vol. v. p. 991) was contained a homily, εἰς τοὺς κορυφαίους τῶν ἀποστόλων Πέτρον καὶ Παῦλον καὶ τὸ αὐτῶν μαρτύριον ἐνδοξότατον. The spuriousness of this is, however, palpable; and Montfaucon contemptuously rejects it (vol. viii. p. 7, in spuriis).

Binterim (Denkw. v. i. 384) cites as evidence for the early celebration of this festival in the East a discourse of Gregory of Nazianzum and one of Gregory of Nyssa. As regards the latter, first published by Gretser (Ingoldstadt, 1620), it is sufficient to say that it appears to be certainly the work of Maximus Planudes (see Patrol. Gr. xliv. 35). The former, delivered in A.D. 381 before the hundred and fifty bishops in Constantinople, does not appear in the passage cited to have anything to do with the subject before us, but to be a bidding farewell to a certain church in Constantinople—Χαίρετε, ἀπόστολοι, ἡ καλὴ μετοικία, οἱ ἐμοὶ διδασκαλοὶ τῆς ἐμῆς ἀλλήσεως, εἰ καὶ μὴ πόλλακις ὑμῖν ἐπανηύρισσα (Orat. 42, c. 26; Patrol. xxxvi. 489, where see note).

In the Eastern church at the present day the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul is, save the two chief festivals of St. John the Baptist, the only one not immediately connected either with our Lord or the Blessed Virgin, included in those of the first rank. The entry for the day in the Menæa is τῶν ἁγίων ἐνδόξων πανευφήμων ἀποστόλων καὶ πρωτοκορυφαίων Πέτρον καὶ Παῦλον, and in the Greek metrical Ephemerides prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May (vol. i. p. xxxii.) is τῇ ἐνᾷτη σταυρὸν Πέτρος εἰκάδι, ἄορ ὁ Παῦλος. The festival of June 29 occurs also in the Ethiopic and Coptic calendars (Ludolf, ad Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 420). Besides this, Ludolf also mentions, but in the Ethiopic calendar only, festivals of Cephas and Saul on September 22, and of Peter and Paul on June 19^c and July 8; but it is possible that these do not all refer to the two apostles.

In the calendar of the Armenian church given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1, 645 sqq.), we find commemorations of St. Peter and St. Paul on June 29 and December 27, the former perhaps a Western importation in addition to an already existing celebration. There is also a commemoration of Peter and Paul, who are, however, perhaps not the apostles, on June 1.

In connexion with the twofold nature of the celebration in the Roman church, a difficulty has been needlessly raised on account of a notice in the Micrologus (c. 42; Patrol. cli. 1009), where, in a discussion on the rule to be observed on the concurrence of two festivals in one day, it is said that one may be postponed to the following day, "as the holy pope Gregory decided to observe the feast of St. Paul after the feast of St. Peter." Now in the Gregorian sacramentary, after the heading, iii. kalendas Julii. Natalis Petri et Pauli, comes the heading, pridie kalendas Julii. Natalis Sancti Pauli. A sufficient explanation is given by Ménard, that originally the pope celebrated mass twice on the earlier day, once in the church of St. Peter and then in that of St. Paul, the latter service being afterwards transferred to the following day. The hymn of Prudentius we have already cited speaks of the two masses as said in different churches on the same day (Peristeph. xii. 57, sqq.).

Confirmation is also to be had from the Gelasian sacramentary, where three masses are given, besides that for the vigil, one for St. Peter proprie, one for St. Paul proprie, and one for both apostles; all three, however, being for June 29. The presumption naturally is that a mass was specially provided for the service in the church of each of the apostles, and a third for use elsewhere on that day. On the above grounds, and considering too that in the service for June 29 in the Gregorian sacramentary the names of the two apostles are equally dwelt on, it is but reasonable to conclude that the special commemoration of St. Paul, whether held on June 29, as in the Gelasian, or on June 30, as in the Gregorian sacramentary, was due to the desire to give that apostle an equal share of honour, the other commemoration having been held in the basilica of St. Peter.

2. Liturgical Notices.—At the risk of a certain amount of repetition, it will be desirable now briefly to review the information derived from our chief extant liturgical monuments. Beginning with those of the Roman church, we find in the Leonine sacramentary a series of masses, in which the one apostle enters as prominently as the other. One of the last of these has the heading, Item ad Sanctum Paulum, in which, however, St. Peter is mentioned co-ordinately with St. Paul. To the sacramentary of Gelasius we have already referred; we may repeat here that we have a mass for the vigil of the apostles Peter and Paul. This is followed by three masses, one for each apostle proprie, and one for a conjoint celebration. A number of forms are also given for the vespers, and a mass for the octave of the festival (lib. ii. 29, sqq.; Patrol. lxxiv. 1166). In the Gregorian sacramentary is a mass for the vigil, for the festival (Natalis Petri et Pauli^d), ^b The reading of the text is here τῶν κορυφαίων ἀποστόλων Πέτρον καὶ Παῦλον. For this Valerius suggested τῶν ἀποστόλων κορυφαίων, referring the title to St. Peter only. His second suggestion, to alter ἀποστόλου into ἀποστόλων, seems more reasonable.

^c In place of the Peter and Paul of the Ethiopic calendar, the Coptic calendar gives the Patriarch Peter.

^d It may be noted that Ménard's Cod. Rodradi reads Natale Sancti Petri, and his Cod. Rhemensis, Natale Sancti Petri, proprie. The earlier of these MSS., however, is not earlier than the time of Charlemagne.

and on the following day is a mass for the Natalis Sancti Pauli. There is also a mass for the octave (col. 111, ed. Ménard). It may be noted here that in some MSS. of the Gregorian sacramentary there is a twofold vigil given, the second being in the night (ib. col. 404). In the Gregorian antiphony, the vigil bears the name of St. Peter only, and so too the festival of June 29, followed by the nativity of St. Paul on the next day. Into this point, however, we need not further enter. The octave bears both names conjointly.

In the Ambrosian liturgy, there is a mass for the vigil and for the festival of the two apostles, but no commemoration of St. Paul is indicated for the following day.

We pass next to the Gallican church. In the ancient lectionary (Lectionarium Luxoviense), edited by Mabillon, the lections in festo Sanctorum Petri et Pauli are an extract from the account of their passion (in place of the ordinary prophetic lection), Romans viii. 15–27, St. Matt. v. 1–16 (Mabillon de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. p. 159; Patrol. lxxii. 208). The MS. containing this lectionary is assigned by Mabillon to the seventh century, which alone would shew that our festival was observed in Gaul under the Merovingian kings.

We may, however, apparently go with safety much further back. There is extant a fragment of a homily of Avitus, bishop of Vienne (circa A.D. 490), bearing the heading, “dicta in basilica S. Petri, quam sanctus episcopus Tarantasiae condidit” (no. 6; Patrol. lix. 294; and the first of the following fragments evidently belongs to this homily). Again, Gregory of Tours mentions the Natale of St. Peter and St. Paul among the festivals whose vigils were to be observed in the church of Tours (Hist. Francorum, x. 31; p. 531, ed. Ruinart). After such evidence, it is rather curious that we should find in a letter of Catulfus to Charlemagne the remark, “sancti Petri in publico celebrare regno tuo constituit” (Patrol. xcvi. 1366). How far any neglect may have occurred, or what special reasons there may have been for urging such a point, it is quite impossible to say.

Mabillon’s Gothico-Gallic missal, which he refers to the 8th century, gives a Missa Sanctorum Petri et Pauli, which contains a solemn benediction of the people [BENEDICTIONS, Vol. I. p. 196].

The Mozarabic missal gives a mass for the festival of the two apostles (p. 334, ed. Leslie), and in the printed editions this is followed by the Commemoratio S. Pauli, but there is no special form for this latter, and it is obviously a later addition. The prophetic lection, epistle, and gospel are respectively Ecclus. xlv. 2–16, 1 Pet. i. 2–15, John xv. 7–17. We may add here that in the Sacramentarium Bobianum the epistle and gospel are Rom. v. 7–17 and Matt. iv. 18, John ii. 15–19. As regards the church of Milan, Thomasius’ Lectionarium Ambrosianum gives 2 Cor. xi. 19, and we may probably gather from a passage in St. Ambrose (Lib. de Virg. c. 19, § 121, sqq.; Patrol. xvi. 133) that the early part of Luke v. was also read, for he cites verse 5 as from the gospel for the day. As regards the church of Africa, the diocese of Hippo at any rate, we find the epistle was drawn from 2 Tim. iv., for Augustine, in his sermons for this festival, twice cites verse 6 as having been just read—“recole verba quae paulo ante . . . audivimus. Ego, inquit, jam immolor” (Serm. 297, § 5; 299; § 3: vol. v. 1772, 1781, ed. Gaume); and that John xxi. 15 formed part of the gospel is seen from one of the same sermons (2962; ib. 1761).

In the Greek church the epistle and gospel are respectively 2 Cor. xi. 21–xii. 9, and Matt. xvi. 13–19; the gospel at Matins is John xxi. 14–25.

(ii.) THE FESTIVALS OF THE CATHEDRA PETRI.

1. Early History of Festivals.—We pass now from this joint celebration of the two apostles to another very ancient festival which regards St. Peter only. The idea dwelt on in this latter is of his episcopate, or perhaps we may more strictly say, of his confession of Christ and our Saviour’s declaration in answer (Matt. xvi. 16, sqq.), and whether it were so directly intended or not primarily, it has ultimately been utilised in the interest of the claims of the see of Rome.

Although the main idea of the festival is clear enough, much uncertainty prevails as to its early history. From about the 8th century onwards we constantly find two days bearing the name of the Cathedra Petri, January 18 and February 22, although it is true that the former is not unfrequently absent. These are known as the Cathedra Romana and Cathedra Antiochena respectively,^o and are supposed to commemorate St. Peter’s two several episcopates. That St. Peter had been bishop of Antioch is maintained, among others, by Leo, who connects the apostle in a like special way with the two churches (“speciali magisterio in Antiochena et Romana urbe fundavit ecclesiam.” Epist. cxix. 2; vol. i. 1213, ed. Ballerini). Our earlier notices, however, are but of a single festival. It has then to be considered what is the cause of the twofold commemoration, and where did the festival originally take its rise. As regards the latter point, we may safely say the West, from the absence of any trace of such a festival in the East, and from the early date at which it can be traced as existing in the Roman church. As regards the former point, two answers may be given. It is possible that there being one Roman festival, this one commemoration branched out into two, with the notion of giving a fresh impetus to the idea underlying the commemoration, a special element being assigned to each day. On the other hand, it must be remembered that our earliest Roman notices fix the Cathedra Petri on Feb. 22, and bring in no mention of Rome or Antioch; and further that in Gaul, where the festival had apparently an exceptional importance, there are, at any rate, reasonable grounds for thinking that the festival fell in January. All this would rather point to the conclusion that the Roman and the Gallican churches observed the festival on different days, and afterwards both these commemorations were embodied in the same calendar, and the mentions of Rome and Antioch are but the attempt to account for the twofold occurrence. Lastly, although a weighty objection to the Roman origin of the festival may be urged from the fact of its absence from important Roman records, e.g. the Gelasian sacramentary, still an important point the other way is that the first notice of the festival occurs in a Roman calendar, two centuries before any other notice is found. This fact, combined with the à priori likelihood that a festival which specially brought into prominence the idea of the primacy of Peter should take its rise in the Roman church, may perhaps justify us in thus striking the balance of probabilities. If so, it must however be admitted that the Roman church did not at first bring the matter into such prominence as at a later time.

We must now enter into the evidence seriatim. Our earliest mention of the festival is that in the Bucherian calendar, where the entry is viii. kal. Mart. Natale Petri de Cathedra (Patrol. lxxiv. 877). This is a rather peculiar use of the word natale, but it is obviously equivalent to festivitas. In the calendar of Polomeus Silvius, which belongs to A.D. 448, we find on Feb. 22 the entry, Deposito S. Petri et Pauli, followed by the words, "cara cognitio, ideo dicta, quia tunc etsi fuerint vivorum parentum odia, tempore obitus deponuntur" (see Acta Sanctorum; January, vol. i. p. xlv). The reference in the latter sentence is doubtless to the heathen rite of the feralia or parentalia, celebrated in the latter part of February, to which we must again refer, and this may be illustrated by the entry for the day in the calendar of Furius Dionysius Philocalus, which carries us back a century earlier, Caristia (Kollar, Analect. Vindobon. i. 963). As to the meaning of the former clause, the Ballerini, in their notes on a sermon of St. Leo for the festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, suggest (vol. i. 498) that there was a confusion in Silvius's mind with the great festival of June 29, aided, it is hinted, by his observing a festival of the Cathedra Petri on Jan. 18. It is evident, however, that we cannot speak here otherwise than very doubtfully. What evidence the Leonine calendar might have afforded us, it is impossible to say, as the early part of the sacramentary is wanting. The festival is passed over, as has been already mentioned, in the Gelasian sacramentary. It is given in the Gregorian sacramentary as edited by Ménard (col. 29), though not in the text given by Muratori. In most MSS. of the Gregorian sacramentary, the heading is merely Cathedra Sancti Petri; the Cod. Ratoldi prefixes in Antiochia. Some editions give in Roma. This irregularity tends to confirm us in our notion, that the special ideas of Rome and Antioch are not of the original essence of the festival, but introduced as an afterthought.

In the Ambrosian liturgy there is no recognition of the festival; but in the Gallican church it must have had a rather exceptional prominence, as in Mabillon's Lectionarium Luxoviense not only are lections provided for the festival itself, but for three Sundays reckoned from it. It does not seem clear whether this Gallican feast is to be placed in January or February. The much greater prominence of the festival of the latter month in the West generally would favour the view that the latter is meant. Moreover, Mabillon's Gothico-Gallic missal gives us a mass for the day, which follows that for the conversion of St. Paul, which fell on Jan. 25. Another argument may be derived from the order of the second council of Tours (A.D. 567) forbidding offerings of food to the dead on this festival. This order we shall cite at length presently. It will be remembered that we have already referred to the heathen practice as prevailing at the end of February. On the other hand, Mabillon reminds us that forms are only given for two Sundays after the Epiphany, and also that after forms for three Sundays following the Cathedra Petri come those for the beginning of Lent. This is clearly in favour of the January date. There is also independent evidence that in Gaul the feast of the Cathedra Petri fell in January. Mabillon cites from a Mart. Gelonense, "xv. kal. Februarii, secundum Gallos cathedra sancti Petri apostoli." It will thus be seen that there are reasonable grounds for thinking that the Gallican festival fell in January, but of course the case is not sufficiently strong to be at all pressed.

Be the matter as it may, the majority of martyrologies and calendars recognise the two festivals. Thus in the Mart. Hieronymi we have, "xv. kal. Febr. Dedicatio cathedrae sancti Petri apostoli, qua primo Romae sedit"; and "viii. kal. Mart. Natalis cathedrae S. Petri apostoli, qua sedit apud Antiochiam." The martyrology of Bede has the festival in February, but only some forms of it recognise that in January. Both are given in such martyrologies as those of Usuard, Rabanus Maurus, Notker, &c. Wandalbert, on the other hand, gives only the festival of Feb. 22, his notice for which is (Patrol. cxxi. 590):

"Octavoque Petri cathedra et doctrina coruscet, Urbs laeta Antiochii quo primum praesule venit."

Binterim, speaking of ancient German calendars, remarks (Denkw. v. 1-331) that but few recognise the festival of Jan. 18. It was not till the time of pope Paul IV. (ob. A.D. 1559) that it was definitely and authoritatively established.

2. Liturgical Notices.—We have seen that nothing is to be looked for from Roman liturgies before the Gregorian, some forms of which give a mass for the Cathedra Petri on Feb. 22. The notion of the festival is made sufficiently plain by words occurring in the service. Thus in the collect we read: "Petro, collatis clavibus regni caelestis, animas ligandi atque solvendi pontificum tradidisti"; or again in the Preface: "Petrum apostolorum principem ob confessionem Unigeniti Filii Tui . . . caelestium claustrorum praesulem custodemque fecisti, divino ei jure concesso, ut quae statuisset in terris, servarentur in caelis."

Attention has been already called to the fact that in Mabillon's Lectionarium Luxoviense, lections are provided both for the festival of the Cathedra Petri and for three Sundays reckoned from it, Die Dominico post Cathedram sancti Petri, &c. (Mabillon de Liturgia Gallicana, lib. ii. 119; Patrol. lxxii. 181). The epistle and gospel for the festival are respectively Acts xii. 1-17, Matt. xvi. 13-19, John xxi. 15-19; the leaf of the MS. which contained the prophetic lection is wanting. The mass in the Gothico-Gallic missal brings out very strongly St. Peter's confession as its central idea (op. cit. lib. iii. 226; Patrol. lxxii. 181).

In the Mozarabic missal, which has the one commemoration in February, the prophetic lection, the epistle and gospel are respectively Isa. xxxii. 1-19 (with several omissions),

1 Peter v. 1-6, Matthew xvi. 13-20 (Patrol. lxxxv. 718). The same gospel also is found in the Sacramentarium Bobianum and the Cones of Pamelius; the epistles in these last being respectively 1 Peter i. 3, 4, and Heb. v. 1 sqq.

3. Miscellaneous Notices.—We have referred above to the order of the council of Tours in connexion with this festival; we shall now cite part of the rule in question. After protesting against the heathen abuses connected with the calends of January, and still practised in the sixth century, it proceeds: "Sunt etiam, qui in festivitate Cathedrae domini Petri Apostoli cibos mortuis offerunt et post missas redeunt ad domos proprias, ad gentiliū revertuntur errores, et post Corpus Domini sacratas daemones escas accipiunt" (can. 22; Labbe, v. 863).

We find this practice referred to in the sermons for the Cathedra Petri formerly attributed to Augustine, but palpably spurious (Sermm. 190-192 in Append.; vol. v. 2836, ed. Gaume). Reference is made to a deadly error as still prevalent on that day, "ut super tumulos defunctorum cibos et vina conferunt" (Serm. 190, c. 2; cf. 191, c. 3). We may remark here that this festival did not exist at all in Africa in Augustine's time. The custom condemned above, like many other heathen practices, seems to have lasted on in the church for a long time; and, in the 12th century, John Beleth refers to it in such a way as to indicate its long continuance (Rat. div. off. c. 83; Patrol. ccii. 87). He goes so far as to describe the institution of the Christian feast as mainly designed to counteract the heathen feast. After saying that annually, on a certain day in February, the heathen were in the habit of placing a feast on the graves of their parents, for the refreshing of the spirits of the dead, but which demons devoured, he proceeds to say that this custom was so deeply rooted that holy men instituted the festival of the Cathedra Petri, fixing it on the same day on which those abominable things were done by the heathen, so that thereby it should be altogether got rid of. Still the old custom left a trace of itself even on the Christian rite, "unde etiam ab illis epulis festum hoc appellatum est beati Petri epularum."

It may perhaps be worth mentioning here that there is still preserved in the Vatican a wooden chair, which is asserted to be the veritable one in which St. Peter sat. On this and on the whole question of the festival of the Cathedra Petri, reference may be made to Phoebeus, Disseratio de identitate cathedrae in qua S. Petrus Romae primum sedit: et de antiquitate et praesentia solennitatis cathedrae Romanae. Romae, 1666.

(iii.) THE FESTIVAL OF S. PETRI AD VIN- CULA, ETC.

Both the Eastern and the Western churches commemorate the imprisonment of St. Peter by Herod Agrippa and his miraculous deliverance. On Jan. 16 is the Festival of St. Peter's Chain in the Greek church, and on Jan. 22 in the Armenian church (Assemani, l. c.); also August 1 is the Western festival Natale S. Petri ad Vincula. Neither of these times, it will be observed, can be meant to represent the actual time of the event, which fell shortly before Easter (Acts xii. 4); but it is probable that in both cases the date has reference to the dedication of a church in memory of it. The Western festival has by some been associated with the chains with which the apostle was bound by Nero; this, however, was certainly not the primary idea, and we shall discuss the point at length presently.

We shall first refer briefly to the Eastern festival. The entry for this in the Menaea is, ἡ προσκύνησις τῆς τιμίας ἀλύσεως τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ πανευφήμου ἀποστόλου Πέτρου; and that in the Greek metrical Ephemerides already cited is, Σεῖρην προσκυνῶ Πέτρου δεκάτῃ ἐν ἑκτῇ. The historical lesson for the day in the Menaea gives the tradition that the chain from which St. Peter was miraculously freed was found by the Christians and treasured up. Afterwards it was removed to Constantinople and deposited in the shrine of St. Peter, which is in the Great Church, and there his commemoration (συναξίς) is observed.

As to the supposed date of this event, nothing is said, and it is quite uncertain when the festival commemorating it arose. There is, indeed, a sermon for it extant of which the Latin translation is given in Lipomannus and Surius (de probatis Sanctorum Historiis, vol. iv. 447); the Greek text itself also is found in MSS. in the Vatican Library and elsewhere, but, so far as I am aware, it has not been printed. The sermon, however, is obviously of a date long subsequent to Chrysostom, and Baronius (not. in Mart. Aug. 1) assigns it to Proclus or Germanus, patriarchs of Constantinople. Baronius recounts how the empress Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius II., brought from Jerusalem in A.D. 439 the two chains with which the apostle had there been bound, one being sent for a church in Constantinople, and the other given to the empress's daughter Eudoxia, the wife of Valentinian III., who built a church on the Esquiline in its honour.[†] As regards this story, we may remark that there is no trace of it in any Greek writer whatsoever. Nicephorus Callistus even, when speaking of Eudocia's journey to Jerusalem, and of the relics thence brought by her (Hist. Eccles. xiv. 2), makes no mention of St. Peter's chain. It may be added that this story is equally absent from any but quite late Western records, and may be summarily dismissed. All that may be safely assumed is that at some time a church was built in Constantinople in memory of St. Peter's imprisonment; and there, doubtless in accordance with the taste of the age, chains declared to be his were treasured up.

In the Western church, too, the date on which the festival fell probably had reference to the founding of a church. This is spoken of in many martyrologies as one built and consecrated by St. Peter himself, with no mention of any imprisonment. We cannot claim a very early date for it, for it is absent from the Kalendarium Carthaginiense, the calendar of Bucerius, and the Leonine and Gelasian sacramentaries. Nor does it occur in the Gallican or Mozarabic liturgies. The reference to the dedication of a church spoken of above occurs e.g. in the Mart. Hieronymi, "Romae, dedicatio primae ecclesiae a beato Petro constructae et consecratae" (though some forms add, "et absolutio ejus a vinculis"), the Martyrology of Bede, in some of its forms (Patrol. xciv. 993), Rabanus Maurus (ib. cx. 1160), &c. The metrical martyrology of Bede, it may be noted, omits the festival altogether.

[†] This is on the whole the story as told in the modern Roman breviary, which adds that the chain brought from Jerusalem to Rome, when placed by the pope with the one with which the apostle had been bound by Nero, became miraculously joined with it so as to form one chain!

That this church, whatever may be its real history, either was originally built in memory of St. Peter's imprisonment, or soon became associated with that idea, may be inferred e.g. from the heading for the day in the Gregorian sacramentary ad Sanctum Petrum ad Vincula. Wandalbert, in his metrical martyrology, tells us, "Carcere Roma Petrum celebrat vinculisque reductum" (Patrol. cxxi. 606). The ancient Mart. Gellonense gives (D'Achery, Spicilegium, xiii. 408), "Roma ad vincula catenas Sancti Petri osculandas." Similarly Usuard. (Acta Sanctorum, July, vol. vi. 399), Notker (Patrol. cxxii. 1129), &c. The last-named writer, after speaking of the church erected by St. Peter as the first in Europe, adds that in this were deposited the chains from the prison in Jerusalem.

It may be next asked what grounds we have for judging whether it is the Herodian or the Neronian imprisonment that is referred to. On this, besides our citation from Wandalbert and Notker, we may appeal to the Gregorian sacramentary (in loc.; col. 117, ed. Ménard), where the reference in the words "Qui beatum Petrum apostolum a vinculis absolutum illeceum abire fecisti" is unmistakable. The homily assigned to Bede (lib. iii. 96, de Vinculis Sancti Petri; Patrol. xciv. 498) is spurious. This dwells on the chains brought from Jerusalem and the church built in Rome in their honour by pope Alexander I. It seems pretty obvious therefore that the writers who have spoken of the chains as those of Nero have merely wished to strengthen the Roman associations. It may be worth noting that, besides the church of S. Pietro in Vincoli on the Esquiline hill, there is also one of S. Pietro in Carcere on the Capitoline, the latter clearly referring to St. Peter's imprisonment at Rome, and thus more or less disconnecting the former from that event. This church is mentioned in the Gregorian sacramentary, as edited by Pamelius, under the Monday after the first Sunday in Lent, in a note of the station, ad Sanctum Petrum ad Vincula. Durandus (Rat. Div. Off. vii. 19) combines both reasons as causing the festival. On the whole of the above question, reference may be made to Papebroch in the Acta Sanctorum (June, vol. vii. 410); also Monsacrat, Dissertatio de Catenis S. Petri ad Benedictum, xiv. 1750.

The familiar English name for this day is Lammas, probably a corruption of the Anglo-Saxon Hlaf-maesse, i.e. Loaf-mass; seeing that on that day the Saxons offered an oblation of loaves made from new corn (see Bosworth's Anglo-Saxon Dictionary, and Strattmann's Dict. of the Old English Language, s.v. Hlaf; Wedgwood, Dict. of English Etymology, s.v. Lammas). Thus, in the Sarum manual, the day is called Benedictio novorum Fructuum. Some have chosen to consider Lammas as a corruption of Lamb-mass, on the ground that lambs were offered at this time; and it has been mentioned that tenants of the chapter of the cathedral of York formerly paid a live lamb on Aug. 1. There does not however seem to be much authority for this latter view, though it is certainly curious that we find a Welsh name for the day, Dydd degum wyn, Lamb-tithing day.

Besides the above three festivals, we find in the Ethiopic calendar a commemoration of St. Peter on July 31 (Ludolf, p. 424), with merely the entry, Peter the Apostle. Also, in the Armenian calendar (Assemani, l.c.), is the notice under May 24, "the finger of the holy apostle Peter," of the reference in which I am quite unaware.

A considerable amount of apocryphal literature has been associated with the name of St. Peter. A passing notice of it may be given here; for detailed information concerning it, reference may be made to the several articles in the Dictionary of Christian Biography and Literature. Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 3) mentions as works falsely ascribed to St. Peter, his Acts, Gospel, Preaching (κήρυγμα), and Apocalypse. The Gospel of Peter is also referred to by Origen (Comm. in Matt. xiii. 55), Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. iii. 25; vi. 12), Jerome (de Viris Illustr. c. 1), Theodoret (Haeret. Fabul. Compend. ii. 2). The last-named identifies it with the gospel used by the Nazarenes. The Gospel and Acts of Peter were condemned as apocryphal by a council held at Rome in the episcopate of Gelasius, A.D. 494 (Patrol. lix. 175). Besides Eusebius (l.c.) and Jerome (l.c.), the Acts of Peter are referred to by Isidore of Pelusium (Epist. lib. ii. 99; Patrol. Gr. lxxviii. 544); and, according to Philastrius (Haer. 88; Patrol. xii. 1200), Acts of Peter were in use among the Manichaeans. Acts of Peter and Paul have been published by Tischendorf (Acta Apost. Apoc. pp. 1, sqq.), and also Acts of Peter and Andrew (Apocal. Apoc. pp. 161 sqq.).

The Preaching of Peter is cited by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 5, 15, &c.), Origen (Comment. in Joan. tom. xiii. c. 17), &c. His Apocalypse is cited by Clement (Ecl. Proph. 41, 48, 49), and in the Muratorian canon it is classed with the Apocalypse of St. John, though it is added that some are opposed to its being read in the church. An apocalypse of Peter, distinct from the above, existed in Arabic, of which there are MSS. in the Bodleian and Vatican Libraries (Tischendorf, Apocal. Apoc. p. xx).

In addition to the above, another work, the Περίοδοι Πέτρων, is mentioned, e.g. by Jerome (adv. Jovin. i. 262), and is obviously the same as the Itinerarium Petri condemned at the Roman council under Gelasius. Jerome also speaks (de Vir. Ill. c. i.) of the Judicium Petri, and Rufinus (Expos. Symb. Ap. 38) mentions, among books not canonical, that "qui appellatur Duae Viae, vel Judicium Petri." The extant fragments of the above works have been collected, with full information concerning them, by Hilgenfeld (Novum Testamentum extra Canonem receptum, Fasc. 5).

Two Syro-Jacobite liturgies, bearing the name of St. Peter, are given by Renaudot (Liturg. Or. Coll. ii. 146, sqq., ed. Frankfort, 1847). [R. S.]

revenues of the see of Rome, derived originally simply from the patrimony of the Roman bishopric, should have proved inadequate to the papal requirements as the supreme pontiff gradually assumed the supervision of the whole church—a function involving a costly expenditure in every country that acknowledged his supremacy. Among other expedients for meeting this difficulty, the tribute known under the name of Peter's Pence was systematically levied in England (though often disputed and withheld) until abolished in 1534 by Henry VIII. This was a tax of one penny on every hearth collected at the Feast of St. Peter and St. Paul (June 29).

According to the statement of Leo III. (Pope, A.D. 795–816), the tax was instituted by Offa,^a king of the Mercians, in the year 787, out of gratitude to Hadrian I. for that pontiff's authorization of his plan of dividing the province of Canterbury and establishing a new archbishopric at Lichfield (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 455; Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. 220). According to the tradition preserved in the Life of Offa (p. 29) ascribed to Matthew Paris and printed by Wats along with his edition of the Historia Major of that writer (1640)—a tradition railed with amplifications by Walsingham (Gesta Abbat. Monast. S. Albani, ed. Riley, i. 5)—Offa made the grant as an acknowledgment of extensive immunities granted to the newly-founded monastery of St. Alban's. The above Life of Offa is, however, to so great an extent fabulous, that this statement is hardly entitled to any credit. A more trustworthy account of the origin of this tax is probably that given by William of Malmesbury, who says that it was instituted in the year 855 by king Ethelwulf, on his visit to Rome, partly, it would seem, in return for the honourable reception previously accorded to his son Alfred by Leo IV., who had also anointed the latter king: "Romani, composito regno, abiit; ibique tributum, quod Anglia hodie pensitat, sancto Petro obtulit coram quarto Leone papa, qui etiam antea filium ejus ad se missum honorifice suscepit, et regem inunxerat" (Gest. Regum Angl. bk. ii. ed. Hardy, p. 152). "The grant," says Hardy, "appears to have been made after Aethelwulf's return to England, by what Asser calls a commendatory epistle, in which he ordered three hundred mancuses to be sent annually to Rome, one-third of which the pope himself was to have, the remainder to be equally distributed between the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul to provide lights on Easter Eve" (see also Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 646).

In northern Europe, this tax was not instituted until much later: in Denmark, in the reign of Cnut; in Norway and Sweden, by the cardinal-legate, Nicholas, in the years 1152, 1153 (Walter (F.), Kirchenrecht, sec. 198). About the same time the payment appears to have been granted by Harald, earl of Orkney, from the county of Caithness (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 250). The tribute appears to have been acknowledged as the pope's due by William the Conqueror, though irregularly paid in England during his reign (Selden, Append. to Eadmer p. 164; Lanfr. Epp. ed. Giles, No. x.). [J. B. M.]

PETROCUS, abbat in Cornwall; commemorated June 4 according to an ancient English missal (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 400, § 3). [C. H.]

PETRONILLA, Roman virgin; commemorated May 31 (Usuard., Wand., Bed. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. vii. 420). [C. H.]

PETRUS [For the Festivals of the Apostle, see PETER]. (1) Martyr under Maximian at Aulana (Usuard.), at Auclara (Florus), surnamed the standard-bearer (Cal. Byzant.), Auselanus, Absalmus, Balsamus, &c.; commemorated Jan. 3 (Usuard. Mart.; Florus, Mart. ap. Bed.; Cal. Byzant.); Jan. 4 (Rabanus, Notker, and others; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 129); Jan. 11, Eleutheropoli (Basil. Menol.); Assolanus, Jan. 11 (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Bishop of Sebaste in Armenia, brother of St. Basil; commemorated Jan. 9 in the Roman Martyrology, and, according to Baronius, by the Greeks on the same day, but his name is not found in the Greek Menologies (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 588). The Cal. Armen. places Peter and Blaze, successive bishops of Sebaste in Armenia, under Jan. 15.

(3) Martyr with Severus and Leucius at Alexandria; commemorated Jan. 11 (Usuard., Notker., Vet. Rom. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 674).

(4) Martyr; commemorated Jan. 12 (Cal. Byzant.). The name occurs on this day with Philoromus and Zoticus in Hieron. Mart., cf. Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 725.

(5) Surnamed TELONARIUS, martyr under Justinian; commemorated Jan. 20 (Cal. Byzant.; Menaea; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 357).

(6) Martyr; commemorated Jan. 22 (Cal. Byzant.); a Petrus of Valentia occurs on this day in Hieron. Mart..

(7) Jailer, martyr with Ananias, presbyter, and seven soldiers, in Phrygia under Diocletian; commemorated Jan. 26 (Cal. Byzant.); Jan. 27 (Basil. Menol.).

(8) AEGYPTIUS, anchorite in Syria; commemorated Jan. 27 (Cal. Byzant.; Menaea; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 771).

(9) Galata, anchorite near Antioch; commemorated Feb. 1 (Menaea; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 94).

(10) Twenty-first patriarch of Alexandria; commemorated Feb. 13 and Oct. 29 (Cal. Aethiop.).

(11) Chamberlain of Diocletian, martyr with Dorotheus and Gorgonius; commemorated at Nicomedia Mar. 12 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. ii. 106; Wright, Syr. Mart.).

(12) Martyr in Africa; commemorated Mar. 14 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.).

(13) Deacon, martyr with Hermogenes; commemorated at Antioch Ap. 17 (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 479).

(14) Thaumaturgus, "our holy father;" commemorated May 3 (Basil. Menol.).

^a Of a yet earlier institution of the tax by king Ine, for the maintenance of the English school at Rome, there is, as Professor Stubbs says, "a want of evidence;" the statement occurs in Layamon's Brut.

(15) Martyr with Paulus, Andreas, and a virgin Dionysia; commemorated at Lampsacus May 15 (Hieron. Mart.; Florus, Mart. ap. Bed.; Usuard. Mart.); May 18, Petrus Lampsacenus and Dionysius, martyrs (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 259; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 452).

(16) Exorcist, martyr with Marcellinus presbyter at Rome; commemorated June 2 (Usuard. Wand.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.).

(17) Presbyter; commemorated June 7 at Cordova, with Aventius, Hieremias, and others (Usuard. Mart.).

(18) Athonita, "holy father," anchorite of Mount Athos; commemorated June 12 (Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 261; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 335).

(19) "Our holy father"; commemorated July 1 (Basil. Menol.).

(20) Martyr; commemorated at Philadelphia in Arabia Aug. 1, with Cyrillus, Aquila, and others (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.).

(21) Martyr with Julianus and others at Rome; commemorated July 7 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart. with Juliana instead of Julianus; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 187).

(22) Soldier, martyr with Marcellinus, tribune; commemorated Aug. 27 at Tomi (Hieron. Mart.; Usuard. Mart.); both names in the sacramentary of Gelasius for June 2, being named in the collect and the "secreta," but not in the post-communion (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 646).

(23) Bishop of the Capitolei, martyr; commemorated Oct. 4 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. ii. 494).

(24) Martyr at Seville; commemorated Oct. 8 (Usuard. Mart.; Bolland. Acta SS. Oct. iv. 273).

(25) Martyr with Theodosius, Lucius, Marcus, all soldiers of Christ, under Claudius; commemorated at Rome on the Via Salaria Oct. 25 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart.).

(26) Of Alexandria, "holy martyr, our father"; commemorated Nov. 24 (Cal. Byzant.); Nov. 25 (Basil. Menol.; Usuard., Wand., Bed. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.). In Hieron. Mart. a Petrus occurs without place or designation on Nov. 25, and a Petrus commemorated at Alexandria on Nov. 26.

(27) Martyr with Stephanus junior and Andreas; commemorated Nov. 28 (Basil. Menol.).

(28) Martyr with Indes and Gorgonius; commemorated Dec. 28 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

PHARENSE CONCILIIUM. [WHITBY.]

PHARMACY. [MAGIC.]

PHAROS IN ART. [LIGHTHOUSE.]

PHAROS, a term occurring continually among the papal gifts in the Liber Pontificalis of Anastasius and elsewhere, to designate the large chandeliers suspended by chains, or the standing candlesticks in churches. "Pharus est majus lychni seu candelabri vel lucernae genus translaticie a Pharo Alexandrina quae de nocte navigantibus adlucet" (Alteserra, Not. in Anastas. § 13, lin. 45). We find them constructed of gold, silver, and brass, ornamented with dolphins (§ 69), circular like crown (§ 34), in the shape of a cross (§ 1370), of network (§ 415) revolving (§ 423). From holding wax candles they were called cereostata (§§ 57, 199), and from the cup or basin which surrounded them pharocanthotri (ibid. 136). Those in St. Peter's were only lighted four times a year, at Christmas, Easter, the festival of SS. Peter and Paul (June 29), and the Natalis Papae (ibid. 320). [E. V.]

PHASIC, martyr with his daughter, a nun; commemorated April 14 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

PHELONION. [PAENULA.]

PHERBUTHA, sister of bishop Simeon, martyr; commemorated Ap. 5 (Basil. Menol.). The Bollandists assign Pherbutha or Tarbula, Persian martyr, to Ap. 22 from Vatican and Venetian MSS. (Acta SS. Ap. iii. 19). [C. H.]

PHIALA, the fountain, or laver, in the atrium, at the entrance of churches, so designated by Paulus Silentiarius in his description of St. Sophia (ii. vers. 177) [CANTHARUS; FOUNTAIN]. In Goar's Euchologium (p. 449) we find a prayer for the water of holy baptism, ἐν τῇ φιάλῃ τοῦ μεσαύλου τῆς ἐκκλησίας. Phiala is used by Anastasius for a golden basin or cup-shaped lamp, rising from a cluster of porphyry columns in the middle of the font, in the Lateran baptistery, lighted up only at Easter-tide, and burning balsam with an asbestos wick (Anastas. Vit. S. Silvestri, § 36, lin. 51). [E. V.]

PHILADELPHUS (1), martyr; commemorated Feb. 8 (Basil. Menol.).

(2) Son of Viteulius, a praefect in Italy, martyr with his brothers Alphaeus and Cyrinus; commemorated May 10 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

PHILAGRIUS, bishop of Cyprus, martyr with Marcianus bishop of Sicily and Pancratius bishop of Tauremonium, all disciples of the apostle Peter; commemorated Feb. 9 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 277 "ex Menaeis"). [C. H.]

PHILANTHES (PHILANTHUS), martyr at Amasia; commemorated Aug. 18 (Wright, Syr. Mart.). [C. H.]

PHILARETUS ELEEMOSYNARIUS, native of Paphlagonia, under empress Irene; commemorated Dec. 2 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

PHILEAS, bishop of Thumis, martyr with Philoromus and others, A.D. 304; commemorated

Feb. 4 (Vet. Rom. Mart.; Euseb. H. E. viii. 10; Bed. Mart. Auct.; Wand., Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 462; Rom. Mart.). [C. H.]

PHILEMON (1), bishop of Gaza; commemorated Feb. 14 (Basil. Menol.).

(2) Martyr with the deacon Apollonius at Antinous in Egypt; commemorated Mar. 8 (Usuard. Mart.); Dec. 4 (Basil. Menol. "under Diocletian"); Dec. 14 (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 277).

(3) Native of Rome, martyr with Domnus; commemorated Mar. 26 (Basil. Menol.).

(4) One of nine martyrs of Cyzicus; commemorated Ap. 29 (Bas. Menol.).

(5) "Apostle," and his companions; commemorated Nov. 22 (Cal. Byzant.).

(6) "Miles," disciple of the apostle Paul; martyr with Archippus at Choni near Laodicea in Phrygia; commemorated Nov. 23 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

PHILETAERUS, native of Nicomedia, son of Tatianus ex-præfect, martyr under Diocletian; commemorated May 19 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iv. 312; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

PHILETUS, senator, martyr with his wife Lydia and his sons, under Adrian; commemorated Mar. 27 (Bas. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 687). [C. H.]

PHILIBERTUS (FILIBERTUS), abbat in the Isle of Herium in Gaul; commemorated Aug. 20 (Usuard. Mart.; Florus, Mart. ap. Bed.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 66). [C. H.]

PHILIP, APOSTLE, LEGEND AND FESTIVAL OF. Of the life of this apostle, beyond what is told us in the New Testament, but little is known, and in much of this there is a confusion between the apostle and his namesake the deacon. Clement of Alexandria tells us (Strom. iii. 52; cited by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iii. 30) that Philip had children, and that he gave his daughters in marriage. We also gather from the same writer (ib. iv. 71) that Philip was not one of those whose life's work was crowned by a martyr's death. All this is possible enough, but the remarks of Polycrates apparently indicate a confusion between the two Philips. He speaks (ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii. 31; cf. v. 24) of Philip as falling asleep at Hierapolis; as having had two daughters who remained virgins to old age, and a third (presumably a married one, from being thus separated from the other two), who, after ἐν Ἀγίῳ πνεύματι πολιτευσάμενη, lay at rest in Ephesus. Eusebius then proceeds to quote from the Dialogue of Caius, where mention is made of the four daughters of Philip, prophetesses at Hierapolis, at which place was their tomb and that of their father. On comparing these notices with Acts xxi. 8, it can hardly be doubted that we have somewhat varying forms of tradition as to the persons there mentioned, more especially when Eusebius himself proceeds to cite this last passage as relevant to the matter. The legends contained in the Apocryphal Acts of Philip are totally undeserving of credit, and it is quite hopeless to try to determine which of the two Philips is indicated.

As regards the festival of St. Philip, we find that he, like most of the apostles, had no special and individual commemoration till comparatively late. Among the earliest witnesses in the west, where St. Philip is as a rule associated with St. James the Less on May 1, are the Martyrologium Hieronymi, the metrical martyrology of Bede, and the Gelasian, Gregorian and Ambrosian sacramentaries. In the first of these documents St. Philip is commemorated on two days, April 22 and May 1, besides the mention in the list of apostles at the beginning—"Kal. Maii. In civitate Hierapoli provinciae Asiae, depositio Philippi apostoli." On April 22, St. Philip is commemorated alone; on May 1, in connexion with St. James, a mention of Hierapolis being in each case brought in (Patrol. xxx. 467, 469). For the notices in Bede and elsewhere, where the two apostles are conjoined, and for the possible reason for the conjunction, reference may be made to the article on St. James the Less. As to the Roman liturgies, nothing need here be added. We must note, however, that the ancient Gallican forms published by Mabillon make no mention of a festival of St. Philip at all, nor was he recognised in the Mozarabic missal.

On passing to the east, we no longer find the two apostles associated. In the Byzantine Calendar, St. Philip (ὁ ἅγιος καὶ πανεύφημος ἀπόστολος) is commemorated on November 14, Philip the Deacon being commemorated on October 11. The notice for the former in the metrical Greek Ephemerides, prefixed by Papebroch to the Acta Sanctorum for May, is (vol. i. p. lii.) ἡρθης κακκεφαλῆς δεκάτῃ Φίλιππε τετάρτῃ. In the calendars of the Ethiopic and Coptic churches also, November 14 is the day reserved for St. Philip (Ludolf, ad Hist. Aeth. Comm. p. 399), and October 11 for Philip the Deacon. It is true that the latter is spoken of as Philip "the Apostle," but then the Coptic calendar adds the words "one of the seven deacons"; and in this it does but agree with the Menaea, which not only applies the name Apostle to Philip the Deacon, but also generally extends the use of the term considerably. In the calendars of the Armenian church, which are given by Assemani (Bibl. Or. iii. 1, 645), St. Philip is commemorated on November 17. The "Philip the Apostle" mentioned by the first of the two calendars on February 9, is defined by the second as "Philip, the Deacon and Apostle."

A certain amount of pseudonymous literature is associated with the name of St. Philip, but it will be generally quite uncertain whether the apostle or the deacon is the person intended. We have a gospel of Philip mentioned by Epiphanius (Haer. xxvi. 13) as in use among the Gnostics. Acts of Philip were condemned by the council held in Rome in 494 A.D., under the episcopate of Silasius (Patrol. lix. 162). It is probably this that is referred to by Anastasius Sinaita as ἡ περίοδος τοῦ ἁγίου Φιλίππου (cited by Fabricius, Cod. Pseud. Vet. Test. i. 806). The Greek text, or rather several large fragments of it, was first edited by Tischendorf (Acta Apost. Apocrypha, pp. xxxi. 75; Apocal. Apoc. p. 141). Syriac Acta have been published by Dr. Wright (Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles). This is a different document from the preceding, and probably refers to Philip the Deacon.

St. Philip, reference may be made to Henschenius (Acta Sanctorum; May, vol. i. pp. 7 sqq.), Binterim (Denkwürdigkeiten der Christ-katholischen Kirche, v. 1, pp. 365 sqq.), Augusti (Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christlichen Archäologie iii. pp. 201 sqq.), etc. [R. S.]

PHILIPPA, martyr with her son Theodorus at Perga in Pamphylia; commemorated Sep. 21 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

PHILIPPOPOLIS, see SARDICA, COUNCIL OF.

PHILIPPOPOLIS (COUNCIL OF), A.D. 347-8, was held at the town so called on the Maritza, to the north-west of Adrianople. It was composed of seceders from the council of SARDICA; and as all the documents put out by them were dated from that place, and believed generally to have emanated thence, they will be best considered under that head. The documents peculiar to it are given in Mansi, iii. 125 et seq. [E. S. Ff.]

PHILIPPUS (1), commemorated with Hermogenes, martyr, and others, Jan. 24 (Cal. Byzant.).

(2) Bishop of Gortyna, in Crete, under the Antonines; commemorated Ap. 11 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 12); the V. R. M. mentions a bishop Philippus at Gortyna also on Oct. 8, without period.

(3) One of the seven deacons of Act. vi.; natalis at Caesarea June 6 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. June 1, 618; Philippus, in Africa, for this day in Hieron. Mart.); Oct. 11 (Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 271).

(4) Martyr, with six brothers, under the Antonines; commemorated July 10 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.).

(5) Commemorated at Alexandria with Zeus, Narseus, and ten infants, July 15 (Usuard. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. iv. 27).

(6) Martyr with Strato and Eutychianus at Nicomedia, under Aurelian; commemorated Aug. 17 (Basil. Menol.). Wright's Syr. Mart. has Philippus and four others at Nicomedia under Aug. 1.

(7) Bishop, previously a praefect, father of St. Eugenia, virgin (Basil. Menol. Dec. 24); martyr at Alexandria; commemorated Sep. 13. (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Acta SS. Sep. iv. 52).

(8) Bishop, commemorated with Eusebius and Hermes at Adrianople, Oct. 22 (Usuard., Wand., Hieron. Mart.; Wright's Syr. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. 9, 545, from a Fulda MS.; Mart. Rom.). The Mart. Rom. and Acta SS. p. 523 assign this day also to another Philippus, a bishop of Firmum. [C. H.]

PHILO, bishop of Calpae, commemorated with Hermogenes, Menas, Philip, &c. Jan. 24 (Cal. Byzant.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 593). [C. H.]

PHILOGONIUS, "our holy father," bishop, formerly pleader, commemorated Dec. 21 (Basil.

Menol.); Dec. 20 (Surius, De Prob. Hist. Dec. 298). [C. H.]

PHILOLOGUS, one of the seventy; commemorated Nov. 4 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

PHILOMENUS, of Lycaonia, martyr at Ancyra under Aurelian; commemorated Nov. 29 (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.); PHILEMUS (Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

PHILOMINUS, martyr at Heraclea in Thrace, with Clementinus and Theodolius; commemorated Nov. 14 (Usuard., Wand.; Hieron. Mart.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

PHILONIDES, bishop and martyr at Curium in Cyprus, under Diocletian; commemorated Aug. 30 (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 544, "ex Graecis MSS."). [C. H.]

PHILONILLA, martyr with her sister Zenais, both of Tarsus, relations of St. Paul; commemorated Oct. 11 (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

PHILOROMUS, tribune, martyr with bishop Phileas at Thmuis; commemorated Feb. 4 (Vet. Rom. Mart.; Mart. Rom.); at Nicomedia Jan. 8 (Wright, Auct. Syr. Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, 423; Jan. 12 (Notker). [C. H.]

PHILOSARCAE was, according to Jerome (Epist. 61 ad Pammach.), a name given by the Origenists to those who believed in the resurrection of the same identical flesh and bones which were buried. They also called such believers "pelusiotas, luteos, animales, carnes" (Hieron. Epist. 65 ad Pamm. et Ocean.), as not having attained to the things of the Spirit. The word πηλουσιῶται is explained by Jerome himself (Comm. in Jerem. xxix. p. 407) to mean "in luto istius corporis constituti." As the nickname was Alexandrian, there may be some allusion to Pelusium, the force of which is lost (Bingham's Antiq. I. ii. 17). [C.]

PHILOTHEI. [MONASTERY, p. 1219.]

PHILOTHEUS, martyr with Domninus and others under Maximinus; commemorated Nov. 5 (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

PHILTRE. The early Christians fully admitted the alleged power of magic to excite love or hatred, though believing themselves to be protected from its influence. Thus in the Clementina Appion is made to say that, when hopelessly enamoured in his youth, he "fell in with a certain Egyptian thoroughly versed in the arts of the Magi . . . who freely taught him the charm (ἐρασιδίην), by means of which he was successful" (Hom. v. 3). Gregory Nazianzen tells us that the legendary Cyprian in his endeavours to corrupt Justina, employed the services of a daemon "whose reward was sacrifices and libations and that close relation which is established through the blood and the odour from the victims" (Orat. xxiv. § 10). "Many women," says St. Chrysostom, "that they may become attractive, employ incantations and libations and philtres, and ten thousand other contrivances" (Hom. 24 in Ep. ad Rom. § 4).

Faith in Christ was a sufficient shield against such darts of the wicked one; but Theodoret tells us of an instance in which the miraculous power of a saint was opposed to them. A woman of rank, whose husband was unfaithful to her, complained to Aphraates that he had been "bewitched by some artifice of magic." The saint "by prayer destroyed the power of the enchantment, and having hallowed a jar of oil brought by her, directed that the husband should be anointed with it" (Histor. Relig. 8).

Constantine, in 321, made a law against those who, "furnished with magic arts," were "convicted of having perverted chaste minds to lust" (Cod. IX. xviii. 4, De Magia). When the crime appeared among professed Christians of a later period, a severe penance was imposed. "Si quis pro amore veneficium fecerit, et neminem perdidit, tres annos poeniteat; unum in pane et aqua" (Poenitentiale, ad calc. Sacram. Gallic. in Mus. Ital. i. 392). The old Roman penitential: "Si quis pro amore maleficus sit, et neminem perdidit; si laicus est, dimidium poeniteat; si clericus, annum unum poeniteat in pane et aqua; si diaconus, tres annos, unum in pane et aqua; si sacerdos quinque annos, 2 in pane et aqua" (Morinus, de Sacram. Poenit. 566; Cigheri, Vet. PP. Theol. Univ. x. 223). In the 9th century, bishops at their visitations inquired "if there was any woman who professed that she could by certain acts of witchcraft and incantations change the minds of persons; i.e. so as to turn them from hatred to love or from love to hatred . . . Haec talis omnimodis ex parrochia ejiciatur" (Regino, de Discipul. Eccl. ii. v. 45). [W. E. S.]

PHOCE, commemorated with Irenaeus Oct. 7 (Cal. Arm.). [C. H.]

PHOENIX. It is not part of our duty to trace the story of the phoenix eastward, or connect it with the Simurgh of Persian poetry. It reached Rome through Greece (see Herodotus's account, ii. 73). It is represented on coins and medals of Hadrian, Caracalla, Antoninus Pius, Constans, and Constantine (Münter, Sinnbilder u. Kunstvorstellungen der alten Christ., 1st Heft, p. 95, and tab. iii. fig. 69 and 68). It would easily be adopted in Christian symbolism as an emblem of the Resurrection, and its name would connect it with the palm-tree. See Tertullian on the Resurrection of the Body (c. 25), where he quotes Ps. xcii. of the palm. The name, the tree, and the bird, with its mythical allegory, all connect the Eastern and Greek imaginations with the central Christian doctrine. Hence there is no doubt that a strange bird sometimes represented on mosaics (as in St. Cecilia's at Rome, see woodcut) is intended for it, especially when, as in this instance, it bears the Nimbus, or when it is placed on the palm (Bottari, tav. xxii.). As a type of death and resurrection it is connected with baptism (Clemens Romanus, 1st Ep. to the Corinthians, c. 25). It is found in the mosaics of SS. Cosmas and Damianus at Rome, and in St. Prassede (Ciampini, Vit. Monum. tab. 16, 47, 51); also in the glass given by Dr. Northcote (Roma Sotterranea, p. 316) of St. Peter and St. Paul, being attached to the latter in particular, as the special preacher of the Resurrection. PHYLACTERY. Any thing might be so called to which a protective power, not due to natural causes, was ascribed. Thus Gregory of Rome in 603 sends to king Adulovald "phylacteries, i.e. a cross with wood of the holy cross of the Lord, and a lesson of the holy Gospel inclosed in a Persian case" (Ep. xii. 7 ad Theodel.). Gregory himself wore suspended from his neck "phylacteries of relics" (Joan. Diacon. in Vita Greg. iv. 80). [LIGATURAE.] But the term was chiefly applied to written charms, and of these we propose to speak now.

The use of "phylacteries" is frequently condemned without explanation, as by the council of Laodicea, probably in 365, which forbids the clergy to "make what are called phylacteries," by Epiphanius, 368 (De Fide, 24), by St. Eligius, 640 (De Rect. Cath. Convers. 3, 5, 7), by the council of Rome, 721 (can. 12), by Zachary of Rome, 743 (Ep. 2 ad Bonif. § 6), in a law of Charlemagne, 769 (Capitulare, i. c. 6), in a penitential of Angers (Morinus, de Sacram. Pœnit. 586), &c. But they are often described as written documents. Thus Caesarius of Arles, 502: "Phylacteria diabolica per characteras" (Serm. 66, § 3; comp. § 5). Boniface in the council of Leptines, 743: "Phylacteria, i.e. scripturas" (can. 33; Opp. Bonif. 142, ed. Wüdtw.). The Capitularies of the French Kings: "Phylacteries or false writings" (vi. 72). The name was not used among the Latins so early as by the Greeks; for St. Augustine, 397, describes them without employing it; "Ligaturae atque remedia . . . sive in præcantationibus, sive in quibusdam notis quos characteras vocant" (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 20, § 30). Neither Isidore, who copies this sentence (Etymol. viii. 9 n. 30), nor Hincmar, who borrows it from Isidore (De Divort. Hloth. et Tetb. Resp. 15) introduces the word, from which we may perhaps infer that it was not even in their times very familiar to all the Latins.

Written charms are condemned under the name of phylacteries in the decree ascribed variously to Gelasius and Hormisdas de Apocryphis: "Phylacteria omnia quæ non angelorum (ut illi confingunt) sed daemonum magis arte conscripta sunt, apocrypha" (Hard. Conc. ii. 942).

The name was without doubt borrowed immediately from the Jews; and the general restriction of its meaning in practice is due to that circumstance. The Jewish phylacteries

(tephillin) were two pieces of parchment, on which were written four texts of Scripture (Exod. xiii. 1-10, 11-16; Deut. v. 4-9; xv. 13-21). One of these was bound on the forehead, the other on the left arm at prayer. They were believed to avert evil from the wearer and to procure blessings for him, owing to the name of God (Shaddai, Almighty) being on them (Beveridge on Can. Laod. 36; Pandect. ii. 194; Schleusner, Lex. N. T. in v.)

The Jewish practice would also naturally suggest the frequent use of the Scriptures as phylacteries. St. Chrysostom, after speaking of the custom of the Jews, adds, that in like manner "many women now suspend the Gospels from their necks" (Hom. 72 in S. Matt. Ev. § 2) and elsewhere "Do you not see how women and little children hang the Gospels from their necks for a great protection" (φυλακῆς, Hom. xix. ad Antioch. § 4). St. Augustine mentions a practice of putting the Gospel on the head when it ached. He says that men were so besotted with ligaturæ that he rejoiced when he found this done; not because they did it, but "because the Gospel was preferred to ligaturæ" (In S. Joan. Ev. Tract. vii. 12). This use of the Gospels continued for many ages. Thus Nilus the Younger, who died in 1005, having met with an accident, "took out of his bosom the phylactery which he always carried there (this was a folding book, the treasure of the New Testament) and put it to his eyes and lips and breast" (Vita Nilii, ix. 63; Bolland. Sept. 26). In the West, however, even this was distinctly pronounced unlawful. St. Jerome commenting on the Jewish practice: "Hoc apud nos superstitionis mulierculæ in parvulis evangelii, et in crucis ligno, et istiusmodi rebus . . . usque hodie facit, culicem liquantes, et camelum glutientes" (Comm. in S. Matt. Ev. iv. 23). St. Eligius (u. s.): "Etsi dicatur, quod res sancta sit et lectiones divinas contineat, quia non est in eis remedium Christi, sed venenum diaboli." [Compare LIGATURAE, p. 990.]

PILATE. Our Lord's appearance before Pilate is almost the only scene of His passion, except the denial by St. Peter, which is to be found in the catacombs, on sarcophagi, or, indeed, anywhere in very early Christian art. See Bottari, tav. xxiv. where Pilate is seated on a curule chair (John xix. 13); see also the Laurentian MS., and Bottari, tavv. xv. xxii. xxxiii. xxxv. Some expression of anxiety and reluctance is generally given to Pilate, and in some instances water is being brought for his hands. His action in washing them is frequently represented, and M. Rohault de Fleury (L'Evangile, vol. ii. pl. lxxxiii. lxxxiv.) gives six examples, two from the Lateran sarcophagi, probably 4th century, one from St. Apollinare nella Città at Ravenna, the third (11th century) from St. Urbano at Rome. He refers also to a 6th-century ivory in the Vatican. One of the Lateran sarcophagi was brought from the Liberian Basilica, commonly known as the church of St. Maria Maggiore.

The subject of our Lord before Pilate is twice repeated on the lid of the magnificent ivory casket in the Biblioteca Quiriniana at Brescia (Westwood, Early Christian Sculptures and Ivory Carvings, p. 37). He stands before Pilate in a group; and in another before Pilate alone, who is in the act of washing his hands. [R. St. J. T.]

PILGRIMAGE (Peregrinatio). A pilgrim was one who travelled from a motive of religion to any place considered sacred, because peculiarly associated with the memory of Christ or any of the saints. The growth of that feeling towards such places which led to pilgrimages has been traced in the article on HOLY PLACES, Vol. I. p. 774. We now propose to speak of the chief resorts of early pilgrims, their immediate motives, and other matters of interest connected with them.

I. The Holy Land.—Paula and Eustochium, writing in 386, suppose that there had been a constant stream of pilgrims to Jerusalem from the very infancy of the church: "It would be tedious now to run through every age from the ascension of the Lord to the present day, and enumerate the bishops, the martyrs, the men eloquent in ecclesiastical learning, who have come to Jerusalem, because they thought that they had less religion, less knowledge, and had not, as the phrase is, received the finishing stroke of their virtues, unless they had adored Christ in those places whence the Gospel had first shone forth from the Cross" (Ep. 46 inter Epp. Hieronym. ad Marcellam, § 9). The record of earlier visits is scanty; but it is probable that these writers were not mistaken. We must except from the holy places visited by their predecessors the most sacred of all; viz. the sepulchre of Christ and Calvary, which from the time of Adrian to that of Constantine were covered by a vast mound of earth surmounted by a temple of Venus. It is to be observed, however, that Eusebius, who lived in Palestine, and was sixty years old when those sites were uncovered, merely says that the heathen madly thought that by concealing them they should hide the truth (Vita Const. iii. 26); from which we should not infer that he was accustomed to see or hear of crowds of pilgrims eagerly inquiring for the scene of every great Christian event. On the other hand, Sozomen, more than a century later, influenced by the opinions and the custom of his own day, clearly supposes that pilgrims would have frequented those sites in great numbers if they had remained exposed. According to him the heathen hoped that through the means which they employed "the true reason of the reverence paid to that place would in the course of time be forgotten, Christians neither daring to frequent it themselves, nor to point it out to others" (Hist. Eccl. ii. 1). We observe also that the first visitors to the Holy Land of whom we have mention were at least as much inquirers as devotees. Alexander, the first whose name is recorded, is expressly said to have gone there εὐχῆς καὶ τῶν τόπων ἱστορίας ἕνεκεν (Euseb. Hist. vi. 11). Origen, his friend, A.D. 230, describes his own visit to the Holy Land as a "search after the footsteps of Jesus and His disciples and the prophets" (Comm. in Ev. S. Joann. tom. vi. § 24). Firmilian, about 240, is more vaguely said by Jerome to have gone to Palestine "sub occasione sanctorum locorum" (De Vir. Illust. 54).

Helen, the mother of Constantine, is the first pilgrim to the Holy Land of whose visit we have anything like a detailed account. About the year 328, when above seventy years of age, she hastened thither to offer "thank-offerings by means of vows (or "prayers;" χαριστήρια δι' εὐχῶν), and to "seek knowledge of the land worthy of veneration." "When she had bestowed suitable worship on the footsteps of the Saviour, in accordance with the saying of the prophet, Let us worship the place where His feet have stood (Ps. cxxii. 7), she forthwith bequeathed to posterity a fruit of her personal devotion" (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 42) in two churches which she built, "one at the Cave of the Nativity, the other on the Mount of the Ascension" (ib. 43). About five years after the visit of Helen, a traveller whose name is unknown, though the diary of his voyage is extant (Itineraria Romanorum, Wesseling, Amstel. 1735, pp. 549-617), journeyed from Bordeaux to Jerusalem, whence he returned by a different route from that by which he came. He was evidently a religious pilgrim; for until he finds himself on holy ground, his notes are rarely more than a record of stages and distances. He gives us a long list of sacred places, and often with some remark of interest. On his way from home he saw Tarsus, the birthplace of St. Paul, the site of the house (Sarepta, not mentioned) where the widow sustained Elijah, Mount Carmel, where he sacrificed, the bath of Cornelius at Caesarea, a certain spring claiming miraculous power on Mount Sinai, Stradela, where Ahab sat and Elijah prophesied, the scene of David's victory over Goliath, Mount Gerizim, Jacob's well in Sichar, Luz, where he saw the vision and wrestled with the angel, and where the hand of Jeroboam was withered. Arrived at Jerusalem he saw the pools made by Solomon on either side the temple, the two called Bethesda, a crypt in which Jewish tradition taught that Solomon had confined evil spirits, the pinnacle of the Temptation, the place where Solomon was said to have written the book of Wisdom, his reservoirs, the stone stained with the blood of Zacharias, the marks of the spikes on the caligae of the soldiers who killed him, the house of Hezekiah, the pool of Siloam, the house of Caiaphas, and the pillar at which our Lord was scourged, the site of the house of David, the walls of the praetorium of Pilate. Out of the city he visited Mount Golgotha, and, a stone's throw from it ("eighty steps"), Antonini Placentini Itinerarium, 19), the crypt in which the body of Jesus was laid," the church lately built there by Constantine, the Valley of Jehoshaphat, the scene of the betrayal, the monuments of Hezekiah and Isaiah, Mount Olivet and the new church thereon, the Mount of Transfiguration, the grave of Lazarus, the sycamore of Zacchaeus, the fountain made wholesome by Elisha, where was shewn him the vessel that held the salt, the house of Rahab, the site of the pile of twelve stones from the Jordan, the place of our Lord's baptism, the little hill whence Elijah was taken up to heaven, the tomb of Rachel, Bethlehem, and the church built there by Helen, the tombs of Ezekiel, David, Solomon, &c., near it, the spring at which Philip baptized the eunuch, the place where Abraham dwelt under a terebinth tree^a (Gen. xviii. 4) and dug a well. In returning home he notes all the stages, as before, but only connects one with sacred history, viz. Philippi, where Paul and Silas were imprisoned.

It will be observed that in this careful enumeration of sacred objects and places there is no mention of that which a few years later was the chief attraction of pilgrims to Jerusalem, the supposed cross of Christ. This at once disproves the later tradition of its having been found by Helen [CROSS, FINDING OF, Vol. I. p. 504; HOLY PLACES, iii. Vol. I. p. 776]. Many instances occur of pilgrims going to Jerusalem "to adore the holy cross," see e.g. the accounts of John of Sochus (John Moschus, Pratum Spirit. 180), Thalelaeus (ib. 91), Christopher (ib. 105), Theophilus and his two companions Vita Macarii Rom. 3), the author of the Life of Euthymius (Vita Euth. 136), &c.

Paula, the friend of Jerome, visited every sacred place and object of which she obtained information. "Entering the sepulchre she kissed the stone of the resurrection, which the angel had moved away from the door of the tomb; and licked with faithful mouth the very place of the body in which the Lord had lain; as if being athirst she longed for water." "A pillar was shewn to her, supporting the porch of a church, stained with the Lord's blood, at which He is said to have been bound and scourged. The place was shewn to her where the Holy Ghost came down on above one hundred souls of believers." Having "entered Bethlehem, going into the cave of the Saviour, after seeing the sacred lodging of the Virgin and the stall . . . she solemnly affirmed in my presence that she saw with the eyes of faith the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, the Lord wailing in the manger, the Magi worshipping, the star shining above, the virgin mother, the careful foster-father, the shepherds coming by night . . . the infants slain, Herod raging, Joseph and Mary fleeing into Egypt." "Thence she went down to the tower Ader, i.e. of the flock, near which Jacob fed his flocks, and the shepherds watching by night were privileged to hear, "Glory to God in the highest," &c. She saw "the glittering cross of Mount Olivet, from which the Saviour ascended to the Father . . . entered the sepulchre of Lazarus, saw the house of Martha and Mary, and Bethphage," the spot where Christ mounted the ass, the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan, the sycamore of Zacchaeus, the place where the blind man stood by the wayside. She also travelled to many places in Palestine of note in the history of the Old Testament, both before and after her visit to Jerusalem; and lastly went to Egypt, where she would probably have remained among the ascetics of the desert, "ni majus sanctorum locorum retraxisset desiderium" (Hieron. Ep. 108 ad Eustoch. 9-14). We have omitted much of her tour, but given enough to show that pilgrims were now directed to many holy places which their guides did not profess themselves able to identify when some sixty years before the pilgrim of Bordeaux travelled over the same ground. Paula sketched a similar route for herself and her friend Marcella when the latter should travel to the Holy Land (Paul. et Eustoch. ad Marc. Ep. 46 inter Epp. Hieron. § 12). Gaudentius of Brescia, A.D. 387, mentions a pilgrimage that he made to Jerusalem, but gives no particulars (De Dedic. Basilicae in Vet. Brix. Episc. Opusc. 340, Brix. 1738).

At this period and onward the notices of pilgrimages to Jerusalem are very frequent. For thirty-seven years, Melania the elder, who died in 410, exercised hospitality towards Christians who came to that city "for their vow's sake, both bishops, and monks and virgins, and those joined in marriage, towards persons both in high position and those of private condition, . . . inhabitants of Persia, and Britain, and all the isles" (Pallad. Hist. Laus. 118). The Arabic collection of canons, falsely ascribed to the council of Nicaea, says, "Faithful sons of the Church of God, when ye enter on a pilgrimage to pray and visit the houses of God, the places of His holiness, and the footsteps of His Christ, load not your bodies with meat and drink," &c. (Decr. Alia, 25; Hard. i. 520). Some eminent names are preserved. Philorhomus, a friend of St. Basil, "for a vow went twice on foot to Jerusalem to do honour to the holy places" (ibid. 113). Fabiola, who died in 399, sailed thither from Rome, and for a time was the guest and disciple of St. Jerome (Hier. Ep. 77 ad Ocean. 7). A few years later Marana and Cyra travelled from Beroea in Syria "to Aelia from a desire to behold the sacred places of Christ's sufferings" (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. 29). Peter, who was known to Theodoret when the latter was a child, is another example. In 421, Porphyrius of Gaza, then a young man, was seized with a "divine longing to adore the holy and venerable places of God" at Jerusalem. Not content with one visit, some five years later, though in great sickness, he went there again, and "non cessabat quotidie obire loca sancta, innitens baculo" (Vita Porph. i. 4, auct. Marco Diacon.) About this time also, Mark, his biographer, happened to "sail out of Asia to worship the holy places" (ibid. 5). The empress Eudocia went as a pilgrim to Jerusalem in 438 (Socrat. Hist. Eccl. vii. 47). She also spent there the last ten or eleven years of her life, and evinced her religious interest in the holy city by repairing its walls, founding monasteries, and building the church of St. Stephen at the place of his martyrdom (Evagr. Hist. Eccl. i. 21, 22). Licinius, bishop of Tours, A.D. 508, "is said to have been in the East and to have visited the places of the saints, and to have gone to Jerusalem itself, and often seen the places of the Lord's passion and resurrection, of which we read in the Gospels" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 39). Martin, a Pannonian by birth, afterwards bishop of the monastery of Dumium, and in 562 archbishop of Braga, "made a rapid voyage to the East to visit the holy places, and so imbued himself with learning as to be considered inferior to no one of his day" (ibid. v. 38; Isid. Hispal. De Vir. Illus. 45). Many other names might be given; but the details in each case are so scanty and devoid of interest, and so few of them come to us from authors of full credit, that it would be useless to attempt an account of all. There is one traveller, however, who visited Jerusalem in 690, the narrative of whose voyage is of great importance both from its fulness and authenticity. This was Arculphus, a French bishop, of see unknown, who, under the guidance of Peter, a Burgundian by birth, but living as a hermit in the Holy Land, saw the places of chief religious interest therein, and spent nine months at Jerusalem. On his return home, "driven by stress of weather to the western parts of Britain" (Bede, Hist. Eccl. v. 15), he became a guest of Adamnanus, the ninth abbat of Hy, who took down from his mouth an account of his pilgrimage, and a few years later presented it to king Alfred. The treatise of Bede de Sanctis Locis is founded on it, and some extracts are found in his History (v. 15-17); but the work itself is extant, and has been printed by Greter (Ingolst. 1619) and Mabillon (Acta SS. Ben. sac. 3). From this we may learn that many new discoveries and identifications were alleged to have been made since the days of Paula, by which the faith of the pilgrim was confirmed and rewarded. The cross was not then at Jerusalem, but its place was well supplied by the stone that had been at the door of the sepulchre, the cup used at the last supper ("which the whole people of the city treat with immense veneration"), the sponge, the spear, the handkerchief by which the head of our Lord was covered, a linen cloth woven by the blessed Virgin on which were wrought figures of our Lord and the twelve apostles, a pillar set up where the dead man was brought to life by the touch of the true cross (De Loc. Sanct. i. 4, 7-12). The spear, the sponge, the reed, and crown of thorns are mentioned by Gregory of Tours (Mirac. i. 7) in the 6th century, but the two latter were not seen by Arculphus. Outside Jerusalem he was taken to the Field of Blood, and the tree on which Judas hanged himself (17, 19). He saw (and is the first to mention) the footprints of Christ on the Mount of Ascension, miraculously permanent in the loose sand (22). At Bethlehem he was shewn a natural basin in the rock full of pure water, which had miraculously appeared on the spot where the water in which the infant Jesus was first washed had been thrown (ii. 3). There too he was conducted to the tombs of St. Jerome, the three shepherds, and Rachel (5-7), while in the valley of Mamre he found those of Adam and the three patriarchs (10). The remains of the oak of Mamre, splinters of which were in great request all over the world, were enclosed and covered by a church (11). In a chapel built near the place of our Lord's baptism, he saw preserved the garments in which He was baptized (16). A comparison of the present list with those given before shews that the taste and spirit of each age ruled the nature of the object proposed to its veneration. As superstition became more gross and childish, new food, such as it craved for, was still supplied.

About the year 725, Willibald, the nephew of St. Boniface, visited the Holy Land. Besides objects already mentioned, he saw the places in which the infants were slain, Dorcas restored to life, and where the Jews strove to take the body of the blessed Virgin from the apostles. He also found in the Church of the Sepulchre two columns marking the places on which the two angels (Acts i. 10) stood, and was told that "whoever could creep between the wall and those pillars was free from his sins" (Willib. Hodoeporicon in Basnag. Thesaur. Monum. Eccles. ii. p. i. 112, 113, Amstel. 1725). In the Itinerarium of later but uncertain age, falsely ascribed to Antoninus of Placentia, we observe the further progress of what we must, however reluctantly, deem imposture. For, to omit new identifications of place, we there read of the lamp "which had been placed at the head of our Lord when He was buried" (§ 18), of blood seen where He was crucified (ib.), of the altar on which Abraham was about to offer Isaac (19), the title which Pilate affixed to the cross, which the writer "held in his hand and kissed." A cross was also shewn as that on which Christ died, though the Itinerary seems to have been written long after that exhibited in Cyril's time had been carried away. He also saw the reed and the sponge ("cum qua spongia aquam bibimus") and "the cup of onyx-stone which the Lord blessed at the supper," a likeness of the blessed Virgin, and her girdle and head-band, &c. (20). In the church which had been the house of James, he found the horn with which David and other kings of Judah had been anointed, the crown of thorns, the spear, and many of the stones with which Stephen was stoned (22). The tract is, as the Bollandists describe it, "refertum fabellis plane anilibus" (Prolog. in Maii, tom. ii. Migne, n. lxxii. 897). We do not hear of the heavenly fire in the holy sepulchre on Easter Eve, an imposture practised to this day, until the ninth century. It is then mentioned by Bernard, a French pilgrim, who visited Jerusalem in 870 (De Locis Sanctis, § 10, in Acta Bened. iii. p. 2, p. 524). According to him, an angel came down and lighted the lamps hanging over the sepulchre; "of which light the patriarch gives to the bishops and the rest of the people, that they may make a light for themselves in their habitations." To this pilgrim also were pointed out some objects of reverence of which former travellers make no mention; as the iron gates through which the angel led St. Peter (§ 11), the place of the betrayal (§ 12), four round tables used at the Last Supper, the place where the adulteress was brought to Christ, and the words then written by Him, engraved on marble (§ 13).

II. Rome.—St. Chrysostom, throughout a long panegyric on St. Paul, dwells on his wish to visit Rome where his remains were treasured (Hom. xxxii. in Ep. ad Rom. 2, 3; Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Eph. 2). At this period Rome could already offer many attractions to pilgrims in the shrines and other memorials of St. Peter and St.

Paul, St. Lawrence, St. Cassian, St. Hippolytus, St. Agnes, &c. (see Prudentius de Coronis, hymn. 2, 9, 11, 12, 14).

"Innumeros cineres sanctorum Romula in urbe Vidimus" (Prud. u. s. 1, 1, 1).

Hence, and from the greater facility of reaching it, Rome became ere long a more common resort of European pilgrims than the Holy Land itself; e. g. Paulinus of Nola made an "annual journey" thither (Ep. 43 ad Desid. 1; Ep. 95, Aug. ad Paul. 6) "pro apostolorum et martyrum veneratione" (Ep. 45 ad Aug. 1). He describes himself as spending the forenoon on one of these visits in the memoriae of the apostles and martyrs (Ep. 17 ad Sever. 2). Letters are extant, written at Rome in 449 to Theodosius the younger by Galla Placidia, Valentinian, and his wife Eudoxia, the emperor's daughter, expressions in which show that the writers had gone to Rome from a motive of religion, "to pay worship to the most blessed apostle Peter" (Concil. Chalced. p. i. cc. 20-22, Hard. Conc. ii. 35-37). Galla, in a letter written to Pulcheria at the same time, says, "Ut Romam frequentibus concursionibus adaeque desideremus inspicere, causa nobis est amplectendae religionis, ut terminus sanctorum nostris exhiberemus praesentiam" (ibid.; in Greek, ap. Cotel. Monum. Gr. i. 62). Venantius, in his Life of St. Remigius, who died in 533, tells the story of a young girl whose wealthy friends conducted her in sickness from Toulouse "to the tomb of St. Peter in the city of Rome with a very great number of attendants and great devotion" (Vita, § 6).

From the foregoing testimonies, we may perhaps infer that during the first five centuries pilgrims went to Rome chiefly, if not entirely, for the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul. Compare even the later Gregory the Great, Epist. vi. 19; Hom. in Ecang. ii. 37, § 9. It is evident, however, that visitors from a great distance could not even at that period, and much less could they in the more troubled times that followed, arrive at Rome by a given day with anything like certainty. Hence, after the 7th century at least, we find pilgrims flocking thither at every part of the year. The first visit of St. Boniface was timed by the season and the affairs of his people (Vita auct. Willibaldo, v. 14). In his time great numbers went to Rome from England (Eangyth ad Bonif. Ep. 30, ed. Würdtus.). The stream had begun to flow about 653, when Benedict Biscop paid his first visit to Rome (Bede, Hist. Abbat. Wiremuth. § 2), to be soon followed by Wilfrid, who had been his companion for part of the way. In reference to the journey of the latter, Eddi Stephani, his friend, says expressly that "as yet that road was untrodden by our nation" (Vita Wilfr. § 3).

The "limina apostolorum" were the first objects visited by pilgrims and probably by all religious travellers to Rome. Thus Sidonius of himself, "Priusquam vel pomoeria contingerem triumphalibus apostolorum liminibus affusus" (Epp. i. 5), where he seems to refer to the shrine on the Ostian Way.

III. Other Shrines.—St. Chrysostom says that the burial-places of St. Peter and St. Paul, St. John and St. Thomas, alone among the apostles, were known in his day (Hom. xxvi. in Ep. ad Heb. 2). Of St. Thomas, Gregory of Tours tells us that

"in that part of India in which he first reposed" there was a church in which "by the virtue of the apostle" a lamp burnt perpetually without any renewal either of oil or wick. Thither, he says, "when his festival came, a great assemblage of the peoples gathered, and those from diverse regions coming with vows and merchandise" (Mirac. i. 32). A story told by Socrates (Hist. Eccl. iv. 18) seems to imply that Edessa, to which city his body, or a part of it, was translated, was equally frequented on that account. We read little of the tomb of St. John at Ephesus, but it is incidentally mentioned by John Moschus as visited with other shrines by an ascetic of the same name, who was wont to leave home "for the distant deserts, or for Jerusalem to worship the holy cross and the holy places, or for Mount Sinai to pray there, or for the martyrs at long distances from Jerusalem; for the old man was a great lover of martyrs, and would go away at one time to St. John at Ephesus, at another to St. Theodore at Euchaita, and again into Isauria to St. Thecla at Seleucia, and again to St. Sergius at Saphae, and journey one while to one saint, and another to another" (Prat. Spirit. 180). In the East, the tomb of Thecla had many visitors. In the West, St. Felix of Nola was one especially famous. If we may believe the poetical account of Paulinus, multitudes flocked to it at his festival from every part of Italy, even from Rome itself (Poem. xiv. Nat. iii. 54-85). Perhaps, however, no shrine was so popular with pilgrims in search of health as that of St. Martin at Tours, where he was reported to have performed numberless cures of which very many are recorded by Gregory, 573, one of his successors in the see (De Mirac. S. Martini, libr. iv.).

IV. Mural Inscriptions by Pilgrims.—The catacombs of Rome have preserved a great number of these graffiti traced with a stylus or with charcoal on the walls by the tombs of the most illustrious martyrs. Many of the earliest, ascribed to the 2nd or 3rd century, "merely express the names of the visitors; but others offer pious thoughts and touching prayers" (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. v. "Pèlerinage").

V. Motives to Pilgrimage.—(1) Research.—The first resort of pilgrims was to the Holy Land; and their purpose, research, which they conducted in a devout and reverential spirit. [See before, § I.]

(2) Vows.—If Eusebius is not merely speaking after the notions of his day, Alexander, the earliest pilgrim on record, combined research with the fulfilment of a vow. Vows are ascribed to Helena (Canonum Nicaen. Arab. Praef. Hard. Conc. i. 525). Palladius, as cited § I., evidently supposes that all who received the hospitality of Melania went to Jerusalem "for their vow's sake." Philorhomus and Eudocia, mentioned before (ibid.), had both vowed a pilgrimage; the latter, if she should see her daughter married (Socr. Hist. Eccl. vii. 47). Paulinus, describing his own visit to Rome, speaks thus: "Ipsum temporis ante meridiem in votis nostris quorum cura veneramus per apostolorum et martyrum sacras memorias consumentes" (Ep. 17, § 2). Wilfrid, 653, has made vows to visit Rome (Eddi Steph. in Vita 4), and long after him Canute, after such a pilgrimage, says of himself, "Hanc quidem perfectionem jam olim devoveram" (Gul. Malmesb.

de Reb. Gest. Reg. Angl. ii. 11, fol. 41 B, Lond. 1596). So a nun in Flodoard makes a vow with others "ut iret ad locum sancti pignoris," viz. a relic of St. Helen (Hist. Eccles. Remens. ii. 9).

(3) Baptism.—It is probable that many catechumens sought the Holy Land from an early period that they might be baptized in the Jordan. Constantine, in 337, when asking for baptism of the bishops at Nicomedia, says, "I intended formerly to do this at the stream of the Jordan; at which our Saviour is recorded to have received the washing for an example to us" (Euseb. Vita Const. iv. 62). Eusebius (De Locis Hebraicis) says of "Bethabara beyond Jordan where John was baptizing" (St. John i. 28), "where also many of the brethren to this day are anxious to receive the washing"; or as St. Jerome paraphrases his words, "desiring to be reborn there, are baptized in the life-giving flood" (De Sit. et Nom. Loc. Hebr. Opp. tom. iii. col. 182, ed. Vallars.). If Pseudo-Amphilochius may be trusted, St. Basil and Eubulus intreated the bishop of Jerusalem that they might "receive divine regeneration in the river Jordan," which was permitted (Vita Basil. 4). See another example, Prat. Spirit. 138. The eve of the Epiphany was the usual time for such baptisms, at which the people carried away of the consecrated water to sprinkle their ships with it before they went to sea, and dipped themselves "pro benedictione," and linen clothes which they kept for their burial (Itinerarium Antonini Plac. 11). In the account of the pilgrimage of St. Willibald, written in 765, we read, "On the Jordan, where the Lord was baptized, there is now a church raised on stone piers, and beneath the church is now dry land, where the Lord was baptized" (Hodoeporicon S. Will. in Basnage, Thesaur. Monum. ii. p. i. p. 111).

A similar sentiment seems to have led some catechumens to Rome. Thus Cædwal, king of Wessex, A.D. 688, resigning his crown, "went to Rome, desiring to obtain for himself this special glory, viz. to be washed in the fount of baptism at the thresholds of the blessed apostles" (Bede, Hist. Eccl. Angl. v. 7).

(4) Devotion.—The object of most pilgrims, however, is best described as prayer in some holy place or before some holy thing. Faith was confirmed and devotion inflamed by sight; and the more fervent the prayer the more acceptable was it deemed, from whatever cause its greater fervour might arise. Peter the Galatian visited Palestine, that "gazing on the places that had witnessed the saving sufferings he might in them worship God the Saviour; not as if He were circumscribed by place, . . . but that he might feast his eyes with the contemplation of the things he desired" (Theodoret, Hist. Reliq. 9). This is the spirit which we observe in Paula (Epist. ad Marcell. § 5; Ep. 46, inter Hieron. Epp.). We have already (§ 1) seen such emotions ascribed to Paula by St. Jerome in terms which shew how highly he valued and respected them; though reason and experience led him to warn the ordinary Christian against the same pilgrimage. [See HOLY PLACES, § II. Vol. I. p. 775.]

The motive of such pilgrims was therefore a loving desire to trace the footsteps of Christ and the saints; while they knew and confessed that an equal devotion elsewhere would have met with an equal reward. This is implied by Theodoret (above); and so St. Jerome: "I dare not confine the omnipotence of God to one narrow corner of the world. . . . From Jerusalem and from Britain the court of heaven is equally open." (Epist. 58 ad Paulin. 2, 3; comp. Paula, u. s. § 10.) St. Chrysostom: "It is not necessary to make a pilgrimage, or travel to distant lands, or to undergo dangers and toils; but only to have the will" (Hom. i. in Ep. ad Philem. § 2). "There is no occasion to cross the sea, and to make a long pilgrimage. Let us, every man and woman, both when gathered at church and remaining at home, call on God with great earnestness and He will certainly grant our prayers." (Hom. iii. ad Antioch. 2.) Gregory of Nyssa, dissuading from the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, says, "Change of place does not make God nearer;" but wherever thou art, God will be with thee there, if the tabernacle of the soul be found such that the Lord may dwell in thee and walk in thee" (de Eunt. Hieros. ii. 1087).

(5) Prayer for a Specific Benefit.—There was, nevertheless, some inconsistency on this point in the teaching of the fathers of that period. They sometimes spoke as if God were more easily propitiated at the shrines of the martyrs than elsewhere. [See PATRON SAINTS].

Where once this opinion of the prerogative of prayer at a martyr's shrine became general, it necessarily gave a great impetus to pilgrimages. Men were ready to travel any distance to obtain certainly a benefit, which prayer could not procure for them at home. The restoration of health was the boon most commonly sought; but nothing was supposed to be beyond the power or the goodwill of the martyr. Some, therefore, asked for children (Basil. Hom. in xl. Mart. 8), some for success in business (id. Hom. in Mam. 1) or war (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. ii. 37), or for the continuance of peace (ibid. iii. 28), or for the detection of guilt and vindication of innocence (Aug. Epist. lxxviii. 3). Others prayed for the souls of the departed. To a son who is represented asking, in reference to a pious father, "Why should I pray for him, why give alms, why fast, why visit the bodies of the saints?" the assurance is given, "It is a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead (2 Macc. xii. 46), . . . and to make pilgrimages that they may be released from their sins" (Pseudo-Aug. Serm. ad Fratr. in Eremito, 44; Opp. S. Aug. app. v). With equal confidence men undertook pilgrimages as a means of obtaining spiritual benefits for themselves. Thus Caesarius, A.D. 502, thought that grace to overcome sinful habits would be granted to the pilgrim: "Frequenting the threshold of the saints, they would implore their help against the sins themselves" (Serm. 60, § 3). Victory over sin would insure its forgiveness; and this, also, the penitent pilgrim asked for in direct terms. E. g. Lothair, A.D. 560, "in the 51st year of his reign, sought the threshold of St. Martin with many gifts, and arriving at Tours, at the tomb of the said prelate, unfolded all the actions which he had done amiss, and prayed with great groans that the blessed confessor would beg the mercy of God for his faults" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. iv. 21). Similarly, Pepin, in 768, went to Tours to implore St. Martin "that he would deign to beseech the mercy of God for his crimes" (Fredegar. Hist. Greg. Con- tin. iv. 135). In England also, during the same century, we find persons planning a visit to Rome, "that there they might obtain the pardon of their sins" (Cangyth ad Bonif. Ep. 30 inter Epp. Bonif. ed. Würdtw.). Wilfrid went to Rome, "ab ea [sc. sede Apostolica] omnem modum maculae solvendum sibi credens" (Vita, § 3).

Such voluntary penitents were known by their habit from the 6th century downwards, but I cannot discover what its peculiarities were. Venantius Fortunatus, 560, relating an old tradition, represents one whom he calls "righteous and holy" as "going the round of very many villages and cities in the winter season, wearing the habit of a penitent, in search of the medicine of his soul" (Vita S. Maurilii, 24). I do not take this as evidence of a practice much earlier than the age of the writer.

(6) Penance.—Pilgrimages voluntarily undertaken in the hope of obtaining the pardon of sin, naturally suggested the imposition of pilgrimage as a public penance. Morinus (de Sacram. Pœnit. viii. 17, § 1) supposes that this custom did not begin before the 7th century; but even if Caesarius (u. s.) refers to voluntary pilgrimages only, a passage in Gregory of Tours is sufficient to prove it earlier. He relates that, about the year 539, "a certain fratricide, bound with iron rings for the enormity of his crime, was ordered to make the circuit of the places of the saints for seven years" (de Glor. Confess. 87). The penance here described was afterwards common in the cases of aggravated murder, the rings being made from the weapon with which the crime had been committed: "Ipso decernente pontifice, ex ipso gladio ferrei nexus componantur, et collum peccatoris, venter atque brachia, strictim innectantur ex ipsis ferreis vinculis" (Mirac. SS. Floriani et Florentii, Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. vi. iv. 2; see also Baluze, Not. in Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 1198).

The earliest canons which prescribe pilgrimage as a penance do not, as we shall see, mention the holy places; but that they were visited by the professed penitents may be shewn from other documents. The Pœnitentiale of Theodore of Canterbury, A.D. 688, condemns a bishop, for certain sins, to be deposed, to be twenty-five years in penance, to fast five on bread and water, and to "end the days of his life in pilgrimage" (Morinus, u. s. vii. 15, § 1). Egbert, archbishop of York, 732, of a homicide: "For we will that he perform penance in a foreign land ten years" (Pœnitentiale, i. p. i. 24). [EXILE.] The murderer of an ordained person was to "leave his country and possessions and go to Rome to the pope, and then do as the pope should order him" (Pœnit. iv. 6). The council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813, while condemning pilgrimages from wrong motives, yet declares that the devotion of those who, having confessed sin to their parish priest and received his counsel to that effect, "desire to visit the thresholds of the apostles or any of the saints, persevering in prayer, giving alms, amending their life, and correcting their manners, is altogether worthy of commendation" (can. 45). From this century downwards, many great criminals resorted to Rome to obtain mitigation of the penance imposed by their own bishop. Nicholas I., 867, writing to a bishop with reference to such a case, says: "Undique etenim venientes admodum plurimi, suorum facinorum proditores, quantum dolorem inferant pectori nostro, plus singultu reminiscimur quam calamo scribi queat. Inter quos videlicet istum Wimarum ad apostolorum limina festinasse cognoscite." This man had murdered his three sons; yet the pope lightened his penance (Epist. Nic. 136 ad Rivoladrum). We see here one of the many ways in which the action of the popes, ever anxious to keep up by exercise the authority which they had acquired, tended to the destruction of all discipline. In such pilgrimages also we trace the origin of reserved cases, i.e. of the practice of referring some great sins to Rome for absolution.

VI. Letters of Commendation.—Pilgrims received letters from their bishops, abbats, or other superiors, to attest their bonâ fide character, addressed to the secular as well as ecclesiastical authorities. Forms of such letters are extant. One runs thus: "Quatenus praesens portitor ille, non (ut plerisque mos est) vacandi causa, sed propter nomen Domini, itinera ardua et laboriosa parvipendens, ob lucrandam orationem limina sanctorum Apostolorum Domini Petri et Pauli adire cupiens," &c. (Marculfi Formulae, ii. 49; Indiculum Generale ad Omnes Homines). Another says of the pilgrim: "Petiit nobis ut ad basilicam S. Petri patris vestri pro suis culpis, vel pro nostra stabilitate, valeat ambulare ad orationem. Propterea has literas cum salutatione per ipsum ad vos direximus ut in amore Dei et S. Petri ipsum ad hospitium recipiatis," &c. (Formulae, Bignon. xv. Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 503, Charta Tractoria). Such letters were given to public penitents on whom a pilgrimage was imposed. Thus in a third form the bishop or abbat, after reciting the crime, adds: "Nos pro hac causa, secundum consuetudinem vel canonicam institutionem, diducimus ut in lege peregrinorum ipse praefatus vir annis tot in peregrinatione ambulare deberet." He therefore begs them, as the penitent is only wandering "pro peccatis suis redimendis," to give him shelter, fire, bread and water, "et postea sine detentione liceat ei ad loca sanctorum festinare" (Marculf. App. 10, Tractoria pro Itinere peragendo). This shews conclusively how the period of exile was expected to be spent. Among the extant letters of Alcuin is one in favour of a pilgrim friend addressed "amicis per diversas nominum dignitates." He calls it "litterae precatiorae" (Ep. 210, Commend. ad Amic.). The bishops of Rome furnished pilgrim penitents with similar letters for their return home. The form in the Liber Diurnus Rom. Pont. begins thus: "Praesentium latores pro sua devotione liminibus beatorum principum apostolorum praesentati, petierunt ut, a nobis relaxati, valeant ad propria remeare" (cap. vi. tit. x. Item Tractoria).

VII. Other Encouragements and Helps.—Hospitality to pilgrims, both on the road and on their arrival at the shrine, was inculcated as a sacred duty. Men were reminded that what they did unto them was done unto Christ (Car. M. 802, Capit. i. 27), and that they might hope to find that they had entertained angels unawares (Conc. Aquisgr. 789, can. 75). The council now quoted addressed a decree to all laymen and clerks: "Hoc nobis compertens et venerabile videtur ut hospites, peregrini et pauperes sus-ceptiones regulares et canonicas per loca diversa habeant" (ibid.). In 802 Charlemagne proclaimed a law that "none within his dominions, rich or poor, should venture to deny hospitality to pilgrims; that is," he explains, "let no one for the love of God and his soul's health refuse shelter, fire, and water, either to pilgrims walking through the land for God's sake or to any traveller" (Capit. i. 27). Of Charlemagne himself, Eginhard says: "He loved travellers [peregrinos] and bestowed great pains on their entertainment; so that their number seemed (without unreasonable complaint) burdensome not to the palace only but to the kingdom" (Vita, § 21). This was in accordance with the teaching of Alcuin: "Regum merces in miserorum juvamine, et maxime peregrinorum sacra sancti Petri principis apostolorum limina petentium, magna apud divinam constat esse clementiam" (Ep. 26 ad Angilbertum). Herard of Tours, 858, charges his presbyters to "love hospitality above all things" and to "undertake the care of widows, pilgrims," &c. (cap. 18).

In many places permanent hostels were erected for the reception of strangers, especially religious pilgrims. Such a house was called xenodochium ("xen.; id est locus venerabilis in quo peregrini suscipiuntur"; Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 29) or hospitale peregrinorum (because in it were entertained "peregrini et pauperes, in quibus specialiter Christus suscipitur"; Capit. Carol. Calv. tit. xxviii. 10). "On the mount of Nitria," says Palladius, "was a xenodochium in which the monks entertained any guest who presented himself throughout the time of his stay, even if he wished to remain there two or three years" (Hist. Laus. 7). Claudia, the mother of St. Eugenia, "built a xenodochium at Alexandria, and settled lands to serve for the reception of travellers" (Vita Eugen. 19; Rosweyd, 346). John the Almoner, who became patriarch in 609, is said to have built several in the same city (Leontius, Vita Joan. 49). There appears to have been such an institution at Rome in the 7th century; for pope Martin, in his exile, A.D. 654, speaking of the hospitality accorded at Rome to Pyrrhus the heretic, when he went "ad vestigia beati Petri," says: "Quisquis venit illuc miserabilis homo hospitari, omnia ad usum praeberunt ei, et nullum immunem suis donis S. Petrus repellit venientium illuc; sed panis mundissimus et vina diversa dantur, non solum ei, sed et hominibus ei pertinentibus" (Commemoratio, Hard. Conc. iii. 684). Zachary of Rome, 742, ordered frequent gifts of food to be taken "peregrinis qui ad beatum Petrum morantur" (Anast. Bibl. Vit. Pont. 93), where the last word seems to imply a residence provided for them. Leo III., 795, gave lands "pro alimoniis Christi pauperum, seu advenis, vel peregrinis, qui ex longinquis regionibus veniunt" (ibid. 98), and he is supposed to have built for their use the hospital of St. Peregrinus, which was afterwards largely endowed by Paschal, A.D. 817 (ib. 100). Louis the Godly, A.D. 814, assigned a property near Vienne to this use: "Reddimus etiam ibi quandam villam quae vocatur Fasiana, quam volumus ad susceptionem peregrinorum et alimonia pauperum ibidem futuris proficere temporibus" (Precept. Lud. Pii, Baluze, Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 1404). The council of Aachen, 816, ordered canons to provide a "house of reception in which the poor could be gathered," over which a brother should be set "to entertain strangers and pilgrims who came there" (Capit. i. 141).

VIII. The Washing of Pilgrims' Feet.—This was an observance on which great stress was laid. Thus Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502, enumerates among the acts of Christian virtue "sanctorum peregrinantium pedes humiliter abluere" (Serm. 62, § 3; similarly, 57, § 4; 67, § 2). Another Western homilist enforces the duty at some length from our Lord's example and words, St. John xiii. 4 (Serm. 149, § 1, in App. iv. ad Opp. S. Aug. ed. Ben.) The monks of Fulda, in a petition to Charlemagne, say: "Quod peregrinorum suscepio et lavatio in eis pedum non negligatur, sed secundum regulam et secundum priorum nostrorum consuetudinem, quandocunque venerint, misericorditer suscipiantur, et ab omnibus patribus lavatio pedum eis exhibeatur" (Libellus, c. 13, in Baluze, Not. ad Capit. Reg. Fr. ii. 1086). In the same age some monks sent by their abbat to gather hints from the monastery at Reichenau report to him that there "they wash the feet of pilgrims every week-day, with psalmsinging on their way to it and back" (Capit. Monach. 3, Baluze, u. s. App. Actor. Vet. ii. 1380). Monks were especially tied to this observance on Maundy Thursday, the day on which the precept (mandatum) was given. Thus the council of Aachen, 817: "That the Maundy (if it be the time of the Supper) both of the fathers and of travellers [peregrinorum] take place" (can. 24, Cap. Reg. Fr. i. 583). These latter testimonies probably refer to all travellers, religious and secular; for the original rule of Benedict (c. 53) included all. Compare S. Fructuosi Regula, c. 10. St. Columba, 560, expecting visitors, says: "Draw water to wash our guests' feet" (Vita auct. Adamn. i. 4).

IX. Protection on the Road.—From an early period pilgrims were put under the especial protection of the law. A decree of Dagobert, A.D. 630, says: "Let no one dare to molest or hurt a traveller abroad; for some go about for God's sake, others for necessary business. Nevertheless, the same peace is necessary for all" (Tit. iii. 4; comp. Cap. Reg. Fr. v. 364). Pepin of Italy, 793: "Touching strangers and pilgrims, who, in the service of God, are hastening to Rome or to other places to the bodies of the saints, that they go and return in safety under our protection" (Leg. Longob. i. ix. 28). Charlemagne, writing in 796 to Offa, king of the Mercians, promises safe-conduct to English pilgrims passing through his dominions: "Touching pilgrims who desire to go to the threshold of the blessed apostles for the love of God, and the health of their own souls, let them go in peace, without any molestation" (Baluze, Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 274).

X. Exemption from Toll.—The words "without any molestation," used by Charlemagne above, intimated freedom from every impost paid by travellers to the crown. For he proceeds: "But if any, not in the service of religion, but in pursuit of gain are found among them, let them pay the appointed tolls at the proper places." This, however, was already an old privilege, having been granted by Pepin in 755: "Touching pilgrims who travel for the sake of God, that they take from them no tolls" (in Synod. Vernensi, 22). Two years later, at Metz, he expressed this more fully: "That ye on no account detain those who are on their way to Rome or elsewhere for the sake of God at the bridges and dams or on the ferry-boat, nor make any accusation against any pilgrim on account of his baggage, nor take any toll of them" (Syn. Met. c. 6).

XI. Evils of Pilgrimage.—The moral danger to the pilgrim is obvious, and bad results were early noticed. Gregory of Nyssa, A.D. 370, urged against pilgrimage to the Holy Land that not only was there no command for it, but pilgrims suffered a spiritual loss through it. He dwells on the wickedness of those cities in the East, through which they had to pass, and asserts that it penetrated into the lodgings and hostels which they were obliged to frequent, and asks in a proverb, "How can one pass through the smoke without smarting eyes?" (De Eunt. Hieros. ii. 1085.) Nor does he deem Jerusalem itself less wicked, or less full of danger. [See HOLY PLACES, II. vol. i. p. 775.] St. Jerome (ibid.), A.D. 393, gives similar testimony. Our countryman, Boniface, bears witness to the existence of the same evils in Europe. For, writing to Cuthbert of Canterbury, about 743, he alleges that the pilgrimage to Rome was almost certainly fatal to female chastity: "They are ruined in great part, few remaining chaste." "There are very few cities in Lombardy, or France, or Gaul, in which there is not an adulteress or prostitute of the English nation; which is a scandal, and the disgrace of the whole church." (Epist. ad Cuthb. 8.) He suggested that women should be restrained by authority from making the pilgrimage. In France the council of Châlons-sur-Saône, 813, denounced other evils of which pilgrimages were the occasion: "A very great error is committed by certain persons, who ill-advisedly travel to Rome or Tours and certain other places under the pretence of prayer. There are presbyters and deacons and other clerks, who living carelessly think themselves thereby cleansed from their sins, and entitled to return to the exercise of their ministry, if they reach the aforesaid places. There are also laymen, who think that they are sinning, or have sinned, with impunity, because they frequent those places for prayer. There are also some of the powerful who, to gain revenue, under pretence of the journey to Rome or Tours, make a great gathering, oppress many of the poor, and affect to do for the sake of their devotions, or of a visit to the holy places, that which they do in truth from covetousness alone. There are also poor persons who undertake it either merely to have a better plea for begging (of whose number are they who, wandering to all parts, falsely assert that they are going there), or because they are so senseless as to think themselves cleansed from their sins by the mere sight of holy places" (can. 45).

XII. Nomenclature.—At a later period a pilgrim to Rome was called "Romipeta" or "Romeus"; in Auvergne, "Romoneou"; in Provence, "Romieu"; &c. (Ducange); in France generally "Romier"—names given at length to all vagrants; whence probably the English verb "to roam." Similarly, it is said, a pilgrim to the Holy Land (Sancta Terra) was a "saunterer." Those who had been there, brought home branches of the palm, and were thence called "palmeri," "palmarii," "palmati," French, "paumiers"; and sometimes in France, "ramiers" (Gretser de Sac. Peregr. ii. 11).

On this subject, Zaccaria (Bibliographia Selecta, iii. ix. 2, in Fleury's Discipl. Pop. Dei, Ven. 1761) refers us to P. F. X. Mannhart de Antiquitatibus Christianorum, § 5, n. 84 seq., Aug. PILLAR SAINTS. [MORTIFICATION.]

PINNAS, Scythian martyr with Innas; commemorated Jan. 20. (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

PINYTUS, bishop of Gnosus in Crete; commemorated Oct. 10 (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. v. 9). [C. H.]

PIONIUS, martyr at Smyrna; commemorated Feb. 1 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 40). [C. H.]

PIONUS, presbyter and martyr with Metrodorus at Nicomedia; commemorated March 12 (Florus, Mart. ap. Bed.); Pion and Metrodus, two martyrs at Smyrna, occur on this day in Hieron. Mart. [C. H.]

PISALIS, PISELIS, PISELUM (Gallice, Poêle), or PYRALE, the same as the CALEFACTORIUM, a chamber in a monastery heated in winter, either by an open fireplace as at St. Gall, or with hot-water pipes, which served as the common room of the brethren, for social intercourse. Its usual place was under the dormitory on the east side of the cloisters ("Reginboldus . . . aedificavit primum dormitorium subtus autem pisalem;" Act. Murensis Monast. p. 9, ap. Du Cange.) At St. Gall it had an outlet communicating with the necessarium. Fires were lighted in it from November 1. "A calendis Novembris concedetur fratribus accessus ignis, locus aptus fratribus designetur cujus refrigerio hybernalis algoris et intemperies levigatur" (Concord. Regular. S. Dunst. Cant. Mon. Angl. i. xxxiv.). Adelard (Statuta Corbeiens. c. 6), speaks of the Piselum as only in temporary use, "piselo . . . tempore quando illo uti necesse est" (ap. Du Cange, sub voc.) Du Cange is in error in identifying it with the wardrobe. At St. Gall, the house of the novices and the infirmary had each their separate Pisalis for the use of the inmates. [See CHURCH, Vol. I. p. 383, MONASTERY.] [E. V.]

PISCICULI. [FISH: ΙΧΘΥΣ.]

PISCINA, a designation of the font, for which Optatus gives a mystical reason in connexion with the acrostichal name of Christ (ΙΧΘΥΣ, piscis), "Hic est piscis qui in baptismo per invocationem fontinalibus undis inseritur, ut quae aqua fuerat a pisce etiam piscina vocitetur" (Optat. lib. iii. p. 62, Paris, 1631). Piscina was also the designation for the infundibulum, or basin to the right (south) of the altar, in which the ministering priest washed his hands before he commenced the Eucharistic service (Cyril. Hieros. Catech. Mystagog. v. 2; August. Quaest. Vet. et Nov. Test. c. i. 101; Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, IV. i. 112). [E. V.]

PISTIS, martyr with Elpis, Agape, and their mother Sophia; commemorated Sept. 16 (Basil. Menol.), Sept. 17 (Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 269). [C. H.]

PISTUS, martyr with his brothers Theognis and Agapius sons of Valerius and Bassa; commemorated Aug. 21 (Basil. Menol.); a martyr of the same name, with no mention of the family, occurs on this day in Hieron. Mart. [C. H.]

PLACIDUS, martyr with Euticius and others in Sicily; commemorated Oct. 5 (Usuard. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 114; Hieron. PLACITUS). [C. H.]

PLAGAL. The name given to four scales or modes added by St. Gregory to those fixed for the church chants as settled by St. Ambrose. The former were called Authentic (v. AUTHENTIC), and bore the names Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian, and Mixolydian, ranging respectively through the octaves D—d, E—e, F—f, G—g. The Plagal modes were called Hypodorian, Hypophrygian, Hypolydian, and Hypomixolydian, and were placed a fourth below these respectively, ranging from A—a, B—b, C—c, and D—d; but their "final" or "tonic" was the same as before, viz.: D, E, F, G. Thus the Hypomixolydian mode differed from the Dorian, although it was contained in the same octave D—d, in that the division of the octave in the respective cases were thus:—

Dorian.

Hypomixolydian.

The prevailing note, or "dominant," was lower than the corresponding authentic dominant, being respectively F, a, a, c (see also MUSIC). These modes were called the 2nd, 4th, 6th, and 8th; and at an earlier period Plagis prothi, Plagis deuteri, Plagis triti, Plagis tetrardi. Each was considered as "related" to the corresponding authentic mode. This may be illustrated, but not represented, by the modern use, in which A minor is said to be the "relative minor" of C, or in which, by some authorities, C minor is claimed to be, in another sense, a "relative minor" of C. An illustration of the fact that two modes may consist of the same notes, may be given by the different treatment of the versicles and responses now in use in cathedrals: assuming the priest's reciting note to be G, on week-days they are often, and perhaps usually, heard sung harmonised with the plain song in the Treble, and, for the most part, in the tonality of G; but on Sundays and festivals, when Tallis's harmonies are used, the same plain song is put into the Tenor, and the prevailing tonality is C.

In consequence of the relationship between the authentic modes and their corresponding Plagals, more extended compositions are to be found in both combined, a practice the modern musicians have largely imitated. [Compare Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte, i. 5; ii. 2, &c.; Handel's chorus, "He saw the lovely youth" (Theodora); Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Mozart's Pianoforte Quartett in G minor; Weber's Overture, Der Freischütz, and many others.] This changing of modes or scales was known in the time of Euclid, by whom it is called μεταβολή (Introd. Harm.); but although apparently unrestricted by him, it would seem to have been restricted by the church composers to the pair of authentic and plagal modes corresponding to each other. A very good example of this, but of a later period, is the plain song tune to the Dies Irae (Hymnal Noted No. 46); the first two stanzas are set in the Hypodorian mode, the third and fourth in the Dorian itself. [J. R. L.]

PLANETA. In a previous article [PAENULA] we have endeavoured to trace out the history of the word under which the eucharistic super-vestment in the Greek church is designated. In the western church, since the end of the 8th century, this vestment has been almost universally known as casula, but so far as notices are found of such a vestment as in use before that date, the word used is planeta.^a Like casula, however, and φανόλης, the word is not restricted to its eucharistic meaning, and we shall presently cite instances in which it is found for a dress worn by laymen.

In all probability, we may assume that the paenula, planeta, and casula were to all intents and purposes the same dress, differing, that is, merely in points of detail: and as regards the two latter words, while it is true that later liturgiologists absolutely identify them (e.g. Rabanus Maurus, infra), shewing that in process of time all distinction had been lost, yet it is clear that at an earlier period a slightly different idea was conveyed by the two terms; the planeta being a more costly, and the casula a commoner dress, the latter term also being perhaps a provincial or popular name for the more general expression paenula.

Thus we find the casula as a dress of monks and peasants and working men (see the article), but references are met with to the planeta, as something too costly for monks to wear, and as actually in use by senators and nobles. Our earliest instance of the use of the name occurs early in the 5th century. Cassian, writing not later than 417 or 418 A.D., when describing the dress of the Egyptian monks, mentions the mafors, or the short cloak which they wore covering the neck and shoulders. "Thus," he says, "they avoid at once the cost and the ostentatiousness of planetæ and birri" (de Cœnobiorum Institutis, 1-7; Patrol. xlix. 72). The exact term used by Cassian is, it may be remarked, planetica, which we may assume to be a diminutive of planeta. In like manner, Isidore of Seville, two hundred years later, in his Rule forbids to his monks the use of the planeta:—"orarium, birros, planetas, non est fas uti, neque indumenta vel calceamenta, quæ generaliter cætera monasteria abutuntur [i.e. do not use]" (Regula Monachorum, c. 12, § 2; Patrol. lxxxiii. 882).

The planeta would thus appear to be a dress whose costliness rendered it unsuitable for the use of simple monks, whose duty it was to avoid luxury. It was apparently a full flowing robe, for Cassian (supra) contrasts it with the angustum palliolum which the monks were to wear. With this agrees the notice given us by Isidore of the derivation of the word. As there are some difficulties connected with the passage, we give it at length. "The casula," he says, "is a robe with a hood, derived as a diminutive from casa [a house], because it covers the whole person—a sort of miniature casa. Similar is the origin of cuiculla—a sort of miniature cella. I may add that the Greeks hold that one of their names for these robes, planetæ, is derived from their free and flowing borders" [sic et Graeci planetas dictos volunt, quia oris errantibus evagantur]. Hence the term planetary stars; that is, roving stars; stars which roll here and there with a roving maze and motion of their own" (Etym. lib. xix. 24; Patrol. lxxxii. 691). On this passage one or two remarks may be briefly made. After the derivation of casula has been given as a "little house," follows the mention of the planeta, introduced by the words sic et. Of course, however, the derivation in the latter case is on a totally different groove; therefore the sic points to a similarity not of the derivation, but of the thing itself. That is to say, Isidore practically identifies the planeta with the casula. Again the derivation of planeta is of course from the Greek, and as will be seen, Isidore distinctly implies that the name planeta was actually given to the dress by the Greeks. Excepting, however, a remark of Rabanus Maurus, which we shall presently quote, there does not appear to be any further evidence forthcoming to shew that the word planeta is ever used in Greek in that sense. This might tend to prove that the word passed from Greek into Latin in its astronomical sense, and that the then Latin word developed this new metaphorical meaning. Whether, however, the difficulty is to be explained by supposing that evidence of usage existed to Isidore, that is not forthcoming to us, or whether Isidore was misled into his statement by the Greek derivation, does not appear.

It has been already remarked that the planeta seems to have been a dress of a somewhat costly description, suitable for men of rank. This can be shewn not only by the prohibitions to monks we have already cited, but by direct instances. In a life of Fulgentius (ob. A.D. 533), by one of his disciples, a description is given of his triumphal return to Carthage after his exile. A heavy storm of rain coming on, the nobles used their planetæ to form a shelter for Fulgentius—"tantum fides nobilium crevit, ut planetis suis super beatum Fulgentium granatrum expansis, repellent imbres et novum tabernaculi genus artificiosa caritate componerent" (c. 29; Patrol. lxxv. 146). Again, in the well-known representation of Gregory the Great, with his father and mother, which is described by his biographer, John the deacon, in the 10th century, not only Gregory himself, an ecclesiastic, wears the planeta, but also his father Gordianus, a senator. The former wore a "planeta super dalmaticam castanea" (lib. iv. c. 84; Patrol. lxxv. 231); and as to the latter, "Gordiani habitus castanei coloris planeta est, sub planeta dalmatica" (c. 83). It may fairly be inferred from hence that, as late as the end of the 6th century at any rate, the planeta, whatever its use by ecclesiastics, whether for official use or otherwise, was also a dress which any gentleman might fairly use. In another passage of the same biography (lib. ii. c. 24; op. cit. 104), the reference is not quite clear. A certain person having been excluded by Gregory from communion for adultery, sought the aid of sorcerers, who undertook that the bishop's horse should throw him as he rode in procession. The plan, however, was readily foiled by the bishop. In the narrative the expression occurs: "When the sorcerers recognized the prelate, ex planetarum mappulatumque processionibus." The mappula, whatever its nature may have been, was, as we have shewn in a previous article [MANIPLE], a special privilege of the chief ecclesiastics of the Roman church in Gregory's time. The planeta we have seen to be worn by laymen as well as clerics. It seems to us, therefore, impossible to define the matter very exactly here; we can only say that the two sets of people specified were the officials of high rank in attendance on the bishops of Rome; but whether these are to be viewed as exclusively clerical, or formed of clerics and laics both, is doubtful. Ducauge (s. v. Planeta) explains the two classes as deacons and subdeacons respectively; and Marriott (p. 202, n.) considers the planetati to be presbyters and high officials, and the mappulati to be deacons and subdeacons. We doubt, however, whether the evidence is sufficient to justify us in coming to a definite conclusion.

Thus far, we have seen that in the 6th century the planeta was not an exclusively clerical dress, either at Rome or in North Africa. Further, there appears to be no allusion whatever in the records of the first six centuries which points to the planeta as part of the ministerial garb of the Christian clerics. So far as it was worn by clerics, it was in virtue of their official rank, not their clerical profession, the privilege being one shared with laymen.

The earliest instance in which the planeta is referred to as something specially pertaining to the Christian ministry is in a canon of the fourth council of Toledo (633 A.D.). Here it is ordered that if a bishop, priest, or deacon shall have been unjustly deposed, and shall afterwards be found innocent, he is still not to regain his lost rank till he shall have received before the altar, from the hands of a bishop, the external badge of that rank. This is in the case of a bishop, stole, ring, and pastoral staff; in the case of a priest, stole and planeta; in the case of a deacon, stole and alb, and so forth (can. 28, Labbe, v. 1714). A later notice, but of a less definite character, is found in the Regula Canonico-rum (c. 8; Patrol. lxxxix. 1102) of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, A.D. 743-766, which orders that canons living "foris claustra" and in the city must attend the chapter every Sunday, "cum planetis vel vestimentis officialibus."

From about the year A.D. 800, the term planeta was in great measure superseded by casula, the two words being thenceforward viewed as absolutely synonymous (see e.g. Rabanus Maurus de Inst. Cler. lib. i. c. 21; Patrol. cvii. 309). [Casulam . . . hanc Graeci planetam nominant], Honorius Augustodunensis [supra]; Innocent III. de Sacro Altaris Mysterio, i. 42; Patrol. ccxvii. 789 [casula vel planeta]. For further illustrations on this point, see Ducange (s. v.).

We may call attention here to a similar extension of the use of the term planeta to that which we have already referred to as existing in the case of the phenolion in the Greek church. In an Ordo Romanus (viii. 1; Patrol. lxxviii. 1000), we find the planeta, as a garment, worn at ordination by acolytes, sub-deacons, and deacons. Whether these differed in shape from the priestly planeta is doubtful; but as the matter falls outside our period we shall not pursue the subject further (cf. ib. xiv. 54; Patrol. lxxviii. 1170).

Literature.—For the matter of the foregoing article, we are mainly indebted to Bock, Gesch. der liturgischen Gewänder des Mittelalters, vol. i. p. 427; vol. ii. pp. 101, 245; Hefele, Beiträge zu Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie und Liturgik, vol. ii. p. 195; Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum, App. C.; and Ducange, Glossarium, s. v. PLANETICUS, PLANETARIUS, an astrologer. The former word seems to have originated in a false reading of St. Augustine, Confess. iv. iii. 4: "Illos planeticos quos mathematicos vocant," where we should read planos. Thence it found its way into Gratian, Decr. p. ii. c. 26, qu. 2, cap. 8. PLANETARIUS occurs in John of Salisbury: "Mathematici, vel planetarii, dum professionis suae potentiam dilatare nituntur, in erroris et impietatis mendacia perniciosissime corrunt" (Policraticus de Nupis Curial. ii. 19). PLATONIA, a broad thin slab of marble (πλατύς), used for inlaying or veneering walls or floors. Rubeus (Hist. Ravennat. lib. v. p. 238, apud Ducange, sub voc.) speaks of "tabulam marmoream quam appellabant Graeca voce platoniam," and in Simon Dunelm., ad ann. A.D. 794, we read of "platoniam, id est, marmor parieti infixum." In this sense it occurs frequently in the Liber Pontificalis of Anastasius. Liberius is stated to have ornamented the tomb of St. Agnes "de platonis (platinis, Muratori) marmoreis petris" (§ 52); Sixtus III. erected at St. Laurence's outside the walls an altar and silver cancelli "supra platonias porphyreticas" (ibid. § 65); and Leo III. at St. Peter's "ex metallis marmoreis platonias posuit diversisque picturis mirae magnitudinis opus decoravit" (ibid. § 416). When the catacombs became objects of pious devotion, it was customary for the rude walls of their more sacred shrines to be faced with these platoniae. Of this we still see remains in the so-called papal crypt in the cemetery of Callistus, the work of Sixtus III. in the earlier half of the 5th century, thus described by Anastasius:—"Fecit platoniam in coemeterio Callisti in Via Appia ubi nomina episcoporum et martyrum scripsit commemorans" (ibid. § 65). The custom is mentioned by Prudentius:

"Nec Paris contenta aditus obducere saxis Addidit ornando clara talenta operi."

Peristeph. xi. 183.

From being the most celebrated of the sepulchral crypts treated in this manner, the subterranean vault ad catacumbas, contiguous to the apse of the basilica of St. Sebastian, from which the designation catacomb has passed to all similar cemeteries, in which tradition asserts the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul originally reposed, after having been lined with marble by pope Damasus, A.D. 380—"aedificavit platoniam ubi corpora apostolorum jacuerunt, id est, beati Petri et Pauli" (ibid. § 54; cf. Bede de Sex Aetat. Mundi, ad ann. 4328—became known as the Platoniam, and was generally designated by that name. It is a rudely triangular chamber, with curved sides and a rectilinear base, its walls excavated with thirteen plainly-arched arcosolia with stucco ornaments. Under the altar is a well-shaped cavity in two compartments, where it is said the bodies of the apostles were placed (Marchi, Monumenti, tav. xxxix. xl. p. 216; Perret, tom. i. pl. 5; Bosio, pp. 178-187).

PLAYS. [ACTORS: THEATRE.]

PLEBS. (1) Sometimes used merely for the laity belonging to the church. Thus Augustine addresses his epistle to the church at Hippo, to the clergy, the elders, and the whole laity, "universae plebi." And, again (Collat. Donat. die 1, § 5), says that the people (plebes) refused to acknowledge two bishops in one church. The sixth council of Paris, A.D. 829 (c. 25), rebukes certain archdeacons for extortions practised, not only on the parochial clergy, but even on the faithful laity, "in plebibus parochiae suae."

(2) But it is more generally used in the sense of an ecclesiastical division, either a diocese, or a parish. Thus the first council of Carthage, A.D. 348 (c. 5), provides against the ordination of a layman from another diocese, "de plebe aliena," without the knowledge of the bishop of the diocese to which he belongs; and (c. 12) listens with approbation to the complaint of one of their number, that another bishop was in the habit of holding visitations in certain parishes of his diocese, "circuit plebes mihi attributas." The second council of Carthage, A.D. 390 (c. 20), Cod. Eccl. Afric. (cc. 98, 99), makes regulations for the allotment of parishes (plebes) to their proper dioceses. The third council of Carthage, A.D. 397 (c. 20), provides that no bishop shall interfere with parishes out of his own diocese, "plebes alienae." A council held at Rome, A.D. 826 (Synod. Rom. c. 16), speaks of the parishes under the jurisdiction of the bishop, "subjectis plebibus." The council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 29), orders that bishops should visit the "plebes" under their jurisdiction. A Capitulary of Charles the Great (tit. v. c. 4) speaks of the presbyters in charge of their respective plebes.

(3) Thomassin (de Eccl. Discip. Vet. et Nov. i. 2, c. 5, § 8) thinks that the word was especially applied to the great parish churches which were in charge of archpresbyters, in which alone baptism was administered, and which possessed some jurisdiction over the inferior parishes. Thus in the council held at Rome, A.D. 826 (Synod. Rom. c. 8), mention is made of the "plebes baptismales." The first council of Pavia, A.D. 850 (c. 6) speaks of the appointment of penitentiaries by the bishops and archpresbyters of "plebes;" and (c. 13) speaks of archpresbyters of "plebes" who were to exercise a certain authority, not only over the laity, "vulgus," but over the presbyters of the inferior parishes, "qui per minores titulos habitant," and to have authority in their own parishes as the bishop in the cathedral church, "sicut ipse matrixi praeest, ita archipresbyter praeest plebibus," yet in due submission to episcopal authority. PLOTINUS, martyr, with forty-nine others, at Melitene; commemorated Nov. 21 (Wright, Syr. Mart.). [C. H.]

PLURALITIES (Pluralitas beneficiorum).—The office of a clergyman is of such a nature as to be for the most part incompatible with other employment; nor is it possible for one person adequately to discharge duties in two churches. Hence it has from ancient times been forbidden that one man should hold office in different places. The council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) ordered (c. 10) that no person should be borne on the roll of two churches in respect of the same office. Gregory the Great (Joannes Diac. Vita Greg. ii. 54; Decretum, p. i. dist. lxxxix. c. 1) desired that one office in the church and no more should be committed to one person; the members of Christ must subserve each its own use. The sixteenth council of Toledo (A.D. 693) ordered (c. 5) in the most emphatic manner that more than one church should on no account be committed to the charge of a single presbyter; and the second council of Nicaea (A.D. 787) enjoined (c. 15) that no clerk should hold preferment in two churches, for a man cannot serve two masters. A main object of this canon, as that of the council of Chalcedon previously quoted, was to compel clerks to remain in the church where they were first ordained (Walter, Kirchenrecht, § 221, 9th ed.; Van Espen, Jus Ecclesiasticum, p. ii. sec. iii. tit. 3). PLUVIALE. [COPE, p. 458.]

PNEUMA. This word is quite as frequently as not met with in the form NEUMA; sometimes also in the form NEUPMA, which seems to point to the orthography of Pneuma; and in the form Neuma the origin seems to have been lost sight of and the word considered to be of the first declension, as we find Neumae and Neumae. It is applied to a musical passage, consisting of a number of notes, which were either sung to one syllable, or to no words at all, in that case probably on the vowel a (ah). This appears to have been used in the Jewish worship as a substitute for the instrumental performance of "Selah" (see DIAPSALMA), or may have been considered a meaning of that obscure word. It is also thought to be a technical meaning of the term "jubilate" used in the translation of the Psalms, so Beletus (quoted by J. M. Neale de Sequentiis ad H. A. Daniel Epist. Crit.), "In hujus fine pneumatizamus, id est jubilamus, dum finem protrahimus et ei velut caudam accingimus," and this was mystically referred to the eternal rejoicing of the saints: "Solemus longam notam post Alleluia super litteram A decantare quia gaudium sanctorum in coelis interminabile et ineffabile est;" and the absence of words is explained thus, "quia ignotus nobis est modus laudandi Deum in patria" (Neale, ut sup.). The Pneuma must have attained considerable magnitude within the period of this dictionary, because immediately afterwards Notker developed out of it the practice of singing sequences (Neale); it would seem very probable that it had been found inconvenient from its length. A very similar proceeding has taken place in the present century in oratorio music; one seldom now meets with long florid passages* such as are to be found in songs, and even in choruses, in the works of Handel and Haydn.

The first tone is generally quoted as a specimen of a short Pneuma of three notes:—

Et in secula se - cu - lo - rum. A - men.

The following is given in Guido Aretinus (de Modorum Formulis apud Coussemaker, vol. ii. pp. 78, &c.), in a "Communion" of the second mode:—

Et in se - cu - la, se - cu - lo -

- rum. A - men.

In Walter de Odyngton (Coussemaker, i

* These pneumata or passages were at a later period called "divisions;" thus Shakspeare "Some say the lark makes sweet division" (Romeo and Juliet, iii. 5).

pp. 218, &c.) occurs the following as an independent Pneuma, apparently; under the eighth mode:—

Some of considerable length appear in the Tonarius Reginonis Prumensis, in the notation spoken of above under the article MUSIC, that presents the appearance of short-hand writing, anterior to the invention of the staff; they are put with the NONANNEANE, or NOEACIS; one notably may be mentioned, standing at the head of the Differentie ivth toni; also in this MS., additions made by a later hand at the beginning of each section, e.g. "Quarta vigilia venit ad eos," are supplied with a notation, and apparently, a Pneuma.

Amongst other uses for Pneumata one was to enable the chant to end satisfactorily, so that there could be no doubt as to the mode in which it was composed. [J. R. L.]

POEMEN, "our father," anchorite in Thebais, confessor; commemorated Aug. 27 (Cal. Byzant.; Basil. Menol.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 266; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. vi. 25).

POLYAENUS (1), martyr with Acacius and Menander, disciples and fellow-martyrs of Patricius, bishop of Prusa; commemorated May 19 (Basil. Menol.).

(2) Martyr with Hermas and Serapion; commemorated Aug. 18 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

POLYANDRON. This word is used by modern antiquaries for a common sepulchre containing any number of bodies above four. Cells (loculi) were arranged in three or four, or even in as many as twelve tiers one above another, in the sides of a vault or catacomb, and in order to make the most of the space, they were adapted to the different ages and sizes of the bodies to be placed in them. Three such parallel rows of niches are to be seen in the cemetery of Cyriaca, intended respectively for tall, middle-sized and short bodies (Marchi, I Monumenti, &c. tav. xv.). Curiously enough, such cells are sometimes found excavated in a crooked line, so that it would seem that the body must have been bent to fit into them (id. tav. xviii.). Tracings for blocks of niches that have never been executed are occasionally found (id. p. 124 and tav. xxviii.).

These receptacles for the dead are not always made in the walls of catacombs, but are sometimes under the floor, as in the ancient Christian cemeteries at Chiusi (Cavedoni, Cimit. Chiusi, p. 20) and in other places (Marchi, I Monumenti, &c. tav. xxi. xxvi. &c.).

The bricks which were used to close the mouth of these cells at Rome were obtained from the brickyards in the neighbourhood. They are generally marked with the name of the factory and of the maker, and sometimes with those of the consuls. The last-mentioned mark would of course be strong evidence of the period of burial. A considerable number of drawings of these inscribed bricks may be seen in Boldetti (Osservazioni, &c. p. 528 et seq.) and in Fabretti (Inscript. Antig. t. viii.) (Martigny, Dict. des. Antig. chrét. s. v.). [E. C. H.]

POLYCARPUS (1), bishop of Smyrna, martyr; commemorated Jan. 26 (Bed., Wand., Usuard., Notker., Vet. Rom. Mart.; Mart. Hieron.; Mart. Rom.; *Boll. Acta SS. (2) Presbyter and confessor; commemorated Feb. 23 (Usuard. Mart., Policarpus; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 369).

(3) Of Alexandria, martyr under Maximianus; commemorated Ap. 2 (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. i. 58).

(4) Martyr with Thraseas, Gaius, and eight others at Eumeneia in Phrygia; commemorated Oct. 27 (Wright, Syr. Mart.). [C. H.]

POLYCHRONIUS, bishop and martyr of Babylon in the Decian persecution; commemorated Feb. 17 (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 5). [C. H.]

POLYEUCTUS (1) of Melitina, flourished under Decius and Valerian, martyr; commemorated at Melitina Jan. 7 (Wright, Anct. Syr. Mart. in Journ. St. Lit. 1866, 423); Jan. 22 at Nicomedia (ibid. 424); Jan. 8 (Notker.); Jan. 9 (Basil. Menol.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 250); Feb. 13 (POLIOCTUS, martyr in Melitana, *Usuard. (Basil. Menol., POLYEUCTUS, martyr of Caesarea).

(2) Confessor with Timotheus; commemorated May 20 (Wright, Syr. Mart.).

(3) Martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia, with Victurus, Donatus, Quintus; commemorated May 21 (Hieron. Mart.). Under Jan. 7, Hieron. Mart. has Polioctos and Candida at Melitana; Poliarthus, Filoronius, Candidianus, elsewhere. Under Feb. 14 the same Martyrology has Candidianus, Poliarctus, Filoronis, in Graecia. Florus under Jan. 11 commemorates Poliectus, Candidianus, Filotimus; and on the same day the Bollandists have Polyeuctus, Candidianus, Philoromus (Acta SS. Jan. i. 666). [C. H.]

POLYGAMY. [MARRIAGE, ix. p. 1101.]

POLYMITUS (POLYMITUM, POLYMITA VESTIS). This, as the name implies, is a garment woven with various coloured threads. Thus Isidore defines it (Etym. xix. 22; Patrol. lxxxii. 686), "Polymita multi coloris. Polymitus enim textus multorum colorum est." Caesarius of Arles forbids to nuns the use of "plumaria et acupictura et omne polymitum" (Reg. ad Virg. 42; Patrol. lxxvii. 1116). Jerome (Epist. 64 ad Fubiolam, c. 12; Patrol. xxii. 614) uses the word in describing the Jewish priestly girdle. The word also occurs in the Capitulaire de Imaginibus of Charlemagne (i. 12; Patrol. xcvi. 1033), where the "vestis polymita sive varia" is the "coat" of Joseph, symbolising the church gathered out of many nations. For further references, see Ducange's Glossarium, s. v. [R. S.]

POLYXENA, virgin, sister of Xantippe, the wife of Probus praefect of Spain in the reign of Claudius, disciples of St. Paul; commemorated Sept. 23 (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

POMPA. [MARRIAGE, p. 1109.]

POMPEIUS (1) Martyr with Terentius under Decius; commemorated Ap. 10 (Mart. Rom.); Daniel (Cod. Liturg. iv. 257) gives the two names as one, POMPEIUS TERENTIUS, which may be by a typical error omitting a comma between them.

(2) Of Italy, martyr in Macedonia with Peregrinus and others under Trajan; commemorated July 7 (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

PONTIANUS (1) Martyr at Spoleum under one of the Antonines; commemorated Jan. 19 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart. Auct.; Mart. Rom.); Jan. 14 (Notker, Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 932, and some other Martyrologies).

(2) Deacon, martyr at Carthage with St. Cyprian; commemorated Mar. 8 (Vet. Rom. Mart.; Usuard. Mart., PONTIUS).

(3) Martyr at Rome with Eusebius and others under Commodus; commemorated Aug. 25 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.).

(4) Pope and martyr under Maximinus; natalis commemorated at Rome Nov. 20 (Usuard., Wand., Vet. Rom. Mart.); Oct. 29 (Florus ap. Bed. Mart.); Aug. 13 (Hieron. Mart.).

(5) Martyr at Rome with Praetextatus, under

Maximinus; commemorated Dec. 11 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.). [C. H.]

PONTIFEX. The derivation of this word by Varro, from pons and facere, "inasmuch as," he says, "the Roman pontiffs built the Pons Publicus and afterwards frequently restored it" (de Ling. Lat. v. 83), may be compared with a capitulary of Charles the Great which commences thus: "De pontibus vero vel reliquis similibus operibus que ecclesiastici per justam et antiquam consuetudinem cum reliquo populo facere debent" (Pertz, Legg. i. 111). Richter, however, considers the theory that its Christian use was derived from the Roman emperors highly improbable, and inclines to regard it as a reminiscence from the Levitical service in the temple, carrying with it the notion of a mediatorial office (Lehrbuch d. Kirchenrechts, p. 204). In Christian literature the title first comes prominently before us, as sarcastically applied by Tertullian to the bishop of Rome: "Audito etiam edictum esse propositum, et quidem peremptorium, Pontifex scilicet maximus, quod est episcopus episcoporum, edicit," &c." (de Pudicitia, c. i.). Cyprian employs language which sufficiently proves that such pre-eminence was unrecognized in the African church of his day: "neque enim quisquam nostrum episcopum se esse episcoporum . . . quando habeat omnis episcopus pro licentia libertatis et potestatis suae arbitrium proprium" (Alloc. in Conc. Carth. ann. 256; Gieseler, I. i. 361). The author of the Life of Fulgentius, speaking of the return of the orthodox bishops to Africa, says that Hilderic, the Vandal monarch, "Carthaginensi plibi proprium donavit antistitem" (i.e. a metropolitan) "cunctisque in locis ordinationes pontificum" (i.e. bishops) "feri clementissima auctoritate ordinavit" (Baronius, ann. 522, c. x.). This alone suggests some doubt as to the genuineness of the 39th canon of the African code, which enjoins that "no primate shall be called a prince of priests, or pontiff" [AFRICAN COUNCILS, p. 38]. Similarly the monks of Carthage in the year 525, in a petition to Boniface, bishop of that city, address him not only as "apostolica dignitate praeditus," but also as "Christi venerandus Pontifex" (Thomassin, ed. Bourassé, ii. 366). Hilary of Arles is styled "summus Pontifex" by Eucherius, bishop of Lyons (Migne, l. 773). Anastasius first applies the term to Pelagius I., of whose ordination in the year 555 he says, "et ordinauerunt eum pontificem" (Migne, Patrol. cxxviii. 109). Pelagius himself uses the title when speaking of his predecessor, Leo the Great (Sirmond, i. 310).

There is, however, abundant evidence that long after the 6th century, especially in the language of the civil legislator, the title continued to be applied to all bishops indiscriminately. It is of frequent occurrence in the Gothic and Lombardic codes, and in the capitularies of Charles the Great, e.g. "Ut unusquisque sacerdos cotidianis adistat orationibus pro pontifice ejus gubernatori regimine" (Pertz, Legg. i. 87). In a capitulary of the council of Aachen (A.D. 803) metropolitans are designated as "summi pontifices." Segebodius is styled "totius Gothiae provinciae archipontifex" (Gallia Christiana, vi. 168). In the 10th century, Bruno, primate of Cologne, is designated simply as "pontifex" (Pertz, Mon. Germ. Hist. v. 430), while in a charter of the year 962, given by Bertha, queen of Hungary, the pope of Rome is styled "Pontifex pontificum apostolicæ sedis." But in the year 1000 we find the archbishop of Arles designated as "Pontifex summus" (Ducange, s.v.), and Lanfranc, in the 11th century, is referred to by his biographer, Milo Crispinus, as "Primas et pontifex summus" (Migne, Patrol. cl. 10). D'Achery indeed, in a note on the latter passage, states that these titles were commonly given to bishops of distinguished sees. [J. B. M.]

PONTIFICAL (Liber Pontificalis Pontificale, Ἀρχιερατικόν), a book of offices peculiar to a bishop, as those of ordination, confirmation, &c. The later pontificals admitted offices common to priests and bishops, as e.g. that of baptism, but with special directions for their performance by the latter.

The early SACRAMENTARY was also a pontifical. Thus the Gelasian gives the prayers said by the bishop over public penitents on Ash-Wednesday and Maundy Thursday (Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 505, 549); the forms of ordination of bishops, priests, and all the inferior clergy (512, 513, 515, 619-629); the benediction of nuns (629); of the holy oils and chrism (554); of baptism, as performed by the bishop on Easter-eve and the eve of Whitsunday (568, 591); the orders of confirmation (570, 597); and of the dedication of a church (609).

The "Ordo Romanus, qualiter Missa pontificalis celebretur," probably compiled about 730 [ORDO], may be regarded as a partial pontifical in its earliest form. The first part (Mus. Ital. ii. 3-16) describes a pontifical mass, but it gives also directions for the especial services of Lent and Holy Week as celebrated by a bishop, including the making of holy oil, and chrism, and the baptisms of Easter-eve (17-29), and for those of Easter-day, Whitsunday, St. Peter's day, and Christmas (29). An appendix contains, with many further instructions, the method of making the AGNUS DEI. Such a directory was necessary at a time when the sacramentaries, as e.g. the Leonian, or Veronese Gelasian (Mur. u. s. i. 294-483), were almost without rubrics. The necessary parts of this Ordo were afterwards transferred, sometimes, it seems, without any alteration, as in the Codex Eligianus, printed by Ménard (Opp. Greg. M. iii.; i. coll. 1-240) to the sacramentaries as rubrics.

The Gregorian sacramentary, as edited by Grimoald, who became abbat of St. Gall in 841, omits the ordinal, and the offices of confirmation and the dedication of a church (Ménard, Praef. in Sacram. Greg. xii.; Pamelii Liturgicon, index Sacr. Grim. ii. 390-394). This shews that some offices assigned to bishops were already to be sought for in another book, i.e. in a "pontifical." It may be doubted also whether the Benedictiones Episcopales ("sub finem Colonien. praecipui cod. alia manu script.") originally belonged to this sacramentary (Pamel. ii. 478).

It is probable that pontificals were in use at least in England a full century before the time of Grimoald,^b though the name does not appear to have been finally fixed at that period. (1)

The earliest extant is probably that of Egbert, archbishop of York, from 732 to 766, now in the National Library at Paris, no. 138. In order to exhibit the full contents of an early pontifical we will give the headings of the several offices in this book, only premising that the extant copy appears to have been written in the lifetime of Egbert. "Literis Saxonibus ab annis circiter 950 eleganter scriptum," said Martene in 1699 (De Ant. Eccl. Rit. ed. 1764, i. p. xx.). It contains the ordinatio episcopi (with proper missa and benediction); confirmatio hominum ab episcopo dicenda (with benedictions); ordo de sacris ordinibus, qualiter in Romana ecclesia presbiteri, diaconi, subdiaconi, vel ceteri ordines clericorum benedicendi sunt (with missae); ratio qualiter domus Dei consecrandus est (with missae), which is preceded by a form to be used by the priest when he gives notice of the intended consecration (Pont. of Egbert, p. 26; Surtees Soc. vol. xxvii.), and followed by a "missa in dedicatione oratorii," a proper benediction for the dedication of a church, a missa "in dedicatione fontis," and the office to be used "in consecratione cimiterii" (with missa); reconciliatio altaris vel loci sacri, with missa in reconciliacione ecclesie, and a proper benediction. The second part (pp. 58-136) consists chiefly of episcopal benedictions, but other rites occur. We have (1) benedictions for Sundays and other holidays (58-93); (2) for occasional use as at ordinations, super regem, pro iter agentibus, super synodum, &c. (pp. 94-100); (3) Missa pro regibus in die benedictionis, followed by the unction and prayers; (4) consecratio abbatis vel abbatissae, benedictio virginis monialis, consecratio viduae, consecratio crucis, ordo ad sanctimonialem benedicendam; (5) benedictions of fruits, bread, houses, bells, &c.; (6) the Roman rites for Maundy Thursday, the blessing of the Paschal Lamb and other feasts, the blessing of incense on Easter eve; (7) Benedictio armorum,—panis ad infirmum,—casei et butyri, et omnis pulmenti, ad sponsas benedictio, orationes ad libros benedicendos, benedictio vini, pro oculorum infirmitate, orationes dicende cum adoratur sancta crux, ad palmas benedicendas vel ramos. Several of the offices are given by Martene (i. 92, 275; ii. 31, 188, 199, 214, 246, 285, 294; iii. 101, 108). Morinus (de Sacram. Ord. ii. 230) refers to the same century the pontifical known as the Benedictional of archbishop Robert now in the public library at Rouen, no. 27. It is so called from the episcopal benedictions preceding the offices in the MS. A full account of it is given by Mr. Gage in Archaeologia, vol. xxiv. pp. 118-136. The extant copy seems to have been written at the instance of Aethelgar of Canterbury, 989. The Ordinationum Ritus are printed by Morinus, u. s. 230-235; and in his work De Sacram. Poenit. he gives the absolutio dicenda ab episcopo super conversum et poenitentem (p. 478); see also p. 374). This pontifical seems to have been only slightly known to Martene, as he merely refers to it twice (ii. 163; iii. 88). The latter writer assigns to the same age ("annorum 900") the pontifical formerly in the Abbey library at

^b Zaccaria (Biblioth. Rit. i. vi. 2) says: "Inter Latinorum Pontificalia celebriora sunt S. Protadii, ii. 626." &c. I can obtain no information about the Pontifical of Protadius; and suspect that the statement is a mistake arising from the fact that certain lauds or acclamations at the enthronement of a bishop are ascribed to Protadius, bishop of Besançon, who died in 625 (Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxx. 409).

Jumièges, now no. 362 in the public library at Rouen; which is also described by Mr. Gage in Archæologia, vol. xxv. 244-250. He also gives in extenso the order of the consecration of a church, with proper missa and benediction (251-274). Martene has transcribed from it, ordo ad catechumenum ex pagano faciendum (i. 15); qualiter suscipere debeant poenitentes episcopi vel presbyteri (275); ordo ad unguendum infirmum (301); ordinationum ritus (ii. 37); benedictio monachorum (162), the same as in Bened. Roberti (163); virginum (189); regum (214); ecclesiarum (250); reconciliatio loci sacri (285); benedictio scrinii (shrine) vel arcae (300); formula excommunicationis (322); ordo ad energumenos adjuvandos (347); ordo ad benedicendum oleum infirmorum, oleum catechumenorum et sanctum chrisma (iii. 88); the same as in Ben. Rob. Martene also describes (in 1699) "Remensis archimonasterii S. Remigii antiquum pontificale ante annos 900 literis Longobardicis exaratum, Tirpini archiepiscopi Remensis nomine vulgo appellatum" (i. xxii). See offices cited by Martene in i. 68; iii. 10.

The foregoing are, if I mistake not, the only pontificals extant which are assigned to the period ending with the death of Charlemagne. It may be well, however, to mention some others of note to which a less antiquity is ascribed. (1) There is one which was given to a monastery by Prudentius, bishop of Troye, who died in 861 (Zaccar. u. s. 169; Martene, i. 192, 303, ii. 384, iii. 133, 153). (2) A MS. described by Jos. Hartzheim in his Catalogue of the Cathedral library at Cologne, 1752, as "Pontificale Remense," but probably English, as the following petition which he cites from it appears to indicate:—"Ut regale solum, videlicet Saxonum, Merciorum, Nordanhumborumque sceptrum, non deserat" (Egbert, Pont. pref. x.). (3) That of Rheims "circa tempus Hincmari (845) exaratum" (Zacc. 167.). (4), (5), (6), (7), (8) Those of Noyons (by Radbodus) (Mart. ii. 47, 260.), Sens (iii. 88), Poitiers (i. 68, 93; iii. 74, 101, 133, 153), and Cahors (i. 93; ii. 45, 262, 333), the copies of which are of the 10th century. (9) The pontifical of Dunstan of Canterbury, who died in 988, is in the National Library at Paris, no. 943. Martene gives from it the rites of ordination, which agree with those in the MS. formerly at Jumièges (ii. 37), the benedictio monachorum (163), and the ordo qualiter domus Dei consecranda est (255).

The Greeks and Orientals do not appear to have put their episcopal offices into a separate volume until long after the 9th century.

In the church of Rome Clement VIII., in 1596, supplanted all the other pontificals of his obedience by a new edition of the Roman (Catalani, Proleg. in Pontif. Rom. ii. 5.) [W. E. S.]

POOL OF BETHESDA. [BETHESDA.]

POOR, CARE OF. The care of the poor was from the date of the Apostolic Canons formally entrusted to the bishop. This indeed was but a detail of the very wide rule that the bishop was to have the care of everything that concerned the church. (πάντων τῶν ἐκκλησιαστικῶν πραγμάτων ὁ ἐπίσκοπος ἐχέτω τὴν φροντίδα. Can. Apost. xxxvii. Labbe, i. 34 B.) The argument of the fortieth canon is, that since he was entrusted with the souls of men he ought certainly to be entrusted with money.

The comment of Zonaras on the forty-first of the Apostolic Canons is, that the care of the poor was committed to the bishop, who had the control of ecclesiastical property with this view; but that the bishop was to make the distribution to the poor through the agency of the priests and deacons, in order to avert from himself the suspicion of applying the funds to his own uses (Bevereg. Pandect. tom. i. p. 29.) A similar provision is made by the council of Gangra (A.D. 325) which provides (can. 8) that no one shall either give or receive offerings apart from the bishop or him whom the bishop appoints to make distribution to the poor (ὁ ἐπιτεταγμένος εἰς οἰκονομίαν εὐποίας. Labbe, ii. 418 B).

Bishops are enjoined by the tenth canon of the third council of Tours (A.D. 813) to have "maximam curam et sollicitudinem circa pauperes;" yet they are to dispense what is collected by the churches, not indiscriminately, but "cauta circumspectione." In fulfilment of this duty they are authorised by the following canon to pay what is necessary out of the treasury of the church in the presence of the presbyters and deacons (Labbe, tom. 7, p. 1262 d, e). The same presence of witnesses (cum testibus) when the bishop makes these payments is insisted on in the Capitula (cap. 12) of Charlemagne of the year 813. The right of the poor to the property of a bishopric was admitted by John the Almoner, patriarch of Alexandria, when he founded a monastery and endowed it with the revenues of the see. To justify such an alienation, he pleaded that the "patrimony of the poor" could not be better administered than by being given to those who were devoted to evangelic poverty. [PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH, C. (4).]

Pope Gregory's answer to the first question of Augustine of Canterbury is most explicit on the subject of the poor. "It is the custom of the apostolic see to deliver to ordained bishops precepts that of every oblation which is made there ought to be four portions, one, to wit, for the bishop and his household, on account of hospitality and entertainment; another for the clergy; a third for the poor; a fourth for the repairing of churches." (See Bede's Eccles. Hist. of the English Nation, Gidley's transl. p. 65.)

By a later canon (Conc. Aquisgran. c. 142, A.D. 816) the obligation to care for the poor is specially extended to canons. Canons might have their own private dwellings, yet they were to maintain "intra claustra" an abode for the poor and aged.

In the last of the eighty Arabic canons of the council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) it is directed that in every town there should be appointed an officer (to this day at Rome called Procurator pauperum), whose duty it was to care for the poor. He might be either cleric or layman; he was to live near the church, and, having the control of funds, he was to provide not only for the sick, but also for those who were in prison. For those who were improperly imprisoned, he was to obtain liberation; the others were to be helped so that they wanted neither for food nor clothing. In France a similar order was made by the fifth council of Orleans (can. 20). Every Sunday the archdeacon or the dean (præpositus) was to visit the prisons, and to supply the wants of poor prisoners out of the funds of the church. Justinian ordered the same to be done on Wednesday or Friday. Other poor captives, too, the bishops might help. Some of the "slaves of the church" they might liberate, make them a grant of money not exceeding twenty shillings (solidi), besides house, vineyard or plot of ground (Conc. Agd. 7). Other slaves there were to protect when enfranchised (ib.). Gregory of Tours makes it a special feature in his eulogy of Maurilion, bishop of Cahors, that he stood between the poor and those who might oppress them "defendens pauperes ecclesiae de manu malorum iudicum." It was at the request of Meroveus, bishop of Poitiers, that King Chilbert readjusted the public imposts according to their ancient distribution, greatly to the relief of the poor of his diocese (Greg. Tur. Hist. ix. 30). When the same officers that had been at Poitiers passed on to Tours, they were resisted by Gregory himself, who at length obtained from the king a confirmation of the immunities that had been conferred upon the city of St. Martin. In England, Cuthbert of Lindisfarne thought that the distressed would betake themselves to his body even after death. The concourse, he urged, would be troublesome to the monastery, and therefore it was for the advantage of the brethren that he should be buried beyond its precinct (Bede, Life). Nor was it only what it is the fashion to call "the deserving poor" that were to be helped; but if any one of the faithful had wasted his property in drinking, and feasting, and wickedness, still he was not to be deserted. Whatever may have been the practical effect of the church's care of the poor, in theory at least she always discouraged idleness in the able-bodied. The bishop was to give food and raiment so far as he could to those who needed them; but it was only to those "qui debilitate faciente non possunt suis manibus laborare" (Conc. Aurel. i. can. 16, qu. Thomassin. part ii. liv. iv. ch. 5).

So paramount did the claims of the poor appear in the eyes of Christians, that St. Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, did not hesitate in a time of distress to sell even the treasures of the church in order to provide relief. The story is told at length by Sozomen how a man recognised upon an actress a piece of work which he had presented at the altar; how a merchant had sold it to the actress; how the bishop sold it to the merchant; and how the bishop was deposed in consequence (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. iv. 25).

Certain forms of distress are the subject of special enactment. The leprous, as being in the worst case of all, were especially commended to the care of the bishop (Con. Aurel. v.).

It appears that the clergy became in some cases so poor as to need alms. A bishop or priest was bound to supply such an ecclesiastic with what was necessary, on pain of excommunication, or even of deposition in case he would not amend (Con. Apost. lix. Bevereg, Pandect. tom. i. p. 38).

Gregory of Tours relates that Crodin took pleasure in building magnificent houses and furnishing them sumptuously, then, asking bishops who were poor to dine with him, he presented them the whole property, in order that "the poor being maintained by it might obtain for him pardon with God." The same writer applies the term matricularii to the poor who were on the roll of the church (De Mirac. B. Mart. iii. 22).

The fund for the relief of the poor was spoken of by St. Gregory the Great under the phrase Res pauperum (S. Greg. Mag. Epp. lvi. lviii.). In the former of these two letters he gives his authority for the payment of a distressed man's debt out of that fund. The care of the poor was not confined to the giving of money or its equivalents. In one of the letters of St. Gregory the Great, the defence of the poor (defensio pauperum) is enjoined upon a bishop as his duty (Ep. xxxvi.). The ordinary rules of courtesy were even to be strained in their favour; "the poor and aged persons of the church are more to be honoured than the rest" (Conc. Carth. iv. 83, A.D. 398); and those who ridiculed the invitation of the poor to the houses of others were anathematized (Conc. Gangr. can. 11).

It ought to be observed that by the 11th canon of the council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451), it is enacted that poor persons, and those requiring help, should be provided with PACIFICAE.

Sometimes a house for the reception of the poor was maintained by private munificence. Such a house probably was the "xenodochium in portu Romano situm," of which it would seem from the letter of St. Jerome that Fabiola was the foundress (St. Hieron. Ep. xxx. ad Oceanum). The council of Aix (A.D. 816) required that canons should provide in their precinct a "receptaculum ubi pauperes colligantur." This receptacle was lower down called "hospitale" (Labbe, vii. p. 1403, A, B). Further particulars of such establishments are given under HOSPITAL, HOSPITALITY. [H. T. A.]

(A) POPE* (abbas, papa, father), a word derived from the Greek πάππας, or πάπας, but often erroneously derived from the Latin, "pater patrum," e.g. Adam Scotus, in the 12th century, says: "Ipsos enim papas, id est, patres patrum, mos solet ecclesiasticus appellare, et ut sic vocarentur instituit" (de Tripart. Tab. Migne, Patrol. xcxcviii. 394), a false etymology, that may be explained by the fact that Greek was originally the official language of the church both in the East and in the West; but that the knowledge of it subsequently became almost extinct among "the Latins" in mediæval times. Walafrid Strabo, who possessed some knowledge of Greek, writing in the 9th century, compares the word to that of "church" as one borrowed by Teutonic races from the Greek in order to express a previously unfamiliar idea: "Kyrch a Kurios, et papst a papa, quod cujusdam paternitatis nomen est et clericorum congruit dignitatis" (Migne, xciv. 927).

The earliest ecclesiastical use of the word appears to have been to denote the spiritual relationship existing between a teacher of Christianity and the convert brought by his agency into communion with a recognised Christian body; in many cases the convert assumed the name of his spiritual father. At a later period the term began to be restricted to bishops and abbats. Severus, a deacon at Rome of the time of Marcellinus (A.D. 296-304), having received permission from Marcellinus to open a double tomb in the catacombs, speaks of having done so—"jussu papæ sui Marcellini" (De' Rossi, Insc. i. p. cxv.). Subsequently, as will be shewn in the course of this article, the title was limited to the bishop of Rome in the West and to the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Constantinople in the East, and finally was claimed by the pope of Rome exclusively, although still the customary mode of addressing priests in the Greek church.^b

The theory of the Papacy, as defined at the council of Florence, involves the assumptions: (1) That Peter had been invested by Christ Himself with a certain pre-eminency among the other apostles. (2) That he was the founder of the church at Rome, and that the inspiration and authority especially vouchsafed to him had been given in equal measure to his successors, the bishops of that church. (3) That the bishop of Rome might thus rightfully claim supremacy over the whole Christian church and over all Christian fathers and teachers. We have to inquire into the historical evidence for these assumptions.

* Throughout this article the dates placed after the name of a bishop or pope of Rome denote the assigned duration of his office. For reasons which will be apparent in the course of the article, I have preferred to use the term "bishop of Rome" up to the middle of the 5th century, and after that date to employ the term "pope."

^b Martigny (Dict. des Ant. chrét.) says that the Greeks employ the word to denote both bishops and priests, but with a different accent and inflexion, placing the accent, when employing it with respect to a bishop, on the first syllable; when speaking of a priest, on the second; but this is doubtful.

(I.) (i.) On the question of the supremacy of St. Peter among the Apostles, and of his presence in Rome, so far as it depends on Scriptural authority, see PETER in DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.

When we turn to the evidence afforded by uncanonical writers, we find that either Paul and Peter are designated as joint founders of the church in Rome, or Peter assumes the foremost place, while Paul receives but slight notice, or is altogether unmentioned.

The earliest testimony is probably that of Dionysius, bishop of Corinth. In a fragment of the Catholic epistles of this writer, preserved by Eusebius (E. H. ii. 25), he expressly refers to Paul and Peter as teachers and founders of the churches at Corinth and Rome, and also as having suffered martyrdom at the same time. Replying to Soter (bishop of Rome, A.D. 168-177) and the Roman clergy, who had addressed to the community at Corinth a hortatory letter, he says: ταῦτα καὶ ὑμεῖς διὰ τῆς τοσαύτης νοουθεσίας, τὴν ἀπὸ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου φυτεῖαν γεννηθεῖσαν Ῥωμαίων τε καὶ Κορινθίων συνεκράσατε. Καὶ γὰρ ἄμφω καὶ εἰς τὴν ἡμετέραν Κόρινθον φυτεύσατε ἡμᾶς ὁμοῖως δὲ καὶ εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν ὁμοσε διδάξαντες, ἐμαρτύρησαν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν (Eusebius, E. H. ed. Heinichen, i. 180).

The main statements of Dionysius are supported by the independent testimony of two yet earlier writers—that of Peter's martyrdom by Clemens Romanus, and that of his teaching at Rome by Ignatius. The language of the former writer is explicit. "Let us," he says, "set before us the holy apostles. Peter, through unjust envy, endured not only one or two, but many persecutions, and thus, having suffered martyrdom, passed into his place of reward in glory:" καὶ οὕτω μαρτυρήσας ἐπορεύθη εἰς τὸν ὀφειλόμενον τόπον τῆς δόξης (Epist. ad Corinth. i. v.; Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. ext. Can. Rec. i. 8; Migne, S. G. i. 217).

The meaning of Ignatius is perhaps less free from ambiguity, but the passage occurs in his Epistle to the Romans, the genuineness of which is generally admitted, and is supported by the Syriac version. Addressing "The church which presides in the place of the region of the Romans" (ἡ τις προκἀθηται ἐν τόπῳ χαρίων Ῥωμαίων), he says, "I teach you not as did Peter and Paul; they were apostles, I am one condemned; they were free, but I am, as yet, in bonds:" Οὐχ ὡς Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος διατάσσομαι ὑμῖν· ἐκεῖνοι ἀπόστολοι, ἐγὼ δὲ κατάκριτος· ἐκεῖνοι ἐλεύθεροι, ἐγὼ δὲ μέχρι νῦν δούλος (Cureton, Corp. Ign. p. 47).

The event foreshadowed in John xxi. 18, 19, may fairly be recognised in the above passage from Clemens, a passage strikingly confirmed by that in the Muratorian canon: "Lucas optime Theophilo comprehendit, quia sub presentia ejus singula gerebantur, sicuti et semote passionem Petri evidenter declarat" (see Westcott, Canon of the New Test. p. 499, ed. 1870). Here, though the text is obviously corrupt, the meaning is sufficiently clear; viz. that Luke related only those events of which he was an eye-witness, and that consequently the martyrdom of St. Peter is not recorded by him. It is also worthy of note that, as no tradition ever assigned any other place than Rome as the scene of Peter's martyrdom, every allusion to that event is also an indirect confirmation of his visit to the capital.

Irenaeus is the next writer after Dionysius, whose testimony is of a like tenor; and, as the disciple of Polycarp and subsequently a bishop of the Western church, he can hardly be supposed to have given expression to a tradition at variance with the prevalent Christian belief of his age. He speaks of Peter and Paul as "preaching the gospel and founding the church in Rome" (ἐν Ῥώμῃ, εὐαγγελιζομένων καὶ θεμελιούντων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν), and represents this as occurring at about the same time that St. Matthew composed his gospel (Adv. Haer. iii. 1). A passage in the Latin version of the same treatise refers to the church at Rome as that "greatest and most ancient church of universal fame which the two most glorious apostles, Peter and Paul, founded and organized"—"maximae et antiquissimae et omnibus cognitae a gloriosissimis duobus apostolis Petro et Paulo Romae fundatae et constitutae ecclesiae" (ib. iii. 3; ed. Harvey, ii. 9).

The language of Tertullian, in his enumeration of the apostolic churches, is equally definite. "How happy that church," he exclaims, "for which apostles poured forth their whole teaching with their blood; where Peter shares the passion of his Lord, where Paul is crowned with the fate of John!" (De Praescript. adv. Haer. c. 36).

In the 4th century the passages are numerous, even in the most authoritative writers, which corroborate the belief expressed in the foregoing statements, and wherein the bishopric of Rome is habitually referred to as "Petri sedes." See Leo Magnus, ad Siciilienses Episc. (Mansi, v. 1305); ad Theodosium Aug. (ib. vi. 14); Concil. Chalced. Allocutio ad Marc. (ib. vii. 455); Anastasius II. P. (Thilo, Epist. Rom. Pont. i. 624). "Petrus, cujus sedem tenemus, locum gerimus," Vigilius P. (Mansi, ix. 358), &c. Augustine refers to the tradition that both apostles were buried at Rome, as one of universal acceptance: "jacet Petri corpus Romae, dicunt homines; jacet Pauli corpus Romae," &c. (Serm. 296; Migne, xxxviii. 1355). The seventh book of the Apostolical Constitutions, which belongs probably to about the year A.D. 300, represents both Paul and Peter as ordinary bishops of Rome—Paul ordaining the first bishop, Linus; Peter the second, Clemens (Cotelierius, Pot. Apost. i. 385).

The passage from Dionysius is not the only one which Eusebius adduces, in support of what was certainly his own belief and that of his age, viz. that Peter lived, taught, and suffered at Rome. "Also," he says, "a certain ecclesiastical writer, Caius by name, who lived about the time of Zephyrinus, bishop of Rome, disputing with Proclus, the leader of the Cataphrygians, gives the following statement respecting the places where the earthly tabernacles of the aforesaid disciples were laid: 'And I can shew you the trophies (τὰ τρόπαια) of the apostles; for if you will go to the Vatican, or to the Ostian road, you will find the trophies of those who have laid the foundations of the church, and also suffered martyrdom'" (H. E. ii. 25). In addition to these extracts, however, Eusebius also hands down another tradition, of which his acceptance is alone sufficient to occasion grave inquiry as to his judgment and authority as a writer. In the fourteenth chapter of the same book he not only states that Peter visited Rome, but assigns the object of his journey thither. The apostle, whom he designates as τὸν καρτερόν καὶ μέγαν τῶν ἀποστόλων, τὸν ἀρετῆς ἕνεκα τῶν λοιπῶν πάντων προήγορον, was "sent on," he says, "by divine foreknowledge to Rome, to vanquish Simon Magus, and to be a light and saving doctrine to souls in the West" (Migne, Series Graeca, xx. 170-2). This statement is repeated by a somewhat later writer, Cyril (bishop of Jerusalem, 351-86), who, in his Catachesis (bk. vi. c. 15), refers to Peter and Paul as "ecclesiae praesules," and describes their victory over Simon Magus at Rome (Migne, S. G. xxxiii. 362).

The relevancy of these traditions to our inquiry becomes apparent when we add, that they are regarded by certain critics as not only in themselves devoid of any historical basis, but as indicating the source from whence sprung the whole story of Peter's presence and martyrdom in Rome. According to Lipsius, the origin of this story is to be found in certain doubtful or spurious writings which he respectively classifies (α) as Ebionite or Jewish-Christian sources, (β) the Catholic or anti-Judaistic sources, (γ) certain Gnostic Acta, extant only in fragments.⁴ Of these the first are now represented by the Clementine Homilies (ed. Lagarde, 1865), which are considered to belong to the second half of the 2nd century, and by the Clementine Recognitions (ed. Gersdorf, 1838), which are referred to the period A.D. 212-230. With respect to the relative antiquity of these two treatises some difference of opinion exists, but there appears to be little doubt that one of them is derived from the other, and that the latter in turn is founded upon yet earlier treatises known as the Κηρύγματα Πέτρου and Περίοδοι Πέτρου (Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. &c. iv. 32; Lipsius, Die Quellen d. röm. Petrussage, p. 14).

The Catholic or anti-Judaistic sources are mainly represented by the Πράξεις Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου (ed. Thilo, Acta Petri et Pauli, i. and ii. 1837-8; Tischendorf, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, 1851), a collection extant in three different recensions, and not supposed to belong to a period anterior to the 5th century (Lipsius, u. s. pp. 52-4). It stands, however, in close connexion with two earlier productions, a certain Πράξεις Παύλου and a Κήρυγμα Πέτρου, which, in the opinion of Lipsius, "breathe the religious atmosphere of the 2nd century." Of these the former is referred to by Origen (de Princip. i. 2, 3), and appears (Hilgenfeld, u. s. iv. 68-73) to have been held in high esteem in the church, and to have been regarded by many as of canonical authority. By Eusebius, however (E. H. iii. 25), it is included among the spurious writings (νόθοι) along with the Shepherd of Hermas, the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Apocalypse of St. John [Apost. Const. p. 120]. The relation of the latter treatise, the Κήρυγμα, which exists only in fragments (Hilgenfeld, u. s. iv. 52-67), to the former is not clearly ascertainable, but both expressly contravene a still earlier tradition, said to have taken its origin in Galat. ii. 11-17, of a permanent hostility between the two apostles. The Πράξεις Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου, which must be regarded as essentially a compilation from these two earlier treatises, is explicit in its language on this point: "We have believed, and do believe, that even as God separates not the two great lights which he has made" (the sun and the moon), "even so He permits not you to separate Peter from Paul or Paul from Peter" (Tischendorf, u. s. c. 5).

The theory which Lipsius has endeavoured to establish—that all the extant sources of the Petrine legend may be traced back to a yet older Ebionite version of the Acta S. Petri as to their common and sole origin, and that this Judaistic treatise forms accordingly the sole basis for the tradition of St. Peter's presence in Rome—has been disputed by many eminent scholars, among whom Hilgenfeld (see Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie, 1872-1878) has given a full discussion of the question. Any attempt to summarize these arguments is beyond the scope of the present article; and equally so is any examination of the startling theory of Lipsius, that the passage above referred to in the Epistle to the Galatians became the origin of "eine immer weiter ausgespinnene Sagenbildung," which found a natural conclusion in the tradition of a final and decisive contest between the true and the false apostle at Rome.

Against the theory of the two apostles' joint residence and labours, the fact that none of the epistles written by Paul from Rome (Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon), though conveying many salutations, contain any allusion to Peter, presents an argument of no great weight, especially if we assume, as certain evidence suggests, that their labours were bestowed on two distinct churches. If, therefore, it be proposed to assign Peter's arrival in Rome to a date subsequent to that of Paul, and also to the composition of the epistles written by the latter during his first imprisonment (at the same time accepting the various statements with respect to Paul's second imprisonment, and a renewal of his labours in the West during an interval of some years), the evidence in favour of such a theory is strong, if not conclusive. The allusion to Silvanus, the friend of St. Paul, in the first epistle of Peter (v. 12), and that to Paul himself in the second (iii. 15), admit of a far more natural interpretation when understood as written from Rome, at a time when the two apostles were labouring there contemporaneously, if not conjointly, in connexion, however, with two distinct communities; the labours of Peter being bestowed on a Judaizing church, those of Paul on a church composed exclusively of Gentiles. Even the tradition respecting Simon Magus, amid much that is pure invention, probably points to a real attempt at the introduction of heretical doctrine. He is said to have been a supporter of the heresy of the Patripassians, and the church of Rome, from the earliest times of which we have authentic record, is distinguished by its uncompromising opposition to heterodoxy in every shape.

(ii.) The evidence for the succession from the time of St. Peter.—The difficulty which attaches to a belief in the tradition concerning Peter extends also to that respecting his earliest successors. According to the lists accepted as authoritative by the Romish church, the succession was preserved unbroken, the duration of each bishop's tenure of office being accurately known to us, not only in years, but even in months and days. On the other hand, a critical investigation of these lists, and a comparison of them with other and earlier sources of information, disclose considerable discrepancies with respect not only to the periods of office, but also to the simple order of succession.

The original sources for the chronology of the bishops of Rome during the first three centuries may be divided into two classes:

(A.) The Greek or Eastern lists.

(B.) The Latin or Western lists.

This classification is not indeed altogether free from objection, for the lists in the first class were undoubtedly derived from Roman sources, while those in the second class were, in all probability, originally drawn up in Greek, which, up to the middle of the 3rd century, was the official language of the Roman church. It is, however, to be observed that the Greek lists are distinguished by certain points of difference, which appear to indicate that they were transcribed from those of the west prior to the time when the official lists of the Roman church were adopted in their final form.

In the following summary of the main facts concerning these different sources, and the conclusions that have been drawn from them, the Roman episcopal succession will be more easily considered if divided into two portions: (a) that extending from Peter to Urban (ending A.D. 230); (b) that from Pontianus to Liberius (A.D. 230-352). After the time of Liberius no difficulties present themselves that here call for discussion, and for the purpose of the present article it will be sufficient to limit our consideration almost entirely to the earlier of the foregoing divisions.

(A.) The first list of which we have any knowledge is that which was known to Hegesippus, who in his visits to the apostolic churches collected information concerning the succession of the bishops from the time of the Apostles, with the design of thereby establishing the evidence of an unimpeachable tradition of Christian doctrine. His statement with respect to Rome is, that during his residence in that city he made out a list of the episcopal succession down to the time of Anicetus,—γενόμενος δὲ ἐν Ῥώμῃ, διαδοχὴν ἐποίησάμην μέχρις Ἀνικήτου (Eusebius, H. E. iv. 22; the conjectural reading of Savile, of διατρίβην for διαδοχὴν, is rejected by the best authorities; see Heinrich's note ad loc.). This list is no longer extant, but we learn from Eusebius that, according to Hegesippus, Anicetus was the immediate predecessor of Soter,—a statement, as we shall hereafter see, of considerable importance, inasmuch as the early Latin lists uniformly place Anicetus before Pius, and Pius before Soter.

The list contained in Irenaeus (adv. Haer. bk. iii. c. 3) represents Peter and Paul as the joint founders of the church at Rome, and they, it is added, "Lino episcopatum administrandae ecclesiae tradiderunt" (ed. Harvey, ii. 10). The names, as preserved in the original Greek, are as follows:—

οἱ ἀπόστολοι Πέτρος καὶ Παῦλος.
ἀπ' ἀποστόλων.

1. Δῖνος.	ἐνδόξως ἐμαρτύρη- σεν.
2. Ἀνέκλητος.	8. Ὑγῖνος.
3. Κλήμης.	9. Πῖος.
4. Εὐάρεστος.	10. Ἀνίκητος.
5. Αλεξανδρος.	11. Σώτηρ.
6. Ξύστος.	12. Ἐλευθερος.
7. Τελέσφορος, ὃς καὶ

It may fairly be assumed that this list represents the official record of the succession accepted at Rome in the time of Eleutherus, the contemporary of Irenaeus.

Eusebius has transmitted to us a double list, —that in the Chronicon (bk. ii.), and that in his Ecclesiastical History; of these the former is contained not in the version by Jerome, but in the Armenian translation. It extends from Peter to Gaius, the last bishop before the Diocletian persecution, and includes the periods of office:—

Here, among the more important inaccuracies, will be noted the insertion of the name of Agripinus of Alexandria, apparently by pure oversight, as twelfth in succession; the repetition of the name of Linus in the second place instead of that of Anencletus; the omission of the name of Eutychianus in the twenty-sixth place. The duration of Peter's episcopate, it will be noticed, is given as twenty instead of five-and-twenty years.

The following table, taken from Lipsius (p. 14) exhibits the chief points of difference between the foregoing list and that in the Ecclesiastical History down to the time of Urban. Here a certain affinity is undeniable, as in the enumeration from Clemens to Soter the only point of divergence is that in the Chronicon a year more is assigned to the episcopate of Xystus than is allowed in the E. H. On the other hand, the differences in the first four places and those that occur after Eleutherus appear to place it almost beyond doubt that the two lists were derived from entirely distinct sources. The assigned imperial years of the two lists are altogether at variance.

The version of the Chronicon by Jerome, which is now generally admitted to be much more than a mere translation, exhibits even in the list of the Roman bishops considerable deviations. The only two dates which exactly agree, i. e. are the same in the patriarchal and the Christian eras, and also in the imperial year, are those given under Anencletus and under Anteros and Fabian; the imperial years are, in fact, derived from the Ecclesiastical History.

(B.) Among the Latin lists is the Catalogus Liberianus, contained in the compilation of the chronicler of the year 354, and extending to the bishopric of Liberius. It has been edited by Mommsen (Abhandlungen der philolog.-histor. Classe der königl. sächs. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, vol. i. (1850), pp. 582-5, and 634-7), to whom we are indebted for the first correct text, and also for original research with respect to its sources and compilation. The Catalogus Liberianus is the most ancient source of the Liber Pontificalis, and, according to Mommsen, is in turn derived from a yet older list, that originally contained in the Chronicon of Hippolytus, bishop of Portus, a work to which the chronicler of the year 354 is to be found having recourse in other portions of his treatise. In the Chronicon of Hippolytus the list itself is no longer extant, but the heading, "Nomina Episcoporum Romae et quis quotannis prae fuit," is alone preserved. A comparison of the Catalogus Liberianus with that given by Augustine (Epist. 53; Migne, xxxiii. 195) and that in Optatus (de Schism. Donat. ii. 3) seems conclusively to prove that all three lists preserve essentially the same tradition, the main discrepancies being (1) that neither Augustine nor Optatus makes mention of "Cletus;" (2) that the Catalogus Liberianus (as known to us from existing MSS.) omits the names of Anicetus, Eleutherus, and Zephyrinus; while (3) in Optatus the name of Alexander is (by a palpable blunder) left out before that of Sixtus and put in the place of that of Eleutherus.

The omissions in the Catalogus Liberianus are, however, clearly shewn to be owing to carelessness on the part of transcribers or some such cause, by corresponding gaps in the consular dates between Telesphorus and Hyginus, Pius and Soter, and Soter and Victor: and this evidence, taken in conjunction with the fact that the Catalogus Felicianus (the oldest existing version of the Liber Pontificalis) which was undoubtedly derived from the Catalogus Liberianus, contains missing names, sufficiently justifies the conclusion of Mommsen that they originally existed in the latter list.

On comparing the following lists with those before given, we see that the lists from Augustine and Optatus support the Eastern omission of Cletus. In the opinion of Lipsius, these two writers have preserved to us a more ancient form of the Western tradition, and it would consequently appear to be a legitimate conclusion that the insertion of Cletus in the Catalogus Liberianus is an interpolation; Cletus and Anacletus, in all probability, representing one and the same person. Of this, the statement of the author of the treatise against the Theodotians, who wrote in Rome during the episcopate of Zephyrinus, that Victor was the thirteenth bishop ἀπὸ Πέτρον (Eusebius, H. E. v. 28) affords a strong corroboration.

Similarly, Jerome, while referring to a difference of tradition with respect to the order of succession, knows nothing whatever of "Cletus;"—"Clemens, de quo apostolus Paulus ad Philippenses scribens, ait, 'Cum Clemente et caeteris cooperatoribus meis quorum nomina scripta sunt in libro vitae' (Phil. iv. 3), quartus post Petrum Romae episcopus: siquidem secundus Linus fuit, tertius Anacletus, tametsi plerique Latinorum secundum post Petrum apostolum putent fuisse Clementem" (de Viris Illust. c. xv.; Migne, xxiii. 854). On the other hand, Augustine and Optatus differ from the Eastern lists in placing Anicetus before Pius, while the chronicler of the year 354 altogether omits Anicetus.

The following table (p. 1657) affords a comparative view of four lists which appear, beyond all reasonable doubt, to have been in existence in the 4th century, with such emendations as, in the opinion of Lipsius and other critics, are called for and justified by the conclusions derived from a critical study of the texts. These lists are as follows: (1) The Catalogus Liberianus; (2) The list in the Chronicon of Eusebius; (3) That derived from his Ecclesiastical History; (4) That used by Jerome. Of these, (1) and (2) appear to be derived from independent sources, while (3) and (4) shew unmistakable signs of a common origin.^e ^e A fifth and a sixth list, the former of no independent value, and the latter (the Leonine) of the time of Leo the Great, compiled from lists (1) and (2), may also be consulted in Lipsius (Chronologie, &c., pp. 28-76).

Into the various difficulties arising from the discrepancies between the different lists in the enumeration from Sixtus down to Liberius, it is impossible here to enter. The chief difficulty is that which relates to the succession and the duration of the episcopates of Pius and Anicetus. On referring to the three lists above given (the Cat. Lib., that from Augustine, and that from Optatus), it will be seen that while the name of Anicetus is wanting in the first list, in the other two it is placed before that of Pius. Mommsen, in his restoration of the text of the Catalogus Liberianus, also assigns to Anicetus the place immediately preceding Pius, and gives ann. iiii. m. iiii. d. iiii. as his period of office—i.e., from the consulship of Gallicanus and Vetus (A.D. 150) to that of Praesens and Rufinus (A.D. 153). Lipsius, however, relying mainly on the Eastern lists and the authority of Hegesippus, does not hesitate in his attempted harmony (as above given) to place Anicetus after Pius, and to assign to him twelve years of office—the original Latin list, in his opinion, having become corrupted by a succession of errors of transcription, as follows:

Original Latin List.

Pius, ann. xvi. (Euseb. xv.).

Anicetus, ann. xii. (Euseb. xi.).

Higinus, ann. xii.

[Anicetus]

Pius, ann. xvi.

Additional evidence of considerable importance as regards the relative duration of these two episcopates is presented in the fact that Polycarp visited Rome during the episcopate of Anicetus

—according to one tradition, in the second year of that bishop's tenure of office (see Gieseler, I. i. 242; Robertson, Church Hist. i. 29; Neander, i. 407; Eusebius, Ecol. Hist. iv. 14; v. 24; Migne, Series Graeca, xx. 193). This, if we accept the Eusebian chronology, in the Eccles. Hist., would be about A.D. 158–159; while according to the Catalogus Liberianus (as restored by Mommsen) it would fall in the year 151—a much earlier date than is conjectured for that of Polycarp's visit by any writer of authority. The most recent investigation of the date of Polycarp's martyrdom, that of Mr. Waddington, may be regarded, however, as affording conclusive proof that it must be assigned to the year 155 or 156 (Mémoire sur la Chronologie du Rhéteur Aelius Aristides, in Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscrip. xxvi. (1867); see also his Fastes Asia-tiques in Lebas and Waddington's Asie Mineure). Such a conclusion, moreover, is in perfect harmony with the Eusebian chronology as corrected by Lipsius; for if we assign to Anicetus twelve years of office, terminating with the year 167, and deduct from this date eleven years, it gives the year 156 as that of his second year of office—the traditional year of Polycarp's martyrdom. It only remains to be added that Waddington's conclusions have been substantially accepted by Renan, Hilgenfeld, and Lipsius, and, although assailed by Wieseler (Christenverfolgungen der Caesaren, 1878), have been triumphantly vindicated by Lipsius (Jahrb. für protest. Theol. 1878, 4, p. 751 sq.).

Into the minor difficulties attaching to the different lists in the enumeration from Sixtus (or Xystus) to Liberius (after which time no doubt of much importance attaches to the accuracy of the official records) it is unnecessary that we should here enter. With respect to the earlier period, in which both the main interest and the chief difficulty centre, we may perhaps conclude that authentic tradition is wanting until we reach the name of Xystus, or at the earliest that of Alexander. Of certain special reasons for caution in accepting the prevalent tradition, we shall have occasion to speak at the close of this article; but while admitting to their fullest extent the arguments which suggest the necessity for such caution, it may be said that they cannot be regarded as sufficient to invalidate the historical existence of the characters whose names are recorded as those of Peter's immediate successors. "These names," says Lipsius, ^f The duration of Pius's tenure of office is given in the text of the Cat. Lib. as ann. xx. m. iiii. d. xxi.; this however is contradicted by the dates there given of the consular years of his accession and decease, and is also at variance with II., III., and IV. On these grounds Lipsius considers himself justified in altering the period to sixteen years.

"are those of men who occupied a conspicuous position in the church at Rome in the first and second generations after the apostles. Linus, referred to in 2 Tim. iv. 21 as among the circle of Paul's friends during his imprisonment, belongs to the former, and Anencletus, or Cletus, Aristus or Evarestus, to the latter generation."

(II.) DEVELOPMENT OF THE CONCEPTION OF THE OFFICE: (1) in relation to other churches; (2) in relation to the civil power.

(i) In relation to other churches.

It will now be of service to notice some of the principal facts which illustrate the gradual acceptance by the church at large of the theory of the Roman supremacy; and here it cannot but be looked upon as of peculiar significance, that in the earliest times the history of the church at Rome appears involved in the greatest obscurity. From the date of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans (A.D. 58) up to the episcopate of Victor (A.D. 193-202), its annals are a blank, save when some incidental allusion in the controversies of the time reveals an occasional fact.

The growing importance of the bishopric is however clearly shown by the saying of the emperor Decius, preserved by Cyprian, to the effect that he would sooner hear of the appearance of a rival to his throne, than of the appointment of a new bishop to the Roman see (Epist. ad Antonian.; Migne, iii. 774). The theory set forth by Cyprian himself of the essential unity of the church, may perhaps justly be regarded as tending to support that of the primacy of the bishop of Rome. He speaks, for example (Epist. 55, ad Cornelium), of the "chair of Peter," and "the principal church of Rome, from whence the priestly unity derived its origin"—"ad Petri cathedram atque ad ecclesiam principalem, unde unitas sacerdotalis exorta est, . . . litteras ferre." This language, however, when compared with other passages (Epp. 7, 52, 57, 72; Epist. ad Q. de Haereticis Baptizandis; de Unitate Eccles. c. 4) seems, at most, only to prove that he regarded the bishop of Rome as "primus inter pares;" he speaks for example (Epist. 52) of pope Cornelius as "collega noster," and distinctly affirms that the other apostles were invested with an equal share of honour and power with Peter,—"pari consortio praediti et honoris et potestatis" (de Unitate, c. 4). The phraseology of the bishops of Rome themselves, when addressing other bishops, is confirmatory of this view. In the 4th, and earlier part of the 5th, century we find "Julius . . . fratribus" (Mansi, ii. 1211); "Liberius fratri Eusebio" (iii. 204, 207, 209); "Liberius episc. dil. fratri Eusebio" (ib. 205); "dil. fratribus et coepiscopis nostris Liberius urbis Romae episcopus" (ib. iii. 208); "Zosimus episcopus urbis Romae Hesychio episcopo Salonitano," "Leo episcopus urbis Romae," "Felix episc. s. ecclesiae cath. urbis Romae Acacio," "Gelasius Romanae ecclesiae episcopus," &c. In these latter quotations the limitation implied in the addition "urbis Romae" is of no small significance.

With the fourth century, the evidence that

† The passages in this chapter which assign to Peter a supremacy among the other apostles do not occur in the earlier MSS., and are attributed by Gieseler (Kirchengesch. i. 364) to Romish transcribers; it is certain that they involve the writer in a contradiction of himself.

favours the Roman theory becomes more abundant and more decisive. Much of it, however, relates to the technical question of jurisdiction and will be found under APPEAL; much, again, to those relations of the bishop of Rome to the general episcopate, which it has been found more convenient to treat in the fourth division of the present article; our enquiry here will consequently be limited to ascertaining the extent to which the authority of the bishop of Rome was admitted by the church at large in connexion with the definition of doctrine and the maintenance of discipline.

At the council of Nicaea the first signatures are those of Hosius, Vito, and Vincentius, the latter two being further described as "presbyteri Romani," subscribing "pro venerabili viro papa et episcopo nostro sancto Silvestro;" and, if it were possible to accept the statement of Gelasius, Hosius himself (the eminent bishop of Corduba and president of the council) was really the legate of Sylvester on this occasion: ἐπέχων τὸν τόπον τοῦ τῆς μεγίστης Ῥώμης ἐπισκόπου (Mansi, ii. 692; Gelasius, Hist. Conc. Nicaeni, ib. ii. 805). This theory indeed is still accepted by Catholic writers (Hefele, Concilien-gesch. i. 24-38; von Schulte, Concilien, p. 65), but is rejected by Milman, Greenwood, Robertson, and others, on the ground of apparent interpolation and confusion; for at the council of Sardica, eighteen years later (A.D. 343) we find the subscriptions of Hosius and Vincentius appearing in the same places, but without any addition to indicate that they attended in a legate capacity from Rome.^b

The alleged canons of the council of Sardica undoubtedly conferred on Julius, bishop of Rome, the power of hearing appeals; but the fact that the canons appear to have been unknown to the church for many years after (Greenwood, i. 155), and that when adduced by Zosimus (A.D. 417-8), their authority was denied by the African bishops (Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. ii. c. 4), is strongly against their genuineness (Gieseler I. ii. 199). And even if their genuineness were admitted, it is still most probable (though we find Sozomen and Socrates in the following century representing their scope as general) that they implied a departure from the rule of the church, and were designed to have effect during the episcopate of Julius only (Baur, Christliche Kirche, ii. 245).

With respect both to Sylvester and to Julius we have, moreover, other evidence which distinctly contravenes a contrary assumption. A letter addressed to the former by the council of Nicaea, asks for a confirmation of the council's decision by a synod of all the bishops of Rome: "episcopos totius vestrae apostolicae urbis in unum convenire, vestrumque habere concilium . . . ut firmetur nostra sanctimonia" (Mansi, ii. 719); and similarly Julius, when he summoned the accusers of Athanasius to Rome, and was met by the demand why he assumed to write alone, replied that the views he upheld were not his alone, but those of all Italy and all her bishops: "nam tametsi solus sim, qui scripsi, non meam tamen solius sententiam, sed omnium Italorum, et omnium in his regionibus episcoporum scripsi" (ib. ii. 1230).

^b An additional proof of a certain tampering with the text is furnished by the statement of the Libellus Synodicus, which gives a third version of the function filled by Vito and Vincentius, as that of the presidents of the Council: ἡς ἐξήρχον προκαθεζόμενοι, ἔβαν καὶ Βικέντιος πρεσβύτεροι, τὸν τόπον ὑπέχοντες Σιλβέστρου τοῦ πάππα Ῥώμης καὶ τοῦ διαδόχου αὐτοῦ Ἰουλίου (Mansi, ii. 747).

Even so late as the time of Innocent I., Chrysostom, when entreating the interposition of the Roman pontiff against his rival Theophilus, appeals not only to Rome but to the collective episcopate of Italy,—κύριοί μου τιμώτατοι καὶ εὐλαβέστατοι (Migne, S.G. lii. 534).

It is however undeniable that, as already observed, a great accession of influence, if not of directly admitted authority, was gained by the see of Rome as the result of the policy of Julius and his successors in connexion with the Athanasian controversy. The bishop of Rome was from that time regarded as the foremost defender of orthodox doctrine; and the discharge of such a function at a time when, according to the assertion of Pacianus, heresies were so rife that their bare enumeration would fill an "immense volume" (Migne, xiii. 1053), was in itself an inestimable service to the church. Yet, notwithstanding, the fourth century passed away leaving the Roman supremacy still unrecognised. Of this the implicit testimony of Jerome affords almost conclusive proof. In one of his most notable letters (ad Rusticum; Migne, Patrol. xxii. 932), he takes occasion to enforce, by various analogies, the expediency of admitting a central and single authority. He adduces examples from the animal kingdom, from the imperial power, from the judicial power, from the military power, and from domestic rule, and finally goes on to say,—"singuli ecclesiarum episcopi, singuli archipresbyteri, singuli archidiaconi; et omnis ordo ecclesiasticus suis rectoribus nititur" (ib. 942), but, remarkably enough, makes no reference to the bishop of Rome.

Under Innocent I. the claim to supremacy was urged with fresh vigour and increased boldness of assertion. In a letter to Decentius, bishop of Eugubium, he says that the authority handed down from St. Peter is entitled to the obedience of all ("ab omnibus debere servari"), especially, he goes on to say, "when it is clear that throughout all Italy, Gaul, the Spains, Africa, and Sicily, together with the intermediate islands, no one founded churches save those whom the venerable apostle Peter and his successors ordained to the priestly office" (Coustant, i. 855; Mansi, iii. 1028), thus entirely ignoring the labours of St. Paul in the West. Writing (about A.D. 415) to Alexander, bishop of Antioch, he claims precedence for Rome over that see, as the city to which "the honour temporarily conferred on Antioch (the presidency of St. Peter) was transferred, and in which it was consummated," "quod illa in transitu meruit ista susceptum apud se consummatumque gauderet" (Mansi, iii. 1054).

We may perhaps infer with Milman (Lat. Christianity, bk. ii. c. 4) that the Roman supremacy was, by this time, generally admitted in Italy, for we find Leo I. writing to the bishop of Aquileia (which see was not included in the Roman diocese) as one subject to his immediate jurisdiction (Migne, Patrol. liv. 590). In Africa, however, in the time of Zosimus (A.D. 417–8), the independence of the episcopate is amply attested by its condemnation of "transmarina judicia" as a lawful court of appeal for presbyters in that province (APPEAL, p. 129). That the ability of Leo, aided by the decree of Valentinian, would have overcome this spirit there can be little doubt; but in the year before Leo's accession Carthage was taken by Genserich, and the province became subject to Arian domination.

It was during the pontificate of Leo (A.D. 440–61) that, by general admission, the Petrine prerogative first received full and distinct enunciation. As already stated, the decree of Valentinian III. must be looked upon as virtually the act of Leo, who claimed that he and his successors derived from St. Peter a supreme if not immediate jurisdiction over the whole church: "per omnes ecclesias cura nostra distenditur, exigente hoc a nobis Domino, qui apostolicæ dignitatis beatissimo apostolo Petro primum fidei suæ remuneratione commisit" (Epist. ad Episc. Illyr. Mansi, v. 1231; cf. Epist. ad Dioscurum, ib. v. 1240). Of the exclusive character of this claim, his language in his sermon on the fourth anniversary of his pontificate leaves no doubt: "et tamen de toto mundo unus Petrus eligitur, qui et universarum gentium vocationi et omnibus apostolis cunctisque ecclesiæ patribus praeponatur, ut quamvis in populo Dei multi sacerdotes sint multoque pastores, omnes tamen proprie regat Petrus quos principaliter regit et Christus" (Migne, Patrol. liv. 16).

Though, after the invasion of Genserich, the political power had lapsed almost completely into Leo's hands, the prestige resulting therefrom is treated by him as altogether subordinate: "Roma, quæ tamen per apostolici sacerdotii principatum amplior facta est arce religionis quam solio potestatis" (De Vocatione Gent. bk. ii. c. 6); "Civitas sacerdotalis et regia per sacram beati Petri sedem caput orbis effecta, latius præsidens religione divina quam dominatione terrena" (quoted by Neander, tr. Torrey, iii. 226).

Yet notwithstanding the unlimited jurisdiction claimed by Leo, it seems probable that even he regarded his powers as visitatorial in their character, to be exercised beyond the Roman diocese only when occasion called for interference; and we may perhaps assent to the view that "he would himself have been shocked at that unmitigated religious despotism for which his name and his authority were vouches by his successors" (Greenwood, Cath. Petri, i. 437).

Under Hilary (A.D. 461–7), Leo's successor, the claims ratified by the decree of Valentinian were pressed still more unreservedly in the provinces; and his celebrated letter to the Gallic bishops embodies little less than a claim not only to universal, but also to immediate legislative authority in the church (see Thiel, Rom. Pont. Epist. i. 141–6).

How successfully these claims were urged, may be seen when we compare the language of Avitus of Vienne, at the commencement of the 6th century, with that of Hilary of Arles. In his letter to the Palmaria synod (A.D. 502) he ascribes to pope Symmachus superiority to all earthly tribunals, and says that he can be judged only by God; he also distinctly implies the universal character of the Roman episcopacy: "At si Papa Urbis vocatur in dubium, episcopatus jam videbitur non episcopus vacillare" (Migne, lix. 248–9).

In the pontificate of Hormisdas (A.D. 514–23) a further advance is discernible in the successful effort made to include the East (which had never accepted the decree of Valentinian III.) in the enunciation of the foregoing theory; and the form of confession subscribed by John, the patriarch of Constantinople, on the return of the Eastern church to orthodoxy, although evasive in expression, was regarded as recording a signal victory for Rome: "Sanctissimas Dei ecclesias, id est, superioris vestrae et novellae illius Romae, unam esse accipio; illam sedem apostoli Petri et istius augustae civitatis unam esse definio" (ib. lxiv. 444). We find accordingly John I. (A.D. 523-6) refusing to hold intercourse with Epiphanius, the patriarch of Constantinople, until his right to take precedence had been recognized: πρωταρχεῖς ὑπὸ Ἐπιφανίου τοῦ πατριάρχου οὐ κατεδέξατο ἕως προεκβίβειν τοῦ Ἐπιφανίου ὁ Ῥώμης (Theophanes, Chronographia, Corp. Hist. Byzant. XXVI. i. 261). In the same spirit Pelagius II. (A.D. 578-90), while denouncing the assumption by John of Constantinople of the title of "oecumenical patriarch," asserted in the most unequivocal language the universal primacy of the see of Rome: "cum generalium synodorum convocandi auctoritas apostolicae sedi beati Petri singulari privilegio sit tradita" (Migne, lxxii. 739).

John, however, so far from discontinuing the title, again subscribed himself thus in the letters in which he acknowledged the formal notification of the accession of Gregory the Great. This drew from Gregory (A.D. 590-604) a still more emphatic condemnation of what he designated as "a haughty and damnable distinction;" "moreover," he adds, "it is known to all that the apostle Peter is the chief of the universal church. Paul, Andrew, John—what were they other than chiefs of particular churches?" (Migne, lxxvii. 743).

The remarkable extension given by Gregory the Great to the power of the pontificate will be noticed under the two divisions with which it is most closely associated; (1), the relations of Rome to the episcopal order; (2), the extension of the church's patrimonium. In the West we have evidence that important exceptions continued to exist to the recognition of the pope as universal metropolitan. In Spain, it is observed by Baxmann (Politik der Päpste, i. 116), that the only instance of Gregory's assertion of such jurisdiction (see infra, p. 1673) was at Malaga, where the imperial government still held its ground. In support of the conclusion to which this fact plainly points, it may be noted that the language of Gregory's illustrious contemporary, Isidore of Seville, is singularly wanting in any such recognition of the Roman prerogatives as the papal assumptions of the preceding century might appear to demand. Isidore admits indeed (ad Eugen. Episc. Tolet.; Migne, lxxxiii. 574), that the "potestas" and "dignitas" conferred on Peter, and transmitted from him to all bishops, were given "specialius Romano antistiti;" but in a more formal treatise (de Officiis Eccl. ii. v. 5) he expressly affirms that all bishops are to be regarded as equal, just as the other apostles were equal to St. Peter, "siquidem et caeteri apostolorum cum Petro par consortium honoris et potestatis effecti sunt . . . quibus decedentibus successerunt episcopi, qui sunt constituti per totum mundum in sedibus apostolorum." Similarly in his Origines (VII. xi.) he assigns "sedes apostolicae" to patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops alike: "Patriarcha Graeca lingua summus pater, quia primum, id est apostolicum, tenet locum" . . . Archiepiscopus Graece summus episcoporum, tenet enim vicem apostolicum," &c.

Among those Western nations which were indebted for their conversion to the direct agency of Rome, we perceive, however, an increased and not unnatural disposition to acknowledge a filial rather than a fraternal relation to the parent see; while after Gregory's death, the course of events—the subjugation of Syria and Egypt by the Saracens, with the involved loss of Jerusalem to Christendom, and the extinction of the churches of Antioch and Alexandria—powerfully contributed to the establishment of the papal autocracy. In England, from the time of the council of Whitby (A.D. 664), the Gregorian traditions, as enforced by Augustine, Theodorus, Wilfrid, and others, were readily accepted, though a strong spirit of resistance to the Roman claims to immediate jurisdiction is from time to time discernible. The British church appears to have almost refused to regard the English churches as Christian (Bede, E. H. ii. 20). The representatives of the English church taxed their antagonists, in return, with spurning "in tyrannous pertinacity the tradition of the Roman church" (see letter of Aldhelm to Geraint; Bright, Early English Church Hist. pp. 419-423). From England this teaching was in turn diffused over Frankland. In this latter country, however, more than one important change in the relations to the papacy is to be noted. From the time of Caesarius of Arles (A.D. 500) the churches in Aquitania and Burgundy, converted from Arianism to Catholicism, appear to have assumed towards the Roman see an attitude of unquestioning deference. Of this the frequent acceptance of the pallium (infra, p. 1673), as well as other evidence, is sufficient proof. But in Neustria and Austrasia, among the purely Frankish population, this was not equally the case. The Merovingian kings usurped the popular rights in appointing bishops to vacant sees (Guizot, Essais, pp. 192-3); and the relations which the genius of Gregory the Great succeeded in establishing (Mansi, x. 34, 293; Sirmond, i. 420, 454, 456) were not sustained. After the death of queen Brunehaut the intercourse with Rome appears to have come to an end. The council of Paris (A.D. 615), which restored the canonical form of episcopal elections, makes no reference to the papal authority. Guizot observes that from the death of Gregory the Great to the time of Gregory II. (A.D. 604-715), not a single document exists which can be cited as proof of intercommunication between the rulers of Frankish Gaul and the papacy (Civil. en France, ii. 235). It was the great result of the mission of St. Boniface that it restored the spirit of allegiance to Rome in yet more than its original force; and the principle which he distinctly enunciated of the duty of referring all difficulties of an important character to the see of Rome for solution, marks an all-important era in European church history: "eodem modo quo nos Romana ecclesia ordinatos cum sacramento constrinxit, ut si sacerdotes vel plebes a lege Dei deviasse viderim et corrigere non potuerim, fideliter semper Sedi Apostolicae et Vicario sancti Petri ad emendandum indicaverim; sic enim, ni fallor, omnes episcopi debent metropolitano, et ipse Romano Pontifici, si quid de corrigendis populis apud eos impossibile est notum facere" (Migne, lxxxix. 764).

At this point we enter upon the commencement of a remarkable fusion between the political and ecclesiastical aspects of our subject, which may be reserved for further comment until towards the close of the outline relating to the development of the conception of the papacy.

(ii) In relation to the Civil Power.—The relations of the State to the Christian community under Constantine the Great and his successors were largely determined by motives of policy. We find Constantius, whose conception of Christianity was extremely defective, avowing his belief that the whole State was more effectually aided by "religion" than by all the services and endeavours of his subjects, and declaring it to be his anxious desire "to rejoice in and to be exalted by the faith." (Cod. Theod. bk. xvi. tit. ii.; ed. Hänel, p. 1490.) Similarly, Valentinian III., in the edict already quoted, speaks of the favour of heaven as chiefly to be gained by the Christian "faith and religion." According to Godefroy (Novellae, p. 49) the terms "religion" and "faith," as here and elsewhere employed by the Roman lawyers, are to be understood in a sense very different from that in which these terms were used by the church itself, and denoted simply the body of privileges ("privilegia ecclesiae" or πολιτεία ἐκκλησιαστική, as they were respectively termed, in the West and the East), conferred upon Christianity as a recognised organization by the State.

In such a compact with the new religion, the emperors, with whatever admixture of higher motives, undoubtedly saw their own political gain; and in like manner the bishops of Rome, in their efforts to assert their jurisdiction over the whole church, discerned a similar advantage in a coalition with the imperial power. This advantage was not, however, to be gained without a corresponding loss of independence and ecclesiastical freedom. "The laws of the Christian emperors," says an able writer, "from Constantine to Leo the philosopher, manifest the absolute subordination of the spiritual to the temporal authority. The minutiae of church government, the relations of the clergy among themselves and to the state, their duties, their morals, and their actions, monastic regulations, the suppression of heresies—all the details, in fact, of ecclesiastical life, internal and external, are prescribed with the assurance of unquestioned power, and with a care which shews how large a portion of the imperial attention was devoted to the management of the church." (H. C. Lea, Studies in Church History, p. 16.) At Rome, however, as regards the chief pontiffs, this language must be accepted with considerable qualification. Exactly in proportion as the imperial power declined in vigour, they are to be seen assuming a bolder policy towards both the church and the state. The removal of the imperial court to Ravenna, under Honorius, was followed by the new assumptions that mark the pontificate of Innocent I. The feebleness of Valentinian III. was in some measure compensated by the vigour of Leo.

So long as the Western empire continued to exist, the traditions of papal Rome were those of at least professed deference to the temporal power; but when, in 476, the Western succession came to an end, the language and demeanour of the popes towards the emperors of the East were characterised by a different tone. A comparison of the letters of Gelasius (A.D. 492-6) with those of Leo I. illustrates this difference. The latter pontiff invariably addresses the emperor with great deference, and admits in the most explicit manner the imperial prerogative in relation to the church. To Theodosius II. he writes, with reference to the assembling of a general council at Rome, "clementia vestra concedat" (Mansi, vi. 53); to Marcian, "differri ad opportunius tempus sacerdotalem synodum juberetis" (ib. vi. 83). Gelasius, on the other hand, while admitting the Roman sovereignty of Anastasius, unflinchingly asserts the supremacy of the church itself in all matters of doctrine. The tone of Symmachus (A.D. 498-514) is equally bold, "An quia imperator es, contra Petri niteris potestatem?" (Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. p. 703.)

During the ascendancy of the Gothic power in Italy (A.D. 476-553), the claims of its monarchs were restricted to the right of interference at the papal elections (see III. ii. "Election"). Theodoric the Great, indeed, proclaimed complete liberty of religious profession, "Religionem imperare non possumus, quia nemo cogitur ut credat invitus" (Cassiod. Variar. ii. 27; v. 37). The relations of the Greek emperors and the Gothic sovereigns are, however, justly characterised by Greenwood (Cath. Petri, ii. 125) as "of some moment to the progress of papal history," the imperial policy being directed towards an alliance with the pope, in order to gain assistance in its scheme for the re-annexation of Italy. John I. was received at Constantinople (A.D. 525) with distinguished honours; and to the suspicions thereby excited in the breast of Theodoric we may attribute his death in prison on his return to Italy. In the year 530, a decree of Justinian declared Constantinople to be supreme over all the churches, "Constantinopolitana ecclesia omnium aliarum est caput" (Just. Codex, i. tit. ii. 24, ed. Kriegel, p. 22); but in 534, on the eve of the expedition of Belisarius, an endeavour was made by the emperor to enlist the sympathies of John II. on his side, by a remarkable letter, wherein, after addressing the pontiff as "Sanctissimus Archiepiscopus almae urbis Romae et Patriarcha," he assures him that he has resolved to subject and unite all the clergy of the regions of the East to the Romish see, "Ideoque omnes sacerdotes universi orientalis tractus et subicere et unire sedi vestrae sanctitatis properavimus" (ib. i. tit. i. ad fin. ed. Kriegel, p. 13).

The selection of John I. as ambassador from Theodoric to the emperor, and that of Agapetus for a like commission by Theodotus, the Gothic monarch, in 535, are evidence of the growing importance of the papal office in relation to the civil power. After the imperial supremacy had been restored in Italy by the arms of Belisarius and Narses, the exarchs of Ravenna succeeded to the authority before wielded by the kings of the Ostrogoths, and the papal elections regularly awaited their confirmation (III. ii. "Election"). Rome herself descended to the second rank in Italy, and the treatment of Silverius (A.D. 536-8), and of Vigilius (A.D. 538-55) proves how completely the popes were now at the mercy of the emperor. Yet, notwithstanding, the Roman see still represented the highest and most influential authority among the Italians themselves, and the Pragmatic Sanction of Justinian (A.D. 554), which fixed the civil organization of Italy, was issued at the request of Vigilius (Gibbon, c. xliii.).

With the establishment of the Lombard supremacy, that of the Byzantine court was again reduced to little more than a shadow; and it may be regarded as the key to much of the state policy of Gregory the Great, that his chief aim was to extricate the papacy from the dangers by which it was menaced by these two powers. His aversion from the conquerors did not prevent him from gaining over Agilulph, the king of the Lombards, to the Catholic as opposed to the Arian interest (Paulus Diac. bk. vi. cc. 9 and 10). And though he continued to profess allegiance to the emperor, there can be no question that his sympathies with the empire were to a great extent estranged by the assumption by his rival at Constantinople of the title of "oecumenical patriarch." The relations which this pope sought to establish both with Frankland and with England stand in very close connexion with those existing between the papacy and the Lombard and Byzantine courts (Baur, Gesch. d. Kirche, ii. 251; Baxmann, Politik d. Päpste, i. 26).

The decrees of the Quinisext council (A.D. 691), of which the thirty-sixth canon was an endeavour to revive that theory of episcopal pre-eminence which regarded it as resting solely on a political foundation, and the efforts of Justinian II. to thrust them on the acceptance of the West, mark the last stage of interference on the part of the Eastern emperors with the papal power. In the pontificate of Gregory II. (A.D. 715-731) the dispute concerning image worship completed the rupture between East and West; the estates of the Roman see in Sicily and Calabria were confiscated by the emperor Leo; and although Gregory continued to profess a nominal allegiance to the emperor, it would appear that it was mainly from motives dictated by yet stronger feelings of animosity to the Lombards that he and his successors, to use the somewhat exaggerated expression of Gibbon (c. xlix.) "spared the relics of the Byzantine dominion" (Greenwood, ii. 481). Nothing, however, could exceed in plainness the terms in which Gregory repudiated the right of the emperor to interfere in questions of dogma, and maintained that the spheres of the imperial and papal authority were entirely distinct: "Scis imperator, sanctae ecclesiae dogmata non imperatorum esse, sed pontificum, quae tuto dogmatizari debent. Idecirco ecclesiis praepositi sunt pontifices a rei publicae negotiis abstinentes, et imperatores ergo similiter ab ecclesiasticis abstineant, et quae sibi commissum sunt, capessant" (Mansi, xii. 960). The significance of this passage is enhanced when we consider that it is from the pen of one whom Gibbon styles "the founder of the papal monarchy."

It is, however, to the relations of the see of Rome to the Lombard power that we must refer that alliance with the Frankish monarch which paved the way for the assertion of that very political power which Gregory II. professed to disclaim. "Placed between a heretic and a robber" (to use the expression of Bryce), the Roman pontiff fled for assistance to the Frank; and the appeal of Gregory III. to Charles Martel for aid against the Lombards marks the commencement of that new conjunction which resulted in the claims of mediaeval popedom. The title of "papa universalis" which Gregory I. had denounced as blasphemous, was claimed by his successors in the 8th century, and the aspiration to political influence which Gregory II. disavowed, grew, in the middle ages, into an assertion of political supremacy.

Other circumstances favoured these results. The Orbis Christianus no longer coincided with the Orbis Romanus, and the want of a bond of union between the nations of the West was painfully felt. This want the papacy could in a great measure supply; and the celibacy of the popes, and the elective character still preserved by their office, served to diminish the jealousy with which a line of hereditary rulers might have been regarded.

Under these circumstances, the appearance of Boniface in Frankland as the papal legate was attended with signal success, and was productive of results which can hardly be over-estimated in their importance. The "familiar" relations which this prelate had already entered into with Rome, the oath whereby he bound himself to perpetual fidelity to the supreme pontiff (Sirmund, i. 512), and the strenuous manner in which he upheld the theory of the Catholic unity, the duty of subjection on the part of the whole clergy to the successor of St. Peter, and the superiority of the pope to all earthly tribunals ("quia cunctos ipse iudicaturus a nemine est iudicandus") constitute a crisis in European history. (See Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 553-4; Labbe and Cossart, iii. 1925; Greenwood, Cath. Petri, ii. 361-71).

The main facts in relation to the compact with Pippin and Charles are stated elsewhere (see IV. iv. "Political Sovereignty"). It will be sufficient here to observe, that although the elective character of the papal office was preserved, the validity of each election, at least throughout the reign of Charles the Great, was entirely dependent on the sanction of the Frankish monarch, to whom the pope acknowledged a kind of feudal relation. We find, for instance, that when Leo III. announced his election to Charles, the latter, in reply, expressed his pleasure at receiving the assurance of humble obedience and the pledge of fidelity to the throne offered by the pontiff, "gavisus sumus seu in electionis unanimitate, seu in humilitatis vestrae obedientia et in promissionis ad nos fidelitate" (Carolina, ed. Jaffé, p. 354).

It is, however, at least questionable, whether the coronation of Charles at Rome (an event but imperfectly understood and very variously interpreted) was not, to a great extent, a skilful readjustment of the mutual relations of the empire and the papacy. As the pope required the consent of the emperor, before his election could be regarded as valid, so the emperor henceforth received the formal award of his crown from the pope.

Though the power of the Frankish episcopate largely increased with the decline of the Carolingian dynasty, the papal and the royal supremacy were still held to be inextricably linked together. Thomassin quotes, in proof of this, the language of the fourth council of Tours (A.D. 849), addressed to Nomenoë, duke of Armorica, who, at the same time that he revolted from his allegiance to Charles the Bald, sought to render the metropolitan of his province independent of Rome: "omnem laesisti Christianitatem dum Vicarium B. Petri apostolicum, cui dedit Deus primatum in omni orbe terrarum sprevisti" (Sirmond, iii. 70). Similarly, Lewis the German, when he sought to bring over the council of Chiersy to his side in his contest with his brother Charles, received for reply that they could never desert one who had been inaugurated so solemnly by the Frankish bishops, "quemque sancta Sedes Apostolica, mater nostra, litteris apostolicis ut regem honorare studuit et confirmare" (Sirmond, iii. 129).

In the memorable struggle between Nicholas I. and Hincmar (arising out of the divorce of queen Theutberga by her husband, Lothair II.) these theories were asserted by pope Nicholas with unanswerable force against the French bishops. He maintained that even the imperial dignity and power were the gift of the holy see; and in the sequel Hincmar was compelled to restore Rothrad to the see of Soissons, and Lothair to receive back his consort. In support of this simultaneous exercise of the papal prerogative in the civil and in the ecclesiastical domain, we find Nicholas appealing to the False Decretals, a collection of spurious pontifical decrees which, it was alleged, had been compiled by Isidore of Seville, but of which the Roman archives presented no trace, their first appearance belonging to the years 829-840, when they were brought to light at Mentz. In these the sole legislative power of the pope was formally and systematically laid down. "The papacy," says Milman, "became a legislative as well as an administrative authority. Infallibility was the next inevitable step, if infallibility was not already in the power asserted to have been bestowed by the Lord on St. Peter, by St. Peter handed down in unbroken descent, and in a plenitude which could not be restricted or limited, to the latest of his successors" (Lat. Christianity, bk. v. c. 4).

III. DISTINCTIVE FEATURES OF THE OFFICE.

(i) Titles.

Papa.—This title, as already stated, was of wide and various use before its final limitation to the Roman pontiff. In the East its ecclesiastical use has always been comparatively vague, including not only bishops and priests but even readers. We find, for example, the emperor Isaac Comnenus, in the 11th century, speaking of a "lector" as "papa." "Quando episcopus facit simplicem papam sive lectorem" (Lupus, Opera, v. 214). In the 5th century, Avitus, bishop of Vienne, writing to the patriarch of Jerusalem, addresses him as "Papa, Apostle, and Prince of the Universal Church:" "Papae Hierosolymitano. Exerces apostolatus vester concessos a Divinitate primatus, et quod principem locum in universali ecclesia teneat, non privilegii solum studet monstrare, sed meritis" (Epist. 23; Migne, Patrol. lix. 239). In Alexandria the title appears to have been first borne by Heraclius, who was elected patriarch in the year 222: "ejus tempore appellatus est patriarcha Alexandrinus Baba, id est avus" (Entychii Alexand. Patriarchae Annales, Migne, S. G. exi.

381-3). It has been asserted that the title was also borne by the archbishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, but this is denied by Asseman, (Biblioth. Orient. i. 14), who says that the archbishop was styled "Primas, Catholicus, et Patriarcha," but never "Papa."

In the West it would appear from the testimony of Walafrid Strabo (supra, p. 1652), that throughout our period the title was not necessarily restricted to its modern use. In its actual employment, however, it appears to have been confined at an early period to bishops. Its limitation to the pope of Rome was gradual, commencing, probably, in the 6th century; and, as we should naturally expect, among the communities more directly under the influence of the Roman see. Liberatus of Carthage speaks both of the "bishop of Rome" and of the "pope of Rome," but, according to Thomassin, after the time of Agapetus (A.D. 535-6), restricts the title of "papa" to the pope: "Agapetus papa ordinatur;" "Papae et senatui Romano scribens rex," &c. (Breviar. cc. 18, 21, 22). In other parts of the West, the title continued for some time longer to be applied without restriction to all bishops. Of this a passage in Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. iv. 26) affords a good illustration. In the year 563 Clothaire I. presented one Emerius to the see of Saintes without the consent of the metropolitan Leontius. Leontius accordingly sought to annul the appointment, and at a council, convened at Saintes, Emerius was deposed, and one Heraclius elected in his place. Heraclius was thereupon advised to despatch a messenger to the court of Charibert, king of Paris, to gain his support. On entering the royal presence, the messenger exclaimed, "Salve rex gloriose, sedes enim apostolica eminentiae tuae salutem mittit uberimam!" To which the king replied, "Numquid Turonicam¹ adiisti urbem, ut papae illius nobis salutem deferas?" It is difficult to avoid concluding from this passage that both Saintes and Tours were styled "sedes apostolicae" in the 6th century, and their bishops "papae." So also Clovis, when addressing the Gaulish bishops in the year 508, styles them "apostolica sede dignissimi papae" (Mansi, viii. 346); and they appear themselves to have claimed the title "apostolici" at the first council of Orleans, A.D. 511 (Mansi, viii. 367). Thomassin, however, observes, that at the third (A.D. 538), fourth (A.D. 541), and fifth (A.D. 549) councils of Orleans, and that of Clermont (A.D. 549), only Rome is styled "apostolica sedes." He also cites a letter of Avitus (Epist. 31), written circa 525, as referring to the pope simply as "papa;" but in the same letter (Migne, Patrol. lix. 248-9) the expression "papa Urbis" also occurs, while in another (Epist. 7) Avitus appears to attribute equal dignity to the "papa Constantinopolitanus," referring to this pontiff and the Roman pontiff as a double constellation in the ecclesiastical firmament, "velut geminos apostolorum principes . . . velut in coelo positum religionis signum pro gemino sidere." Fortunatus of Poitiers, writing in the latter half of the 6th century, inscribes a letter to ¹ Ruinart, who is followed by Migne (lxxi. 166), reads "Romanam" for "Turonicam," but see note to Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 20.

Felix, bishop of Nantes: "Domino sancto et apostolica sede dignissimo patri, Felici papae" (Misc. iii. 4; Migne, lxxviii. 119); and writing to Euphronius, bishop of Tours, inscribes the letter "Domino sancto . . . papae" (ib. iii. 1; Migne, lxxviii. 115).

It is supposed by Thomassin and by Phillips (Kirchenrecht, v. 603) that, with the end of the 6th century the title began to be entirely restricted to the pope of Rome, who was now generally recognised as "pater patrum." We find, however, that at the sixth general council, that of Constantinople in the year 680, Honorius is referred to as "papa antiquae Romae," and Cyrus as "papa Alexandriae" (Mansi, xi. 214). The following titles assumed by, or given to, pope Agatho, in the Acts of the same council, appear to indicate that such titles were largely enhanced, at discretion, by the use of adjectives, or a more amplified description: "episcopus servus servorum Dei;" "episcopus sanctae Dei catholicae atque apostolicae ecclesiae urbis Romae;" "sanctus nuper ordinatus papa in apostolica sede antiquae Romae;" "sanctissimus et beatissimus archiepiscopus antiquae Romae;" "sanctissimus et beatissimus papa;" "sanctissimus papa;" "orthodoxus papa" (ib. xi. 202, 209, 285, 298, 322, 330, 346).

In the 9th century the dissociation of the title from ordinary episcopal dignity is attested by the fact that we find Gregory IV. (A.D. 827-44) reproving the Frankish bishops for addressing him by the incongruous titles of "frater" and "papa;" when it would, he says, have been more fitting to have shewn simply the reverence due to a father: "Romano pontifici scribentes, contrariis eum in praefatione nominibus appellatis, fratrem videlicet et papam; dum congruentius esset solam ei paternam reverentiam exhibere" (Migne, civ. 207).

The use of this title in addressing any other ecclesiastical dignity than the pope of Rome was formally forbidden by Gregory VII. in the council of Rome of the year 1073: "ut papae nomen unicum sit in toto orbe Christiano, nec liceat alicui se ipsum vel alium eo nomine appellare" (Gieseler, Kirchengesch. i. ii. 405, with note).

Pontifex maximus and pontifex summus. [See PONTIFEX.]

Episcopus universalis or oecumenicus.—This title first assumes significance in the time of Pelagius II. (A.D. 578-590), who, as we have already seen, strenuously denounced its assumption by John the patriarch, and at the same time disclaimed it for himself (Baronius, ad ann. 587). His remonstrance appears to have produced no effect on John, for we find his successor, Gregory the Great, repeating both the remonstrance and the disclaimer. According to Gregory, the council of Chalcedon had already distinctly affirmed the exclusive right of the Roman pontiff to this title, but no pope had hitherto assumed to himself this "audacious name," lest such an assumption should seem to involve the denial of the title to his episcopal brethren: "Numquid non, sicut vestra fraternitas novit, per venerandum Chalcedonense concilium hujus apostolicae sedis antistites . . . universales oblati honore vocati sunt. Sed tamen nullus unquam tali vocabulo appellari voluit, nullus sibi hoc temerarium nomen arripuit, ne si sibi in pontificatus gradu gloriam singularitatis arripere, hanc omnibus fratribus denegasse videretur" (Epist. v. 18; Migne, lxxvii. 743). Authorities, however, concur in holding Gregory mistaken in his supposition that the title had been sanctioned by the council of Chalcedon (Gieseler I. ii. 228; Hefele, Concilien-gesch. ii. 325; Schaff, p. 662); Leo was only styled οικουμενικὸς ἀρχιεπίσκοπος in an accusation preferred against Dioscurus by two deacons of Alexandria (Mansi, vi. 1006, 1012); and that he himself assumed the title in his correspondence is a statement that probably rests upon a forgery (see Gieseler, u. s.). Boniface II. (A.D. 530-2) appears to have been thus styled by Stephen, metropolitan of Thessaly; and Boniface III. (A.D. 606), who according to Anastasius (Muratori, Script. III. i. 135) obtained from the emperor Phocas a decree entitling the see of St. Peter to rank as "caput omnium ecclesiarum," is said to have openly assumed the title. Gieseler (I. ii. 488) refers its earliest appearance as self-assumed to the Liber Diurnus, which appeared A.D. 682-5; and Leo II. (A.D. 682) was saluted as "papa oecumenicus" by the emperor (Mansi, xi. 713). After the 7th century its occurrence is not unfrequent. It is given by the Roman senate to Stephen IV. in the 8th century (Mansi, xii. 625); to the same pontiff by the Lateran council of the year 769 (ib. xii. 713); and to Leo III. by a synod held in Rome in 799 (ib. xiii. 1071). It was used by Charles the Bald in addressing John VIII. in the year 876, on the occasion of that monarch's receiving the imperial dignity from the latter. In the proposals of the commissioners presented to Lewis the Pious (A.D. 825) the pope is referred to as he "who, by apostolical authority and the reverential deference of the world, is exalted to the universality" (Baronius, ad ann. 825). Hallam, however (Middle Ages, c. vii. pt. 1), quotes Gratian (Decretum, ed. 1591, p. 303): "Nec etiam Romanus pontifex universalis appellatur," and says that a distinction is made by the canonists between "universalis ecclesiae episcopus" and "episcopus universalis;" "that is, the pope has no immediate jurisdiction in the diocese of other bishops, though he can correct them for the undue exercise of their own."

Apostolicus [see APOSTOLICUS].—The latest of the episcopal titles claimed exclusively by the pope. Charles Martel, in the 8th century, when recommending Boniface to the Frankish bishops, addresses them as "domini et apostolici in Christo patres episcopi" (Migne, lxxxix. 699). To the evidence of Rupertus Tuitiensis (quoted in APOSTOLICUS) may be added that of Adam Scotus, who, speaking of the pope, says, "Ipsi quippe sunt principales, et maximi sedis apostolicae in ecclesia Romana successores; unde et ipsos specialiter apostolicos sancta ecclesia vocare consuevit" (de Tripart. Tab.; Migne, cxviii. 394).

Servus servorum Dei.—This title was not originally restricted to the bishop of Rome. Augustine (Epist. 217, ad Vitalem) superscribes a letter "August. episc. servus Christi et per ipsum servus servorum ipsius." Fulgentius (Epist. 5) styles himself "servorum Christi famulus" (Gieseler, I. ii. 214). Its earliest use as assumed by the Roman pontiffs appears to have been by Leo the Great, who so styles himself in a letter addressed to the emperor Theodosius II. (Migne, Patrol. cv. 23). It is adopted again by Gregory the Great, with the design, probably, of contrasting his own humility with the arrogant assumption of the title of "universalis" by John of Constantinople (Vita a Joh. Diac. ii. 1). His contemporary, Didier of Cahors, refused to permit himself to be addressed by any other title. In the 9th century it began to be limited to the pope. Leo III. habitually styles himself "episcopus, servus servorum Dei" (Jaffé, Carolina, p. 336, et passim).

Claviger.—The use of this title appears to date from the middle of the 8th century. Pope Hadrian was styled "clavicularius regni coelorum" (Mansi, xii. 828; xvii. 130-1); in a dedicatory poem addressed in the thirty-seventh year of the reign of Charles the Great to that monarch, the same pontiff writes, "Pollice sacra dona clavigeri aulae Petri" (Maassen, Gesch. d. Canonisch. Rechts, i. 965-7).

(ii.) Election. This, as is generally allowed by ecclesiastical writers, was, in the earliest times, by the clergy and laity of the church of Rome conjointly with the bishops of the neighbouring dioceses, and in no way differed from that observed in election to other bishoprics. [BISHOP; ORINATION.]

With respect to the election of pope Cornelius (A.D. 251) St. Cyprian tells us that he was raised to the dignity "by the divine decree, the testimony of nearly all the clergy, the assent of the people, and by the college [ELECTORAL COLLEGES] of venerable priests, and by good men" (Epist. 55; Migne, iii. 771). The emperor Valentinian II. in a letter respecting the election of Siricius (A.D. 385), says: "We hold it to be the right of the Roman people that they should enjoy concord and elect the best man for bishop" (Constant, Epist. Roman. Pont. i. 639). In the disputed election of Boniface I. (A.D. 418) it was alleged as decisive in his favour that he had been elected by the Roman clergy, "amid the acclamations of the people and the chief men of the city, and that 70 priests had subscribed the act of election in the presence of nine provincial bishops" (ib. i. 1007).

The method observed was consequently the same as that observed in other episcopal elections; but almost as soon as the see of Rome rises into historical importance—from the time, that is to say, of Constantine the Great, we find that the act of consecration was always deferred until the ratification of the popular choice by the emperor (or by the exarch of Ravenna) had been received. In the manner in which this imperial prerogative was exercised,—according as it was invoked by the bishop, restricted to a mere formality by the emperor, or enforced in a spirit which virtually destroyed the freedom of the election—we are presented with valuable evidence with respect to the position of the papacy throughout our period.

The earliest instance of encroachment by the civil power on the popular rights was the act of the emperor Constantius, who deposed Liberius (A.D. 356) and installed Felix II. in his place. The new pope was elected by three eunuchs; but the letters which represent Athanasius as stigmatising these proceedings as "incredibile facinus," and asserting that the voice of the church was silenced by the imperial will: "Qui in locum ecclesiae palatium suum succedere voluerit" (Baronius, ann. 370 and 372) are spurious. The clergy and people, on hearing of the banishment of Liberius, pledged themselves by solemn oath in assembly never to accept another bishop during his lifetime.

At this period the growing importance of the office is attested by the fierceness of the contests for its possession. Ammianus Marcellinus, referring to the state of Rome, says that he "should naturally expect that those who were desirous of this high office would shrink from no expedient of faction to gain it" (xxvii. 3); and the scenes that marked the contests between Ursicinus and Damasus (A.D. 366-384), and Ursicinus and Siricius (A.D. 385-399) afforded the emperors Valentinian I. and II. more reasonable grounds for intervention (Socrates, H. E. ii. 27; iv. 29). Under Honorius a law was enacted that whenever two candidates for the vacant chair conducted the contest in an uncanonical manner neither should succeed to the vacancy, but that the Roman clergy should proceed to make another choice (Baronius, ann. 419). The law, however, as emanating from a secular source, has never been held by the canonists to be binding on the church (Dict. Grat. v. Illud autem, p. 96).

Bribery and other scandals continued, notwithstanding, to mark each fresh election; and in the pontificate of Siricius (A.D. 468-483)—a time when jealousy of the rival see of Constantinople almost absorbed that of the civil power as represented by Odoacer,—we find this pope actually invoking the interference of that monarch. In view of the election that would follow his own decease, Simplicius requested Basilius, the prefect of Odoacer, not to sanction such election, unless it should be conducted under his auspices, and the proceedings throughout be subject to his supervision (Hardouin, Conc. ii. 977). To this request Basilius assented; and, on the death of Simplicius, Odoacer asserted his right of confirming the election of the new pope—the Roman clergy being thus compelled to acknowledge the authority of an Arian monarch. On the same occasion a royal ordinance was promulgated prohibiting the application of church funds to electioneering or other party purposes.

The elections of Gelasius and Anastasius II. were conducted in due form (save that the former pontiff refused, in the first instance, to notify his election to the patriarch of Constantinople according to custom); but on the election of Symmachus another disgraceful contest ensued between his party and that of Laurentius, and the arbitration of the civil power, in the person of Theodoric the Great, was again invoked. Theodoric appears to have contented himself with convening an assembly of the clergy (A.D. 499) which he left free to frame whatever laws might be deemed necessary; and under the presidency of Symmachus the following canons were enacted: (1) A direct adaptation of the ancient Roman law de Ambitu, whereby any presbyter, priest, or deacon, canvassing or soliciting votes, was rendered liable to degradation and excommunication; (2) The penalty of the anathema on any person guilty of the same offence; (3) That a majority of votes should decide an otherwise valid election; (4) Immunity and reward to any person (even an accomplice) who should divulge any attempts at electoral intrigues and malpractices (Baronius, ad ann. 499).

In the difficulties which involve the history of the Synodus Palmaris (A.D. 502) two points in relation to our subject may be regarded as sufficiently ascertained: (1) That the synod repealed the enactment of Odoacer; (2) That it did this solely in order to repudiate the precedent thereby established for civil interposition, for the law concerning the alienation of church property was forthwith re-enacted in all its details by the same synod (Hardouin, ii. 975).

The elections of Hormisdas and John I. present no particular feature; but after the latter had died in confinement, a victim to the displeasure of Theodoric, that monarch assumed to himself the right of both nominating and appointing Felix IV. (or III.). This invasion of their privilege called forth energetic remonstrance alike from clergy and people; and Theodoric was ultimately prevailed upon to decree, that in all future elections the choice should rest with them, though he still reserved to himself the royal right of pronouncing upon such choice before the act of consecration (Cassiodorus, Variar. viii. 15).

The elections of Boniface II., John II. and Agapetus, conducted under Gothic auspices, mark another period of open and shameless bribery; and almost the last act of the expiring Roman senate was to issue a decree (ann. 532) declaring that any person convicted of giving or promising a reward for the purpose of bringing about the election of a candidate, should forfeit the right of suffrage, while the bribe was made recoverable by action against the receiver (ibid. ix. 15). This decree was subsequently ratified by a rescript from Ravenna, which extended its operation to all the metropolitan sees of Italy; and Athalaric, the successor of Theodoric, gave order that "the laudable decree of the most noble senate" should be engraved on marble, and placed in the vestibule of St. Peter's (ib. ix. 16).^k

The right of a pope to influence in any degree the election of his successor appears to have formed a subject of deliberation at the synod of 499 (see Greenwood, Cath. Petri, ii. 69). In principle, however, such interference had been virtually condemned by Hilary, who had forbidden the bishops of Tarraconensis to nominate their successors (Thiel, i. 167). The theory was now revived by Boniface II., who obtained from a synod in the year 530 a decree empowering him to appoint a successor, and actually nominated a deacon, Vigilius, who was afterwards pope. But a second synod reversed the decree ("quia contra canones fuerat hoc factum"), and Boniface himself publicly committed the writing to the flames,—in the language of Anastasius, "reum se confessus majestatis" (Murat. Script. I. ii. p. 127.)

cxlii. c. 25) shews that bishops were required to maintain a resident agent or secretary at the residence of their metropolitan; the metropolitan, again, at the residence of his patriarch. The growing dependence of the Roman see on the emperor is probably indicated by the fact, that Agapetus (A.D. 535-6) was the first pope who maintained an apocrisiarius permanently at the Eastern court (Thomassin, ed. Bourassé, i. 141). From this time the influence exerted by that court over the papal elections may be inferred from the number of apocrisarii (e.g. Pelagius I., Gregory I., Sabinian, Boniface III. Martin I.) who succeeded to the papal throne.

The illegal deposition and murder of Silverius (A.D. 536-7) was followed by theuncanonical election of Vigilius, at the dictation of Belisarius, who, however, according to Liberatus, condescended to observe the usual formalities: "Convocatis presbyteris et diaconibus et clericis, mandavit eis ut alium sibi Papam eligerent" (Migne, lxxviii. 1040). But the election, to quote the language of Greenwood (ii. 146), "by every known rule of canon law was void from the beginning." Pelagius I. (A.D. 555-60) the successor to Vigilius, was installed without even these formalities, and his unpopularity was such that only two bishops and a single presbyter could be found to officiate at his consecration (Greenwood, ii. 162). It is not until the year 578, when the Lombard invasion had paralysed the power of the Byzantine court for interference, that we again meet with a really independent election,—that of Pelagius II.

The successor of Pelagius, Gregory the Great, was summoned to the papal chair by the unanimous and spontaneous voice of the electors; "Clerus, senatus, populusque Romanus sibi concorditer pontificem elegerunt" (Vita a Joh. Diac. bk. i. c. 39). For nearly three quarters of a century from his time, no election calls for particular comment, if we except, perhaps, that of Eugenius I. (A.D. 654) whose installation at the dictation of the imperial power during the lifetime of his predecessor, was in open disregard of the canonical requirements. The changes that mark the relations of the papacy and the empire during this period, are, however, important. In the first instance, the emperor is to be seen endeavouring to retain his control over the Roman see by delegating his authority to the exarchs of Ravenna,—the course adopted by Heraclius in 639. The exarchs appear to have sympathised with the see of Ravenna in its endeavours to establish "autocephaly," and rendered themselves obnoxious to the Roman pontiffs by an arbitrary exercise of their powers. At the earnest entreaty of pope Agatho, Constantine Pogonatus, in the year 682, reassumed these powers to himself, and finally, on the succession of Benedict II. in the year 684, in consideration of the great expense and delay (sometimes extending to a twelvemonth) involved in referring each election to Constantinople, consented altogether to forego his right of sanction; from this time nothing more was required than a formal notification from Rome, while the act of consecration no longer awaited the imperial sanction. Baronius speaks enthusiastically of this concession: "Restituta Romana ecclesia in pristinam libertatem;" and the election of John V. in the year 685, is regarded by many ^k This decree may be regarded as retaining its validity until the time when the papal elections became vested in the College of Cardinals. Baronius, and most of the Catholic writers since his time, have sought, somewhat disingenuously, to give a different aspect to this undeniable intervention of the secular power (see Annal. 533; Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v. 748).

canonists as the first really free election. (See Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v. 758.)

The number of Greeks or Syrians who appear as Benedict's successors clearly prove, however, that the influence of the exarchs was still potent. Constantine's concession had been made, moreover, on the condition that the election was unanimous; and the contests that preceded the elections of Conon (A.D. 686), and Sergius (A.D. 687), placed the newly-acquired freedom again in jeopardy. In the former case the "militia" and the clergy of Rome supported different candidates; in the latter the interference of the exarch of Ravenna was solicited, and his support gained by a bribe of one hundred pounds of gold.

It was not, consequently, until the outbreak of the iconoclastic controversy, and the loss of the exarchate, that the prerogatives of the Eastern emperor in relation to the papacy came definitively to an end. The last pope who solicited the imperial confirmation of his election was Gregory III. (A.D. 731-41); and the acts of the Lateran synod of 769 exhibit for the first time the discontinuance of the imperial year in the official records of the proceedings of the Western church (Hefele, Concilien-gesch. iii. 435; Mansi, xii. 703-21).

The Lombard kings appear to have attempted no interference with the papal elections; but in Rome itself the growing importance of the influence wielded by the pontiff invested his office with a corresponding value in the eyes of political parties. The forcible installation of Constantine II. (A.D. 767), a layman, by the intervention of the armed nobility, marks another innovation on the canonical method of procedure. Strictly speaking, Constantine was not a layman, for the party who raised him to the see compelled the bishop of Praeneste previously to admit him to priest's orders,—"ut orationem clericatus eidem Constantino tribuerit" (Anastasius, xcvi. 8), and the same bishop consecrated him deacon and sub-deacon,—"subdiaconus atque diaconus ab eodem episcopo, in oratorio sancti Laurentii, intra eundem patriarchium, contra sanctorum canonum instituta consecratus est" (ib. xcvi. 10). As, however, these offices had not been filled for the period required by the canons, the clergy of Rome refused to recognize the validity of Constantine's orders, in addition to which he could only claim to be "diaconus forensis," instead of "diaconus cardinalis" (Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v. 761). After he had been deposed and blinded, he was brought before the Lateran synod of 769, and asked how he had dared, being only a layman, to occupy the papal chair, "cur praesumpsisset apostolicam sedem laicus existens invadere" (Anast. xcvi. 42). He appears not to have dared to refer to his own uncanonical admission to orders, but pleaded in defence the precedents of the archbishop of Ravenna and the bishop of Naples, both of whom had been consecrated to their respective offices while still only laymen. It was accordingly enacted by the synod that "no one should be eligible to the papal dignity who had not previously risen, step by step, and been duly made a cardinal deacon or presbyter" (ib. xcvi. 45; Muratori, Script. III. i. 177).

It has been inferred from a subsequent clause of this decree, that the laity were at the same time excluded from all real influence in papal elections, and permitted only to express assent and approval after the selection had been made by the clergy (Hefele, Concilien-gesch. iii. 438; Greenwood, Cathedra Petri, ii. 403, note). But it is evident that if such were the design of the synod, it either failed to be carried into effect or was soon set aside, for we are told by Anastasius of the election of Leo III. (A.D. 795), "cuncto populo Romano electus est" (Muratori, Script. III. i. 195); of that of Stephen V. (A.D. 816) "a populo Romano est electus" (ib. III. i. 212); and of that of Paschal I. (A.D. 817) "una voluntate a cunctis sacerdotibus seu proceribus, atque omni clero, nec non et optimatibus, vel cuncto populo Romano in sedem apostolicam Pontifex elevatus est" (ib. III. i. 213). It would therefore appear that the view of Fleury (ix. 464) is more likely to be correct, viz., that the popular or lay ratification of the clerical choice continued to be essential to the validity of the election (see Thomassin, II. ii. 13, § 7).

The statement that pope Hadrian, at a Lateran synod, A.D. 774, made over to Charles the Great the right of appointing to the see of Rome, together with that of investiture to all ecclesiastical dignities in the empire, may safely be dismissed as a mere fiction.¹ The utmost that the Frankish monarch claimed, was the ancient imperial prerogative of confirming each papal election. Phillips (Kirchenrecht, v. 763) and Thomassin (II. ii. 25) concur in their belief that throughout the rule of the Carolingian dynasty these elections took place in due canonical form.

On the other hand, it is not to be denied that the stratagem whereby Leo III. exhibited himself to Christendom as the bestower of the imperial dignity on Charles (A.D. 800) introduced novel elements in the papal relations to the political power, and that these in turn served to render the respective rights of the clergy, the people, and the emperor, in elections to the Roman see doubtful and conflicting. In this manner these elections became one of the chief causes of the strife between emperor and pope in the middle ages (see Phillips, Kirchenrecht, iii. 150; v. 763; Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. iv. c. 12; Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, c. 5; Staudenmaier, Gesch. der Bischofswahlen, pp. 55-70). In the year 867, on the election of Hadrian II., we are told by Anastasius that the "missi" of the emperor (Lewis II.) were in Rome, and were indignant that they were not invited to be present at the ceremony and take part therein. Whereupon they were assured that the omission was not designed as a slight on the emperor ("Augusti causa contemptus"), but in order that no precedent might be afforded, to be pleaded on future occasions, for the presence of the imperial envoys at the papal elections (Migne, cxxviii. 1382).

(a) Qualifications.—These, throughout our period, appear to have been identical with those for the episcopal office generally, viz., (1) that the elected should be fifty years of age; (2) that he should be one of the clergy of the church over which he was called to preside; (3) that he should have been duly and regularly admitted to the subordinate offices of deacon and presbyter (see BISHOP, p. 129). No instance of translation from another see occurs within our period, the earliest having been that of Formosus, who was translated, in the year 891, from the bishopric of Portus (Bower, History of the Popes, v. 66). The absence of information respecting the exact age of each pontiff at the time of his election, a fact attributable to the obscure origin of the majority, does not enable us to determine how far the limitation with respect to age was adhered to. Gregory the Great was probably about forty-six at the time of his accession; Leo the Great was just fifty; Damasus, Pelagius I., Pelagius II., and Sergius I. were considerably above the latter age. That prior admission to the priestly office was looked upon as indispensable may be inferred from the fact referred to above, that even in the case of the forced and irregular promotion of Constantine, in 767, it was deemed necessary that he should first go through the forms of admission to the diaconate and to the priestly office. The precedents pleaded by Constantine sufficiently prove that no exception existed in favour of the Roman see. Nationality was not regarded, and seven of the bishops of Rome in the first three centuries were of Greek extraction; while the fact that from A.D. 687–767 three were Greeks, four Syrians, and only one a Roman, indicates the influence exerted at this period over the elections by the exarchs of Ravenna.

(B) The Electors.—These were originally the neighbouring bishops, in conjunction with the clergy and laity of the church of Rome. Such at least is the tenor of the evidence afforded by a letter of St. Cyprian (Epist. 52) concerning the election of Cornelius (A.D. 251), and his statement is appealed to by the canonists as satisfactory proof of the due observance of the canonical forms as soon as we have any information respecting these elections: “Factus est Cornelius episcopus de Dei et Christi ejus judicio, de clericorum paene omnium testimonio, de plebis, quae tunc affuit, suffragio, et de sacerdotum antiquorum et bonorum virorum collegio” (Gratian, Decret. II. causa vii. qu. 1, c. 5). From the 5th to the 8th century it would appear that (1) the whole body of the clergy, (2) the magistrates (“judices”) as representatives of the “optimates,” (3) the militia (“schola” or “generalitas militiae,” who really represented the civic class, while the “civium universitas” remained in the background) made up the component elements of the electoral body (Lib. Diur. II. i.–vii.). In the year 769, we find Stephen III. (IV.) presiding at a synod, which refers in one of its decrees to the papal elections as being made by the “proceres et primates ecclesiae” (Gratian, Decret. I. lxxix. 5). In this body Thomassin considers we may recognise the college of cardinals,^m but the formal decree for the election of the pope by this body was not promulgated until A.D. 1059, when the second Lateran council decided that from that time the choice, “judicium,” should rest with the cardinal bishops, while the cardinal priests and deacons, the laity and the emperor, should be consulted only for their assent (Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v. 792–796; Gratian, I. dist. xxiii. 1).

(γ) Method of Procedure.—The order of the proceedings as prescribed in the Liber Diurnus (Migne, Patrol. cv.) is supposed by the editors to be derived from that observed at four papal elections, viz., that of Boniface V. (A.D. 618), of Leo II. (A.D. 682), of Conon (A.D. 686), and of Gregory II. (A.D. 715).

(1) Immediately on the pope's decease, a letter (“nuntius”) was despatched to the exarch at Ravenna, conveying a formal announcement of the event. Originally this letter purported to be written in the name of the whole body of the clergy; but from the time of Pelagius II. (Lib. Diur. II. i.) it appears to have been written in the names of the archpresbyter, the archdeacon, and the “primicerius” or chief notary. (2) After the funeral rites, and a solemn three days' fast, during which time the electors were enjoined to supplicate the divine direction in their new choice, the clergy, “optimates,” and “populus” assembled and gave their votes, and the decree was drawn up and received their signatures. (3) The election was then announced by a deputation to Constantinople, and awaited the imperial sanction. (4) It was similarly announced to the exarch at Ravenna, and his confirmation besought; if, as at certain periods was the case, this authority was not vested in his office, he was desired to use his influence in obtaining the sanction of the emperor. From the time of Honorius (A.D. 626–38), however, Gregorovius (Gesch. der Stadt Rom, ii. 124) considers that the Liber Diurnus shews that although the election was also notified to the imperial court, the greater importance was attached to the consent of the exarch. (5) Letters were also sent to the judges, the archbishop, and the apocrisarius at Ravenna, and to the “patricius,” the patriarch, and the apocrisarius at Constantinople; and the decree (“decretales paginae”) was deposited in the archives of the Vatican. (6) When the confirmation of the election had been received, the new pope was conducted to St. Peter's, “ad confessionem sancti Petri.” (7) On arriving there he made a public confession of faith before the relics (“corpus”) of the apostle. (8) After receiving consecration and ordination,ⁿ he repeated this confession. (9) Finally, he delivered a sermon in the city, copies of which were sent to all the churches.

Somewhat as the day of martyrdom was spoken of as the birthday of the martyr, in the community to which he belonged, so the day of their election to the papal office was described by the popes as “dies natalitius.” Thus Leo ⁿ It appears to have been also the custom for the emperors to notify their accession to the papal court at Rome (see Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. i. 703).

^m According to Milman (Lat. Christianity, bk. i. c. 1), the bishops of the adjacent towns, Ostia, Tibur, Portus, &c., were “the initiatory college of cardinals”; but this term, when it first comes under our notice, seems to have included only the presbyters and deacons of the Roman Church (see CARDINAL, 292).

^o Ménard, in his notes on the Liber Sacramentorum of Gregory the Great (Migne, lxxviii. 517), quotes from an ancient MS. at Corbey, to which however he assigns no date, an order of ordination in which parts are severally assigned to the bishops of Alba, Portus, and Ostia.

Magnus, preaching on the anniversary of his accession, says,—“Illi ergo hunc servitutis nostrae natalitium diem, illi ascribamus hoc festum, cuius patrocinio sedis ipsius meruimus esse consortes” (Serm. iv. c. 41; Migne, Patrol. liv. 19).

The ceremony of foot-kissing, of which the earliest mention is on the installation of Valentinian, A.D. 827, took place on the formal induction of the new pontiff into the Lateran as its possessor.

iii. Insignia of the office.—The distinguishing insignia probably belonged to a period later than A.D. 800; although a tradition is preserved by Aimoin (Hist. Franc. i. 24; Migne, cxxxix. 660) that the emperor Anastasius sent a gold crown, adorned with gems, to Clovis, king of the Franks, and that he, at the suggestion of St. Remy, sent it to the pope. Rocca (de Tiaræ Pontificiæ Origine, Thes. pp. 7, 8) considers that the allusion in the spurious donation of Constantine to the “diadema, videlicet coronam capitis nostri,” proves that the pope had already assumed a crown, as distinguished from the ordinary episcopal mitre. The crown was designed to symbolize the temporal power. Innocent III. says “In signum spiritualium confutit mihi mitram, in signum temporalium dedit mihi coronam; mitram pro sacerdotio, coronam pro regno” (Serm. iii. 4; Migne, ccxvii. 665). The earliest reference to the double crown occurs, according to Richter (Kirchenrecht, p. 201) in the year 1297, in the pontificate of Boniface VIII.; according to Phillips, (Kirchenrecht, v. 612) as early as that of Nicholas II. (A.D. 1059–61). Von Hefner (Trachten des christl. Mittelalters, p. 38) assigns the earliest mention of the triple crown to the time of Clement V. (A.D. 1305–14); Phillips not earlier than that of Urban V. (A.D. 1362–70). The upright pastoral staff (“pedum rectum”) surmounted by the cross, is probably referred to as the “ferula pastoralis” in the account of the deposition of Benedict V. in the 11th century (Pertz, Mon. Germ. i. 626), and cannot be traced farther back than this. The cross was borne by the pope in common with all the other bishops; the pallium [PALIUM] in common with other metropolitans, but the pope claimed the exclusive right to wear it on all occasions (Richter, Kirchenrecht, p. 218).

IV. PREROGATIVES SPECIALLY CLAIMED FOR THE OFFICE.

i. Claim to universal authority in the church, as specifically asserted (1) in the granting of dispensations, (2) in the conferring of privileges.

(1) Theories of a universal jurisdiction and of special powers, as prerogatives of the Roman pontiff, almost necessarily involved his right to exempt, under circumstances of an exceptional and peculiar character, particular communities or dioceses from customary canonical observance. The precedents afforded in our period for the exercise of such a power are few, but among the best ascertained are—

(a) Dispensations from penalties attaching to non-observance of the canons.—The power to grant these is justly described by Thomassin as in its very nature peculiar and singular, for, he observes (Vet. et Nova Discip. II. iii. 27, § 14), all canonical discipline must soon have come to an end, if each bishop had possessed the power of remitting at pleasure the obligations imposed by a canon of the church; and if in any exceptional emergency a bishop or local synod ventured on such an exercise of power, the act was always held to require the confirmation of a general council or of the pope. The view of this writer with respect to the conditions under which such power could be exercised are given under INDULGENCE, p. 835; but the following instances are deserving of note, as illustrating more precisely the gradual development of its exercise by the Roman pontiff.

The important part assigned to Melchisedech (A.D. 311–14) in relation to the Donatist schism [CAECILIANUS, DICT. CHRIST. BIOG.] is cited by Catholic writers as one of the earliest and most important instances. Melchisedech restricted his condemnation to the author of the schism, and permitted those Donatist bishops who had been ordained by Majorinus to re-enter the pale of communion, and to retain possession of their sees on declaration of their readiness to renounce their schismatical tenets. In cases where a Catholic bishop had been established, he endeavoured to provide another cure for the Donatist bishop, “ita ut quibuscumque locis duo essent episcopi, quos dissensio geminasset, eum confirmari vellet qui fuisset ordinatus prior, alteri autem eorum plebs alia regenda provideretur” (Augustine, Epist. 43; Migne, xxxiii. 167). This policy is warmly praised by Augustine as indicating the personal action of Melchisedech; but it should be noted that he also speaks of him as enacting these measures at Rome “cum multis collegis suis.” The instance is however unquestionable proof of the growing deference paid to the church of Rome and its bishop.

Other instances, cited by Thomassin and Phillips, as occurring in the times of Damasus and Siricius, are referred to under INDULGENCE, p. 835. In the time of Anastasius I. (A.D. 398–401) application was made to that pontiff by the African bishops to sanction a general dispensation to the Donatist clergy. It had previously been decreed, at a council held at Capua (A.D. 389), that no such dispensation should be granted unless under conditions that afforded a prospect of a complete suppression of the schism. The church of Africa accordingly deemed it necessary to gain the approval of the Roman see before it ventured to set the decision aside; but at the same time it is to be noted that they do not attribute autocratical authority to the bishop of Rome, but simply such pre-eminence as might be claimed by the representative of an apostolic see, “Placuit ut litteræ mittantur ad fratres et coepiscopos nostros, et maxime ad sedem apostolicam in qua praesidet Anastasius” (Cod. Can. Eccl. Afric. c. 68).

Symmachus vindicates a similar exercise of the papal prerogative on the part of his predecessor Anastasius II. (A.D. 496–8) in relation to certain of the Gallican churches, although admitting it to have been “praeter ecclesiae consuetudinem et antiqua praedecessorum nostrorum statuta,” he also in the same letter takes occasion to enunciate the general rules that may be supposed to regulate such exercise of supreme ecclesiastical authority, maintaining that “what is done contrary to the canon is not necessarily a breach of the canon, which is violated only by a wanton disregard for precedent,” and that it would often be “cruel to insist upon a law when its observance was likely to be attended with detriment to the church, it being the design of all laws that they should benefit, not injure" (Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. p. 657).

The doctrine of expediency, as thus laid down, and depending on the discretion of the pontiff, is illustrated in the policy of Boniface I. (A.D. 418-22). On the one hand he refused to permit Patroclus, bishop of Arles, to assume the functions of a metropolitan in another diocese by ordaining a successor to a vacant bishopric "contra patrum regulas," quod nequaquam possumus ferre patienter, quia convenit nos paternarum sanctionum diligentes esse custodes" (Epist. 12); on the other, in the permission which he accorded to Perigenes to assume the bishopric of Corinth, he appears directly to have departed from adherence to canonical law (Constant, ed. Schoenemann, p. 723).

A certain dispensing authority is undoubtedly implied in the permission accorded by Celestine I. (A.D. 422) to the Nestorians, to be received again into the church (ib. pp. 871-6).

The language of Leo I. is distinctly that of one who assumes to be the censor of the whole church, and bound to interfere, "quoties aliqua contra instituta canonum et ecclesiasticam disciplinam præsumpta vel commissa cognoscimus" (Praef. in Decret.); and he asserts that compliance with the canonical discipline is an essential condition of communion (can. 5); yet, notwithstanding we have a conspicuous instance of the exercise of the dispensing power by this pontiff. In a letter to Flavianus, bishop of Constantinople (Mansi, v. 1365, 1406), he condemns the heresy of Eutyches, but at the same time enjoins that the latter should be restored to communion, and to the administration of his monastery, on abjuration of his errors, "sedis enim apostolicae moderatio hanc temperantiam servat, ut et severius agat cum obduratis et veniam cupiat praeare correctis." In a letter to the emperor Marcianus he severely condemns the presumption of his rival Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople, in ordaining a bishop to the church of Antioch, "contra instituta canonum;" and says that his opposition to this measure has been withdrawn solely from a desire to restore the faith and from a love of peace, "quod nos amore reparandae fidei et pacis studio retractare cessavimus" (Epist. civ.; Migne, liv. 1153).

Thomassin considers that a yet earlier exercise of the dispensing power in the East is to be found in the action of Damasus in relation to Flavianus, bishop of Antioch. On this occasion Theophilus, of Alexandria, is represented by Socrates, the historian, as having sent a messenger to Damasus to suggest that it would be for the welfare of the church if, in order to bring about concord among the laity, he would condone the offence of Flavianus (Soc. II. E. v. 15)—λυσιστελείν ἐπὶ τὸν δι' ὁμόνοιαν τοῦ λαοῦ, παριδεῖν τὸ φθόσον Φλαβιανοῦ πλημμέλημα (Migne, S. G. lxvii. 281).

In the time of Leo's successor, Hilary, the prevalence of grave irregularities in Spain, in the appointment of bishops to vacant sees, and in their removal from one diocese to another, rendered it advisable to appeal to Rome. Hilary granted a general dispensation with respect to appointments which had already taken place, but forbade similar disregard of the canons in future, "ut nihil deinceps contra praecepta beati Apostoli, nihil contra Nicaenorum canonum constitutum tentetur" (Thiel, p. 166).

Gelasius, at the time when the Gothic invasion had deprived Italy of half its clergy, yielded to imperative necessity, and dispensed with the observance of the canonical periods with respect to ordination (Hardouin, Conc. ii. 897).

Up to this period, the evidence seems fairly in harmony with the view of Thomassin, that dispensations were presumed to be in conformity with the precept of Augustine, that the weal of the church, not the interest of individuals, should be consulted in the exercise of the dispensing power, the conditions being (1) that the matter in question should be of primary magnitude in relation to the church; (2) that the good accruing should be clearly discernible, either in the avoidance of some evil to which the observance of the canon might afford admission, or in the gain of benefits which might otherwise be lost; (3) that such dispensations should have effect only with respect to past irregularities, and not be construed into precedents in the future. In the language of pope Martin I., "Canones ecclesiasticos solvere non possumus qui defensores et custodes canonum sumus, non transgressores."

With the advance of the 7th century, however, and especially in the contact with Teutonism, we find the papal dispensation solicited and conferred in connexion with irregularities of a kind that afforded precedents for some of the worst abuses of mediaeval times—the appropriation of revenues of bishoprics, monasteries, and cures for secular purposes. The extent to which this abuse had grown under Charles Martel, in Frankland, rendered hopeless the efforts of Boniface towards obtaining satisfactory restitution, and he accordingly obtained from pope Zacharias permission to forego the duty of demanding full reparation to the churches and monasteries. The pontiff himself, indeed, appears to have partially condoned these spoliations, on the consideration that they had been made in behalf of the Christian state in its struggles against the pagan and the infidel—the Saxon and the Saracen (Epist. x.; Migne, lxxxix. 941).

Other facts relating to the same period seem to indicate that this prerogative had already grown into an abuse. We find, for example, a Frankish noble pleading the papal indulgence for an unlawful marriage, an irregularity differing in character from those of the kind which the instructions of Gregory the Great to Augustine might be held to condone, where the marriage tie had been contracted while the parties were still pagans, "in quibus se per ignorantiam ante lavacrum baptismatis astrinxerunt" (Epist. xi. 64; Migne, lxxvii. 1190). Certain of the clergy, again, alleged that notwithstanding that they led immoral lives they had received the papal licence to continue to perform their sacred functions, "reventiens ab apostolica sede dicunt se Romanum pontificem licentiam dedisse ministerium episcopale in ecclesia ministrare." Boniface appears to have treated these representations as mendacious, "quia Apostolicam sedem nequaquam contra decreta canonum audivimus judicasse" (Epist. 49; ib. lxxxix. 747); but the mere fact that they were alleged points to a wider and less defensible exercise of the dispensing power.

Boniface himself received from Zacharias permission to nominate his successor to the see of Mainz, but the concession was made with express limitation to his case, "praesentibus cunctis tibi successorum designa, ut huc veniat ordinandus. Hoc nulli alii concedi patimur quod tibi charitate cogente largiri censuimus" (Migne, lxxxix. 920); the installation of his successor during his lifetime was preemptorily forbidden, as "contrary to every ecclesiastical rule."

It is worthy of note, that Zacharias was not willing to delegate any general dispensing powers to Boniface, "quaecunque repereris sacris canonibus deviare nulla ratione patiaris sacrum ministerium tractare" (ib. lxxxix. 928).

At the eighth oecumenical council it was declared in the most explicit terms that it was the legitimate function of the pope to exercise powers of this description for "the healing of the wounds of the catholic and apostolic church" (Hardouin, v. 730). And at the third council of Soissons, A.D. 866, the language of Herardus, archbishop of Tours, points to this function as one to which the Gallican clergy had frequent recourse in their appeals to Rome (Migne, cxxi. 777.)

(2.) To confer privileges.

(a) On monasteries, with respect to episcopal jurisdiction.—The exercise of this prerogative may certainly be traced farther back than the period assigned by Guizot and other writers as that of its earliest use (see BISHOP, p. 232; Guizot, Hist. de la Civ. en France, ii. 111), viz., the 8th century. Before the time of Gregory I., his predecessors appear to have warned members of the episcopal order that they had no canonical right to celebrate mass in the monasteries of their dioceses (Baxmann, Politik der Päpste, i. 101)—a theory of monastic privilege which would derive support from the original character of such societies as lay communities. The hard pressure of the "jugum clericorum" would appear indeed to have frequently induced these societies to place themselves under the protection of a bishop of a different diocese (see Gieseler, Kirchenesch. I. ii. 425). By degrees they began habitually to look to Rome as the quarter from whence they were likely to receive the most effectual protection; and in the pontificate of Gregory I. we have a well authenticated instance of a papal response to such appeals in a letter written by this pope to Luminosus, abbat of St. Thomas at Rimini, wherein he states that he has deprived Castorius, the bishop of the diocese, and his successors, "of all power of injuring the monastery" (Epist. ii. 42; Jaffé, Regesta Rom. Pont. p. 114). In the same year, at a Lateran synod (A.D. 595), it was enacted that the property and revenues of all monasteries should be free from episcopal control (Mansi, x. 485). Special privileges appear to have also been conferred by Gregory on several of the Frankish foundations, to protect them from the already conspicuous rapacity of the Gallican bishops (Epist. vii. 12; ix. 111; xiii. 8-10). In the year 628, Honorius I. conferred on the famous monastery at Bobbio, entire freedom from all ecclesiastical control save that of the Pope (Jaffé, p. 157). The abbey at Fulda, founded in 744 by Sturm, the disciple of St. Boniface, was similarly placed by Boniface, in whose diocese it was situated, directly under the papal protection, to the exclusion of the authority of the bishop of the diocese. Similar privileges were conferred in 750 on Monte Cassino by pope Zacharias. Engel (de Priv. et Jur. Monast.) enumerates no less than fifty distinct privileges, granted by papal authority to monastic foundations at a somewhat later period.

(β) On bishops, with respect to residence.—The earliest instance on record occurs nearly at the close of our period, when Charles the Great, at the council of Frankfort (A.D. 794), notified that he had received from pope Hadrian formal permission to retain archbishop Angilram at his palace, "propter utilitates ecclesiasticas;" on the same occasion he announced a like permission with respect to bishop Hildebald, and solicited the assent of the council to these arrangements, which was unanimously granted (Sirmond, ii. 201). As Thomassin observes, these formalities clearly prove the importance attached, at that time, to such departures from canonical obligations.

(γ) With respect to minor details.—Among these may be named the right to open private chapels for public worship, to wear ecclesiastical dress of a particular kind (DALMATIC), and others, of which, however, the examples are doubtful and extremely rare before the 9th century.

ii. Claim to authority over all bishoprics and bishops.

As regards elections to the episcopal office, the outline of facts presented under BISHOP (pp. 216-219), and other evidence cited by Thomassin (II. ii. cc. 1-30), appear to render it probable that during the greater part of our period the canonical mode of election was maintained—such election, however, always depending on the confirmation of the metropolitan, and generally upon that of the king or emperor. That this mode of election was fully recognized by the see of Rome, is shewn by a letter addressed to the bishops of Tarraconensis to pope Hilary, in which, after complaining that Silvanus, bishop of Calagura, contrary to law and custom, had ordained a bishop in opposition to the popular wish—"postponens patrum regulas et vestra instituta despiciens, nullis petentibus populis, episcopum ordinavit"—they assert that they have recourse to the papal see, as "unicum remedium" (Thiel, Epist. R. P. p. 156). This last expression probably indicates the real character of the authority wielded by the see of Rome in the West, where as the one apostolic see, its decision was from time to time invited in relation to questions of an extraordinary and unusual character. On the other hand, the absence of all evidence of any claim on the part of the pope to exercise a veto in ordinary elections, seems conclusive against the existence of such a right. Canonists who maintain that it was both claimed and exercised, are compelled to resort to the singular hypothesis that the power of the metropolitan was held by him simply as the delegate of the bishop of Rome; and that the re-assumption of a direct discharge of such functions by the latter, was merely a changed method of administration rendered imperatively necessary by the inordinate preten-sions of patriarchs and metropolitans, the growth of heresy and schism, and the decline of discipline (Phillips, Kirchenrecht, v. 314-8; Roussel, Hist. Pontif. Jurisd. ii. 12; Zaccaria, Anti-Febronius, ii. 4).

The question will admit of being more concisely investigated, if considered as it presents itself in relation (1) to the East; (2), to the West; (3), to pagan communities.

(1.) In the East.—Even here it is alleged (Phillips, ib. v. 319) that the papal authority in elections to bishoprics was recognized, and that the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria exercised merely delegated powers. In support of this view, Phillips quotes a letter from Damasus (A.D. 366-84) to Paulinus, bishop of Antioch. But the language of this letter (respecting the genuineness of which some doubt may be felt) implies, at most, only a general supremacy, of an honorary character, conceded to the bishop of Rome. If, indeed, we remember that the authority of Damasus was disputed in Rome itself by his brother bishops, it seems scarcely necessary to enquire whether it was recognized in the East. The evidence cited under II. (A) will serve in some measure to prove the unsoundness of such a theory; while in relation to the decree of Valentinian III. (A.D. 455) it is to be observed that after the political severance of the two divisions of the empire in A.D. 438, this could have had no legal force in the East, unless by the consent of the eastern emperor, which was never granted (Gibbon, v. 279; Greenwood, Cathedra Petri, i. 459).

A letter of Innocent I. (A.D. 402-17) to Alexander, bishop of Antioch, which may reasonably be accepted as genuine, seems, however, almost decisive.^p Here, after distinctly interpreting the sixth canon of the council of Nicaea as recognizing the right of the bishop of Antioch to ordain metropolitans for the whole of the Eastern diocese, Innocent goes on to say: "Itaque arbitramur, frater carissime, ut sicut metropolitano auctoritate ordines singularem, sic et caeteros non sine permissu conscientiae tuae sinas episcopos procreari. In quibus hunc modum recte servabis, ut longe positis litteris datis ordinari censeas ab his, qui nunc eos suo tantum ordinant arbitratu; vicinos autem, si aestimas, ad manus impositionem tuae gratiae statuas pervenire" (Migne, Patrol. xx. 547-9). Of his own authority in relation to such ordinations, Innocent says nothing; but, as Thomassin (II. ii. 8, § 3) points out, after interpreting the language of the council of Nicaea in the sense above described, holds that as regards the bishops of the different provinces included in the Eastern diocese, those in the provinces nearer to Antioch were to be summoned to the metropolis to receive ordination at the hands of its bishop, while those in the more remote provinces were to receive ordination from their respective metropolitans, their elections being confirmed by the bishop of Antioch.

Finally, we have satisfactory proof with respect to the earliest consecration of an eastern bishop by the pope. Agapetus, in a letter to Peter, bishop of Jerusalem, after referring to his own consecration (Mar. 13, A.D. 539) of Mennas, patriarch of Constantinople (Liberatus, c. 21; Migne, lxxviii. 1059), expressly states that "since the time of the apostle Peter, the Eastern church has never received a bishop at the hands of the pope" (Hardouin, ii. 236).

(2.) In the West.—Here the evidence, though conflicting, is such that it is not difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. The view of Thomassin, that the method above recognized by Innocent as the canonical mode of procedure in the East, may be supposed to have corresponded to that in force in the West, is in the highest degree probable. The claim already referred to (supra, p. 1659) as put forth by Innocent, of the original foundation of all the bishoprics of the West by St. Peter and his successors, points to a theoretical supremacy of Rome over the entire episcopate. With respect to the suburbicarian bishops (SUBURBICARI), their ordination was, of course, directly subject to the papal approval as to that of their supreme metropolitan. The papal sanction was also necessary throughout the Roman patriarchate. Of this a letter written by Celestine in A.D. 429, to the bishops of Calabria and Apulia, affords direct evidence. He here expresses his surprise that the churches of those districts, after electing laymen to the episcopal office, should venture to look for his confirmation of such elections—"de nobis pessime sentientes quos credunt hoc posse facere" (Migne, Patrol. l. 436).

In the theory above indicated by Thomassin (who appears, however, scarcely to have apprehended its full significance), we have the key to much of the subsequent history of the extension of the papal authority over the whole episcopate. Towards the close of the 4th century we are able, for the first time, to trace with any certainty the presence of metropolitan bishops in the West. The importance of this fact in relation to our whole enquiry is considerable; for, as will be seen, it compels those who assert that the papal prerogatives were admitted and exercised at a much earlier period, to have recourse to the singular hypothesis that during the time when the evidence for a general recognition of the authority of the bishop of Rome is especially defective, that authority was most directly exerted.

At the same time, it is not to be denied that the bishop of Rome claimed a certain nominal authority over all patriarchs and metropolitans, and their elections would appear to have been usually notified to the Roman see, not, however, in order to obtain the ratification necessary to validity, but as a spontaneous recognition of the honorary primacy of its bishop. Of this almost conclusive evidence is afforded in two letters addressed by Leo the Great (A.D. 444) to the bishops of Illyricum. Here, after claiming to have authority, derived from St. Peter, over all churches (supra, p. 1659), he formally appoints Anastasius, metropolitan of Thessalonica, his delegate to consecrate metropolitans in Illyricum, and to convene synods (Mansi, v. 1233). Illyricum, however, over which the jurisdiction of the metropolitan see of Thessalonica was thus extended, was included in the Roman patriarchate; it accordingly seems reasonable to infer with Thomassin that in other provinces, not included therein, the authority of the Roman pontiff was neither recognized nor asserted, either directly or by delegation,—“quid conjectandum restat de episcopis longinquoibus et qui ne Romani quidem patriarchatus finibus clauderantur” (Thomassin, II. ii. 8, § 11).

The earliest instance that points to a more general recognition of this authority, is perhaps that contained in the preamble of a letter addressed to Hilary by a synod of Barcelona (A.D. 465), soliciting his confirmation of the uncanonical translation of one Irenaeus from a neighbouring bishopric to that of Barcelona, and implying that their appeal is not simply dictated by a sense of the importance attached to the papal decisions, but is the course binding upon them as a matter of church discipline:—“Etiam si nulla exstaret necessitas ecclesiasticae disciplinae, expetendum revera nobis fuerat illud privilegium sedis vestrae” (Mansi, vii. 924). Inasmuch as, however, Hilary, in his reply, takes occasion to rebuke them for ordaining bishops to different sees without obtaining the sanction of Ascanius, their metropolitan, it is evident that in Spain a delegated authority was all that was at this time asserted by the pope (Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. i. 166). In support of this view we may refer to the language of Gregory the Great, at a yet later period, in certain instructions to his legate when the latter was about to set out for Spain. Here it is clearly implied that his jurisdiction did not ordinarily extend to bishops in that province, for in referring to a certain bishop named Stephen, Gregory says that “inasmuch as Stephen had neither a metropolitan nor a patriarch,” a certain matter in dispute must consequently “belong to the apostolic chair, as the head of all the churches, and be decided by it” (Epist. xiii. 45; Migne, lxxvii. 1254).

Generally speaking, however, the evidence exhibits the authority of the pope as advancing from the time of Leo the Great, towards that of a universal metropolitan in the West; and again, at a period later than that which we are here called upon to treat, from that of a universal metropolitan to an immediate and ordinary jurisdiction over the whole episcopate. Among the means whereby this great extension of the papal power was brought about, the encouragement given to the practice of appealing to Rome [APPEAL] must be regarded as the most effectual. It will indeed be found that nearly all the precedents afforded by our period, which canonists are wont to cite in support of the Florentine canon (supra, p. 1652) represent, in reality, exceptional cases, which, viewed in their proper light, tend rather to an exactly opposite conclusion.

In no relation were appeals to Rome more frequent than in connexion with elections, and in these cases the pontiff nearly always appears as the defender of popular rights and of canonical discipline against laxity or tyranny on the part of the metropolitan. Leo himself asserts in the plainest language that the wishes of the laity and the concurrence of the electing bishops are essential to an ordination to a bishopric,—“Nulla ratio sinit ut inter episcopos habeantur qui nec a clericis sunt electi nec a plebeibus sunt expetiti” (Epist. 167; Migne, liv. 1420). Thomassin (II. ii. 10, § 4) considers that among the distinguishing excellences of Gregory the Great's character his marked abstention from interference in episcopal elections, even within the Roman province, claims special notice. It would appear indeed to have been this pontiff's great aim to preserve to every church its rights and freedom on such occasions. When, for example, the church at Panormus, in Sicily, were in great perplexity with respect to the choice of a new bishop (owing to the want of a suitable candidate for the office) he desired them to send deputies to Rome who should elect a bishop there: “quod tamen nos non voluntate impulsus loquimur, sed necessitate compulsi; quia quantum est ad nostrae auctoritatis iudicium, de suis volumus ut debeant habere pastorem” (Epist. xiii. 15; Migne, lxxvii. 1229). Even when he vouchsafed advice to a church with respect to its choice (as in the case of Constantine of Milan) he abstained as much as possible from all appearance of dictation, “quia antiquae meae deliberationis intentio est, ad suscipienda pastoralis curae onera, pro nullius unquam misceri persona” (ib. iii. 29; ib. lxxvii. 644). At the same time the language of his biographer, Joannes Diaconus, proves that the selection of fit persons for the office in his own diocese was to Gregory a matter of the liveliest interest, “ab ipso suae consecrationis exordio per omnem diaecesim suam, episcopos undecunque meliores invenire potuit studiosissime ordinavit” (Vita, iii. 7; Migne, lxxv. 86).

But notwithstanding Gregory's genuine moderation, events in the political world contributed very powerfully during his pontificate to augment the authority of the Roman see. Of this we have undeniable evidence in the frequency with which the pallium [PALLIUM] was solicited at his hands. Instances of the bestowal of this vestment before his time are exceedingly rare; among the best authenticated being its presentation to Caesarius of Arles by Symmachus, in the year 513 (Jaffé, no. 477), to the metropolitan of Arles by Vigilus (A.D. 537-555), and to the same dignitary by Pelagius II. (A.D. 578-590). Gregory assigns the fact of its bestowal by his predecessor, as a reason for not subjecting “the bishop of Arles” to the authority of Augustine (Bede, E. H. i. 27). By Gregory it appears to have been bestowed^a on the metropolitan of Hispalis (Mansi, x. 199), on the metropolitan of Arles (ib. ix. 1231), on the bishops of Augustodunum in Gaul (Migne, lxxvii. 1014), of Salona in Dalmatia (ib. ix. 1166), of Prima Justiniana in Illyricum (ib. ix. 1189), on Augustine as archbishop of Canterbury (ib. x. 394), on the metropolitan of Nicopolis in Epirus (ib. x. 6), on the bishops of Messina, Syracuse, and Panormus in Sicily (ib. x. 7, 13, 367), and on the metropolitan of Ravenna. Boniface IV. (A.D. 608-615) sends it to Florianus, metropolitan of Arles, and writing to Theodoric, king of the Franks, speaks of the act as “secundum antiquam consuetudinem” (Jaffé, Regest. Rom. Pont. p. 155). Honorius I. (A.D. 625-628) refuses to send it to Hypatius, bishop of Nicopolis, until the latter shall have purged himself from the accusation of having been accessory to a brother's death (Mansi, x. 581); he promises it to the bishop of Grada (Jaffé, p. 157); sends it to Honorius, archbishop of Canterbury, and to Paulinus, archbishop of York (Mansi, x. 580); and decrees that metropolitans using it in the streets or "in litanis" shall be deprived of the right to wear it (ib. x. 585).

The theory that the acceptance of the pallium did not involve any special profession of allegiance to the pope of Rome (Thomassin, II. ii. 45, § 10; Greenwood, Cath. Petri. ii. 220), can hardly be looked upon as valid after the 7th century. Gregory himself, it is true, appears to have considered that its bestowal must be preceded by the express wish and personal application of the receiver, and also be sanctioned by the consent of the reigning prince (Migne, lxxvii. 781). So early however as the year 581, a canon of the first council of Mâcon forbids metropolitans to celebrate mass without it, "ut archiepiscopus sine pallio missas dicere non praesumat" (Sirmond, i. 371); and we find that its bestowal on Tilpin, archbishop of Rheims, in the year 772, was understood to entitle him to appeal to the pope from the authority of a local synod (Flodoard, Hist. Remens. bk. ii. c. 17).

(3.) The question of the significance to be attached to its bestowal will be further illustrated by the following evidence for the papal authority over bishops and bishoprics (3) in pagan lands. In this relation the evidence is far more plainly favourable to the theory of Roman supremacy. A bishop sent from Rome to evangelize a heathen community was directly accountable to the pope. He was known as "episcopus consecratus in sorte praedicationis," as Boniface was styled by Gregory II. (Epist. 5; Migne, lxxxix. 503), a relation compared by Phillips to that which Titus, when in Crete, bore to St. Paul,—and was empowered both to create new bishoprics as occasion might arise, and to ordain those who might be elected to fill them. When the district in which he laboured had been, to a certain extent, brought under ecclesiastical organization, if the distance precluded a special journey to Rome, his ordination was delegated to another bishop. Of this an instance occurs in connexion with the archbishoprics of York and Canterbury in the time of Honorius, who empowered the surviving archbishop to ordain a successor on a vacancy occurring in either see (Bede, H. E. ii. 18).

It would appear, however, to be beyond doubt that in pagan lands such powers were only delegated for a time by the Roman pontiff, and were resumable at pleasure. Of this, strong presumptive evidence is afforded in the 28th canon of the council of Chalcedon, already quoted (supra, p. 1664). The endeavour here made to claim for the see of Constantinople rights precisely corresponding (ἰσα πρεσβεία) to those of the see of Rome, involves the assertion of the right of the bishop of Constantinople to ordain, not merely the metropolitans of Pontus, Asia, and Thrace, but also the bishops "in sorte praedicationis" among the pagan communities still existing in those provinces, ἐν δὲ καὶ τοῖς ἐν τοῖς βαρβαρικοῖς ἐπισκοποῖς τῶν προεξημένων διοικήσεων (Mansi, vii. 427). The proviso in this latter clause would seem to have been designed to complete the parallelism between the jurisdiction of the primate of Constantinople and that of the Roman pontiff, an attempt which was met by the indignant repudiation of Leo.

Among such communities themselves the theory that prevailed appears to have varied with the particular conditions and circumstances. At first, the papal claims would be received with ready assent, such as a sense of filial gratitude would naturally dictate. When, however, ecclesiastical power became associated with political power, there arose a spirit of greater independence, like that from time to time exhibited among those nations of the West whose conversion belonged to a much earlier period. We learn, for example, from Bede (H. E. iii. 29) that Wighard was sent to Rome to receive his consecration as archbishop of Canterbury at the hands of pope Deusdedit, "to the end that he might ordain catholic priests for the churches of the English nation throughout all Britain;" archbishop Theodore, again, was ordained at Rome by Vitalian (ib. iv. 1). Yet notwithstanding, only a few years after the ordination of Theodore, we find Alfrid, king of Northumbria, refusing to recognise the right of Wilfrid to the bishopric of York, though the election of the latter had twice been confirmed by popes Agatho and John V. "I will not," said the monarch, "alter one word of a sentence issued by myself, the archbishop, and all the dignitaries of the land, for a writing coming, as ye say, from the apostolic chair" (Milman, Lat. Christianity, bk. iv. c. 4).

Again the tone of English ecclesiasticism changes, and within little more than half a century Boniface, in Frankland, announces to Cuthbert, in terms already referred to (supra, p. 1660) a full recognition, on the part of the Frankish bishops and their metropolitans, of the supreme and final authority of the pope—"Decevimus . . . subjectionem Romanae ecclesiae fine tenus vitae nostrae velle servare; sancto Petro et vicario ejus velle subjici; . . . metropolitano pallia ab illa sede quaerere et per omnia praecepta sancti Petri canonice sequi desiderare, ut inter oves sibi commendatas numeremur" (Epist. 63; Migne, lxxxix. 763). But it is evident that this deferential spirit was succeeded by something approaching to insubordination; for, a few years after, Boniface writes to entreat the indulgence of pope Zachary for the non-fulfilment of the above engagements, especially "de palliis a Romana ecclesia petendis," "quia quod promiserunt tardantes non impleverunt, et adhuc differtur et ventilatur" (Epist. 75; Migne, lxxxix. 778). "How difficult it was to overcome the repugnance of the Teutonic prelates, is manifest in the fact that St. Lull, the especial disciple of St. Boniface, in whose favour the latter exercised the exceptional privilege accorded him of nominating a successor to the primatial see of Mainz, though appointed in 754, had not yet sought the pallium in 772, when Adrian I. wrote to Tilpin of Rheims, ordering him to investigate the doctrine and virtues of Lull, and, if the result was satisfactory, to give him a certificate, on the strength of which the pallium would be sent to him. It was evident that some additional inducements were necessary to overcome this aversion and to bind the hierarchy to the throne of St. Peter" (Lea, H. C. Studies in Church History, p. 138). Thomassin, indeed, is of opinion that the oath administered by Boniface was an entirely exceptional measure, justified, however, to a certain extent, by the neglected state into which ecclesiastical discipline had fallen in Frankland; and he maintains (II. ii. 44, § 11; 45, § 7) that throughout the reign of Charles the Great there is no trace of any oath of obedience taken either by Frankish metropolitans or bishops to the pope. This assertion can be accepted only in conjunction with his peculiar view, that the acceptance of the pallium did not involve any acknowledgment of submission to Rome, for both the bishops of Bourges and of Metz received that vestment at the hands of Hadrian I. (Mansi, xii. 834; xiii. 909). On the other hand, throughout Charles's reign it is evident that the papal pretensions in Frankland assumed a very modest guise, and were little more than honorary in character; the relations established between the papacy and the Frankish monarchy secured to the latter full powers over the church within its own dominions; and we find Leidradus, metropolitan of Lyons, when writing to Charles, implying that his appointment to his episcopal dignity had been due entirely to the monarch himself, "ad regimen ecclesie Lugdunensis destinare voluistis" (Migne, xcix. 871).

In the year 877, pope John VIII. at the synod of Ravenna, ordered that all metropolitans should be deprived of their sees who failed to apply for the pallium within three months of consecration—"a regulation," says Lea, "which met with little more respect than previous like attempts" (Studies in Church Hist. p. 87).

Resignations.—It is confirmatory of the negative conclusions to which the foregoing evidence points, that the resignation of the episcopal office seems never to have required the assent of the pope. Instances adduced to the contrary are of far too dubious a character, and too rare to be accepted as in any degree tending to invalidate this general fact. A letter, addressed by Leo I. in 458, to Rusticus, bishop of Narbonne, who has intimated his wish to seek "vacationem ab episcopatus laboribus," on account of his despondency at the religious condition of his diocese, proves nothing more than that Leo, on this occasion, assumed the part of a friendly adviser (Epist. clxvii.; Migne, liv. 1415). The same observation applies to another instance, the remonstrance of Martin I. (A.D. 649-55) with Amandus, bishop of Maestricht, under similar circumstances (ib. lxxvii. 155).

Examples cited by Phillips, belonging to the 9th century, that of one Villicarius applying for the papal license to resign his charge, when permission had been withheld by the provincial synod, and that of Wenilo, archbishop of Sens, soliciting the intervention of Nicholas I. to procure the deposition of Herimann, bishop of Nevers, who was incapacitated for the discharge of his duties by imbecility, undoubtedly carry more weight. But the evidence collected by Thomassin (ed. Bourassé, ii. 919-22) is far more convincing, as tending to establish the conclusion that, even in the 9th century, the authority of the pope was appealed to only as a last resource, and generally with the view of confirming the decision of a provincial council (see also Thomassin, Vetus et Nova Eccles. Discipl. II. ii. 53, § 1, 2, 3, and 11), but that usually such questions were held to be rightly within the cognizance and authority of the diocesan bishops.

iii. Claim to present to all benefices.

This claim on the part of the Roman pontiff, which Milman affirms to have been "unknown until the 12th century" (Lat. Christianity, bk. xiii. c. 10), is certainly not to be recognized within our period. The precedents cited by the canonists are, for the most part, taken from instances of the exertion of metropolitan authority within the Roman diocese, or are only to be looked upon as cases wherein the advice of the pope was sought and given, without any notion on either side that it partook of the nature of a command.

We find, for example, Innocent I. instructing Marcianus, bishop of Naissus, in Illyricum, to appoint to offices in the church the presbyters and deacons whom his predecessor, Bonosus, prior to his sentence and degradation, had consecrated to such offices—"eos recipiendos esse censemus" (Coustant, ed. Schoenemann, p. 573). It is to be observed, however, that the authority here exercised relates to matters within the province of Illyricum, over which, ever since the time of Damasus, Rome had asserted metropolitan jurisdiction [METROPOLITAN, ad fin.]; the instance consequently fails as proof of the more general application (see Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, ii. 7-9).

A more relevant instance is that of Celestine I. who, when writing in the year 430 to the clergy and laity of Constantinople, enjoins that all bishops or priests whom Nestorius had deposed or excommunicated shall be regarded as still possessing their benefices and privileges—"aperte sedis nostrae sanxit auctoritas, nullum sive episcopum, sive clericum, seu professione aliqua Christianum, qui a Nestorio vel ejus similibus . . . vel loco suo vel communione dejecti sunt, vel ejectum vel excommunicatum videri" (Coustant, pp. 816-829). Here, however, it is to be remembered that the interference of Rome had been invoked by the contending parties, and that its assertion in the Eastern capital represented an altogether abnormal condition of affairs. When Leo the Great, some years later, appears as intervening between Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople, and the archdeacon Aëtius, whom the former had deprived of his office, his language—"quem tamen pietati vestrae commendare praesumo" (Migne, Patrol. liv. 1156), is of a very different character; and the argument of Phillips (Kirchenrecht, v. 490) that, to quote the language of John of Salisbury, "the requests of the pope are mandates," involves the anachronism of confusing the status of the papacy in the 5th and the 12th centuries.

Other instances, such as when Simplicius inflicts a penalty on Gaudentius, bishop of Autunum, for ordaining priests, "contra statuta canonum ac nostra praecepta," and directs two other bishops to deprive him of the future exercise of such power, "totam penitus auferri praecipimus potestatem" (Thiel, Epist. Rom. Pont. p. 176); or when Gelasius issues stringent regulations to the bishops of Lucania, Bruttii, and Sicily, with respect to the ordination of the clergy and their appointment to cures (ib. pp. 360-379), are invalid as a general argument, from the fact that they occur within the Roman diocese, where, at this period, such authority was unquestionably wielded by the Roman pontiff.

In all but the last of the foregoing instances, it will be seen that the occasion for the papal interference arose out of an exceptional position of affairs, and thus turns very much upon the fundamental question of appellate jurisdiction [APPEAL, p. 130]. Other instances, cited by Phillips and Thomassin, belonging to the pontificate of Gregory the Great, exhibit again the following important qualifying conditions: (α) that they occur within the diocese over which the Roman pontiff claimed metropolitan rights; (β) that Gregory himself appears, where practicable, to have first consulted the bishop of the district; (γ) that they occur at a period when political circumstances might warrant an occasional extraordinary exertion of the papal influence. For example, when Gregory bestows the monastery of St. Theodorus at Messana on Paulinus, bishop of Taurinae, he first consulted with the metropolitan of the district, Felix, bishop of Messana, to whom he writes: "quod etiam te voluisse, jam ejus [sc. Paulini] relatione didicimus" (Epist. bk. i. 41; Migne, lxxvii. 528); while, when writing to Felix, a subdeacon, with reference to the same transaction, he says:—"quam rem venerabili Felici ejusdem civitatis episcopo non significasse cognosce, ne præter suam notitiam in diocesi sibi commissa, ordinatum quippiam contristetur" (Epist. i. 42; ib. lxxvii. 529). With reference to the ordination of Paulinus himself to the bishopric of Lipara, Gregory writes to Paulinus, to say that he has already expressed his wish in the matter to Maximianus, the metropolitan: "Maximiano fratri et coepiscopo scripsimus ut fraternitatem tuam ecclesiae Liparitane ex nostra auctoritate præcesse constituat" (Epist. ii. 17; ib. lxxvii. 580). Similarly, when recommending a deacon as a proper recipient of a stipend, he writes to the same Maximianus: "sive ut officium diaconatus expleat, seu certe ut sola ejusdem officii pro sustentanda paupertate sua commoda consequatur, in tuæ fraternitatis columbus hoc pendere iudicio" (Epist. iv. 14; ib. lxxvii. 695).

But to whatever point we may assume the papal authority to have advanced in this respect, with the age of Gregory, it may be regarded as certain that it was not only held in check, but almost entirely set aside, by political events after his time. Neither in England, nor in Frankland under the Merovingian and Carolingian dynasties (save for a brief period following the arrival of Boniface), was there any disposition to admit the assertion of these claims; and it is not until nearly the close of the 12th century that the appearance of "epistolæ monitoriæ," "præceptoræ," and "executoriæ" indicate that such powers were asserted and enforced.

(1) Patrimonium.—The foundation of the church of St. John Lateran by Constantine the Great, is probably the only foundation of the kind in Rome which can be attributed with much probability to that monarch. At the same time he bestowed upon the bishop of Rome for a residence, that portion of the Lateran palace [LATERAN] which was known as the "domus Faustae" (Gregorovius, Gesch. d. Stadt Rom, i. 87), and here the first Lateran synod was held, in the year 313. It was in the same reign that the church acquired the right of possessing estates, and receiving bequests of landed property from individuals. The revenues thus obtained were always supposed to be devoted to charitable purposes, a law of Constantine of the year 326 pronouncing it fit that "the poor should be sustained by the riches of the churches" (Cod. Theod. xii. i. 6). Under this plea the church at Rome soon acquired widespread possessions; and in the year 432 we find Celestine, the bishop, writing to Theodosius II., and entreating his protection for certain estates of the see in Asia, which a lady named Proba, the representative of an ancient house, had bequeathed for the maintenance of "the clergy, the poor, and certain monasteries" (Constant, ed. Schoen. p. 879). Long before the time of Gregory the Great, the "patrimonium Petri," as it was termed, was represented by large estates in Southern Italy, Sicily, Corsica, Africa, and Dalmatia. "Ever since the extinction of the Western empire had emancipated the ecclesiastical potentate from secular control, the first and most abiding object of his schemes and prayers had been the acquisition of territorial wealth in the neighbourhood of his capital. He had, indeed, a sort of justification—for Rome, a city with neither trade nor industry, was crowded with poor, for whom it devolved on the bishop to provide" (Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, p. 42). In pursuance of this theory, we find Gregory himself speaking of such property as "res pauperum" (Migne, lxxvii. 834); his allusions to it are frequent. He refers, for instance, to lands in Gaul, "patrimonium ecclesiae nostrae quæ illic constitutum est" (Letter to Brunichild, Migne, lxxvii. 836); in Sicily near Catania (ib. lxxvii. 593), but these latter appear to have been wrested from the church by Leo the Isaurian, A.D. 730 (Le Quien, i. 97); in Sardinia (Migne, lxxvii. 926), in the Cottian Alps, in Illyricum, and in the cities "of Otranto, Gallipoli, perhaps Norcia, Nepi, Cuma, Capua, Corsealano, Naples, Palermo, and Syracuse" (Milman, Lat. Christianity, ii. 115).

The "donatio patrimonii Alpium Cottiae," presented to the Roman see in 703, by Aripert, king of the Lombards, was wrested from its possession by Luitprand, who, however, moved by the remonstrances of Gregory II., again restored the territory (Anast. Greg. II.; Muratori, Script. III. i. 154). After this time no further reference to this patrimony is discoverable, and it appears to have been finally lost to Rome in the troubles that marked the second quarter of the 8th century.

(2) Political sovereignty. The commencement of the political authority of the Roman pontiff is perhaps to be discerned in the discharge of certain civic duties, with which, like the bishops of other important cities, he was entrusted on behalf of the imperial power (Phillips, Kirchenrecht, iii. 37). These functions date back as far as the 4th century. The supreme civil authority of the city appears, however, to have been wielded by the prefect, and at a later period by the "dux" or duke of Rome. The beginning of a really independent authority has been referred (Sugenheim, Entstehung und Ausbildung des Kirchenstaates, p. 9) to the occasion when Peter the "dux" having been driven from the city, in the pontificate of Gregory II., it is supposed that a kind of republic was formed, with the pope as chief administrator. This conjecture, however, is wanting in any real historical basis (Gregorovius, ii. 258), and the commencement of the "States of the Church" is more correctly referred to the year 727, when, according to Anastasius, Luitprand, after he had taken and plundered the town of Sutri, the possession of the emperor, offered it, at the request of Gregory II., as a gift to the apostles Peter and Paul (Muratori, Script. III. i. 157).

The real "donatio" dates from the year 754, when Pepin le Bref, at a council held at Quiercy, bestowed upon Stephen III. the territory which he had wrested from the Lombards, consisting of Ravenna and the Pentapolis, a tract of country to the east of the Apennines, stretching northwards from Ancona and the city of Comaculum. According to Anastasius, Desiderius, the vanquished Lombard monarch, had already vowed to present this territory to the Roman pontiff (ib. III. i. 171; Jaffé, Regest. R. Pont. 193-4).

The magnificence of Pepin was rivalled by that of his son. When, in the year 774, Charles (who was then little more than thirty years of age) visited Rome, the donation of his father was made the ground for soliciting a yet larger grant. It is difficult to acquit Hadrian on this occasion of deliberate falsification of the deed conveying Pepin's grant, for when read by that pontiff to the monarch it was found to include territories before unheard of as part of the original gift. "Some of these," says Greenwood, "had never belonged to the exarchate of Ravenna, as it existed under the Greek dynasty, nor had ever been comprised within it at any time since the Lombard invasion of 568. Of this deed, as read by the pope, Charlemagne himself was entirely ignorant." The territory conceded by Charles, "per designationem confinium," was marked, according to Anastasius, by a line commencing at the port of Luna and taking in Corsica, then passing on to Surianum, Mons Bardonus, and Veretum, from thence to Parma, Reggio, Mantua, Monselice, taking in the whole exarchate of Ravenna (sicut antiquitus erat), together with the provinces of Venetia and Histria, and the duchies of Spoleto and Beneventum (Muratori, Script. III. i. 186). "It should be observed," continues Greenwood, "that Spoleto and Beneventum had been in fact all along integral portions of the Lombard kingdom; moreover, it is known that Pippin did not dismember that kingdom in favour of the pope, and that those duchies were not comprised in the surrenders which Pippin extorted from Aistulph in pursuance of the treaties of Pontyon and Quiercy. . . . The donation executed by Charlemagne, at the request of Hadrian, was, in fact, an entirely new grant, comprising indeed much of the older claim, but extending it to at least double the area stipulated for in the prior donation" (Cath. Petri, ii. 414; Hefele, Conciliengesch. iii. 541).

Out of these successive donations arose the story of the "Donation of Constantine," first alleged as a fact in a letter of Hadrian to Constantine and Irene, 26th Oct. 785 (Mansi, xii. 1056; xiii. 527). According to this fabrication, Constantine the Great, on being cured of the leprosy by the intercession of pope Sylvester, determined, on the fourth day from his baptism to quit Rome and found a new capital on the Bosphorus, in order that the supreme ecclesiastical power of the West might have free scope, and no longer be overshadowed by the presence of the imperial authority. He accordingly not only made over to Sylvester the Lateran palace, but also invested him with the diadem, the phrygium, the collar, and the purple cloak, "et omnia imperialia indutamenta." The clergy of Rome were to be attired in similar fashion. Finally, Rome itself, together with all the provinces of Italy and the West, were presented to Sylvester as "universal pope"—"ubi enim principatus sacerdotum et Christianae religionis caput ab imperatore coelesti constitutum est, justum non est ut illic imperator terrenus habeat potestatem" (Gratian, Corp. Juris Can. Dist. xvi. cc. 13, 14).

This forgery (first challenged by Cusanus and Valla in the 15th century) having long been abandoned as spurious by the chief authorities in the Romish church itself (Döllinger, Papstfabeln, pp. 52-62), it will be unnecessary here to adduce the data for such a conclusion.

PORCH. [NARTHEX.]

PORCH [compare NARTHEX]. Dr. Neale (Eastern Ch. Introd. p. 215) says of Eastern churches that "the προαύλιον, or porch, is usually, where it exists at all, at the west end, and reaches from the north to the south of the narthex: it is sometimes a lean-to against the west end of the narthex, but oftener it forms with the narthex one lean-to against the west end of the nave. . . . Occasionally. . . the προαύλιον, though at the west end, is simply like an English porch; and sometimes there are north and south porches. . . . The north, south, and west sides are open between the piers on which the προαύλιον is supported; the east side. . . is usually adorned with mosaics or frescoes, usually of infernal punishments. Commonly the προαύλιον opens with three doors into the narthex. . . . Against the east side there is a seat of marble or stone, or—in poor churches—of wood." [C.]

PORTRAITS. It is probable that very many of the Oranti, or praying figures in the catacombs, both male and female, may be portraits or memorial figures of the dead. Such representations were quite in accordance with Roman family habits of sepulchral observance, and respect for ancestors passed away; and would be, in fact, a kind of Christian "Imagines." Those of Probus and Proba (see woodcut) are beautiful and pathetic in a high degree. Two medallion portraits, one of which, to judge by the engraving, must have been a marked likeness of considerable merit, occur in the cemetery of St. Priscilla (see Bottari, tav. clx. clxi.). Both the medallions appear to be of military men, and Bottari mentions a conjecture that seventy-two soldiers martyred under Numerianus, with Claudius their tribune, may have been buried in that spot. They seem to be of the same rather early date, as their proportions are relatively good, and small loculi have been cut through the pictures into the wall.

Many figures in the mosaics are undoubtedly portraits, as those of Justinian and Theodora in the church of St. Vitale at Ravenna. (See Crowe and Cavalcaselle, Hist. of Painting in Italy, i. 27, and Gally Knight's Italian Architecture, where the colours of the mosaic are beautifully given; also Ricci's series of photographs, and the copies at South Kensington.) The marked countenances of many saints of the Eastern church in all mosaics, and, indeed, on many cups and glasses, can hardly be ideals. (See Buonarroti, Osservazione, &c., x.-xiii.) [R. St. J. POTTERY. The greater part of the objects made of clay, which bear Christian devices, symbols, or inscriptions, will be found under LAMPS; but there are also some others, for the description of which a few words may suffice. There is a class of small flat, circular, terra-cotta bottles, with two handles attached to the body a little below the neck, the short neck rising a little above them, which appear to have been designed for holding holy oil. On all of them, either on one side or on both, a standing figure is represented between two animals, sometimes very rudely modelled, but which appear in every case to have been intended for camels. Some of these, probably the greater number, are uninscribed; but a few bear the name of Menas, who died a martyr for the faith in the persecution under Galerius Maximinus or Maximianus at Alexandria (see Garrucci's remarks in Archaeologia, vol. xlv. p. 323, on the confusion of the two saints of the same name). To this saint, as it seems most probable, this whole class of ampullae or chrismaria belongs, which were in all likelihood made exclusively in Egypt as memorials of pilgrimage to his tomb (which was nine miles distant from Alexandria) and to hold oil brought from it. They are supposed by M. de Rossi to have been manufactured in the 6th and 7th centuries. They may be arranged chronologically as follows:—

(1) On one side the inscription ΕΥΛΟ || ΓΙΑ ΤΟΥ || ΑΓΙΟΥ Μ || ΗΝΑ* in four lines on the body of the cruse, followed by a small rude cross of four nearly equal limbs: below in another line three pellets, all enclosed in a circle, and this again in a wreath. On the other side a draped figure with extended arms, an orante (details of drapery, &c., obscure); below each arm a very rudely designed animal, on each side of the head a cross as before, all inclosed in a circle, surrounded by a circle of beads, and that again inclosed in a circle. Height (when perfect) about 4 inches; diameter of body, 2½ inches. Figured and described from an example found at Arles, in De Rossi's Bullett. di Arch. Crist. for 1869, pp. 20, 31, 32. De Rossi (u. s.) notes that other specimens occur in museums (public or private) in Paris, Rome, London, and also in Montauban (found at Memphis) as well as Marseilles, Aix and Turin (also found in Egypt). Another in the Halles Museum at Brussels, of pale yellow clay, has ΤΟΥ ΑΓΙΟΥ ΜΗΝΑ only, as it would seem, but the description is defective (De Rossi, Bull. 1872, pp. 25–30).

(2) On both sides an orante as before, but with distinct circular nimbus (no crosses near the neck), dressed in military costume; the cloak (paludamentum) is buckled round the right shoulder, and the cuirass comes down nearly to the knees. A rude animal (a camel) is on either side his body. Across the body of the cruse, near the neck of the figure, Ο ΑΓΙΟΣ

* Eulogia, a word used primarily for the bread in the Eucharist, then for loaves distributed after it to the faithful, is also extended to 'other pledges of heavenly blessings' (De Rossi), and occurs not only on these fictile chrismaria, but on one of those metal ones preserved in Monza Cathedral, where we have ΕΥΛΟΓΙΑ ΚΥΡΙΟΥ ΤΩΝ ΑΓΙΩΝ (sic) ΤΟΠΩΝ, on which Kirchhoff observes (in Böckh. C. I. G. n. 8977) that the sacred oil is so called 'ut pote Domino pro sacrificio oblatum,' and refers to Du Cange, Gloss. i. p. 447; see De Rossi, Bull. 1869, p. 31, and 1872, p. 7; also EULOGIAE.

ΜΗΝΑC (ΜΗΝ ligated) in one line. Diameter of body of cruse, nearly 4½ inches; the height must have been fully 6 inches. Figured and described by De Rossi, Bull. 1869, pp. 44, 46. Found at Alexandria. (In the Florence Museum.)

(3) A nimbed orante, nearly as in No. 2 (without crosses); very rude camels on either side, but in place of Greek inscription s. m. (i. e. S. Menas) on either side of the neck (the s is clear, the m is much blurred). The reverse has a Maltese cross inclosed in a circle or wreath of palm branches; this again is included in a circle in which three pellets alternate with one barleycorn, there being twelve pellets and four barleycorns. Of hard red clay; part of one handle missing. Height, 3½ inches; diameter of body, 2½ inches. Found in Lower Egypt; formerly in the Allemant collection. (See below, under No. 4.)

(4) Uninscribed. On both sides an orante, as No. 1, with the same adjuncts. Three specimens from Alexandria in the Florence Museum (De Rossi, Bull. 1869, p. 46). Two others of soft pale yellowish clay, diameter of body about 3 inches, height nearly 4 inches; both from Lower Egypt (Allemant, Collect. d'Antiquités égypt. part of Nos. 520–531, p. 85, Lond. 1878; now in the collection of the writer, as well as the foregoing, forming part of the same lot). One said to have been found in the cemetery of St. Cyriaca in 1830, now in the Le Noirs collection, is figured in Perret, Catacombes, vol. iv. pl. xx. n. 6. The ampullae with full inscriptions would (as De Rossi observes) naturally be the most ancient, those with shorter inscriptions would come next, and those with no inscription would be latest of all, the type having then become known (Bull. 1872, p. 30).

(5) There remains another example of this class, which entirely resembles no. 3 on the side bearing the figure of Menas, except that it has two crosses in place of s. m.; but the reverse has a monogram plainly reading ΠΕΤΡΟΥ inclosed within a circle, and this again within a circle of scroll-work. Clay of a yellowish colour. Height, 3½ inches; diameter of body, 2½ inches. Preserved in the College of the Barnabite Fathers in Moncalieri, near Turin (De Rossi, Bull. 1872, p. 26. tav. ii. nos. 4 and 5).

De Rossi, while fully admitting that this figure between camels must be Menas, thinks with great probability that the Peter of the reverse is St. Peter, bishop of Alexandria, also a martyr, who died in the persecutions of Diocletian. His cemetery near Alexandria is mentioned by the monk Epiphanius, a writer of the 11th century, in close connexion with the sepulchre of St. Menas (pp. 5, 6, ed. Dressel. Lips. 1843). It is just possible, however, that Peter may be the potter's name.^b

^b Since most of the above was in type, Mr. Franks has kindly called the writer's attention to a paper in the Archæologia, vol. xlv. by Mr. A. Nesbitt "On a Box of Carved Ivory of the Sixth Century," representing the Acts of St. Menas; at the conclusion (pp. 329, 330) is a description of the flasks of the same saint, which were in the British Museum in 1876. They are nineteen in number, and except one, which was found in Calymnos, were all found in Egypt; eleven are inscribed, eight are not so. They more or less resemble those which have been mentioned above; some, indeed, are exactly like no. 3 (above). Two of them have profile heads of St.

The camels, which are the invariable concomitants of Menas, were suggested by M. de Rossi to be reminiscences of the desert of Libya, of which Menas was governor during his life, and regarded as the protector after his death. But the Acts of St. Menas say that he, before undergoing martyrdom, ordered that his body should be placed after his death on camels, and that the beasts should be left free, and "that they would see the glory of God manifest," i.e. by their bearing it to the spot where God willed that his sanctuary should be erected (Garrucci, u. s.).

There are in the British Museum a few other flasks bearing different types and of different forms, which were probably used for the same purpose.

(1) Ampulla without handles. On one side three arches with coronae hanging from them: cross and two branches above them; below (retrograde) ΚΤ ΕΛΕΗ CON; below the inscription a rude bird. On the other side the same types with a continuation of the inscription (also retrograde) ΘΗ CIONKET (i.e. Κύριε, ἐλεῆσον τῇ Σιονκέτ, a woman's name). Height between 3 and 4 inches. From Egypt.

The following small ampullae have two small perforated handles:

(2) Greek cross on both sides impressed with concentric circles; similar markings in the two upper compartments on both sides of the body; circles round the neck.

(3) Greek cross on both sides; rays between the limbs; extremities of limbs forked. Recently brought from Egypt by the Rev. G. J. Chester.

(4) Figure (of a saint) at full length, holding long cross in left hand, and grasping snake by the head with the other; the same types on both sides. This and the preceding are narrower in form than no. (2).

Other kinds of fictile vessels, bearing marks of Christianity, occur but rarely. There is an amphora, found in the cemetery of St. Cyriaca, now in the Lateran Museum, which is stamped in intaglio upon the neck with

SPES I N DEO

 (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1872, p. 12).^c

A few Christian stamps on brick and tile are now to be mentioned. A fragment of brick found in Rome has ΧΜΓ ΚΑCCTIOY stamped upon it in a circular form, and in the centre the usual chrisma (✠) rudely drawn within a Menas (?) with curly hair. The other variations need hardly be mentioned here. In the same paper (pp. 322, 323) are remarks relating to these flasks by Padre Garrucci in a letter to Mr. Nesbitt. One is figured in the Revue Archéologique, vol. i. (1844), p. 405, and others in a recent volume of the same work, not seen by the writer. The Museum has acquired other flasks of St. Menas since 1876; among them is a large example (from Egypt) which may possibly be intended for some other saint. It shews a naked figure with nimbus between two bulls and two other animals, perhaps meant for bears.

^c A piece of a handle of a wine amphora found at Bīnchester, now preserved in the Museum at Newcastle, has the potter's name V R F I enclosed in an oblong label, a Greek cross (approaching the Maltese) being inserted between R and F. Dr. Bruce (Roman Wall, p. 411, 3rd ed.) is unwilling to recognise it as a Christian symbol, probably rightly.

circle. Cassius is doubtless the master of the brick-kiln. Χ.Μ.Γ, as De Rossi gives reasons for thinking, may stand for Χριστός, Μιχαήλ, Γαβριήλ (Bull. 1870, pp. 7-31, tav. iii. n. 2). A fragment of tile, found at Piacenza, has the same chrisma, also very rude, accompanied by some scarcely legible marks, which may perhaps form the word ΝΙΚΑ (De Rossi, u. s. p. 32, tav. ii. n. 2). A brick found in the Roman catacombs in 1849 has a stamp bearing two concentric circles. Within the outer circle is the word CLAUDIANA (the name of the owner of the manufactory); accompanied by an ivy-leaf: within the inner circle is the chrisma of the ordinary form (Perret, Catacombes, t. iv. pl. xx. n. 13, and t. vi. p. 119). But it is in Spain perhaps more especially that tiles and bricks stamped with Christian inscriptions have been found; they have been collected by Hübner (Inscr. Hisp. Christ. pp. 65, 66). Some are not altogether intelligible; the more remarkable of the others are as follows: (1) BRACARI VI | VAS CUM TVIS (in two lines); between them

A ✠ ω (Hübner, n. 193, who mentions that many examples of this tile have been found in various parts of Hispania Baetica). (2) Chrisma with loop to left; followed by CHIONI VIVAS (retrograde) (n. 196). (3) Alpha and Omega (Ω), chrisma between them in one line in a line below FELIX ASELLA. This form of the Omega, if correctly given, is perhaps unique in this connexion (n. 197). Others have SPES IN DEO and the chrisma (n. 203, 6). Tiles of the same general character, some of early date, some of Ostrogothic times have been met with in Italy (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1872, p. 12). Fragments of tiles found in Strasbourg in a tomb were stamped with a label inclosing the inscription ARBOASTIS EPS FICET (fecit). He died about 679 A.D., and was evidently in possession of the manufacture of these tiles (Le Blant, Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, n. 350, pl. 39, n. 233).

On a vase, probably a cup, of red clay, found between Saint-Léger-sur-Dheune and Chagny are scratched three Latin crosses, two of them with a rude heart-shaped figure at the base, and the third surrounded by a like figure; on the upper rim is inscribed in retrograde and inverted letters the potter's name PISTILLVS, which occurs on other examples of Gaulish pottery; also, both near it and near the crosses, the letters ZVY (in various combinations), which have not been explained. Supposed to belong "aux premiers temps du christianisme." Shape nearly cylindrical, slightly increasing above; no handles. Height said to be 0.138; breadth, 0.009 [0.039?]. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 6, pl. 1, n. 2.) Remains of tile and also of pottery have been found in Christian tombs in Gaul,^d belonging in some cases to vases too large to have been placed there when whole, on which are scratched the proper names of the persons buried,* accompanied sometimes by the cross or chrisma, or the symbols occur alone. (See Le Blant, u. s. pl. 17, 18, 19, 20.) One which M. Le Blant supposes to be of the 4th century (n. 155) has VIVAS IN DEO, followed by a palm scratched on a piece of glazed red pottery of classic times (Samian ware); and the Louvre has similar fragments with Greek Christian inscriptions drawn with the point. A terracotta weight (n. 160) has VRSVS, with palm and chrisma engraved on its sides.

^d Perret (Catacombes de Rome, vol. iv. pl. iii. and pl. vi.) figures many pieces of pottery, which (as he justly remarks) would be of little interest, were they not found in the catacombs (the exact localities are not given); among them are jugs (two forms), open cups without handles (either plain or with protuberances), and others with loops for suspension; also long pointed amphorae, others with swelling bodies and flat bottoms. Described in vol. vi. pp. 109, 110. As they are the ordinary Roman pottery of the period no more need be said about them. See also Guenebault, Dict. Iconogr. s. v. "Vases."

It may be added that on fragments of Egyptian pottery a few Greek Christian inscriptions are written in ink, containing verses from the Gospels and from the hymn trisagion, which were perhaps used as charms. They are probably of the 7th or 8th century. (Böckh, C. I. G. Nos. 9060-9063). [C. B.]

POVERTY, VOWS OF. In order to arrive at a correct and philosophical view of this wide subject, it must be remembered that the self-imposition of poverty is not exclusively, is not (it might be said) even principally Christian.

As an example of it in Greek paganism it will be enough to cite the case of Crates, the wealthy Theban, casting away a mass of gold when he went to live the life of philosophy at Athens.

In the ancient religion of India it is generally understood that voluntary poverty occurs; but to remove all vagueness and doubt upon the subject, one or two authorities may be conveniently presented here.

In the code of Menu, then, which is of supreme obligation, we find this direction laid down for the man who would make progress in religion:—"From devout Brahmins let him receive alms to support life" (Institutes of Menu, ch. vi. 27, Calcutta, 1794). At a later period we meet with the same ideas in a still more precise form in the Institutes of Akbar, where one of the five subdivisions of the state called Jowg Sumpergeyat is Appergerreh, "not holding any worldly possessions, but considering them as the cause of every kind of unhappiness." (Institutes of Akber, translated from the Persian by F. Gladwin, Calcutta, 1786, vol. iii. p. 140.) And finally, in our own century, the devout Hindu who professes penance is thus described by Mill:—"Repairing to a forest . . . and leaving all property and all worldly duties behind him, he is there directed to live on pure food, on certain herbs, roots, and fruit, which he may collect in the forest, to wear a black antelope's hide, or a vesture of bark, to suffer the hairs of his head, his beard, and his nails to grow continually" (History of British India, bk. 2, ch. 6). It will be observed that these are phrases which might be exactly applied to the life of many a Christian hermit.

In the history of monasticism the vow of poverty is one factor of the famous triplet which constituted profession (religionis professio)—obedience, poverty, and chastity, (continentia, castitas). The vow is divided by canonists into two classes: (1) simplex, (2) solenne. The solemn vow is that made with certain approved formalities in a religious body; when these formalities are absent the vow is termed simple. It was probably under a vow of this latter kind (if under any at all) that the early ascetæ practised poverty. It is mostly under a vow of the solemn kind that the religious Orders have in subsequent times undertaken that life. (See Aquinas, Summa Secunda Secundæ, q. 88, and Cajetan's Comment.) Aquinas argues that even if a monk becomes a bishop he is not absolved from his vow of poverty. He ought to have nothing of his own, but ought to be, as it were, the dispenser of common property (ib. q. 88 xi.).

We can, however, trace the fact of a self-inflicted poverty, long before we have any satisfactory evidence of a vow to undergo it. There is no occasion to seek the prototype of such a life in that disdain of material things which is in one degree or another a characteristic of most forms of religious thought, and which, as we have seen above, found expression in the Brahmanism of ancient India, and the polytheism of ancient Greece, as well as in modern Christianity. The ultimate motive of the system is to be found, no doubt, in the infirmities of man himself; but when we are considering it as a feature in the asceticism which is specifically Christian, it is enough to notice that the germ of it was ready from the first, both in the life our Lord Himself and in certain texts of the New Testament. Just as there were words in Scripture which seemed to demand, and in some cases actually produced, the sacrifice of self-mutilation, so there were words which seemed to imply that possession was, if not a sin, at least a hindrance to Christian life. It was inevitable that "Go and sell all that thou hast" should be taken in the full severity of the letter.

Whatever be the solution of the vexed question as to the origin and name of the early Ebionites, it seems certain that they made a profession of poverty, esteeming the world, and all its allurements, as the property of Satan (see Mr. Soames' learned note on Mosheim, Hist. bk. i. cent. 2, part ii. ch. v. s. 2).

In the middle of the first century of the Christian era we learn from Philo (quoted by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. ii. 17) that the Therapeutæ divested themselves of their property before withdrawing into the wilderness. The Greek historian suggests that this was probably intended as an imitation of the practice of the first Christians in the Acts, who sold their lands and laid the price at the Apostles' feet. The spirit of voluntary poverty in early days is well illustrated in the life of St. Spyridion, bishop of Trimythion in Cyprus, in the 4th century, who was so far a devotee of poverty that he lent his money without interest (Sozom. Eccl. Hist. i. xi.). But the life of poverty, says the Greek historian just now quoted, was carried to "the summit of exactness and perfection" by Antony, the great monk (ὁμέγας μοναχός). Many other instances of the same form of asceticism in the 4th century are recorded in the first book of Sozomen's Ecclesiastical History.

In the following century we reach the time of St. Benedict of Nursia, the founder of the celebrated monastic rule that bears his name. The formal vow of poverty was one of the three vows that were exacted of all postulants for the order, the other two vows being those of chastity and obedience.

It is important to notice that we can find no trace of the formal vow of poverty earlier^a than the Benedictine rule. It appears from the Novellae of Justinian that in his times the profession of religious life was not accompanied by any particular solemnity. Even in the monasteries of earlier days, such as St. Antony's for example, there was no formula of profession. It is obvious, however, that poverty is an essential feature of the monastic life. And this perhaps may be some explanation of a fact which might otherwise occasion some surprise—that in the formula of profession St. Benedict makes no express mention of the poverty. The novice is indeed asked three questions, which no doubt, are meant severally to correspond with the poverty, the chastity, and the obedience; but the stern demand of absolute poverty is at least very mildly phrased; it is in fact simply the question that is put throughout Christendom to every candidate for baptism, "Vultis abrenuntiare saeculo huic, et pompis ejus?" (Martene de Monach. Rit. v. 4, vol. iv. p. 223, fol. 1764). The rule, however (cap. 33), describes the condition with great minuteness of detail—no property, not even book, nor paper, nor pen, nothing at all, was the professed to have.

Precautions were always taken against inconsiderate entrance into the monastic life. And it was the concern of princes as well as of pastors to secure the existence of proper safeguards against hasty renunciation of all title to possession. We are not therefore surprised to find that simultaneously with the very rise of formal profession the emperor Justinian regulates admission by a decree (Nov. 5). Laymen were to make a novitiate of three years. [NOVICE.]

We find St. Gregory distinctly enjoining poverty on Augustine of Canterbury: "But because you, my brother, having been instructed in the rules of the monastery, ought not to live apart from your clergy in the church of the English, which by the aid of God was but lately brought to the faith, you ought to institute that conversation which was our fathers' in the beginning of the early church; among whom none of them said that anything was his own of those things which they possessed, but all things were common to them" (Bede's Eccles. Hist. i. 27; Gidley's transl. p. 65).

Amongst the examples of the life of poverty we may cite some famous names. St. Anthony, whose life was written by St. Athanasius, has perhaps the right to stand first. St. Olympia had the distinction of being under the guidance of St. Chrysostom (see Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. viii. 9). There are the pupils and friends of St. Jerome—Fabiola, Paula, Eustochium, and others. A little later we have John the patriarch of Alexandria (A.D. 616), surnamed Eleemosynarius. Other examples collected by Zöckler (Kritische Geschichte der Askese, 1863) are more or less grotesque: Bisarion the abbot, who covered a corpse with his cloak, gave his coat to a beggar and went stark naked himself; Eleemon, who sold every one of his books, and himself performed the office of a midwife to a poor woman in the vestibule of a church; Macarius, who was so indifferent to worldly possessions that he helped the thief to complete the plunder of his dwelling; Pambo, who at once distributed amongst the poor the three hundred pounds of silver with which a lady presented him; and Agatho, who so dreaded possession that he would not even receive the solitary piece of gold that was offered him for distribution to the poor. [H. T. A.]

PRAEBENDA. A word probably derived from the daily rations issued to soldiers (Thomassin, Vel. et Nov. Eccles. Discip. iii. 2, c. 16, § 1), and signifying the portions of food, raiment, or money, allowed to a monk or cleric. Gregory the Great, writing to Paschasius, bishop of Naples (Ep. ix. 9), speaks of a hundred solidi which were to be paid to the clergy. These allowances were distinct from the benefice [PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH]. A Capitulary of Charles the Great (Addit. iii. c. 112) provides that canons who have benefices should not claim a share in the allowances allotted to their poorer brethren, "stipendia fratrum unde pauperiores vitam sustinent nequaquam assumant." Those who offended against this statute were to be deprived of both prebend and benefice, "utrisque careant et beneficio et praebenda," and to forfeit any ecclesiastical preferment they might happen to hold. The same monarch (Sirmundi. Conc. Gall. iii. p. 637) complains that certain of the clergy neglected their parishes in order to hold a prebend in the monastery of Monte Falco. The development of the prebendal system belongs to a period beyond our present limits. [P. O.]

PRAECENTOR. [PRECENTOR.]

PRAECO. As it was the duty of the deacon at certain points of the liturgy to proclaim to the people the subjects to be prayed for, and generally to direct them by his voice in the performance of their acts of worship, he sometimes received the name of κήρυξ, or praeco, the herald or proclaimer [DEACON, p. 529 f.]. Synesius (Epist. 67, p. 209, Migne) calls the deacons ἑποκήρυκες; and the word κηρύττειν is used of the deacon's proclamations, as "κηρύττω, μή τις τῶν ἀπίστων" (Constt. Apost. viii. 5). It is also applied (4) to that member of a chapter who takes charge of the administration of the capitular estates, (5) to the bailiff or steward who manages an estate, and (6) to the ADVOCATUS ECCLESIAE. PRAYER. It is unnecessary to say that the importance of prayer as a means of spiritual growth is everywhere insisted on by Christian teachers, especially in the well-known tracts on Prayer by Tertullian and Origen, and in that on the Lord's Prayer by Cyprian. Cyprian in particular (De Orat. Dom. c. 4) warns us that we should endeavour not to offend the eye of God either in our postures or the tones of our voice; that God will have us worship Him in secret, as well as in the assembly of the brethren. Origen, too (De Orat. c. 31), insists that the outward accompaniments of prayer are not indifferent, for the gestures are expressive as well as the voice. And again (c. Celsum, vii. 39 and 44; De Orat. c. 20), he describes how the Christian in his prayer closes, so far as may be, the avenues of sense, and abstracts himself from earthly things. He prays in a low voice, for the heart and not the lungs is powerful with God (Tertullian de Orat. c. 13). See further on Prayer as an ascetic exercise, ROSARY, HOURS of PRAYER. On forms of prayer, see LITURGICAL BOOKS.

Christian teachers, from the apostles onward, insist constantly on the necessity of common prayer. When ye assemble frequently, the power of Satan is broken (Ignat. ad Ephes. c. 13). If the prayer of one or two has so much power, much more has that of the bishop and the whole church (Ib. c. 5). The Teacher of peace and unity did not prescribe mere individual, but common, prayer. I am not to pray to "my Father," but our Father; not for my daily bread, but our daily bread (Cyprian de Orat. Dom. 8). When the feeling of community in prayer was so strong, it follows that frequent attendance on divine service was insisted on. "Before all things," says the writer of the Clementine Homilies (Hom. iii. c. 69), "assemble yourselves together more constantly. I would it were hourly, at any rate on the accustomed days of assembling; for while ye do this ye are within the walls of inviolability (ἀνολίας)." It was from the conception of prayer as a duty that public prayer itself came to be called officium (Tert. de Orat. c. 14). Especially was attendance required at the Sunday services (Apost. Constt. vii. 30). But daily attendance at church, morning and evening, was enjoined on clergy and laity alike (Ib. ii. 59). Origen (in Genes. Hom. 10, c. 3) reproves those who came to the house of the Lord only on festival days, as if all days were not holy to the Lord. The Arabic canons which bear the name of Hippolytus (c. 21, p. 79, quoted by Probst, Kirchl. Disciplin., p. 362) desire the priests, sub-deacons, and readers, and the whole people to assemble together in the church at cock-crow, and give themselves to prayer, the saying of psalms, and the reading of Scripture. Even for the sick the true medicine is to attend at church and enjoy the prayers, except indeed those who are dangerously ill. The Greek Διατάξεις τῶν ἀποστόλων (c. 22, in Hippolyti Opera, ed. Lagarde, p. 83 = Apost. Constt. viii. 34) desire prayer to be made at dawn, at the third, sixth, and ninth hour, at evening, and at cock-crow. And if it be impossible by reason of unbelievers to approach the church, the bishop is desired to hold meetings for worship (συνάξεις) in his own house; for it is not the place that sanctifies the man, but the man the place. But if even this be impossible, every man is enjoined to say psalms, read Scripture, and pray by himself, or by two or three together. The injunction is added, that one of the faithful is not to pray with a catechumen even in private. When such provision was made even for a time of persecution, it is easy to see how strong was felt to be the obligation to prayer, and especially to public prayer. And the acts of martyrs frequently shew the same thing. The martyrs Saturninus and Felix, for instance, avowed in the midst of tortures that they had held assemblies for worship (collectas), and gloried in their obedience to the law of God (cc. 10 and 12, in Ruinart, pp. 386-7).

And as attendance at Catholic worship was earnestly enjoined, so was attendance on non-Catholic worship earnestly forbidden. One who joined in the worship of Jews or heretics was excommunicated (Can. Apost. 64). If any one despises the church of God, and turns aside to the abominations of the heathen, or to a meeting of Jews or heretics, how shall he give account to God in the day of judgment? (Apost. Constt. ii. 61, § 2).

For the general arrangement of the place of worship see CHURCH, p. 378. To this may be added that the space nearest to the presbytery was occupied by the virgins, widows, and presbyteresses (πρεσβυτήριδες) of the church, standing or sitting (Apost. Constt. ii. 57, § 8; cf. Tertullian de Exhort. Cast. c. 11). With these were probably the ascetics. The sexes were separated [SEXES, SEPARATION OF] probably from about the 3rd century (Ap. Constt. ii. 57, § 4). The Apostolical Constitutions inform us that the younger part of the congregation, if the seats were not sufficient for all, had to stand; children stood beside their parents; women not yet purified after childbirth took their place among the catechumens.

Men and women were desired to go to church in seemly dress, with simple and unaffected mien, pure in body and in heart, fit to pray to God (Clem. Alex. Paedag. iii. 11, p. 300, Potter). The women covered their heads in church, according to the apostolic precept (1 Cor. xi. 5); the men bared their heads, as bondsmen of Christ, while in Judaism and heathendom alike men prayed with covered head, as a sign of freedom. [HEAD, COVERING OF.] Devotional quiet was maintained during the service; the deacon was to prevent whispering, or sleeping, or laughing, or beckoning (Apost. Constt. ii. 57, § 8). And this direction was not, it appears, superfluous; for Origen (In Exod. hom. 12, § 2) complains that there were some who, while scripture was read, withdrew into corners and amused themselves with worldly conversation, even turning their backs upon the reader. Strangers who brought commendatory letters from another diocese were conducted by the deacon to their proper place; a foreign presbyter sat among the presbyters, a foreign deacon among the deacons; a bishop was received with honour by the bishop of the place (Ap. Constt. ii. 58).

The hours of prayer, afterwards observed only by the clergy, were originally intended to be observed so far as practicable by the laity also. There is nothing in the passage above quoted from the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 34) to limit the observance of the hours to the clergy; and even at a later period efforts were made to induce the laity to attend at the hours of prayer, as well as at the Eucharistic service, at least on festivals. Thus a capitulare of the year 801 (quoted by Van Espen de Horis Can. pt. i. c. iii. § 2) says: "It was ordered not merely that clerics should perform the offices at meet times, but also that they should ring bells to rouse the people to pray." And Theodulph of Orleans (Capit. ad Presb. 23, 24) begs those who can do no more at least to pray twice a day, morning and evening, in the church, if a church is near, if not, wherever they may chance to be when the time comes. On the sabbath (Saturday) he enjoins all Christians to come to church with lights [for the service of the eve], to come to the vigils or matin office, and again with their oblations to the mass [on Sunday]. See HOURS OF PRAYER; LITURGICAL BOOKS; LITURGY; OFFICE, THE DIVINE.

Postures of Prayer.—It was the custom in the earliest times of Christianity to pray standing, with the hands extended and slightly raised towards heaven, and with the face turned towards the east. Exceptions may no doubt be cited even from the New Testament, but that this was the most common attitude is evident from the testimony of primitive monuments. Frescoes, sarcophagi, sepulchral monuments, ancient glass, mosaics in the earliest basilicas, above all the Roman catacombs, exhibit the faithful, more especially women, praying in this attitude [ORANTI]. Many of these female figures are richly dressed, and, as though wearied with the length of their prayers, have their arms supported on either side by men, who to judge from their dress were servants; a probable allusion to the support which Moses received from Aaron and Hur, and a possible hint not of their weariness, but of their lengthened devotions. The presence of serving men may, like the rich dress, also indicate the position in life of the deceased, though the rich dress may also have had a religious significance [PARADISE]. Tertullian (Apologet. xxx.) explicitly declares this to have been the Christian attitude of prayer—"illuc suspicientes (in coelum) Christiani manibus expansis quia innocuis, capite nudo quia non erubescimus"—though this description does not exclude kneeling nor involve turning to the east, while it adds the bare head to the previous description.

There is abundant evidence from ancient art and ancient literature to shew that the raising the hands toward heaven was an ordinary attitude of prayer among the Egyptians, Etruscans, and Romans; but Tertullian (de Orat. xi.) attaches a different motive to the Christian elevation of the hands to any that could have entered into the mind of a pagan. Contrasting the mere elevation with the expansion of the hands he says: "nos vero non attollimus tantum sed expandimus, e dominica passione modulantes." The same desire to imitate the position of our Lord upon the cross is related in Ruinart (Acta Martyr. Sinc. p. 235) of Montanus, and in Usuard (Martyrol. xii. Kal. Feb.) of Fructuosus, Augurius, and Eulogius. Pagan may readily be distinguished from Christian orante on ancient monuments, the pagan figures raising the hands vertically with the elbow forming a right angle, the Christian extending the arms horizontally, expressing, according to Tertullian (de Orat. xiii.) more humility and self-control; "ne ipsis quidem manibus sublimius elatis, sed temperate ac probe elatis." In the early church the catechumens as well as the faithful prayed standing, but whereas the latter raised the eyes to heaven, the former bent them towards the earth, to indicate that they had not yet acquired by baptism the right of sons to raise their eyes to the Father in heaven.

For the prevalence of the attitude of kneeling in the early church, see GENUFLEXION. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v. Prière, Attitudes de.) [E. C. H.]

PRAYER, THE LORD'S. [LORD'S PRAYER.]

I. In the first place we find our Lord applying to Himself the prophecy of Is. li. 1, "He hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor" (Luke iv. 18); and giving an express commission to preach to the Twelve (St. Luke ix. 2), and it would seem to the Seventy (St. Luke x. 9). To the former it was repeated with great solemnity immediately before the Ascension (St. Mark xvi. 15); and we find St. Paul (1 Cor. i. 17) claiming with considerable emphasis this function of preaching (Ὁ γὰρ ἀπέστειλέ με Χριστὸς βαπτίζειν, ἀλλ' εὐαγγελίζεσθαι) as peculiarly belonging to him. Very naturally, therefore, and for an obvious reason, the preaching of the Apostles is described by the term, εὐαγγελίζεσθαι; and εὐαγγέλιον (in the singular) means not only the record of the life and teaching of Christ, but also the communication by preaching of the knowledge of the Incarnation. See St. Luke iii. 18, iv. 18; Acts v. 42; Gal. i. 11. This usage is generally confined to the preaching of our Lord and His apostles, and it is generally true of them; but there is apparently one exception at least in Acts viii. 4, even in the very first period of the spread of the gospel.

II. At a somewhat later stage of the primitive church, when congregations had been formed in various places, we learn from the epistles of St. Paul that those to whom extraordinary spiritual gifts had been committed, were in the habit of preaching and expounding in the public assemblies of Christians. See 1 Cor. xiv. 31 (where, however, it is to be noticed that the word εὐαγγελίζω is not employed). Certain rules are laid down there for these "preachings." It does not, however, appear under what further limits or restrictions this custom of general ministrations was permitted; and as these extraordinary endowments died out in or shortly after the apostolic age, this "ministry of gifts" was speedily replaced by one devolving on the natural depositaries, the clergy. Hilary's comment on the Epistles (in the works of St. Ambrose) states this definitely, but it is not clear whether upon any kind of authority, or as a mere theory: Ut cresceret plebs et multiplicaretur, omnibus inter initia concessum et evangelizare et baptizare, et Scripturas in ecclesiâ explanare. At ubi autem omnia loca circumplexa est ecclesia, conventicula constituta sunt, et rectores et caetera officia in ecclesiis sunt ordinata, ut nullus de clero auderet, qui ordinatus non esset, praesumere officium, quod sciret non sibi creditum vel concessum" (Com. in Ephes. iv.).

III. Women, however, were never permitted in the church to assume the character of public preachers; neither in the apostolic age, as we learn from 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35; 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12; nor afterwards was this ever permitted in any case. The fourth council of Carthage (can. 99) expressly declares this: "Mulier quamvis docta et sancta, viros in conventu docere non praesumat." To the same effect the Apostolical Constitutions (lib. iii. cap. 9). The allowing of women to preach was, however, a mark of many heretical sects. Thus Tertullian: "Ipsae mulieres haereticæ quam procaces, quæ audeant docere" (De Praescript. cap. 41). And the Montanists even made this a leading principle of their sect, and its two prophetesses, Priscilla and Maximilla, were quite as prominent in the teaching of their followers as Montanus himself.

IV. Among the Catholics, however, preaching was in the earliest age especially the duty of the bishop. Justin Martyr (Apol. i. c. 67) describes the presiding brother (προεστῶς) as exhorting the assembly. St. Chrysostom, commenting on the phrase used by St. Paul, "A bishop must be apt to teach" (διδακτικόν), refers to this as especially required of the bishop (Hom. x. in 1 Tim. iii.), and declares in another place that "he who was without the power of preaching ought to be far from the throne of teaching" (πῶρῳ ἔστω θρόνον διδασκαλικόν). Similarly Cyril of Alexandria speaks of the episcopal office as ἀξίωμα διδασκαλικόν (Ep. ad Monach. in Conc. Ephes.). The same phrase was used by the sixth general council in degrading Macarius, bishop of Antioch, for heresy. It was understood that a bishop undertook to preach as one of the distinctive duties of his office; and St. Ambrose complains that he, although unlearned in theology and unprepared, was obliged to undertake it: "Cum jam effugere non possumus officium docendi, quod nobis refugientibus imposuit sacerdotii necessitudo . . . Ego raptus de tribunalibus atque administrationis infulis ad sacerdotium, docere vos coepi quod ipse non didici. Itaque factum est, ut prius docere inciperem, quam docere. Discendum est igitur mihi simul et docendum, quoniam non vacavi ante docere" (De Offic. Minist. i. 1). And St. Chrysostom develops the same idea at length, and with great beauty, in the fourth book of his treatise De Sacerdotio. St. Augustine, when he writes to blame the custom of the auditors standing throughout the sermon, which he says, by fatigue of the body, takes away the attention of the mind, so that they should rather sit, says, "Antistites sedentes loquuntur ad populum" (De Rud. Catech. c. 19). The passage is interesting on another ground, since we learn from it that in the province of Africa the custom was for the preacher to sit and the people to stand: whilst in some other churches both preachers and people used to sit.

In the African churches it would seem, from this and other passages, that the duty of preaching was reserved wholly to the bishop; and to this fact we must refer the frequent use of such phrases as me tractante and tractante Episcopo in the Epistles of St. Cyprian (Epp. 52, 56, 83). It was for centuries altogether unknown in these churches that any but bishops should preach; and Possidius, in his Life of St. Augustine, relates that when Valerius, the bishop of the diocese, was induced by Augustine's remarkable powers to allow him to preach frequently before him, he introduced a marked departure from the customs of the province: (Vit. Aug. cap. 5). But the example once given was afterwards followed, and it became more usual for presbyters to preach by licence from the bishop, "postea bono praecedente exemplo, accepta ab episcopis potestate, presbyteri nonnulli coram episcopis populo tractare coeperunt verbum Dei" (ibid.). But in the Eastern Churches presbyters were more generally permitted to preach; for the same author intimates that it was from their example Valerius derived the idea, and disregarded accordingly the outcry made against him. St. Jerome was so jealous of the rights of presbyters, that we need not be surprised to find him stigmatizing the refusing to them the privilege to preach in the presence of bishops as "a very bad custom in certain churches." The ecclesiastical historians have some scattered notices upon the subject. Socrates (lib. v. c. 22) asserts that at Alexandria presbyters were not permitted to preach; and that this restriction began from the time when (the presbyter) Arius troubled the church by his novel speculations respecting the Incarnation; which has somewhat the air of a theory invented ex post facto to account for the custom. But he records in another place (vii. 2) in his notices of Atticus, bishop of Constantinople, that the latter constantly preached while yet a presbyter. And almost the entire career as a preacher of St. John Chrysostom is comprised in the sixteen years which intervened between his ordination as deacon and his elevation to the episcopal throne of Constantinople. To this period, amongst many other of his works, must be referred the orations on the martyr Babylas. The sermon that he preached before the bishop and a large congregation on the occasion of his ordination as presbyter is still extant; and it needs only to mention the celebrated orations On the Statues, as falling likewise within the time of his presbyterate.

Similar instances from other churches might easily be adduced; and there is nothing to shew that they were in any respect exceptions. The power and the duty of preaching were primarily in the bishop; but he might and usually did authorize presbyters who were capable of discharging it to do so.

A case is recorded by Paulinus in his Carmen de Vitâ Felicis of this Felix being appointed by Quintus, as the newly-elected bishop of Nola, to preach there: "Ergo sub hoc coram Felice antistite vixit Presbytero, et crevit meritis, qui crescere sede noluit [he had refused to be himself chosen bishop]. Ipse illum tanquam minor omnia Quintus observabat, et os linguam Felicis habebat. Ille gregem officio, Felix sermone regebat."

V. The case was somewhat different with regard to deacons. The power of preaching was not, in the earliest times, committed to them; and where the terms κηρύσσειν and κήρυγμα are applied to them, and the deacon is called κήρυξ (or PRÆCO), it is to be understood of his calling the congregation to prayer, giving notice of the various stages of the service and such like. It was noted as a thing unusual even among the Arians that Leontius, the (Arian) bishop of Antioch, permitted Aetius, a deacon, to preach publicly in the church (Philostorg. Hist. lib. iii. c. 17). Yet great numbers of sermons and similar discourses are extant from the pen of Ephrem Syrus of Edessa (d. A.D. 399), who was never more than a deacon; and we must apparently conclude that these were preached, and that we have here another exception to the ordinary rule. The Com. in Ephes. already quoted, asserts positively "nunc neque diaconi in populo prædicant." At a later period in the West, the council of Vaison (A.D. 529) gave permission in a canon to deacons to read "the homilies of the holy fathers," when the priest was prevented by sickness from preaching (can. 2). And it is said of Caesarius of Arles in his Life that when himself unable to preach through sickness and age, he appointed not only presbyters but also deacons to do so. But the context shews (cap. 28) that they were merely to read discourses or homilies "Ambrosii, Augustini, seu parvitatibus meae vel quorumcunque Doctorum Catholicorum."

It may, however, safely be said that deacons were as a rule confined to reading, and were not suffered to preach; and that this rule was not broken through except in rare and unfrequent instances.

VI. It would seem that monks or other laymen were sometimes permitted to preach. Eusebius (Hist. lib. vi. c. 19) relates the well-known case of Origen, who, while a layman, was requested by Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, to preach before him; and Alexander defended this, when challenged, as a well-known practice when a layman was well qualified to preach. In doing so, he quotes the instances, otherwise unknown to us, of Euelpis at Larandæ, bidden to preach by the bishop Neon; of Paulinus at Iconium, and of Theodorus at Synnada. This freedom does not appear, however, to have existed in the West. We find pope Leo, in an epistle to Maximus, bishop of Antioch, telling him that monks or other laymen, however learned, should not be allowed to usurp the right of teaching or preaching, but only the priests of the Lord (Ep. 60 or 62). But the very caution would seem to shew the existence of such a practice; and doubtless monks at all events, who were capable of preaching and expounding Scripture, would habitually do so in their own communities. With respect to this practice, nevertheless, St. Jerome writes: "Monachus non docentis, sed plangentis, habet officium" (Ep. 55 ad Ripar.), and in the epistle to Heliodorus, "Alia monachorum est causa, alia clericorum: clerici pascunt oves, ego pascor."

VII. It was not at all uncommon in large churches having many clergy, or at times when bishops were assembled, to have several sermons preached one after another, in the same assembly; the bishop, if there were one present, or the person of greatest dignity, coming last. We find in the so-called Apostolical Constitutions the following rule, which no doubt represents the practice of the period when it was written: "When the gospel is read, let the presbyters one by one, but not all, speak the word of exhortation to the people, and last of all the bishop, who is the governor or pilot of the ship" (lib. ii. c. 57). And it is clear from various allusions in the discourses of St. John Chrysostom, preached by him at Antioch while still a presbyter, that the bishop was to preach after him, as when he says: "It is now time for me to keep silence, that our master may have time to speak" (Hom. 2, de Verbis Esai. tom. iii). St. Jerome, writing to Pammachius, mentions an instance when two bishops, Epiphanius and John, bishop of Jerusalem, had preached one after the other in the church at Jerusalem (Ep. 61, cap. 4).

There are many decrees of ancient councils enforcing the duty of frequent preaching, and directing when and how often sermons should be preached. The eleventh council at Toledo recommended to bishops diligently to fit themselves by reading and study for the discharge of this duty: "ut qui officium prædicationis suscepimus, nullis curis a divinâ lectione privemur. Isidore, bishop of Seville (d. 636 A.D.), in his work on "Ecclesiastical Offices," lays down that to a bishop the knowledge of Scripture is necessary because he has to labour in preaching. The Trullan synod enjoined upon bishops "to preach in their churches every day, or at least on Sundays, teaching all the clergy and people with pious and orthodox discourse, collecting out of the divine Scriptures knowledge and right judgments. And if controversy should arise about the Scripture, they should interpret it no otherwise than as the lights and doctors of the church have expounded it in their writings" (can. 19). A letter from St. Boniface, archbishop of Mentz (d. 754 A.D.), not long after explains sufficiently his idea of the importance of preaching as a duty of the clergy: "Lullum constituere faciatis Praedicatorum et doctorem Presbyterorum et Populorum. Spero quod in illo habeant Presbyteri Magistrum, et Monachi regularem doctorem, et populi Christiani fidelem Praedicatorum et Pastorem." Still more emphatic is the second canon of the sixth council of Arles (A.D. 813): let priests learn the holy Scriptures and the canons, and let their whole business consist in preaching and teaching, and let them build up others as well in the knowledge of faith, as in the practice of good works." A council of Mentz in the same year exhorts "bishops not to fail to preach in person or by a deputy, on Sundays and festivals" (can. 25). The second at Rheims repeats this order with the additional direction, that the bishop's sermon shall be in the vernacular tongue, in order that he may be understood (can. 14, 15). And the third of Tours in a very similar canon goes so far as to require that he shall be careful to translate his discourse "in rusticam Romanam linguam aut Theoticam" for the same reason (can. 19). As in other parts of the duty of the clergy, so with this, the emperors thought it their duty from time to time to supplement and support ecclesiastical regulations by the enactments of their own secular law. The title of one of the laws in the Theodosian code issued by the three emperors, Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius, is de munere seu officio episcoporum in praedicando verbo Dei. The same law was inserted into the code of Justinian (lib. ix. tit. 29, de Crimine Sacrilégii, Leg. 1). It would be long to quote other provisions to the same effect, and we close this list with the remark that this subject was naturally not overlooked in the multifarious legislation of Charlemagne, and of his successors. These capitularies contain many provisions very similar to those already quoted. A collection of "tractatus atque sermones et omelias diversorum Catholicorum patrum," for the various Sundays of the ecclesiastical year is still extant, which was compiled by Paulus Diaconus at the command of that sovereign. [HOMILY, p. 782.]

VIII. As to the days when it was usual that sermons should be preached, the Lord's day or Sunday was the principal occasion for this, and it is thought that it was at first the only appointed day. For Justin Martyr (Apol. c. 87) seems to exclude any other days by the description he gives of the Christian worship "On the day which is called Sunday." The report of Pliny to the emperor Trajan speaks of the Christians being accustomed to meet on a stated day, "stato die ante lucem convenire" (lib. x., Ep. 97. This would be about A.D. 105). We may perhaps then conclude that the celebration of the Eucharist and with it the preaching of the sermon were invariably held on Sundays; not that they were never held at other times. And, in fact, we learn from Tertullian not many years later, that Wednesday and Friday, the "stationary days" or days of special meeting, were observed in a similar manner with celebration of the Holy Communion, and no doubt therefore with sermon, which, as we have seen, was a usual part of the Eucharistic service (De Orat. cap. 14). [STATIONS.] The natalitia or anniversaries of the martyrs were also times of abundant preaching. St. Chrysostom, in his homily on the martyrs (Hom. 65) remarks upon this, and mentions that the whole city went forth to celebrate their memory at their tombs.

Likewise the great festivals and fasts of the Christian year were naturally the occasion for the delivery of sermons. In Lent it was customary to have sermons every day. The homilies of St. Chrysostom upon the book of Genesis compose a Lenten course of this kind; and the homilies "On the Statues" were similarly preached upon every day in Lent. Pamphilus says of Origen that he was accustomed to address the people almost every day (Apol. pro Orig. tom. i.). The Apostolical Constitutions also have an order directing public prayers and preaching to be held on every Saturday also, excepting that preceding Easter day or on the Lord's day (lib. ii. c. 59). [SABBATH.] It would seem that it was the practice in the Egyptian monasteries, where there were constant services every day, for a sermon to be preached daily, and this was usually in the afternoon, "post horam nonam," according to St. Jerome (Ep. 22, ad Eustoch. cap. 15).

It was in fact a general custom to have evening preaching as well as morning upon occasions of particular devotion [compare VIGIL]. In several of Chrysostom's discourses he plainly alludes to their being preached in the afternoon: e. g. Hom. 10, ad Popul. Antioch. St. Augustine makes it clear that he preached sometimes in the afternoon as well as in the morning, by expressions which he uses: e. g. in his second sermon on Psalm lxxxviii., where he says, "Ad reliqua Psalmi, de quo in matutino locuti sumus, animum intendite et pium debitum exigit." And Gaudentius, bishop of Brescia (d. A.D. 427), refers in his Tractatus to his having preached twice on the vigil of Easter (Tract. 4). Some of the discourses of St. Basil on the Hexameron, or six days of creation, were likewise preached in the evening (Hom. 2, 7, 9). It is, perhaps, needless to multiply instances of a practice widely spread in all the churches, and naturally to be expected.

A remarkable statement is made by Sozomen (Hist. lib. vii. c. 19), that at Rome neither the bishop nor any other were known to preach publicly to the people up to his time (A.D. 440). This declaration is repeated by Cassiodorus in his Historia Tripartita, and without hinting that it is incorrect. Valesius, in his note on this passage, observes, in corroboration of Sozomen, that no sermons by any bishop of Rome are extant before those of Leo the Great. His pontificate commenced only in A.D. 440—i. e. in the same year in which Sozomen's History breaks off. There is indeed an oration delivered by pope Liberius in St. Peter's church on the Feast of the Nativity, upon the occasion of a profession of virginity by Marcellina, sister of St. Ambrose, and other ladies. But he argues (1) that this oration was not properly an ὁμιλία, or sermon, but an address and exhortation to Marcellina; and (2) that it was an exception to ordinary rule, probably to do honour to a person of high rank. Bingham's suggestion is that the homilies of famous writers might be read in place of a sermon. Perhaps, however, all that Sozomen's statement need be taken to mean is that it was not the habit to preach constantly, as in other churches; or that instead of formal sermons there were merely familiar and unstudied addresses for which the title of Sermon was not arrogated; and that the Roman church had produced no great preachers, such as Origen, Athanasius, or Chrysostom, in the East. And when we remember how few of the clergy were in the habit of preaching during the Middle Ages, and in the centuries preceding the Reformation, the statement is credible enough. Bingham's argument, from the expressions of Justin Martyr in his Apology, does not seem to be of much weight, since Justin was essentially Greek by birth, long residence, culture, and experience; and it is by no means certain that in the passage in question he is describing the services of the Roman church.

IX. Sermons were commonly written, but occasionally preached ex tempore. Origen was a distinguished instance of the latter practice. Eusebius (Hist. lib. vi. c. 36) relates, however, that it was not until he was sixty years of age that he ventured to preach unwritten sermons in the churches; and these were taken down by ταχυγράφοι, or shorthand writers. It is related by Sozomen concerning St. Chrysostom upon his return from banishment, that he was obliged by the people to go into the great church, and deliver to them an extemporal discourse, "καὶ σχέδιόν τινα διεξήλαθε λόγον" (Hist. lib. viii. 18). And in many of his sermons still extant, we have allusions to incidents taking place during the delivery of them, sufficient to prove that the prepared sermon had been embroidered by the preacher's ready eloquence with these spontaneous additions. The historian Socrates (H. E. vii. 2) relates of Atticus, afterwards bishop of Constantinople, that though, whilst he was in the order of presbyters, he used to preach from memory discourses which he had previously prepared, yet afterwards, having acquired confidence by industry and practice, he began a course of extempore (ἐξ αὐτοσχέδιου) and more popular preaching. Ruffinus says in his History (lib. ii. cap. 9) of Gregory Nazianzen and St. Basil, that there were noble monuments of their ability extant in the sermons which they spoke ex tempore in the churches; but it is doubtful whether he means anything more than memoriter. This remark cannot, however, apply to that passage in a letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (died A.D. 482) to Faustus, bishop of Reggio, in which he refers to "praedicationes tuas, nunc repentinas, nunc cum ratio poposcerit clucubratus," where the distinction between the two classes of sermons is clearly expressed. It is evident that to preach in this unprepared manner was a matter of frequent occurrence with St. Augustine. In one of his sermons on the Psalms (Hom. Ps. lxxxvi.) he intimates that it had been prescribed to him by the bishop then present in church. In his book De Doctrina Christiana he gives such detailed directions for the practice of sacred oratory as to make it abundantly clear that he contemplated a habit of preaching similar to that common in modern times, viz. the careful preparation beforehand of a discourse, followed by oral and unassisted delivery of it. In his treatise De Catechizandis Rudibus he gives two sermons of different lengths as models for the inexperienced preacher. Yet, however careful had been the preparation, they were wont to depend somewhat on the inspiration of the moment, and in this they considered they were depending upon the help of the Holy Spirit, promised by our Lord in the Gospel (St. Matt. x. 19, 20). There is an exquisite prayer for "a humble wisdom which may build up, and a most gentle and wise eloquence, which knows not how to be puffed up," preserved in the works of St. Ambrose (Orat. apud Ferrar. de Conc. lib. i. cap. 8), which he is said to have habitually used before preaching; but it does not appear whether privately or not. But these quotations might be increased to any number, for the habit of commencing the sermon with a prayer was a constant one among the later fathers.

Another preface to the sermon which was commonly used was known as the Pax, "Peace be unto you," to which the congregation would reply, "And with thy spirit." This was called in Greek πρόσρησις, the address or salutation; but St. Chrysostom speaks of it as the Peace, Ἀντιδόντες τῷ δίδοντι τὴν εἰρήνην (Hom. iii. in Coloss.).

It was not uncommon to use a short prayer before the sermon, but there does not appear to have been any prescribed form for this. It was a matter of individual choice; and from the various specimens of such prayers which are now extant, they would seem to be very similar to those which are frequently embodied by modern preachers in the exordium of the sermon. Thus in the commencement of one of St. Augustine's homilies upon the Psalms, we find "attendite ad Psalmum; det nobis Dominus aperire mysteria quae hic continentur" (in Psal. xc.). A similar but longer one occurs in Psal. cxxxix. "Adjuvet [Dominus] orationibus vestris, ut ea dicam quae oportet me dicere et vos audire" (Comp. also De Catechizandis Rudibus, cap. 4 and Hom. in Psal. cxlvii.). St. Chrysostom also says, "First prayers and then the word, Πρότερον εὐχή καὶ τότε λόγος, Hom. xxviii.; but is here probably referring to the general prayers, perhaps of the Ante-Communion office, which, at all events, usually and preferably preceded the sermon (Constit. lib. viii. cap. 5).

X. The text was always taken out of some part of the Scriptures; but it appears from some homilies of St. Chrysostom that preachers would sometimes dispense altogether with a text. The subjects, however, were always of a serious and religious nature. St. Gregory Nazianzen, in his first Orat. Apol. de Fugá, gives a list of these, which includes the chief doctrines of the Christian faith; and St. Chrysostom gives a not dissimilar one (Hom. 24, de Bapt. Christ. tom. i.).

doubt, the great bulk of the popular preaching remained comparatively unchanged. Of this period Origen, Tertullian, Athanasius, and Jerome may be taken as representatives. By the end of the 4th century, however, the rhetoric of the schools has completely made its way into the pulpit; and in the brilliant group of Christian orators who flourished at that period, St. John Chrysostom, the two Gregories, of Nazianzus and of Nyssa, and St. Basil, we have the typical examples of a greatly altered style of Christian preaching. About this time it became usual to preach sitting in the ambo instead of in the more distant cathedra, in order to be better heard. The custom of applauding the preacher by clapping the hands and stamping the feet (κρότος) extended itself by degrees into the church, and shewed the great change which had passed over the habits of Christians. St. Chrysostom is said to have inveighed against this objectionable custom in an eloquent sermon, which was loudly applauded. Rhetoric, in fact, speedily passed into mere unreal and factitious artifice in that luxurious age, and the sermon seems to have in some places sunk to be little higher than an intellectual exercise. Accordingly, in Constantinople and other great cities, popular preachers were loaded with rewards, with fame, and it would seem with recompense of a more substantial kind. The historian Socrates (Hist. lib. vi. cap. 11) tells a story of a certain bishop from Ptolemais, Antioch by name, who was very famous for his eloquence, and having come to Constantinople and preached in a great many churches there, obtained by so doing a large sum of money, and then returned home. Possibly this prevalent secularity of tone into which the practice of preaching had fallen, may not be unconnected with the disuse of it in the Roman church, and it would seem throughout great part of Western Europe, where at this time a much greater simplicity of manners and even ignorance prevailed. Here, however, Hilary, bishop of Arles (d. A.D. 449), was renowned for his preaching, which seems to have been in some respects a return to a higher and purer type of pastoral address. It is, nevertheless, too much like the inflated compliment of the previous century, when we are told by a contemporary: "Si Augustinus post Hilarium fuisset, judicaretur inferior." The writer of his life gives the following account of his preaching:—"Temporalis vero ejus praedicatione, quantum flumen eloquentiae habuerit, quas sententiarum gemmas sculperit, aurum superiorum sensuum reperit, argentum splendidis eloqui abundaverit, descriptionum varias picturas, et rhetoricos colores expresserit, ferrum spiritualis gladii acumen in truncandis haereticorum venenatis erroribus exercuerit, non dicam dicere, sed ne cogitare me posse protestor; sedilibus prae paratis in jejuniis ab hora diei septima usque in ejus decimam epulis plebem spiritalibus saginabat, pascendo esurire cogebat, esurientes nequaquam pascere desistebat. Si peritorum turba defuisset, simplici sermone rusticorum corda nutriebat, at ubi instructos super venisse vidisset, sermone, vultu pariter in quadam gratia insolita excitabatur, seipso celsior apparebat; ut ejusdem praeclari doctores temporis, qui suis scriptis meriti summi claruere, Silvius Eusebius, Donnolas, admiratione succensi in hac verba proruperint, Non doctrinam, non eloquentiam, sed nescio quid super homines consecutum."

XII. When we come to the 8th century, and the beginning of the 9th century, we must conclude, if we may judge from the few specimens that remain, that there was but little preaching, and that what existed shews a singular mixture of piety and dense ignorance. It would probably be correct to say that there was little or no popular or public preaching at all; the written compositions that remain to us from that age emanated almost in every case from the monastic institutions, and were intended for use within their own walls and for their own members. On the one hand, they display considerable knowledge of the letter of Scripture, care and acuteness in reasoning upon it, and ardent, if simple, piety. On the other, the temper of the age was utterly uncritical, and accepted indiscriminately historical truth, and the most crude and incredible legends. The Homilies which are extant under the name of Aelfric (whether written by him or not, they are apparently a work of that age) afford numerous examples of this characteristic. And on the other hand, they have many passages of considerable spiritual insight and remarkable earnestness and beauty.

PREBEND. [PRAEBENDA.]

PRECARIAE, PRECARIUM, an agreement, lease, or charter (Ducange, Gloss.), by which a life interest in church property was created, 1, in return for the conveyance of an estate to the church in fee simple; 2, at a fixed quit-rent, in return for feudal services.

I. In the first case the property appears sometimes to have been given over with a bare reservation of the life interest. Thus Augustine (Sermo 356, Migne, Patrol. t. v. page 1572), speaking of one Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, tells a story of a man who, not expecting to have children, conveyed his whole property to the church, retaining merely a life interest (retento sibi usufructu); when children were born to him, the bishop, contrary to his expectation, restored the property to him. In most cases, however, the arrangement evidently partook largely of the nature of a bargain. Thus the third council of Tours, A.D. 813 (c. 51), replies to the complaints made by certain heirs, who alleged that they had been unfairly disinherited, because the property to which they had a rightful claim had been conveyed to the church under the title of "precariae," that no one ever conveyed property to the church without receiving either as much as he had given, or twice or thrice as much in the shape of life interest (usu fruc- tuario), and that, if the donor made it a condition, his children or relations were allowed to hold the property on the same terms that had been agreed on with himself. It is added that even relations who had no legal claim were habitually permitted, as a matter of grace, to hold the property which had been conveyed away from them (de qua illi jam erant per legem exclusi) if they were willing to hold it as a fief (in beneficium) from the church. This they allege to be the invariable custom and method of the church. It is probable, however, that complaints continued to be made by heirs who considered themselves unjustly deprived of their inheritance, and that such assertions were not altogether without reason may be gathered from the fact that the council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 21), found it necessary to declare in the most positive terms that no one should dare to accept "precariae," except on condition that the owner should retain a life interest in the property, and receive an annuity of twice the amount from the property of the church (si res proprias et ecclesiasticas usufructuario tenere voluerit). In case, however, the owner preferred to convey the property at once (ad praesens demiserit) he was to receive a life interest to the amount of three times the value from church property, but only for his own life.

II. The second class of "precariae" consisted of lands held from the church by military tenure, on condition of rendering certain feudal services, and paying a certain fixed quit-rent. The occasion of the foundation of these precariae is found in the proceedings of the council of Leptina, A.D. 743 (c. 2), where an edict is recited of Carloman the Elder, providing that, on account of the cruel wars then prevailing, and the necessities of the state from the invasions of surrounding nations, the church should allot some estates for the assistance of the army, to be held on lease and at an annual rent (precario et censu), on condition that the tenants should pay a rent of twelve denarii for every farm building (casatâ) to the church to which the property belonged. It was carefully provided that the estate should revert to the church at the death of the original holder, but if the necessity of the case required, or the sovereign willed it, the lease should be renewed or regranted. These leases might also be revoked even before the death of the holder, in case the church or monastery to which they belonged was in actual need.

A capitulary of Charles the Great (A.D. 779, c. 13) provides for the renewal of "precariae" already subsisting, and the granting of them in cases where they did not exist. From the wording of the capitulary it appears that there were two classes of these leases, some dependent directly on the church, and others in which the sovereign was concerned, for it directs that a distinction should be made (sit discretio) between the precariae founded by the will of the sovereign (de verbo nostro factas) and those granted by the free will of the church from its own property. Another edict (Addit. iv. § 32) further provides that those who refuse to pay their quit-rent, their tenths, and nones, or defer to seek a renewal of their leases, shall forfeit their fiefs, which shall return in absolute and perpetual possession to the church to which they belong. See also Capit. v. c. 198.

As might have been expected, the holders of these leases were engaged in a continual effort to assert hereditary rights over the estates so held, and indeed to claim them as their absolute property, on payment of the fixed quit-rent. Such claims were absolutely negated by imperial decrees. A capitulary of Charles the Great (Capit. vii. c. 104), after reciting the evils that had fallen upon states in consequence of seizing the property of the church, expressly provides that no one shall hold church lands except as "precariae"; that, on the death of the holder, they shall be delivered up to the church, and that the bishops shall elect either to receive them or to regrant them on the same conditions. It is emphatically added that the property shall be delivered to the bishops of the particular church to which it belonged, and dealt with them according to the law (canonice).

The mistrust of the bishops indicated in the careful wording of the latter provision does not seem to have been altogether unfounded. There are traces, even in the slender notices of precariae which are found in the records of councils, not only that the sovereign occasionally found them a convenient method of appropriating, with a colour of legality, the estates of the church, but that bishops sometimes used them, as leases of church property have been used in later days, to further their individual interests. Thus the council of Meaux, A.D. 845 (c. 22), apparently referring to the precariae mentioned in the capitulary of Charles the Great, above quoted, protests that the sovereign has no power to issue precepts concerning precariae created by the church (praecepta regalia super precariis ecclesiasticis fieri), and also (c. 21) decrees that certain "precariae" which had been granted by bishops who were in illegal occupation of sees which were really vacant, should be resumed, and granted, if desirable, by proper ecclesiastical or civil authority (cum auctoritate ecclesiastica vel civili). The latter expression seeming to indicate that the state had some power of granting "precariae" out of the estates of the church. The same council decrees (c. 22) that "precariae," according to ancient rule and custom, should be renewed every five years.

It was evident from these decrees that the system of "precariae" was never altogether free from unfairness and dishonesty, though there is no express mention of the abuses which it fostered in times later than our present limits. That donors of property regarded the system with at least suspicion may be inferred from the fact that gifts were sometimes made subject to the special provision that they should not be granted as precariae. Thus the second council of Vermez, A.D. 853 (c. 2), revoked the concession as a "precaria" of a certain monastery belonging to the abbey of St. Dionysius, because the donor of the property in question had made it a condition that it never should be granted as a fief or "precariae" (nec beneficiario nec precario jure distrahendum). [P. O.]

PRECENTOR, the leader of the singers in the chanting of the psalms and the other musical portions of the church service, "qui vocem praemittit in cantu" (Isidor. Orig. lib. vii. c. 11); "qui cantando voce et manu incitat, ut servus qui boves stimulo minans dulci voce bobus jubilet" (Honorius Augustod. Gemma Animæ, i. 17). Other names were ὑποβολεύς, (a prompter); φωνασκός, monitor, suggestor, psalmi pronuntiator or prænuntiator, archicantor. We find no distinct mention of this office before the 4th century. We then have abundant evidence of the custom of dividing the psalms and canticles between one leader, who recited the first half of the verse, and the people who took it up and sang the latter half, "præcinebant cantores, populus vero succinebat" (Coteler. in Constit. Apostol. note 34, p. 260). At Caesarea, we learn from Basil's letter to the Neocaesareans (Epist. 207 [63], § 3), the psalmody was sometimes antiphonal; sometimes one began the strain, and the rest responded (οἱ λοιποὶ ὑπηχοῦσι). We see that the same custom was adopted at Alexandria from Athanasius's narrative of his escape from the soldiers who were sent to apprehend him. When the church was beset with the military force, he directed the deacon to commence the 137th Psalm, and the people to respond at the close of each verse "For His mercy endureth for ever," and then quietly to disperse (Athanas. de Fug. § 34, p. 717). The custom at Antioch was the same, as we learn from Chrysostom, "He who chants, chants alone, and, though all utter the response, the voice is wafted as from one mouth" (Homil. xxxvi. in 1 Cor. xiv. § 9). A similar direction is given in the Apostolical Constitutions—"Let some person sing the hymns of David, and let the people join at the conclusion of the verses" (τὰ ἀκροστίχια ὑποβαλλέτω) (lib. ii. c. 57). Sidonius Apollinaris is evidence of the same custom in the Gallican church in the 5th century—"Psalmorum hic modulator et phonascus" (lib. iv. Ep. 11). These leaders of the chant formed a distinct class, called ὑποβολεῖς (Socr. H. E. v. 22), originally belonging to the order of "lectores" (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Discipl. c. iii. § 89), of whom, in Justinian's time, there were as many as twenty-six attached to the church of Constantinople (Justin. Novell. iii. c. 1). They were forbidden to wear an orarium (Can. Laodic. 23; Labbe, i. 1500), as being a too distinctly clerical symbol, and, on the other hand, were prohibited from singing in a secular dress (Canon 11, Bracar. II.; Labbe, v. 841). In process of time, the name praecentor became restricted in the Western church to a single person, or sometimes two persons—the Gemma Animæ, speaks of those "qui chorum utrumque regunt" (i. 74)—who had the chief regulation of the musical portion of the service, and conducted it himself, per baculum, beating time with a baton, and proclaimed from the ambo the title of the psalm (Cassiodor. Praef. in Ps. c. 2). The narrative of Beda makes us acquainted with several persons bearing this title of office, such as James, the chanter, who—"magister ecclesiasticæ cantionis juxta morem Romanum"—nobly remained in Northumbria when Paulinus fled after Penda's victory at Hatfield (Beda, Eccl. Hist. ii. 20). Stephen Eddi (Haedde), the biographer of Wilfrid, after James, "primus cantandi magister Nordanhymbrorum ecclesis" (ibid. iv. 2). Putta, afterwards bishop of Rochester, whose special skill in chanting had been derived from the disciples of pope Gregory (ibid.). Maban, the chanter of Hexham (ibid. v. 20), and, above all, John, the praecentor, archicantator of St. Peter's at Rome, sent by pope Agatho, at Benedict Biscop's request, A.D. 680, to teach the monks of Wearmouth the Roman style of singing and reading, and to arrange the yearly cycle (ibid. iv. 18), "which, in its results, affected the whole church of England" (Bright, Early English Church History, p. 314). [E. V.]

PRECES. I. While always capable of a more general meaning, this word was largely used to denote a series of short petitions, especially such as were dictated to the people by the ministers of common prayer. In this usage there was a distinction between orationes and preces, orationes being longer forms of prayer, complete in themselves, as collects. We observe the restricted use of "preces" in St. Cyprian, 253: "Fratres nostros . . . in mentem habetis in orationibus vestris, et eis vicem boni operis in sacrificiis et precibus representetis" (Epist. 62 ad Januar.). Here preces = the eucharistic litany, in connexion with which the names of benefactors were given out [LITANY, NAMES, OBLATION OF]. St. Augustine, after speaking of the several petitions of the Lord's Prayer, says, "Preces istas Jurisperitus coeli dictavit" (Serm. 114, § 5).

The preces of the West were at first always bidden or dictated by the deacon, like those of the East (thence called "diaconica"), from which they were derived. Thus, Germanus of Paris, 555, speaks of the "Levites singing the preces for the people" (Expos. Brev. Lit. Gall. c. De Prece). So Isidore of Seville, about 610: "Ad ipsum (diaconum) quoque pertinet officium preceum" (Epist. ad Leudefr. 8). But at Rome, as we infer from the language of Pseudo-Innocent, the litany was already said by the priest before the beginning of the 6th century: "De nominibus vero recitandis, antequam preces sacerdos faciat," &c. (Epist. ad Decent. c. 2.)

II. The preces were peculiarly the prayer of the people, and even of their children, as St. Chrysostom expressly tells them (Hom. 71 or 72 in S. Matt. Ev. § 4), and naturally dropped out of common use in the liturgy when the people no longer understood the language in which they were required to respond. Vestiges of them, however, remain in the ancient sacramentaries. There are two metrical litanies given for use on Easter eve in the Besançon sacramentary, found by Mabillon at Bobio, and assigned by him to the 7th century. They are preceded by the rubric. "Incipit Precis (sic) de eodem Die" (Mss. Ital. i. 319). See Notitia Eucharistica, p. 304, ed. 2.

These "preces" contain seven verses each. The same sacramentary gives, in a part for general use, three collects headed Oratio post Preceem (282), one of which refers very distinctly to the litany which originally preceded it. Two similar prayers in the Gothico-Gallican Missal retain the old headings, "Collectio post Preceem" (Liturg. Gall. 190), and "Post Prec." (251). Both pray that the people may be heard, thus implying that they had been praying. There are two similar prayers, with the heading "Post Preceem" in the Frankish Missal of the 7th century (ibid. 324-5). In two Gallican liturgies (Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 243; Miss. Gall. Vet. 359) we find for use on Easter eve sets of twelve or thirteen short intercessory prayers, each introduced by a request [PREFACE (II.)] from the priest to the people that they would pray for some object or class of persons, as for those then and there keeping Easter, those in exile and unable to keep it; for the clergy; for devoted virgins; givers of alms, &c. In a third we find only the requests—"bedes" in the stricter sense—the prayer being left to the silent devotion of the people, except that the priest says a general "Collectio" at the end (Sacram. Gallic. (the Besançon) in Mus. Ital. i. 320). In the last these bedes follow immediately the metrical litany cited above. It is obvious that the form of this office is derived from a litany as bidden piece-meal by the deacon according to the practice of the East, and of the churches of Gaul and Spain. They were probably also a substitute for such a litany. That which had been the common eucharistic litany was retained on Easter eve, after its disuse at other times (Sacram. Gelas. u. s. i. 564; Ord. Rom. i. Mus. Ital. ii. 26, 35); but it had become little more than the repetition of Kyries, and the recitals of a long string of saints' names (see examples, Miss. Moz. Leslie, 187; Martene de Ant. Ecol. Rit. lib. i. c. i. 18, Ordd. 6, 21). At this stage, I would suggest, the want of the intercessions in the old litanies was felt; and the churches in Gaul sought to restore them in another form by introducing the prefaces and collects above described.

The Hispano-Gothic preces came between the PROPHECY and the epistle; and those for the first five Sundays in Lent were retained in that place to the last, and are still so used in the liturgy as celebrated in the parish churches of St. Justa and St. Mark at Toledo (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, 94, 105, 117, 128, 139). The Ambrosian Missal still retains two sets of preces for alternate use on the second and three following Sundays in Lent. They are said by the deacon after the introit. Traces of the eucharistic preces are also found in the earlier Roman sacramentary. The heading to Missae, "Orationes et Preces," is of frequent occurrence, though the latter had disappeared (Lit. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 349, Leon.; 493, 504, &c., Gelas.). The later Gregorian corrects this by the omission of et Preces. See the various codices: Mur. ii. 7, 10, &c.; Pamel. ibid. ii. 187, 196, &c.; Ménard, Opp. S. Greg. ed. Ben. iii. 82, 96, &c.; Rocca, Opp. S. Greg. ed. Autv. 1615, v. 68, 73, &c. Allusions to the preces of the people, similar to those of the Gallican collects cited above, are frequent in the Roman. Thus: "Exaudi, Domine, supplicium preces" (Sacr. Leon. ib. i. 517); "Suscipe, Domine, preces populi Tui" (Gelas. 572); "Preces populi Tui . . . exaudi" (686), &c. Nor were these expressions rejected by the Gregorian reviser, as they were easily understood of the whole office when the proper "preces populi" had fallen out. They occur, of course, here in the collect for the day, which in the Roman rite followed the litany. See examples, Sacr. Greg. Mur. ii. 19, 26, 27, 31, 34, &c. Several of our own collects preserve this allusion to the preces. The following are among the more obvious examples: Coll. for Septuagesima (comp. Sacr. Greg. u. s. 26), tenth Sunday after Trinity (S. Gr. 169), and twenty-third after Trinity (ibid. 175).

III. The petitions dictated by the deacons for the catechumens and penitents before their dismissal were also called "preces." Germanus (u. s.) tells us, in the dialect of his day, that after the lessons "deprecarent pro illos Levitae, diceret sacerdos collecta; post prece exirent postea foris qui digni non erant stare dum inferebatur oblatio." The Hispano-Gothic preces for penitents in Lent are extant (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, 99-147).

IV. At Rome the canon in the liturgy was sometimes called Prex. Thus Vigilus, 538, after speaking of the general "Ordo precum in solemnitate missarum," says to a correspondent, Profuturus of Braga, "Ipsius canonicae preces textum direximus subter adjectum, quem Deo propitio ex Apostolica traditione suscepimus" (Nona Collect. Conc. 1470, Par. 1683, § 5; in Labb. and Hard. "ad Eutherium"). Gregory I. in 598: "Orationem vero Dominicam idecirco post preceem dicimus, quia mos Apostolum fuit ut ad ipsam solummodo orationem oblationem hostiae consecrarent" (Epist. ad Joan. Syrac. vii. 64). He had been blamed, "quia orationem Dominicam mox post canonem dici statutis" (ibid.) [W. E. S.]

PREFACE (I.). A form in every liturgy serving as an introduction to the anaphora or missa fidelium.

The Benediction.—In most offices the preface began, after the first liturgic period, with a benediction by the priest, derived from 2 Cor. xiii. 14, to which the people responded, or with the ordinary mutual salutation of the priest and people. This part of the preface cannot claim an apostolic origin, for it is not mentioned by Cyril of Jerusalem in his close account of the liturgy of his church, A.D. 350 (Catech. Myst. v. 2, 3), nor in the West do we find it in the Galasian sacramentary (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 695), nor attached to the canon as borrowed from Rome by the Franks in the 8th century (Lit. Gall. Mabill. 326), nor have I met with any reason for supposing that it had a place in any purely Gallican liturgy. Yet the benediction is very ancient in the East. St. Chrysostom, 398, alludes to it; the priest "does not touch the offering without first praying that the grace from the Lord may be on you" (Hom. i. in Pentec. 4). Theodoret, A.D. 423, thought it universal, for he calls it "the commencement of the mystical liturgy in all the churches" (Epist. 146, ad Joan. Oecon.). In the liturgy of St. James, used at Jerusalem, it appears in this form: "The love of the Lord and Father, the grace of the Son and God, and the fellowship and gift of the Holy Ghost be with you all" (Codex Liturg. Assem. v. 32). Similar expansions or variations of the apostolic benediction are found in all the Syrian liturgies (Renaudot, Collect. Lit. Orient. ii. 21, 30, 126, 134, &c.), in the Egyptian rites of St. Gregory, Coptic and Greek (ibid. i. 27, 98), in the Armenian (Neale, Hist. East. Ch. Introduct. 530), and the Clementine (Constit. Apost. viii. 12). The Nestorian liturgies, which in their more ancient parts represent those of Constantinople and Mopsuestia before the schism, are more faithful to the text of Scripture, but they read "us" for "you" at the end, and add "Now and for ever, world without end" (Ren. u. s. ii. 589, 617, 626; Missa Malabar. Raulin, 312). St. Basil and St. Chrysostom differ from St. Paul only by giving in the second clause "the love of the God and Father" (Euchologion, Goar, 165, 75). A few Eastern liturgies do not use this benediction. St. Mark and the Greek Alexandrine of St. Basil have instead, "The Lord be with you all" (Ren. i. 144, 64), the Coptic SS. Basil and Cyril, "The Lord be with you" (ibid. 13, 40).

The Mozarabic is the only Western liturgy which follows here (with its own variations) the more common oriental form: "The grace of God the Father Almighty, the peace and love of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with us all evermore" (Miss. Moz. Leslie, 4). The Milanese has, "The Lord be with you" (Ritual. SS. PP. Pamel. i. 300); and this (probably borrowed from Milan) is found in all the extant copies of the Roman Gregorian (Pamel. ii. 178; Rocca, Opp. Greg. v. 63, ed. 1615; Murat ii. 1; Ménard. Opp. Greg. ed. Ben. iii. 1; Gerbert, Monum. Eccl. Aleman. 232; &c.).

The common response to both benedictions is, "And with thy spirit." This is recognised by St. Chrysostom (u. s.): "And ye respond to him, 'And with thy spirit.'" In a few liturgies, as the Nestorian (u. s. 589, 626), and the Syro-Jacobite of Eustathius of Antioch (ibid. 235) and Jacobus Baradatus (347), the people answer, Amen. The Mozarabic is peculiar: "And with men of good will." Several versicles and responses with the kiss of peace follow before the Sursum Corda is said (Miss. Mozar. Leslie, 4, 227).

Theodoret evidently regarded this benediction as the opening of the Missa Fidelium, and we should infer from St. Chrysostom that it was a part of it, and near the beginning. In the liturgy of Milan (u. s.) it is preceded by the rubric, Praefatio in Canonem, and in some Oriental rites (the Coptic St. Basil and St. Cyril, Ren. i. 13, 40) by the title ANAPHORA, or by the rubric, "The priest says the canon" (Lit. Nestor. ibid. ii. 589, 617). It is nevertheless not improbable that originally it was the close of the former and less sacred part of the liturgy, as suggested by Mr. Trollope (Lit. of St. James, 67). This opinion derives countenance from the facts, that in the Mozarabic the peace is given (Leslie, 4); in the Armenian, the deacon utters his cry of "The doors, the doors" (Neale, u. s.); in the Nestorian, the gifts are signed (Ren. ii. 589, 617, 626); between the salutation and the Sursum Corda; and also from the response, Amen, to the former in the very ancient rite of Nestorius (626).

Sursum Corda.—The next member of the preface is Sursum Corda, "Lift up your hearts," as it is commonly given. In one form or another this is found in every perfect liturgy, whence it is reasonably inferred to be apostolic. The earliest Greek writer who quotes it, Cyril of Jerusalem, 350, has "Ἀνῶ τὰς καρδίας" (Catech. Myst. v. 3), which evinces its superior antiquity both by its simplicity and its exact correspondence to the common and earlier Latin form, Sursum Corda. To the latter, St. Cyprian, 252, is the earliest witness: "Sacerdos, ante orationem prae-fatione praemissa, parat fratrum mentes dicendo, Sursum Corda" (de Orat. Domin. 152, ed. 1690). St. Augustine: "Si in terra obruis cor tuum, erubescet; quia mentiris cum respondes quando audis, Sursum Cor." (Serm. 346, § 4). The singular cor for the corda of St. Cyprian is so frequent in St. Augustine (see also Serm. 25, § 7; 53, § 14; 86, § 1; Enarr. ii. in Psalm. 31, § 21; &c.) as to indicate a difference between the liturgies of Carthage and Hippo. A later writer, compiling a sermon from St. Augustine (Serm. 261, § 1), changes his cor into corda (Serm. 177, § 2, in App. iv. ad Opp. Aug.). Caesarius of Arles, 502, has the plural: "Dicente Sacerdote Sursum Corda" (Serm. 40, § 4). Germanus of Paris, 555: "Sursum corda ideo sacerdos habere admonet, ut nulla cogitatio terrena maneat in pectoribus nostris" (Expos. Brev. Lit. Gall. Migne, lxxii. 94).

The liturgies of Rome and Milan have Sursum Corda (u. s.). So, as we have learnt from Caesarius and Germanus above, had the Gallican; so has the Mozarabic (u. s.), but in that it is preceded by the versicle and response: "Aures ad Dominum. R. Chorus. Habemus ad Dominum." It is singular that no Greek liturgy preserves the exact words cited by St. Cyril. St. Clement (u. s.) has, "Ἀνῶ τὸν νοῦν; St. James (u. s.), "Ἀνῶ σχῶμεν τὸν νοῦν καὶ τὰς καρδίας, which latter is the form cited by St. Chrysostom (Hom. ix. de Poenit. ii. 349), and by Anastasius Sinaïta (Orat. de Sacra Synaxi, Gretseri, Opp. xi. 454). The Greek St. Basil and St. Chrysostom give, "Ἀνῶ σχῶμεν τὰς καρδίας; as do also the Greek liturgies of Alexandria (Ren. i. 64, 99). And this also is cited in the same passage by Anastasius, as if he were familiar with both forms. St. Mark (u. s. 144), gives, "Ἀνῶ ὑμῶν τὰς καρδίας. The Nestorian Liturgy of the Blessed Apostles preserves the simple form, "Lift up your minds" (Ren. ii. 589); but it is greatly enlarged and paraphrased in those ascribed to Nestorius and Theodore: "Above in the height of the highest, and in the awful place of praise, where the fluttering of the wings of the cherubims ceases not, neither is there any intermission to their hallelujahs, or to the song of Holy, Holy, Holy, of the seraphim, thither lift up your hearts" (Badger's Nestorians, 223; Ren. ii. 617, 626). One Ordo Communis of the Syrian Melchites and Jacobites is also marked by the verbosity of the nation: "Above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God the Father, be lifted the minds and understandings and hearts of us all" (Ren. ii. 21); but with one exception (Xystus, 135) all the other Syrian forms in which it is expressed, including the common St. James, give, "Lift up your hearts" (ibid. 32, 127, 146, 155, &c.). In two only the salutation and its sequel is represented by the beginning, "The love," &c. (ii. 256, 513), where the rest, including the Sursum, is doubtless to be taken from the Ordo Communis. The Coptic liturgies as translated give, "Lift up your hearts" (Bas. Ren. i. 13; Neale, 532), and "Sursum Corda" (Greg. Cyr. Ren. 28, 40), but the original Greek which here is still employed in the service ("ex antiquitatis reverentia," Ren. i. 226, 227; ii. 641) is, "Ἀνῶ ἡμῶν τὰς καρδίας (i. 13). The clause before us has dropped out of the very corrupt Liturgia Communis or Canon Universalis of the Abyssinian church (Ren. i. 513), but, from the statement of Renaudot, appears to be in all their other liturgies (226). In the Armenian it is said by the deacon: "Lift up your minds on high with the fear of God" (Neale, 530).

The response, "We lift them up unto the Lord," is noticed among the Greeks by Cyril of Jerusalem (u. s.): "Then ye answer, Ἐχομεν πρὸς τὸν κύριον." Yet it does not appear in the liturgy of Jerusalem, though found in some form or other in every other. St. Chrysostom (Hom. ix. de Poen.) cites it in the same words as does also Anastasius Sinaita (u. s. 455, 456), and this is the common reading in the Greek liturgies—in St. Clement, St. Mark, and the Greek Alexandrines, in St. Basil and St. Chrysostom. Renaudot renders the Syrian Ordo Communis (ii. 21), "Sunt ad Dominum;" and so Masius, the Syrian St. Basil (586); but the former gives the "Habemus ad Dominum" in every other Syrian liturgy, except that of Xystus, where we read, "Habemus ad Te, Domine" (135). The Nestorian liturgies: "Sunt ad [apud Malab. u. s. 312] Te, Deus Abraham, Isaac, et Israel, rex gloriæ (Beat. Apost. gloriose, Nest. pergloriose, Mal.); but Theodore (u. s.) simply, "Sunt apud Te, Deus." The Armenian (u. s.) has, "We have lifted them up to Thee, Father Almighty."

Among the Latins, St. Cyprian (de Or. Dom. u. s.), St. Augustine (Serm. 227, 345, § 4, &c.), Caesarius (Serm. 40, § 4), and others, quote from their liturgies "Habemus ad Dominum." According to St. Augustine, "quotidie per universum orbem humanum genus una paene voce respondet, Sursum corda se habere ad Dominum" (De Ver. Relig. 3, § 5). The Roman and Ambrosian liturgies give this formula, which the testimony of Caesarius proves to have been used in Gaul. The Mozarabic only has, "Levemus ad Dominum" (Leslie, 4, 227).

Eucharistia.—Another versicle is then said, properly, as in most liturgies, by the priest, but in the Armenian by the deacon. St. Cyril of Jerusalem gives it thus, Ἐὐχαριστήσωμεν τῷ κυρίῳ (Catech. Myst. v. 4); but it is not found in the liturgy of his church (St. James). It occurs in the same words in St. Clement (Const. Ap. viii. 12), in St. Basil, in St. Chrysostom (Goar, 75, 165), and in the Greek Alexandrine of St. Basil and of St. Gregory (Renaud. i. 64, 99), but St. Mark has, Ἐὐχαριστούμεν τ. κ. (144). The Armenian adds, "With all our hearts" (Neale, 530). The Coptic rites have the same as the Greek, "Let us give thanks unto the Lord" (ἐὐχαριστούμεν, 13, 28, 40). There are frequent variations in the Syrian. The Ordo Communis adds, "with fear" (Ren. ii. 21), to which Xystus adds, "and worship Him with trembling" (135). St. Basil: "Let us reverently," &c. (586; corr. 550); others: "Let us give thanks" (126, 170); but most resemble the Greek, "Let us give thanks unto the Lord" (146, 177, 187, 203, &c.); while St. James, which is used both by orthodox and heretics, agrees with the more common Western form, "Let us give thanks unto our Lord God" (31, 163). The Nestorian liturgies are peculiar. The Blessed Apostles (ibid. 589) and the Malabar (Raulin, 312): "An oblation is offered unto God, the Lord of all," which Theodore (Ren. ii. 617) and Nestorius (626) expand by long interpolations.

St. Augustine, in the Latin church, quotes the clause thus: "Gratias agamus Domino Deo nostro" (Serm. 68, § 5; similarly, Serm. 227; Epist. 187 ad Dard. § 21). This agrees with the Roman sacramentaries (Murat. Pamel. &c. u. s.). The Milanese (Pamel. i. 300) omits "Domino." The Mozarabic: "Deo, ac Domino nostro Jesu Christo, filio Dei, qui est in coelis, dignas laudes dignasque gratias referamus" (Leslie, 4). When the Gallican churches adopted the Roman canon, they took its preface with its several parts (see Miss. Franc. in Liturg. Gall. 327). Before that, the Sursum Corda, &c. were not written in their liturgies, nor do they even appear before the contestatio in the oldest sacramentary in which the Roman canon was inserted, viz. that of Bezançon (Mus. Ital. i. 279), though we learn from Germanus (u. s.) that they were not omitted. They were probably still said from memory until the suppression of the Gallican rites in the 8th century.

The response to which St. Chrysostom refers is found in nearly every liturgy. St. Cyril (Cat. u. s.) gives Ἄξιον καὶ δίκαιον. It is the same in the Greek St. James, St. Clement, the Alexandrine Basil and Cyril (all as above), and in the Coptic (Ren. i. 13, marg.). The common Greek St. Chrysostom and St. Basil enlarge it (u. s.) by a reference to the creed which in them precedes the Sursum Corda: "It is meet and right to worship the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, the consubstantial and undivided Trinity"; but copies are extant of the 9th and 10th century that retain the brief original (Goar, 99; Bunsen. Analecta Ante-Nicaena, iii. 215). The Syrians have not changed it; but the Ordo Communis (u. s.) adds a distinct clause: "O God, have mercy on us." It is preserved in all the Nestorian liturgies (u. s.); but in that of Nestorius it is followed by an exhortation from the deacon to remember the mercy of God in the redemption of man, and by the words (also said by him), "Peace be with us all." In the rest he only says after it, "Peace be with us."

St. Augustine bears witness to the practice of Latin Africa: "Et vos attestamini Dignum et justum est" dicentes, ut ei gratias agamus qui nos fecit sursum ad nostrum caput habere cor" (Serm. 227; comp. de Don. Persev. 13, § 33; de Bono Viduit. 16, § 20). This is to a letter the response of the people in the Roman, Milanese, and Hispano-Gothic liturgies (u. s.). In the Gallican it is written at the beginning of many of the contestations, without any rubrics to distinguish the parts of the priest and people, viz. "Inmolatio Missae. Dignum et justum est. Verè dignum et justum est nos Tibi gratias agere," &c. (Lit. Gall. 188, 197, &c.; 330, 371).

The Contestation.—The next part of the preface is strictly and properly, according to St. Chrysostom as quoted above, the commencement of the Eucharist. It is often itself called the Preface, partly perhaps for that reason, but more certainly because, being variable, it is the only part which appears under that title in the collections of proper prayers. The Goths of Spain called it the Illatio, either because this word, used by them in the sense of oblatio, was like the Greek anaphora, the name of the office that followed, or because it originally denoted the "illation of the gifts" (Conc. Valent. 524, can. 1) = the great entrance of the Greeks, which took place at this part of the service. "Quinta" [oratio], says Isidore of Seville, "infertur Illatio in sanctificatione oblationis, in qua etiam et ad Dei laudem terrestrium creaturarum virtutumque coelestium universitas provocatur" (De Off. i. 15, § 2). The word is once used as equivalent to preface in a collection of Roman prefates at the end of the Vatican MS. from which Muratori prints the Sac. Gregor. viz. in the rubric, "In Exaltatione S. Crucis eadem inlatio dicenda, quae et in inventione S. Crucis" (ii. 334). The Gallican churches often called this prayer immolatio, because it began the more sacrificial part of the liturgy. This may be illustrated by the rubrics, Ἀρχὴ τῆς προσκομιδῆς (Lit. S. Bas. Alex. Ren. i. 64; S. Greg. A. 99), and Ὁ ἱερεὺς ἀρχεται τῆς ἀναφορᾶς (S. Marci. 144), in some Eastern liturgies. "Immolatio" occurs in the Besançon sacramentary (Mus. Ital. i. 345), in the Gothico-Gallican (Lit. Gall. Mabill. 188, 191, 202, &c.), and in the Missale Gallicanum Vetus of Thomasius, &c. (ibid. 334, 368, 370, &c.). In the Gallican liturgies it is also called the "contestatio" for an obvious reason, viz. because the celebrant in its first words joins his testimony with that of the people to the fitness and justice of giving thanks unto God.

The Roman words of contestation are, "Vere dignum et iustum est, aequum et salutare, nos tibi semper et ubique gratias agere, Domine Sancte, Pater Omnipotens, aeternae Deus, per Christum Dominum nostrum" (Murat. Pamel. &c. u. s.); the Milanese, "Verè quia dignum et iustum est," &c. (Pam. u. s.). The Mozarabic varies: "Dignum et iustum est, nos tibi gratias agere," &c. (Leslie, 5, 17, &c.); "D. et j., vere aequum et salutare est, Domini nostri Jesu Christi adventum in mirabilibus praedicare," &c. (for Advent, 9); "D. et j., verè dignum et honorificum est," &c. (12); and so on, the clause which follows also varying. The Gallican varied also: "Verè dignum et iustum est [aequum et salutare, Lit. Gall. 191] nos tibi semper, hic et ubique (269) gratias agere [et gloriari in operibus tuis, 269] Domine," &c. (188); "Vere aequum et iustum est nos tibi gratias agere, vota persolvere," &c. (197). The Franks early adopted the constant Roman formulae with the canon, and indicated it by the same symbol Ψ (Lit. Gall. 317–319, &c.; comp. Sacram. Gelas. Mur. i. 494–496, &c.).

There is the same similarity amid variety in the Greek and Oriental rites. In the Alexandrine St. Basil the priest repeats the words Ἀ. κ. θ. thrice, and then makes a direct address to God, which begins like that of the Greek St. Basil. The more ancient Syrian rites (as St. James, St. Basil, &c. u. s.) are faithful to their Greek originals; but many of the later have no express contestatio. In the liturgy of Nestorius (ib. 627), and in the Nestorian Blessed Apostles (589), the priest prays for himself between the response and the contestation.

The celebrant next, in every liturgy, declares the reason why God should be thus glorified; in some, as in the Clementine, in the Nestorian Theodore and Nestorius, in St. Mark and St. Basil, Greek and Syrian, and some other Syrian forms, at great length. St. Chrysostom and the Armenian are here shorter than St. Basil, but longer than St. James, the original of all three. The following is one of the shorter Oriental forms: O Thou who art, Master, Lord, the God of Truth, existing from eternity, and reigning to eternity, who dwellest in the highest for ever, and lookest down on lowly things, who hast made the heaven and the earth and the sea, and all things that are therein; the Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by whom Thou hast made all things visible and invisible, who sittest on the throne of the holy glory of Thy kingdom, who art adored by every heavenly power" (Lit. Bas. Gr. Alex. in Renaud. i. 64). St. Cyril (Catech. Myst. v. 6) refers to this part of the liturgy of Jerusalem at sufficient length to show that it resembled very closely, and may even have been identical with, the preface as it now stands in St. James. The Eastern rites have no changing or "proper" prefaces.

The common Western prefaces are here much shorter than any of the original Eastern, the reason of the eucharistia being expressed in a few epithets only: "Domine, sancte, Pater Omnipotens, aeternae Deus" (Rom. Ambr.). But all the Western missals admitted many proper prefaces; and in the Mozarabic and Gallican liturgies the whole ground of the doxology is stated in the addition proper to the day, which sometimes begins with the foregoing Roman formula, but very often not. Ex. "Dignum et iustum est te auctorem et sanctificatorem jejuniis conlaudare, per quod nos liberas a nostrorum debitis peccatorum. Ergo suscipe clemens jejunantium preces," &c. (Missal Jejunii in Miss. Goth. No. 24, u. s.).

Proper Prefaces.—Though proper prefaces cannot be traced to the East, they were nevertheless very early in the West. In one for Christmas Day in the Mozarabic rite we read: "Post multa tempora in hac die, ante non multa tempora . . . nobis natus est Christus" (Leslie, 39). A "contestatio" in the Gallican fragment discovered by Mone is thought both by him and the English editors to have been written during the persecution at Vienne and Lyons in 177. This is suggested by the apparent age and the matter of the prayer, and by a comparison of it with the epistle from the Christians of those cities to their brethren in Asia and Phrygia (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 1). See Gallican Liturgies, Neale and Forbes, Miss. 5, p. 12.

The Milanese missal has above 120 proper prefaces, one for every missa. They are yet more numerous in the Mozarabic, and they appear to have varied in the several Gallican rites, whenever the other prayers varied. Hence, in the Besançon and Gothico-Gallican sacramentaries, we find above seventy. They were equally numerous at Rome in the 6th century, for Vigilius, 538, tells us that on saints' days, as well as at Easter, the Ascension, and Epiphany, "they added proper chapters adapted to the days" (Nova Collect. Concil. 1470); that is, they had a proper missa for every such day, and a missa was not complete without its preface. The so-called Leonian sacramentary, or Veronese Gelasian, must have contained more than 300; but the rule for their use is not very certain. The later Gelasian limited this profusion to Easter, Ascension-tide, and Pentecost (Murat. u. s. i. 572–606), while the Gregorian reduced the number to eight, of which two were said on Christmas Day, that at the second celebration being for St. Anastasia, and the others severally at the Epiphany, Easter, on Ascension Day, at Whitsuntide, and on the feasts of St. Peter and St. Andrew (ibid. ii. 8, 9, 16, 66, 85, 101, 131).

There were also in some rites proper prefaces for special services; as for the benediction of oil and chrism [see MISSA, x. (2)] (Sac. Gelas. Mur. u. s. i. 555, 556, 557; Sac. Greg. ii. 55); of the paschal light (Missale Goth. Mab. u. s. 241; Miss. Gall. Vet. 357; Miss. Moz. Leslie, 177; Miss. Ambros. Pamel. i. 345; Sacr. Greg. Mur. ii. 143; at baptism (Miss. Goth. u. s. 247; Miss. Gall. Vet. "Contestatio Fontis," 363; not in the Roman, Milanese, or Mozarabic; at marriage (Sacr. Gel. u. s. i. 721; Greg. ii. 245); at ordination (Sacr. Greg. 244, 427, 439).

The variable part of the canon "Communicantes," &c. is headed by the title Praefatio in the mass for Maundy Thursday (Sacr. Greg. u. s. 54), but this is by error.

The Reference to the Angelic Hosts.—In every liturgy the eucharistic preface leads up to the angelic hymn, after a reference, which is nearly universal, to the heavenly spirits by whom it was first sung. They are claimed as fellow-worshippers. "This divine saying handed down to us, which proceeded from the seraphim we repeat, that we may have communion in our hymnody with the supramundane hosts" (Cyr. Hier. Cat. Myst. v. 5). Most of the Greek liturgies here enumerate the orders of the angels. Thus St. James (who associates with them "the spirits of the just and of the prophets, the souls of the martyrs and the apostles"): "Angels, archangels, thrones, dominions, principalities, and authorities, and awful powers (see Col. i. 16), and the cherubim with many eyes, and the seraphim with six wings, who with two wings cover their faces, and with two their feet, and flying with two, shout one to another with mouths never resting, with doxologies never silent (ecphonesis), chanting with clear voice the triumphal hymn of Thy exalted glory, crying aloud, giving glory, shouting, and saying, Holy, Holy," &c. (Assem. v. 33). Compare the Clementine (Const. Apost. viii. 12), St. Mark (Renaud. i. 134), St. Basil (Goar, 165), St. Chrysostom (ib. 75), the Greek Alexandrine Basil and Gregory (Ren. i. 65, 99). See also the Coptic Basil, Gregory (ib. 13, 28, 46). Similarly, the early Syrian liturgies, St. James (Ren. ii. 31), St. Basil (586), &c. St. Chrysostom, however (Goar, 76), only names the angels, archangels, cherubim and seraphim, while the Armenian is yet more simple: "He . . . hath granted us to form part, with the heavenly host, of a spiritual company, and with cherubim and seraphim boldly to sing sacred songs, to cry, to call, and say, Holy," &c. (Neale, Introd. 534). Nor are the several orders, as in Col. i. 16, mentioned in the Nestorian liturgies (Ren. ii. 589, 617, 628; Malab. Raul. 312); though this part of the preface is long in them; but we cannot infer from these facts that they were not named in the apostolic originals; for the passage above cited from St. James is fully recognised in St. Cyril's quotations from the liturgy of Jerusalem (u. s.).

The prefaces of St. Mark and the Coptic St. Cyril, which is derived from it, are strangely interrupted by very long forms of intercession and by the reading of the diptychs, which are introduced immediately before the reference to the angelic hosts now under consideration (Ren. i. 41, 146).

In the West this part of the preface is variable. There were four forms of it in the Roman liturgy, of which the most common is as follows: "Et ideo cum angelis et archangelis, cum thronis et dominationibus, cumque omni militia coelestis exercitus hymnum tuæ gloriæ canimus, sine fine dicentes, Sanctus," &c. (Murat. Sacr. Leon. i. 312, 314, &c.; Gelas. 501, 503, &c.; Greg. ii. 8, 9, 10, &c.). For the others, see Sacr. Gel. i. 494, 575, &c., Greg. ii. 322 (Quem laudant); Leon. i. 315, Gel. 517, 554, &c.; Greg. ii. 2, 192, &c. (Per quem Te, or Per quem majestatem); Gel. i. 572; Greg. ii. 90 (Sed et supernae virtutes). These forms are found in the Gallican and Ambrosian liturgies, but often varied, and with several others; e.g.—"Ante cuius sacratissimam sedem stant angeli atque archangeli, et sine cessatione proclamant, dicentes, Sanctus," &c. (Miss. Goth. in Lit. Gall. 198); "Congratuletur innumerable multitudo angelorum exercitus, cum quibus innumerabilem gloriam tuam canimus, sine fine dicentes, Sanctus," &c. (Miss. Ambr. Pamel. i. 300). In the Mozarabic rite no preface seems in this part to follow any other. Some are very ambitious, while others are as simple. Ex. "Cum angelis atque archangelis laudantibus atque ita dicentibus, Sanctus," &c. (Leslie, 15).

The Hosanna.—Even the hosanna which followed the sanctus is included by Isidore (de Off. i. 15, § 3) in the illation ("in qua etiam ad Dei laudem terrestrium creaturarum virtutumque coelestium universitas provocatur et osanna in excelsis cantatur"); but this will be more properly noticed in a separate article on the SANCTUS itself.

(II.) A short address in which the people are taught the intention of the prayer or office which follows. The word is chiefly so used in the liturgies of Gaul. In a complete Gallican missa a preface follows the "Collectio post Precem." The collect which it precedes and explains is usually headed Collectio sequitur, but often merely Collectio [MISSA, X. (3) (c)]. It begins the Missa Fidelium, and corresponds exactly to the "Missa" of the Goths in Spain [MISSA, V.].

In certain intercessions said on Easter Eve in the churches of Gaul [PRECES, § ii.] the several prayers are preceded by short addresses which are called prefaces in the Missale Gothicum. E.g. "Oratio pro Infirmis. Praefatio. Let us beseech the God of all health, and Lord of all power for our brethren and sisters, who are afflicted in the flesh by various kinds of sickness, that the Lord will grant unto them the heavenly gift of His medicine; through," &c. "Oratio sequitur. O Lord, to whom it is an easy thing to raise the dead to life, restore to the sick their former health," &c. (Lit. Gall. 245). The Missale Gothicum has twelve such prefaces, the Gallikanum Vetus (ib. 359) thirteen, each followed by the prayer for the object announced in it.

The Ambrosian missal has a Praefatio chris-matis, in which the bishop on Maundy Thursday invites the people to pray for the benediction of the chris-m (Rituale SS. PP. Pamel. i. 341). In the Gelasian sacramentary (Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 621) the bishop begs the prayers of the congregation for those whom he is about to bless or ordain in forms entitled "Praefatio Ostiarii, Lectoris, Exorcistae," &c., and the phrase is retained in the Gregorian pontifical (ib. ii. 405, 406, &c.). [W. E. S.]

PRESANCTIFIED, MASS OR LITURGY OF. Any communion of the reserved elements might be so called; but in practice

these phrases were applied only to those public communions in Lent for which the elements had been expressly consecrated on a previous day. In the East, consecrations were forbidden from an early period throughout Lent, except on Saturdays and Sundays; in the church of Rome they were equally forbidden on Good Friday and Easter Eve; in Italy, i.e. in the province of Milan, on every Friday in Lent. Hence those who wished to communicate on those days received of the presanctified, i.e. of the previously consecrated gifts.

The East.—The foundation of the rite was laid early in the East. The council of Laodicea, probably about 365, says, "It is not lawful to offer bread in Lent, except on the Sabbath and the Lord's Day alone" (can. 49); which appears rather to state and confirm an old custom than to establish a new. In an age when communions were valued, and RESERVATION for whatever reason practised, the final result would soon develop itself; but we have no decree respecting it earlier than that of Constantinople in 691: "Let the sacred liturgy of the presanctified [gifts] be performed on all the days of the fast of the holy Forty Days, except the Sabbath and the Lord's Day, and the holy day of the Annunciation" (can. 52). The Greek liturgy of the presanctified (which see in the Euchologion, Goar, 190) was probably compiled by Germanus of Constantinople some twenty-four years after the date of the council there (Goar, 210).

Only the Greeks celebrate a proper liturgy of the presanctified. The Maronites do not even reserve on the liturgic days of Lent (Abraham Echellensis, Epist. ad B. Nilusium in Leon. Allat. de Eccl. Occid. et Orient. Consens. ad calc. 1663). They celebrated every day in Lent, except on Saturday; but the exception was only a part of their Jewish observance of that day.

The West.—Probably the earliest notice of a restriction on celebrations in the West occurs in the epistle of Pseudo-Innocent to Decentius: "It is an established fact that the apostles were in grief during those two days (Good Friday and Easter Eve), and also that they hid themselves from fear of the Jews. Nor, indeed, is it doubtful that during the said two days they fasted to such a degree that the tradition of the church holds that the sacraments of the church should not be celebrated at all during those two days" (§ 4; Hard. Conc. i. 997). The writer is stating, of course, the rule of Rome. It is probable that Easter Eve was not long thus a dies clausus; but the history of the rite is very obscure. The present rule, which only prescribes reservation on Maundy Thursday for the communion on Good Friday, was probably introduced in the 7th century. A monastic rule of that age, which appears to be in great part a translation from the Greek, says, "Let the sacraments of the altar be consecrated [on the Thursday] in a large glass paten, that when the Jews shall seek Christ for the passion on the sixth day [of holy week], He may on that day be hid in our minds" (through reception of the sacrament; Regula Magistri, 53; Holsten. Cod. Reg. ii. 406). The Gelasian sacramentary, the MS. of which is of the 8th century, directs that, after certain prayers proper to Good Friday, "the deacons go into the sacrum, and come forth with the body and blood of the Lord, left from the preceding day, and set them on the altar." The Lord's Prayer with its preface and embolism having been then said, as before other communions, "all adore the holy cross and communicate" (Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. i. 562). This procedure is recognized by the Roman Order of a Pontifical Mass, compiled (it is thought) about 730. The bishop, "when they have said Amen (after the 'Libera nos'), takes of the SANCTA, and puts it into the cup, saying nothing; and they all communicate in silence" (Ordo R. i. 35, in Mus. Ital. ii. 23). Similarly, in a monastic ordo, seemingly of about the same age: "Let the deacon take the body and blood of the Lord, which was left previously on the day of Coena Domini, and was consecrated, and put it on the altar, and let all partake of the body and blood of the Lord in silence" (Breviar. Eccl. Ord. in Thesaur. Nov. Anecd. Mart. et Dur. v. 108). The Gelasian rubric is found copied into the rites of Noyons, Rheims, Riès, and Gellone, all preserved in MSS. of the 9th century (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. 23, § 27).

It was from Rome that the Gallican church thus received the rite; for it is not found in her earlier books. The remains of the Gothico-Gallican missal (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 237-239), the Gallicanum Vetus (ibid. 349-354), the Besançon sacramentary (Mus. Ital. i. 315-318), and the Gallican lectionary (Lit. Gall. 128-133), give proper prayers and lessons for Maundy Thursday and Good Friday, but there is no allusion in them to the mass of the presanctified. Nor do we find any in the writings of Germanus, or in any other Gallican authority.

Nor do we discover any trace of it in the original office of Gothic Spain. It is not mentioned by St. Isidore (de Offic.), nor by any of the Spanish councils. On the other hand, the council of Toledo, 633, complains that "throughout some churches the doors of the basilicas were closed on the 6th feria of our Lord's passion (i.e. on Good Friday), and neither was office celebrated nor the passion of the Lord preached." The council therefore ordered—not that a mass of the presanctified should be celebrated—but that the mystery of the cross should be preached on that day, "and that all the people should in a loud voice implore the pardon of their sins"; that by this means they might be prepared for their communion on Easter Day (can. 7). The service for Good Friday, now found in the Mozarabic missal, is of a late date: "missa præsantificatorum adjecta videtur" (Mabillon, Comm. in Ord. Rom. 11; Mus. Ital. ii. lxxv.).

We have no evidence of the practice of Roman Africa later than that of St. Augustine, who refers more than once to the service for Good Friday ("solemniter legitur passio, solemniter celebratur," Serm. 218; so again 232), but gives no hint of the peculiar rite in question.

The Communion.—The mass of the presanctified originated in the desire to communicate on Good Friday, or on other days when consecration was prohibited. On Good Friday (Parasceve), says Amalarius, "the body of the Lord is not consecrated. It is necessary that they who have the wish to communicate have the sacrifice from the preceding day" (de Eccl. Off. i. 12). This was at first a general communion "ut populus qui reficiendus erahaberet in fundamentum Corpus Domini" (ibid. iv. 20). So according to the Gelasian rubric, the Ordo Romanus, and the Breviarium, quoted above, "all communicate." Yet when Amalarius (about 820) went to Rome, he found this custom already obsolete there: "In that station in which the apostolical salutes the cross, no one there communicates" (u. s. i. 15).

PRESBYTER. [PRIEST.]

PRESBYTERESS. 1. Presbyterica (rarely, and apparently later, presbyterissa) is sometimes found in ecclesiastical Latin from the 6th century and onwards for the wife of a presbyter, especially for a wife who had come under the rule which, in some parts of the Western church, made married continence compulsory. Conc. Turon. A.D. 567, c. 19, and Conc. Autissiodor. A.D. 578? c. 20, forbid a presbyter from associating with his presbyterica; S. Greg. M. Epist. 9, 7, implies that in such cases the wife went to a monastery, where, however, she did not become a monacha or adopt the monastic dress. Rather later the word is found for the widow of a presbyter (= the earlier "vidua," or "relicta, presbyteri.") 1 Conc. Tolet. c. 18, Conc. Epaon. c. 33, 1 Conc. Aurel. c. 13), viz. in Roman councils under Gregory II. in A.D. 721, c. i. and under Zachary in 743, c. 5, both of which anathematize any one who marries either a presbyterica or a diacona.

2. For the use of πρεσβυτης, presbyterica, and presbyterissa in the sense of a church officer, see WIDOWS AND VIRGINS.

PRESBYTERY (1). The part of the church occupied by priests (βῆμα, θυσιαστήριον, ἄντον, ἄβαρα, Πρεσβυτερεῖον) (Sic in Suidas) Presbyterium, Sacrarium, Sanctuarium, Altarium. (Secretarium in second council of Arles, can. 15, acc. to Martene).

According to the most ancient arrangement of churches, the presbytery was the part behind the altar which contained seats for the bishop and priests. It was early described in the West as follows: ". . . loco, ubi sacerdotes, reliquique clerici consistunt, quod presbyterium nuncupatur . . ." (Synodus Romana sub Eugenio 2 (824), ap. Ducange. Quoted as Clemens Papa i. in Labbe, vol. i. 116).

The presbytery was divided from the rest of the building by rails (κίγκλιδες, cancelli), which were meant to render it inaccessible to all but clergy (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. x. 4). That it was separated by rails ("à reliquâ aede" appears in the Roman synod under Leo IV. The first council of Bracara (can. 31) prescribes that it is "not lawful for laymen to enter the sacrarium to communicate, but only for the clerics." A Roman synod, under Leo IV., in the 9th (qu.)

century, forbids those who are not in orders to enter it. [CANCELLI; CHANCEL; CHOIR.]

In later times some ambiguity has crept in as to the use of the term presbytery, the doubt being whether it applies to a space before the altar or behind it, and whether the presbytery forms, strictly speaking, any part of the choir of a great church, or is to be carefully distinguished and architecturally separated from it. These later uses it does not belong to the present volume to discuss at length; but with regard to the precise latitude of the term in early centuries this much may be said, that no ancient passage has been found where presbytery does not mean the part of the church which contained the altar. In later times the usage of the word is certainly twofold, it being sometimes identical with choir,^a and sometimes pointedly distinguished from it. [H. T. A.]

(2) Presbyterium, πρεσβυτέριον (πρεσβυτερεῖον), are sometimes used to denote the body of presbyters taken collectively that is, as equivalent to τὸ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων συνέδριον. This use is found in the New Testament in reference to both Jewish (St. Luke xxii. 66; Acts xxii. 5) and Christian (1 Tim. iv. 14) presbyters. Other early instances are, in Greek, S. Ignat. ad Ephes. c. 2, 4; Clem. Alex. Strom. 6, 13, p. 793, ed. Pott.; Origen, Hom. xi. in Hierem. c. 3, vol. iii. p. 189, ed. Delarue; S. Basil. Epist. 81 (319) ad Innocent. vol. iv. p. 174; and, in Latin, S. Cyprian. Epist. 48 (45, ed. Hartel, p. 610); Collat. Carthag. c. 130, Migne, P. L. vol. xi. 1298. For the functions of the presbyters acting collectively see PRIEST.

(3) The same words are also used to denote the office of a presbyter. Early instances of this are, in Greek, Origen. Hom. in Matt. XV. c. 26, vol. iii. p. 690, ed. Delarue; S. Athanas. Apol. c. Arian. c. 47, vol. i. p. 131; S. Epiphani. c. Haeres. 68, 2, p. 717; and in Latin, S. Cyprian. Epist. 49 (52, ed. Hartel, p. 619), 34 (39, ed. Hartel, p. 584); Pont. Diacon. Vit. S. Cyprian. c. 3; S. Siric. Epist. i. c. 13; S. Innocent. I. Epist. 38 ad Maxim. et Sever.; 2 Conc. Hisspal. c. 5.

PRIEST or PRESBYTER. I. Names for:

(1) Πρεσβύτερος, presbyter (in inscriptions sometimes πρεσβύτερος, e.g. on a tomb at Melos of the 3rd or 4th century, Corpus Inscr. Gr. vol. iv. No. 9288; praesbiter, Inscr. Hosp. Christ. ed. Huebner, No. 67; presbiter, ibid. No. 174, 189; praesbyter, De Rossi, Inscr. Christ. Rom. No. 303, Corpus Inscr. Lat. ed. Mommsen, vol. iii. No. 755; praesviter, ibid. No. 975); in use in Egypt of the officers of a temple, e.g. at Diospolis in the time of Cleopatra, Corpus Inscr. Gr. vol. iii. No. 4717, and of the "headmen" of a village, Reuven 3me Lettre à M. Letronne sur les Papyrus grecs du Musée de Leide, p. 32, cf. C. I. G. vol. iii. p. 294; of its use among the Jews for the members both of the local courts and of the chief court at Jerusalem the most trustworthy and concise account will be found in Schürer, Lehrbuch der neutestamentlichen Zeitgeschichte, pp. 402 sqq.; that it had become a title, and was not confined to persons of advanced years is clear from (e.g.) Philo, vol. ii. p. 481, ed. Mangey (so in Christian times, S. Cyrill. Alex. in Isai. III. vol. iii. p. 55, ed. Aubert; Isidore of Seville de Eccles. Off. 2, 7, and hence Pseudo-Anacletus, Epist. ii. c. 22, explains that Christian presbyters are so called, not on account of their age, but "propter sapientiam," though he adds, "quod si ita sit mirum est cur insipientes constituantur"); it was also in use for a professor in some of the philosophical schools; cf. Schweighäuser's note to Epictet. Diss. i. 9, 10. Its Christian use begins with the N. T. e.g. Tit. i. 5, and is continued through sub-apostolic to modern times; e.g. for early references, Clem. R. 44, 5, 47, 6, Hermas, Vis 2, 4 (where Origen de Princip. 4, 11, vol. i. p. 168, preserves the Greek form, which the common Latin version renders by "seniores," the Palatine by "priores"), Papias ap. Euseb. H. E. 3, 39 (where, as is well known, the precise application of the term in both the expressions of πρεσβύτεροι and ὁ πρεσβύτερος Ἰωάννης has been frequently discussed: a convenient index to the literature of the subject will be found in the note to the fragments of Papias in Gebhardt and Harnack's Putres Apostolici, fasc. i. 2, p. 90, ed. 1878), Clem. Al. Strom. 6, p. 793, ed. Pott.; of its use among non-Catholic Christian churches, the most interesting example (which is also probably the earliest existing inscription on a Christian building) is that of the inscription on a Maronite church at Lebaba (Devil-Ali) near Damascus, dated A.D. 318, ap. Le Bas et Waddington, Inscriptions grecques et latines, vol. iii. No. 2558; that it was in use among the Arians appears from (e.g.) Victor Vitens. de Persec. Vandal. 5, 13. (2) Ἱερεῖς, sacerdos; the early instances of the use of these terms in reference to the officers who were commonly called presbyters are open to much dispute; it has sometimes been questioned whether Cyprian does not reserve them exclusively for the episcopate, but Epist. 35, vol. ii. p. 325, Epist. 40, 3, vol. ii. p. 334, clearly refer to presbyters, cf. id. Epist. 14, 3, vol. ii. p. 263, where (as in Optatus, i. 13, p. 14), even deacons are included, "presbyteris et diaconibus non defuit sacerdotii vigor;" from the 5th century onwards, there is no doubt of their common application to presbyters, e.g. Socrat. H. E. i. 27; Const. Apost. 2, 25; 8, 46 (where presbyters are ἱερεῖς, bishops ἀρχιερεῖς); 1 Conc. Turon. A.D. 461, c. 1, 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 3, 4, 10; S. Greg. M. Dial. 1, 11; so in the epitaph on pope Damasus the grades are marked "lector, levita, sacerdos," Gruter, p. 1164, 11, from a Palatine MS.; cf. the confused but important testimony of Malchus of Philadelphia, de Byzantinis ap. Corpus Hist. Byzant. vol. i. p. 55, ed. Venet. τῶν βαρβάρων ἔχων ἱερέα ὃν ἱ Χριστιανοὶ καλοῦσι πρεσβύτερον. In course of time, however, the inclusion of both for bishops and presbyters under a single term was found inconvenient, and presbyters were sometimes specially designated as secundi sacerdotes (law of Theodosius and Valentinian, probably A.D. 430 ap. Haenel, Corpus Legum ante Justinianum Laturum, No. 1183, p. 241, who quotes as his authority a Corbey MS. given by Sirmond in his Append. Cod. Theodos. c. 20, and his own paper in the Act. Soc. Reg. Saxon. Lips. 1852, 8, p. 81), or secundi ordinis sacerdotes (S. Leon. M. Serm. 48 [47], c. 1, vol. i. p. 181, Sidon. Apollin. Epist. 5, 25, p. 126), or minoris ordinis sacerdotes (S. Greg. M. Hom. in Ezech. lib. ii. Hom. 10, c. 13, where, however, deacons may be included, as they probably are, in Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 27, "inferioris gradus sacerdotes")—or simply ordo secundus (Fredegodii, Vit. S. Wilfridi, c. 8, Migne. P. L. vol. cxxiii. 987), or οἱ ἐκ τοῦ δευτέρου ὁρίων (Epist. Constant. M. ap. Euseb. H. E. 10, 5); so "presbyteros in secundo sacerdotio constitutos," Optat. de Schism. Donat. 1, 13, p. 14; so in the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals Epist. Anaclet. 3, c. 28. "Sacerdotum ordo bipertitus est, S. Innocent I. Epist. ad Decent. c. 3, "presbyteri licet sint sacerdotes pontificatus tamen apicem non habent."

The English word "priest" is the later form of the Anglo-Saxon "priost" (Cotton MS. Augustus, ii. 79, A.D. 805-831, a Kentish charter, printed in Ancient Charters in the British Museum, vol. i.) or "preost" (frequently found, e.g. Conc. Bergh. c. 7 ap. Wilkins, Councils, vol. i. p. 60; Leg. Aelfr. ibid. p. 193), the derivation of which from "presbyter" is probable, but by no means certain: in the A.-S. Chronicle, an. 661, id. Thorpe, p. 54, the MS. of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, has "maesse preost," the Bodleian MS. "preost," but Cotton MSS. Tiberius A. 6 and B. 1, have the abbreviation "prb." The A. S. "sacerd" = "sacerdos" has not survived in modern English.

II. Nature of the Priesthood, and its Relations to Bishops and Deacons.—In one of the two passages in which the word ἐκκλησία is placed by the Evangelists on the lips of our Lord, it is mentioned not merely as an assembly, but as one to which disputes could be referred, and whose decision in relation to such disputes ought to be respected. The ἐκκλησία was conceived, in short, as a court of discipline. As such it continued among Christians the functions which had come to be fulfilled by the synagogue among Jews; nor was it separated from the synagogue even in name, ἐκκλησία and συναγωγή being convertible terms not only in the LXX, but also in most early Christian writers. (See Harnack's elaborate note in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie for 1876, p. 104; and also Bickell, Geschichte des Kirchenrechts, Bd. ii. p. 14.) But the Jewish synagogue only possessed disciplinary powers by virtue of its practical amalgamation with the συνέδριον, that is, by virtue of the presence in it, though properly distinct from it, of a body of πρεσβύτεροι—a corporation or college of elders, who formed the local court for administrative as well as judicial purposes. It is therefore natural to suppose that when the Jews who became Christians met in assemblies and formed communities which bore the accustomed names, they continued in these assemblies and communities the main features of the accustomed organization. And this is in fact the case. Presbyters are found from the first in the Judæo-Christian community at Jerusalem (Acts xi. 30; xv. 2, 4, 6, 22, 23; xvi. 4; xx. 17), at Ephesus (Acts xx. 17), in the churches of Asia Minor which were organized by Barnabas and Saul (Acts xiv. 23), and in the churches which are addressed by those of the apostles who were most conservative of Jewish usages, St. Peter and St. James (James v. 14; 1 Pet. v. 1). (It must be noted as a significant fact that they are not once mentioned by St. Paul, except in the Pastoral Epistles.) It is a fair inference that officers who bore the same name in analogous communities had analogous functions, and that the Christian, like the Jewish, presbyters were officers primarily not of worship but of discipline. This inference is corroborated by the fact that all the references to them which exist in both the canonical and the extra-canonical writings of the apostolic and sub-apostolic age refer to discipline. (1) In the canonical writings, excluding of course those passages in which the reference is not to organization but to the possession of χαρίσματα, every passage in which church officers are mentioned speaks of either the exercise of authority or of the practice of its correlative, obedience. In 1 Thess. v. 12, τοὺς προϊστάμενους are spoken of as νοουητούντας; in Heb. xiii. 17, obedience is enjoined to the leaders of the community as being those who "watch for your souls;" in 1 Peter v. 1, the presbyters are regarded as shepherds, and are exhorted to exercise control, μὴ ἀναγκαστῶς ἀλλ' ἐκούσως, not as masters over slaves (κατακυριονύοντες), but as being themselves examples of the qualities which they require in others; in the Acts of the Apostles it is on questions of church discipline that the apostles and elders meet in the council of Jerusalem (c. xv.), and afterwards at the end of St. Paul's second missionary journey (xxi. 18, 25); in the Pastoral Epistles, among the qualities which are enumerated as desirable in bishops and presbyters fitness for teaching (διδασκτικός) and soundness in the faith (ἀντεχόμενον τοῦ κατὰ τὴν διδασχὴν πιστοῦ λόγου) are altogether subordinated to the possession of the moral qualities which are necessary in a moral governor, and which in the Apostolical Constitutions are expressly taken as correlative to the exercise of discipline. (2) In the extra-canonical writings of the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic age the same position is held by the presbyters, and obedience to them is similarly enjoined—e.g. Clem. R. i. 57; Ignat. ad Trall. 3, ad Magnes. 2; Polycarp, ad Philipp. 5; and the Ebionites appear to have kept up the original distinction, which had apparently become in most cases obliterated among the Jews themselves between the ἀρχισυνάγωγος, or proper officers of the synagogue, and the πρεσβύτεροι, or proper officers of the συνέδριον (S. Epiphani. adv. Hæres. xxx. 18).

Whether the institution of presbyters existed in the first instance outside the limits of the Judæo-Christian communities is doubtful. There is no evidence that it did so; the presumption is that it did not, for when St. Paul, writing to churches which were presumably non-Jewish in their character, recognizes the existence of church officers, he designates them by other names—προϊστάμενοι (1 Thess. v. 12), ἐπίσκοποι (Phil. i. 1).

i) Relations of Presbyters to Bishops.—What were the primitive relations of presbyters to bishops is a question which cannot be overlooked, and yet to which, with the evidence at present available, only a tentative answer can be given. Most probably, as the former were of Jewish, so the latter were of Gentile origin, and as the former presided over Jewish, so the latter, in the first instance, presided over Gentile communities. Hence, when the distinction between Jewish and Gentile communities began to fade away, the two sets of officers, fulfilling, as they did, analogous functions, were regarded as having equivalent rank. This point must be taken as having been conceded by almost all important writers upon the subject in both ancient and modern times—e.g. in ancient times, S. Hieron. Comm. in Ep. ad Tit. c. i. id.; Ep. 146 (85) ad Evang.; Theodoret. Interp. Ep. ad Philipp. c. i. v. 1; Ep. i. ad Timoth. c. iii. v. 1; Ep. ad Tit. c. i. v. 7; S. Isidor. Hispal. de Eccles. Off. lib. ii. c. 7; Hrabanus Maurus de Clericorum Instit. lib. i. c. 6; and in modern times, to take only writers whose tendencies are strongly hierarchical, Probst (Sacramente, p. 215); Dollinger (First Age of the Church (E. T.), vol. ii. p. 111). (The evidence upon which this opinion is based will be found in a convenient form in Bp. Lightfoot's edition of The Epistle to the Philippians, pp. 189 sqq., and in Gebhardt and Harnack's edition of Clement of Rome, ed. altera, p. 5, and of the Shepherd of Hermas, p. 25: see also Baur, Kirch. Gesch. 3te Aufl. i. p. 270. It must, however, be noted that there is a tendency in many writers to press the evidence too far, and to infer an original identity of bishops and presbyters, whereas all that can be legitimately inferred is, as stated above, an equivalence of rank.) As inter-communion increased between Judæo-Christian and Gentile communities, those who passed from one to the other tended to use the names bishop and presbyter as interchangeable; but how the two offices came to co-exist as distinct offices in the same community is the most difficult point in the whole complex question; nor does it seem possible upon existing evidence to give any other than the general answer that there was a fusion of the Judæo-Christian and the Gentile organizations, and that this fusion was a gradual one. But whether this or some other be the true explanation of the co-existence of the two offices, the fact of such co-existence must be admitted, although its universality may be denied. Out of that fact two other questions spring: (1) How was it that the relative rank of the two offices changed from one of equivalence to one of subordination; (2) and how was it that the title ἐπίσκοπος rather than any other attached itself permanently to the head of the ecclesiastical organization.

(1) To the first question many answers have been given in both ancient and modern times; when, as early as the end of the 4th century, Alerius appealed to St. Paul's language as evidence that bishops and presbyters were μία τάξις, μία τιμή, καὶ ἐν ἀξίωμα, Epiphanius, though admitting that the difference between the two orders lay only in the power of ordination (this is expressed by the contrast between πατέρας γεννᾶν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ = to ordain, and τέκνα γεννᾶν τῇ ἐκκλ. = to baptize), propounded the theory that in some cases bishops had been appointed and not presbyters, and in others presbyters, but not bishops. In either case, however, deacons were necessary, and hence St. Paul speaks sometimes of deacons and bishops, sometimes of deacons and presbyters. Assuming that Timothy was (1) a bishop, (2) a bishop in the later sense, he regards the command, "Rebuke not an elder" (1 Tim. v. 1), as conclusive proof of the superiority of the one order to the other (S. Epiphanius. adv. Hæres. lxxv. 3-6, p. 906). Almost contemporary with this was the theory of Jerome, that the episcopate rose out of the presbyterate as a safeguard against schism. At first there were several presbyters in one church, but afterwards one was elected to preside over the rest: "quod postea unus electus est qui cæteris præponeretur in schismatis remedium factum est, ne unusquisque ad se trahens Christi ecclesiam runperet" (Hieron. Ep. 146 [85] ad Evangel.). So also in his Comment. in Ep. ad Tit. c. i. "idem est ergo presbyter qui et episcopus et antequam, diaboli instinctu, studia in religione fierent et diceretur in populis, Ego sum Pauli, ego Apollo, ego autem Cephae, communi presbyterorum consilio ecclesiae gubernabantur"). Later theories on the subject are so numerous as to make the discussion of them an almost endless task; and it must be sufficient here to refer to the more important of those which have been advanced during the present century, viz. those of Rothe, Die Anfänge der christlichen Kirche u. ihrer Verfassung, 1837 (which is adopted in effect by Döllinger, First Age of the Church (E. T.), vol. ii. p. 112); Baur (1) über den Ursprung des Episcopats, 1838 (which is mainly a criticism of Rothe's theory), and (2) Kirch. Geschichte, 3te Auflage, Bd. i. pp. 272 sqq.; Ritschl, Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche, pp. 399 sqq.; Herzog über die Abfassungszeit der Pastoralbriefe, 1872; Hackenschmidt, Die Anfänge des katholischen Kirchenbegriffs, 1874.

Without here adding another complete theory to those which have been advanced already, or treading unnecessarily upon debatable ground, it may be useful to point out that in all probability the question does not admit of a single answer, and that the relations of presbyters to bishops varied widely in the several groups into which the churches of the first two centuries may be arranged. (a) The case of Jerusalem stands on a peculiar footing. The Acts of the Apostles preserve the tradition, which is confirmed by later authorities, that James had a kind of presidency over the Judæo-Christian community which existed there. The nature of that presidency is uncertain. The Clementines speak of him as "episcopus" (Recogn. i. 66), or "archiepiscope" (ibid. i. 73; so also in later times, e.g. Conc. Ephes. c. 30); but there is no contemporary evidence of his having possessed the designation, nor, even if the tradition of the 2nd century be admitted as to the possession of the designation, is there any such evidence to shew how far the relation in which he stood to the other apostles, or to the "elders," was analogous to that which existed between the bishops and presbyters of later times. The most probable conjecture is that in this case the conception of a visible head of the church arose from the belief in the nearness of the Second Advent (Gfrörer, Allgem. kirch. Gesch. i. p. 271); James, as the Lord's brother, was regarded as occupying His place until He came. It is also probable that, as Gfrörer thinks, after the fall of Jerusalem, men's thoughts turned to Rome as the centre of the Christian organization, and that the Pseudo-Petrine literature of the 2nd century, which originated at Rome, had for its chief object to impress the hierarchical ideas, of which it is full, upon the Roman mind. Even in the earlier books of the Apostolical Constitutions, which probably reflect the ideas of the 3rd century, the bishop is not only ἐρχων καὶ ἡγούμενος, but ἐπίγειος Θεὸς μετὰ Θεόν (Const. Apost. ii. 26). (b) In the larger communities, such as Rome or Ephesus, in which the influence of a single apostle had for some years dominated, it was natural that the monarchical idea should tend to prevail after the apostle himself had passed away. The existence of such a dominance is here assumed. The clearest and most recent summary of the controversy will be found in A. Hilgenfeld's article, Noch einmal Petrus in Rom und Johannes in Kleinasien, in the Zeitschrift f. Wissensch. Theologie, 1877). In such communities, therefore, there is strong historical evidence to shew that from early times there was a recognized and permanent president. But here also there is no evidence to shew the precise relation in which such a president stood to the presbyterate. It is, however, a significant fact that Irenæus speaks of the early heads of the Roman church as presbyters (in the letter to Victor of Rome in Euseb. H. E. v. 24; so of Polycarp, in the letter to Florinus, in Euseb. H. E. v. 20). (c) In the case of the churches of other cities, in which, it must be borne in mind, there is no evidence of the existence of a president or bishop until the middle of the 2nd century, it appears to be sufficient to point to the general analogy of the contemporary communities, after which in so many respects the early churches were modelled. Democratical as those communities were in the main, they still had a president. We find such a president (a) in the Greek associations, under several titles—e.g. ἀρχεπαιστής, at Rhodes, C. I. Gr. No. 2525 b. Foucart, No. 46, and at Syros, Ross, Inscr. Gr. Ined. No. 107, Foucart, No. 44; ἐπανάρχης, Diog. Laert. vi. 63; ἀρχεπαυος at Amorgos, Foucart, No. 45; ἀρχιεπιστήτης, at Delos, C. I. Gr. No. 2271, Foucart, No. 43; ἀρχισυνάγωγος (of a college of priests), C. I. Gr. 2007 f.; so also among the ἐφηβοί, γυμνασιάρχης, C. I. Gr. Nos. 274, 2885, cf. Le Bas et Wadd. No. 223; (b) in the Roman Collegia, very frequently, and under various titles, e.g. "Magister," at Rome, Orelli-Henzen, Inscr. Lat. Nos. 6010, 6011, Mommsen, C. I. Lat. vol. iii. No. 1339, id. de Coll. et Sodul. Rom. p. 106; "praefectus," at Perusia, C. I. Lat. iii. No. 3432, at Salona, i. Vid. No. 502; "patronus" (= Greek προστάτης, Plut. i. 25, which may be compared with the Christian προϊστάμενοι), e.g. C. I. Lat. iii. Nos. 975, 984, 1209.

These special circumstances of particular churches, and the general analogy of contemporary communities, seem adequate to account for the fact that towards the middle of the 2nd century, if not earlier, there was a tendency to place a single officer at the head of the ecclesiastical organization. But the question still remains, nor has it hitherto been answered, except upon purely speculative grounds, why, assuming the existence of this tendency, should this single officer have been called ἐπίσκοπος. The key to the problem, which is afforded by inscriptions which have only come to light in recent times, is one of the most important contributions of epigraphical science to early Christian antiquities. (1) At Salkhad, in the Haurān are several inscriptions which contain the word ἐπίσκοποι (Le Bas et Waddington, No. 1990, cf. No. 1990, 2298, 2412e; Wetzstein, Ausgewählte Gr. u. Lat. Inschriften, No. 47, in Abhandl. der Berl. Akad. 1863; Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature, 2 series, vol. v. part 2, p. 259). It appears from these that the officers so designated had the charge of the funds of the temple (τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ), and that out of these they had erected the building of which the most important inscription formed part. (2) In entire harmony with this is an inscription which was found at Thera. (Ross. Inscr. Gr. Ined. fasc. No. 2, 198; Rhangabé, Antiquités helléniques, vol. ii. No. 764; but in a more exact form Wescher, Revue archéologique, vol. xiii. (for 1866), pp. 245 sqq.) :—

δεδοχθαι ὁ ἀ[πο]δε-ξαμένος τὰν ἐπαγγελίαν τὸ μῦν ἀρ-γύριον ἐδανείσαι τοῖς ἐπίσκοποις
Δίωνα καὶ Μελεῖππον . . .

“It has been decreed (sc. by the community that the ἐπίσκοποι (Dio and Meleippus) shall accept the money and place it at interest . . .” This seems to shew that the ἐπίσκοποι of the Greek associations were their officers of finance. Such also were in all probability the ἐπίσκοποι of the early Christian churches. One of the most important features of those churches was that they were charitable societies. In an age which, like our own, was marked by great extremes of wealth and poverty, and under circumstances which cut off many of their members from the ordinary pursuits of life, they tended to gather round them more and more every year the poor and the dependent. They dispensed hospitality to travelling brethren, they tended the sick, and, what was probably the weightiest burden, they supported the widows and orphans of those who had died in poverty, or by martyrdom. All this required not only funds, but a dispenser of funds. It was not possible to distribute a common fund satisfactorily by means of a number of officers with equal powers, not necessarily acting in concert. A presiding officer became indispensable, and the officer so appointed was known by the title which was in current use to designate the financial officer of a community. This function of the Christian bishop continued to be a primary one, even after many other functions had clustered round his office. It is not sound to reason from the functions of bishops in the 3rd and 4th centuries to their functions in the 1st; but at the same time, the fact that the bishops were the custodians and dispensers of church funds in the later period corroborates the inference which is drawn from other data that they were so also in the earlier. (As the point is only incidental to the subject of the present article, the evidence in favour of the view which is here stated cannot be fully given; it must be sufficient to refer to the stress which is laid in the Pastoral Epistles upon the necessity of a bishop being ἀφιλόργυρος and φιλόξενος; to the fact that in Hermas (Sim. 9, 27) the bishops, who are distinguished from the ἀπόστολοι καὶ διδάσκαλοι of c. 25, are regarded chiefly as ministers of hospitality; to the fact mentioned in Justin (Apol. i. 67) that the collections of the faithful were deposited in the president (προεστώς, the title ἐπίσκοπος is not given), and that he had the care of widows and orphans and prisoners and strangers; and to the long series of ecclesiastical canons and imperial edicts which regard the bishop specially in the light of trustee of church property. The union of financial and disciplinary character in the same person has a close parallel in the curatores = λογισταὶ of the Roman municipalities under the later empire. For the authorities as to the functions of these important officers see Marquardt, Röm. Staatsverwaltung, pp. 487–490. It is a coincidence which is worth mentioning that the curator had the title of pater civitatis.

It is not difficult to see that such an officer in such communities must, from the mere nature of his position, have had considerable power. But several collateral as well as several derivative causes were at work to increase that power, and to account for the altered status of the presbyterate at the end of the 2nd century as compared with the end of the first.

1. The custodian of the church funds was also the custodian of the list of persons among whom those funds were to be divided. He kept the κανὼν or κατάλογος. [MATRICULA.] Like the corresponding lists of contemporary communities (which, however, were rather lists of contributories than of recipients), this list was probably arranged in classes, the presbyters, the deacons, the “widows,” and the “virgins,” being severally ranked together. Hence, like the Roman censors, the custodians of this list seemed to have assumed the function of determining upon the right of particular persons to be admitted to or excluded from the several classes. Hence also the bishop, as custodian of the list, was the proper officer for giving certificates of membership. When a Christian claimed the hospitality of a foreign church in his travels, or when he passed permanently from one church to another, and claimed a place on the roll of a new community, such a certificate was indispensable. The jealous care with which the right of giving it was guarded (Conc. Antioch. c. 7) shews the importance which was attached to it, and supports the inference that it played no inconsiderable part in the exaltation of the episcopate in relation to the presbyterate.

2. The presbyterate also lost ground in the 2nd century through the large development within the churches of opinions which were at variance with the general currents of apostolic doctrine. The authority of apostolic doctrine was generally admitted, and the appeal to it was not made only on the Catholic side. Gnostics, Ebionites, and Ophites, the followers of Carpocrates, of Basilides, and of Valentinus, all traced back their opinions to an apostolic source, and maintained that they were the inheritors of an unwritten apostolic tradition (cf. Iren. i. 25, 5; 30, 14; Clem. Al. Strom. 7, 13, p. 882; 7, 17, p. 900, ed. Pott.). It became necessary to distinguish the true from the false tradition, and the former was found not merely in the tradition of apostolic as distinguished from non-apostolic churches (Tertull. Adv. Marc. 1, 21, “non alia agnoscenda erit traditio apostolorum quam quae hodie apud ipsorum ecclesias editur"), but specially in the tradition which had been handed down by the heads of those churches (Iren. 3, 2, 2, "quae per successiones presbyterorum in ecclesiis custoditur;" cf. id. 4, 26, 2 (and 4, 33, 8), with the same general reference, "cum episcopatus successionem charisma veritatis acceperunt;" cf. Tertull. de Praescript. Haeret. c. 32, 26). Hence, in other churches also the chief officer was the depositary and conservator of the faith. It was safer in the hands of a single person than if it were shared by a number of persons. Thus the bishop, who had by this time begun to be prominent above the presbyters, was regarded as a sort of incarnate tradition, the pure and uncorrupted spring of apostolic truth (cf. Clem. Recogn. 3, 65, ab ipso" [sc. from the bishop] suscipite doctrinam fidei, cf. ib. 3, 61, Hom. 3, 60, 66; Ignat. ad Ephes. 3; so also in the following century, Cyprian, Epist. 69, 5, vol. ii. 402, "inde enim schismata et haereses obortae sunt et oriantur dum episcopus qui unus est et ecclesiae praest . . . contemnitur"). The coherence of this function of the episcopate with that which was mentioned in the preceding paragraph is strongly marked by Tertullian (de Praescript. Haeret. c. 20), "Communicatio pacis et appellatio fraternitatis et contesseratio hospitalitatis, quae iura non alia ratio regit quam ejusdem sacramenti una traditio."

These causes operated with different degrees of force in different communities; and it is by no means certain when the subordination of the ordo of presbyters to a single officer first became general. The evidence, whether for the existence of bishops or for their superior authority, cannot be pressed farther than the facts warrant. (a) It may be admitted, for example, that Hegesippus is a trustworthy witness, and that a presiding officer existed from the first at Jerusalem without also admitting that such an officer had the attributes which in later times attached themselves to the episcopate. (2) It may be admitted that assuming the genuineness, or approximate genuineness, of the shorter letter of Ignatius to the Romans (cf. Renan, Ignace d'Antioche, a review of Zahn and Pfeiderer in the Journal des Savants, 1874, p. 45), bishops existed as chief officers of certain churches in Asia Minor early in the 2nd century, without also admitting that they existed in Egypt or in Gaul. (3) It may be admitted that bishops existed as church officers without also admitting that they occupied in relation to the presbyterate the same position which they occupied afterwards. Irenaeus, for example, was cognizant of the distinction, but (a) in using "successiones presbyterorum," 3, 2, 2, and "successiones episcoporum," 3, 3, 2, as convertible terms; (b) in speaking of the office of "presbyteri" as "episcopatus," 4, 26, 2; (c) in applying the τοὺς ἐπισκόπους of Isaiah 60, 17, to προσβυτέρους, 4, 26, 5, he clearly implies that there was no essential difference of function between them. (This conclusion cannot be avoided by the assumption which Döllinger makes that Irenaeus uses the word "presbyteri" in an unusual sense, Hippolytus and Callistus, E. T. p. 313.)

But by the beginning of the 3rd century the organization of almost all churches had begun to conform to a single type, bishop, pres-

byters, and deacons. In some places the older organization lingered on, and there are many indications that the presbyters did not allow their privileges to be curtailed without a struggle. That struggle came to a head in Montanism, and the triumph of the episcopate over the presbyterate was by no means secure until Montanism was crushed (cf. Ritschl, Altkath. Kirche, pp. 519 sqq.). Even so stern a disciplinarian as Cyprian found some rebels against his rule (cf. e.g. Epist. 9, 11); and his quarrel with Novatus was based to a great extent upon the fact that the latter, though only a presbyter, had ignored Cyprian's claims as bishop by ordaining Felicissimus as deacon, Ep. 49 (52); Felicissimum satellitem suum diaconum nec permittentem me nec sciente sua factione et ambitione constituit.

When this type was once established, several circumstances combined to render the subordination of the presbyterate more complete. The original causes of both the rise and the aggrandizement of the episcopate still remained, but new causes became more active. Of these new causes the most important were (1) the institution of synods, (2) the assimilation to the organization of the empire, (3) the rise of the parochial system [for which see ORDERS, HOLY, III.; PARISH].

But even after these influences had begun to operate, the difference between the two orders was rather a difference of rank than of function.

The bishop was "primus inter pares" (cf. Ambrosiast. Comm. in Epist. I. ad Timoth. c. 3, 7, ap. S. Ambros. Op. vol. ii. p. 295, "episcopi et presbyteri una ordinatio est; uterque enim sacerdos est, sed episcopus primus est"); there was no function which he discharged which might not also, save only as a question of order, be discharged by a presbyter; even in his proper field of finance he was not an absolute monarch, but the executive officer, at first of the community, and afterwards of the presbyteral college; (of this there are indications even so late as Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 23, ut episcopus nullam causam audiat absque praesentia clericorum suorum; alioquin irrita erit sententia episcopi nisi clericorum praesentia confirmetur; id. c. 32, irrita erit donatio episcoporum vel venditio vel commutatio rei ecclesiasticae absque conniventia et subscriptione clericorum). The one function which Epiphanius and Chrysostom claim as peculiar to bishops is that of ordination (S. Epiphan. adv. Haer. lib. 3, tom. i., Haer. 74, 3, p. 906; S. Chrysost. Hom. 2 in Ep. I. ad Timoth. c. 3, Migne, ii. p. 553); but we have elsewhere stated the grounds which exist for believing that this was an acquired and not a primary function of bishops, and if so, it could not have been part of the original difference between them and presbyters [see ORDINATION]. In the course of the 5th and 6th centuries the subordination became more complete; but as the decrees of councils enable us to trace it step by step, its progress will be sufficiently clear from the following section on the functions of presbyters. It will, however, be convenient to give, by way of contrast to the statements of Epiphanius and Chrysostom, the elaborate canon in which the second council of Seville summed up the differences of function which had come to be recognized at the beginning of the 7th century; the canon is more important than most local canons, because the president of the council was the learned antiquarian Isidore, who is not likely to have expressed merely local customs as general rules; it may be added as an indication, that the tendencies of the council were not ultra-episcopal; that the preceding canon had restored to his office a presbyter who had been deprived by the sole authority of his bishop "sine concilii examine Episcopus enim sacerdotibus ac ministris solus honorem dare potest, auferre solus non potest." The canon in question begins by disallowing the action of Agapius, bishop of Cordova, who had frequently commissioned presbyters in his absence to erect altars and consecrate churches: it then proceeds to state in detail (1) what presbyters could not do under any circumstances, (2) what they could not do either in the presence of a bishop or without his commission; "nam quamvis cum episcopis plurima illis [sc. presbyteris] ministeriorum communis sit dispensatio quaedam novellis et ecclesiasticis regulis sibi prohibita noverint; sicut presbyterorum et diaconorum ac virginum consecratio; sicut consecratio altaris, benedictio vel unctio; siquidem nec licere eis ecclesiam vel altarium consecrare nec per impositionem manus fidelibus baptizatis vel controversis ex haeresi paracletum Spiritum tradere; nec chrisma conficere nec chrismate baptizatorum frontem signare; sed nec publice quidem in missa quenquam poenitentium reconciliare nec formatas culibet epistolas mittere. Haec enim omnia illicita esse presbyteris quia pontificatus apicem non habent quem solis deberi episcopis auctoritate canonum praecipitur; ut per hoc et discretio graduum et dignitatis fastigium summi pontificis demonstretur; sed neque coram episcopo licere presbyteris in baptisterium introire nec praesente antistite infantem tingere aut signare, nec poenitentes sine praeepto episcopi reconciliare, nec eo praesente sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Christi conficere, nec eo coram posito populum docere vel benedicere aut salutare nec plebem utique exhortari" (2 Conc. Hispal. A.D. 619, c. 7).

(ii.) Relations of Presbyters to Deacons.—The primitive relations of presbyters to deacons are hardly less obscure than their relations to bishops; but one point at least is clear, that it was a relation of superiors to inferiors in rank. Deacons appear to have been mainly out-door relieving officers, whose function was to find out and to report the circumstances of worthy recipients of church funds. They were thus brought into intimate connexion with the bishops, who were the custodians and dispensers of church funds. With the growth of the supremacy of the bishops, and also with the extension of the eleemosynary system, there was a corresponding increase in the importance of deacons. Of this there is abundant evidence in the Apostolical Constitutions, which perhaps from this point of view may be treated as a "Tendenz-schrift." For example, Const. Apost. 2, 26, the bishop sits as it were in the place of God, the deacons stand by him as the heavenly powers stand by the side of God; ibid. 2, 28; the laity are to make their requests known to the bishop through the deacons, even as we approach God through the Lord; ibid. 2, 30, as the Son is the messenger and prophet of the Father, so the deacons are the messengers and prophets of the bishop. So also in the place which deacons and presbyters respectively occupied in the ritual, the presbyters, who were only coadjutors of and concelebrant with (σύμμυσται, Διαιτ. Κλήμ. 17 [20]) the bishop, tended to be crushed out. In the "Pontifical High Mass" of those days the bishop and the deacons seemed to share the service between them. The presbyters might take the bishop's place, but when he was present they appeared to have little share in the liturgy. Even down to modern times the gospeller and the epistoler are regarded as deacon and sub-deacon respectively. It is therefore natural to find in early councils traces of a struggle for supremacy between presbyters and deacons. It is clear from 1 Conc. Arelat. c. 15, and 1 Conc. Nicaen. c. 18, that the deacons had begun to assume to themselves the place in the liturgy which was afterwards reserved exclusively for priests, i.e. bishops and presbyters (the obvious meaning of these two canons has been obscured by the interpretations of those who have viewed them only by the light of later usage, e.g. Binterim, Denkwürdigkeiten, Bd. i. p. 360; Hefele, Councils, E. T. vol. i. p. 429). But upon these assumptions these councils put an effectual check, and a few years afterwards the council of Laodicea (c. 20) made the further regulation in support of the presbyterate that a deacon must not sit in the presence of a presbyter except with the presbyter's permission (cf. SS. Apostolorum Epitimia, ii. 7, ap. Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 105, which, although Pitra speaks of the canons in general as an instance of "proterviam illam byzantinorum mentiendi pruriginem," is supported by Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 39). The rise of the sacerdotal theory, which made the same distinction between presbyters and deacons which had existed in the Mosaic legislation between priests and Levites, settled the question in the East, nor are any other conciliar regulations respecting it found until Conc. Trull. c. 7, which so far modifies the earlier rule as to allow a deacon to take precedence of presbyters when he is acting as the deputy of a metropolitan or patriarch. In the West it is clear from Jerome that the struggle was even stronger and more lasting since he is at the trouble formally to refute those who thought that a deacon was superior to a presbyter (S. Hieron. Epist. 146 [85] ad Evangel.); and although the canon of the council of Arles, and the growth of the sacerdotal theory, which have been mentioned above, prevented any revival of the claim to what were considered to be sacerdotal functions (unless account be taken of 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 15), the claim for precedence was continued, as is seen from Conc. Andegav. A.D. 453, c. 2; 1 Barcinon. A.D. 578 (?), c. 4; 4 Tolet. A.D. 633, c. 39; Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 37. It may be added that in the strenuous effort which was made by Novatian to uphold the authority of the presbyterate against the episcopate, he seems also to have endeavoured to dispense with the diaconate (cf. Coustant's interpretation of his letter, ap. Routh, Reliquiae Sacrae, vol. iii. pp. 21, 78).

(iii.) Functions of Presbyters.—The sketch which has been given of the origin of the presbyterate, and of its early relations to the episcopate, has to some extent covered the ground of the present section; it has at the same time shewn, from the great variations which took place in those relations, the difficulty of framing any statements on the subject which will hold good for more than a particular period, or a particular group of churches.

The functions of the presbyterate may be mainly grouped according as they relate (1) to discipline, (2) to the sacraments, (3) to teaching, (4) to benediction. The functions of presbyters in regard to ordination will be gathered from the special article on that subject. [ORDINATION, V. Minister of Ordination.]

(1) Discipline.—It has been mentioned above that the original conception of the presbyterate, as gathered both from the analogy of the corresponding office among the Jews, and from the words of early Christian writers, was that it had the general control of the morals of the churches, and constituted a court of discipline. The same function continued, though its relative importance decreased, even after the episcopate had attained its final supremacy, and after the officers of the church had become officers rather of worship than of government. The most significant indications of this are found in the Ordinals of the Western church; the tenor of both the addresses to the people and the prayers shews this to have been the leading element in the conception of a presbyter's functions at the time when those Ordinals were framed. Presbyters are said to be appointed to help bishops in the government of the people as the seventy were appointed to help Moses. The prayer is that they may exhibit in their own lives the virtues which they require in others. In the earliest ordinal of the later type (Missale Francorum, ap. Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vet. vol. iii. p. 450) there is only a slight reference to any other functions, but all the later Ordinals have added a prayer, or prayers, that the presbyter may "offer acceptable victims for the sins and offences of the people," and the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals (Epist. Fabrian. 2, c. 17; Hinschius, p. 163, make sacrificing the prominent function. The question of the general bearings of this function of discipline upon Christian morals is too intricate to be properly discussed here; it will be sufficient for the present purpose to treat briefly of its judicial or quasi-judicial exercise. In that respect an important distinction must be drawn between the functions of the Ordo Presbyterorum in a church acting in concert and the functions of an individual presbyter acting alone; it is the more necessary to bear this distinction in mind, as the ignoring of it underlies much of the confusion which exists in many of the discussions to which the subject of the presbyterate has given rise.

There are good grounds for thinking that in the earliest period of church history the presbyters were little more than the presidents and executive officers of the community, liable to be overruled by its voice, and bound to carry out its decisions. The most pertinent proof is the account of the judicial process in a Christian community in Tertull. Apolog. c. 39 (judicatur magno cum pondere et apud certos de Dei conspectu, summumque futuri iudicii praejudicium est si quis deliquerit ut a communicatione orationis et conventus et omnis salutis commercii relegetur. Praesident probati quique seniores, honorem istum non pretio sed testimonio adepti). But there can be no question that in time, though there may be a doubt as to the particular time, the ordo of a church (1) assumed an authority apart from the community, (2) came to consist of two elements, the presbyters and the bishop [the discussion as to the place of deacons in relation to the ordo must, for brevity's sake, be here omitted].

(a) The presbyters and bishop, acting together, formed the court to which offences against morals or church order were referred, and by which the affairs of the church generally were administered. In this capacity they formed a συνέδριον (Ignat. Epist. ad Trall. c. 3), and are designated as such even so late as the 4th and 5th centuries, e.g. by S. Greg. Nazianz. Orat. 42, 11, p. 756; S. Basil. Epist. 81 [319], p. 174; S. Sixti III. Epist. 2 ad Cyrill. Alex.; Synesius, Epist. 67, p. 208. Hence, in terms which are borrowed from similar courts under the empire, they are also spoken of as σύμβουλοι τοῦ ἐπισκόπου, βουλὴ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, e.g. Const. Apost. 2, 28, and in Latin as a "consilium" (Statt. Eccles. Ant. c. 22). And since the smallest number of persons who could form a συνέδριον among the Jews was three, one of the earliest documents which refers to ecclesiastical organization requires each bishop to appoint two presbyters, presumably to form such a court, Διατ. Κλήμ. c. 20, Pitra, Jur. Eccl. Gr. vol. i. p. 83; Bickell, Gesch. des Kirchenrechts, vol. ii. p. 122.

(b) The bishop, as head of this body, was an integral and essential part of it. His consent was ordinarily necessary to the validity of its acts. He was the officer by whom sentences were pronounced, and by whom the restoration of penitents to church privileges was effected. It is probable also that in emergencies in which immediate action was necessary he had a discretionary and quasi-independent power. But without such an emergency even Cyprian declined to act alone. He will not judge the case of the sub-deacons Philomenus and Fortunatus, and the acolyte Favorinus, since many of the clergy are absent, though in the meantime, in his capacity of finance-officer, he orders that the accused persons shall not receive their monthly allowance (Epist. 28 [34], c. 3).

(c) Individual presbyters sometimes claimed for themselves a similar discretionary power: "audio tamen quosdam de presbyteris nec evangelii memores, nec quid ad nos martyres scripserint cogitantes, nec episcopo honorem sacerdotii sui et cathedrae reservantes, jam cum lapsis communicare coepisse et offerre pro illis et eucharistiam dare, quando oportet ad haec per ordinem perveniri (St. Cyprian. Epist. 11 [17], c. 2). But the claim was disallowed. In the East the general rule was laid down that individual presbyters must not act without the bishop's consent (Conc. Laod. c. 57, ἀνευ γνώμης τοῦ ἐπισκόπου; so Can. Apost. c. 39, where Balsamon limits the rule to the administration of church funds, but Zonaras understands it of excommunication); but the penitentiaries who were appointed at Constantinople after the Novatian schism were presbyters (Socrat. H. E. 5, 19), and much later archbishop Theodore, who must be taken as an authority for at any rate contemporary usage, expressly states that "among the Greeks a presbyter may, if there is necessity, reconcile a penitent" (Poenit. Theodor. 2, 3, 8, ed. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c., vol. iii.).

In the West their powers in this respect were limited by many conciliar enactments, the repe-

tion of which, however, shews that they were not unfrequently struggled against. The earliest canon is that of Elvira (Conc. Illib. A.D. 306, c. 32), the main purport of which appears to be that a presbyter (or deacon) must not readmit a penitent even in peril of death without consulting his bishop; but the text of the canon is somewhat uncertain, and has given rise to some controversy (cf. the notes of Aubespine on the canon, printed as an appendix to his edition of Optatus, Paris, 1631; F. de Mendoza, Dissert. de Can. Conc. Illib. ap. Mansi, ii. p. 243; Petavius de Poenit. et Reconcil. Vet. Ecclesiae Moribus Recepta, c. 2, 4). There is a similar variety in the African canons on the same subject; 2 Conc. Carth. c. 4, coincides with the version of the canon of Elvira which is given above (the text as given in Mansi, iii. 694, is slightly different from id. iii. 86-7, but the purport is the same); but the African code allows a presbyter to act in similar cases without consulting his bishop (Cod. Can. Afric. c. 43). The Gallican canons agree with the latter rule; 1 Conc. Araus. A.D. 441 (under S. Hilary of Arles), c. 1. specially of heretics; so totidem verbis, 2 Arelat. c. 26; so also Conc. Epaon, A.D. 517, c. 20. Conc. Agath. A.D. 506, c. 44, 2 Conc. Hisp. A.D. 619, c. 7, lay down the converse rule that a presbyter must not readmit a penitent publicly in church; and the latter of the two councils prohibits such an action even upon the delegation of a bishop; but archbishop Theodore expresses the opinion that such a delegation was permissible (Poenit. Theod. 1, 13, 3, ed. Haddan and Stubbs), leaning herein, as in other points, rather to the Eastern than to the Western use. It may be noted as an indication of the drift of opinion and usage that the Jumièges Pontifical of the end of the 8th century (Pontif. Gemmeticense, Martene, ordo iii.) treats the receiving of penitents as an ordinary function of bishops and presbyters in distinction from deacons. The Apostolical Constitutions (8, 27) deny the right of individual presbyters to depose (καθαίρειν) inferior clerks, but allow them to suspend (ἀφορίειν) such as, being subject to their authority, deserve suspension; (the Coptic version, as translated by Tattam, c. 73, makes the distinction to lie in their having power to put out, but not power to anathematize). Whether a single presbyter had power to excommunicate in early times is doubtful: the earliest mention of such a power is probably in the Judicium Clementis, which gives summary power in certain cases of misbehaviour in church to a bishop, presbyter, or any clerk (Judic. Clem. c. 20, ap. Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 226, from Kunstmänn Pönitent. Bücher der Angelsachs. p. 176).

(2) The Sacraments; (i.) The Eucharist.—In the earliest period it is probable that in the Eucharist, as in the administration of discipline and church funds, the bishops and presbyters acted together (this practice of "concelebration" survived at Rome long after it appears to have ceased elsewhere; it is mentioned by Amalarius of Metz in the 9th century, de Eccles. Offi. i. 12, three centuries later by Innocent III., de Myst. Miss. iv. c. 25, and by many mediaeval writers). They jointly offered or blessed the offerings, and jointly distributed them to the people. In the absence of the bishop the presbyters could perform these functions without him; the power to offer or bless the Eucharistic offerings, and to give them to the people, was probably regarded as inherent in the office of a presbyter; and it may be inferred from the fact of its being the function of which an erring presbyter was first deprived Conc. Neocæs. c. 9, that it was regarded as the chief independent function of his office. Outside the city church in which the bishop and his presbyters ordinarily thus acted together, a single presbyter seems to have exercised this power without question; he might "break bread" with confessors in their prison, or as in apostolic days "from house to house." At Rome the presbyters of the several tituli, which were practically equivalent to the urban parishes of later times, were restrained from consecrating the Eucharist themselves, and used instead that which the bishops sent them; but the words of the earliest enactment respecting this, state expressly that the practice was merely designed as a mark of unity of communion, and admit that presbyters have ordinarily the right of consecration (S. Innocent I. Epist. ad Decent. c. 5). But elsewhere there does not appear to have been any restriction whatever, except those which were imposed by the general rules of seniority and precedence, e.g. Conc. Neocæs. c. 13. In time, however, there came to be restrictions of place. 2 Conc. Carth. A.D. 390 (?) c. 9, forbids a presbyter from performing his office "in quolibet loco" without the permission of his bishop. The requirement that the altar upon which he offers should previously have been consecrated by a bishop, is probably of much later date; the first positive enactments are in the Liber Pontificalis (Vit. S. Siric. c. 2), and in the Carolingian capitularies, Karoli M. Capit. General. A.D. 769, c. 14, Pertz, vol. i. p. 32; the fact that it is so elaborately vindicated by the Pseudo-Isidore (Decret. Felicis IV. ad Omnes Episcopos, Hinschius, p. 700) and also the fact that it occurs as a positive enactment, not based upon early canonical authority, so late as the 10th century, e.g. in the capitularies of Atto II. of Vercelli, circ. A.D. 950, c. 7, ap. D'Achery Spicil. vol. i. p. 403, are significant indications of its late date. In the absence of such a consecrated altar, fixed or portable, Archbishop Theodore allows a presbyter to perform mass provided that he holds the elements in his hands (Poenit. Theodor. 2, 2, 2, ed. Haddan and Stubbs).

(ii.) Baptism.—The admission of a new member into the community was in early times the work of the whole church. In the most solemn form of the ceremony bishop, presbyters, deacons, and laity, ἡ πᾶσα ἱερὰ διακονία, and πάντα τὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας πληρέματα (S. Dionys. Areop. de Eccles. Hierarch. 2, 4, where a comparison with 3, 14 shews that Pachymeres is wrong in understanding the expressions of the κλῆρος only) had each their appropriate part. In the less solemn forms of the ceremony the Eastern Church seems to have allowed either a bishop or a presbyter to preside (Const. Apost. 7, 22; so ibid. 3, 20, βαπτίζειν is a distinct and proper function of a presbyter); but in the Western Church the function of a presbyter in this respect seems always to have been regarded as delegated and not original; on this point the statements of Tertullian and Jerome leave no room for reasonable doubt; the former says, de Baptismo, c. 17, "dandi [se baptismum] quidem habet jus summus sacerdos qui est episcopus. Dehinc presbyteri et diaconi, non tamen sine episcopi auctoritate propter ecclesiae honorem;" the latter says, Dial. c. Lucif. c. 9, Op. ed. Migne, vol. ii. 164, "inde [sc. from the necessity for unity in the church] venit ut sine chrismate et episcopi jussione neque presbyter neque diaconus jus habeant baptizandi." In both East and West when the full ceremonial took place, there was a division of labour; the best account of the part of each order of clergy in the East is to be found in the treatise of St. Dionysius Areopagite quoted above: the earliest complete account of Western usage is to be found in Mabillon's Ordo Romanus, i. c. 43, id. vii. c. 11. In both of these a distinction is drawn between the immersion in water, which might be performed by deacons and even by acolytes, and the other ceremonies, of which the chief were the anointing with the chrism and the imposition of hands, which were shared between the presbyters and the bishops. If the bishops were absent, the Eastern church allowed a presbyter to do all that, if present, the bishop would have done; but although there was for some time a variety of usage in the West (as is shewn, e.g., by the fact that Gregory the Great [Epist. 4, 9, vol. ii. p. 689] reserves the final anointing on the forehead for bishops, whereas in Epist. 4, 26, vol. ii. p. 705, he allows it to presbyters), it ultimately came to be the Western rule that a presbyter might anoint with the chrism, provided that he used chrism which had previously been consecrated by a bishop, and also that he did not anoint on the forehead (S. Innocent, Epist. ad Decent. c. 3, ap. Hinschius, p. 528), but that he must not in any ease impose hands (Theodulph. Aurelian. de Ordine Baptismi, c. 17, Migne, P. L. cv. 235). In other words a presbyter might baptize, but a bishop must confirm; (it is important to note that when Photius objected to this Western usage, and asked "Whence came the law that presbyters should not confirm?" Epist. i. 13 (2), ap. Migne, P. G. vol. cii. 726, the Latins were not able to give any better authority than the Decretals and the Liber Pontificalis, see e.g. the arguments of Aeneas of Paris ap. D'Achery, Spicileg. vol. i. p. 141). When the later system of dioceses and parishes began to prevail, there was some variety of usage. (a) Sometimes there was only one baptistery in a diocese, and to it all candidates for baptism had to come. (b) But more frequently the parochial presbyter had the right of baptizing in his own parish, and such baptism by a parochial presbyter did not confer the full status of church membership until it had been followed by "confirmation." Jerome thought that the baptism was spiritually valid without such confirmation (S. Hieron. Dial. c. Lucif. c. 9), but the later view doubted this (see e.g. Poenit. Theodore, 2, 4, 4, ed. Haddan and Stubbs; Joann. Diac. Epist. ad Senar. c. 14, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. lix. 406; Isaac Lingon., can. 11, 8, ap. Migne, P. L. vol. cxxiv.), and out of this doubt probably sprang the revival of the chorepiscopate in France in the 8th and 9th centuries (Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cler. i. 5, "ordinati sunt chorepiscopi propter pauperum curam qui in agris et villis consistent ne eis solatium confirmationis deesset:" on the other hand, in the vigorous polemic against the chor-episcopate which is made by the author of the false decretals, this privilege is denied to them, e.g. Leonis Papae de Privilegio Chorepiscoporum, Hinschius, p. 628, Damasi Papae de Chorepiscopis, ibid. p. 514). (c) The parochial presbyter had the delegated right of using, but not the right of consecrating the baptismal chrism. This was the African rule, 2 Conc. Carth. c. 3 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 6 (but it appears from John the Deacon that in his time, i.e. in the 9th century, African presbyters had the right of consecrating the chrism, Epist. ad Senar. c. 8, Migne, P. L. vol. lix. 404; Mabillon, Mus. Ital. i. 2, 74), and 1 Conc. Tolet, c. 20, enacted that it should henceforth be the Spanish rule; as such it was confirmed by 2 Conc. Brac. A.D. 563, c. 19, 2 Conc. Hisp. A.D. 619, c. 7; but it is rather implied than directly stated by the Gallican councils, e.g. conc. Vas. A.D. 442, c. 3, and probably did not exist in the East (cf. Poenit. Theod. 2, 3, 8, ed. Haddan and Stubbs). Where the rule existed, the parochial presbyters were bound to obtain the chrism from the bishop once a year, usually just before Easter; so Statt. Eccles. Antiq. c. 36; 1 Conc. Tolet, c. 20; Conc. Vas. c. 3; Conc. Emerit. A.D. 666, c. 9, further enacts that he who is charged by the bishop to convey the chrism to presbyters is not to exact pay for it. (d) The right of baptizing except in emergencies was apparently not personal to the parochial presbyter, but had to be exercised in an authorized place; the Trullan council (c. 31) will not allow it to be exercised in private chapels without the bishop's authority, and the Frankish and Carolingian capitularies appear to deny the title of even parish churches to be baptisteries, unless they are expressly constituted such by the bishop; "ut publicum baptisterium in ulla parochia [i.e. diocese] esse non debeat nisi ibi ubi episcopus constituerit ejus parrochia est" (Pippini Capit. Vernense, A.D. 755, c. 7, Pertz, Legum 1, p. 24 = Conc. Vern. ap. Mansi, xii. 577; so also Capit. Ticinense, A.D. 801, c. 16, Pertz, i. p. 85).

(3) Preaching and Teaching. — The Jewish presbyters were not, as such, teachers; and since (1 Tim. v. 17) by making special mention of those who labour in the Word and doctrine" implies that some presbyters did not so labour, it may be inferred that teaching was not an inherent function of the Christian presbyterate. The Διαταγαὶ Κλήμεντος (c. 16) contemplate the case of an unlettered presbyter, and the earliest list of presbyteral functions (Polyc. Epist. ad Philipp. c. 6) treats a presbyter, wholly as a disciplinary officer; nor is there any mention of presbyters in connexion with teaching in either Clement or Ignatius. The Clementines also indicate that, whereas the bishops had to do with the doctrine, the presbyters had to do with the morals of the members of the church (Recogn. 3, 65). But the function of teaching, although not inherent in the presbyterate, was not incompatible with it. There were "presbyteri doctores" (S. Cyprian, Epist. 24, vol. i. p. 287; Acta Perpetuae et Felicitatis, ap. Ruinart, c. 13); preaching (ὁμιλεῖν) was a function from which a lapsed presbyter was deposed (Conc. Ancyra. A.D. 313, c. 1); and it is clear that the Alexandrian usage of excluding presbyters from preaching was either temporary or local (Socrat. H. E. 5, 22). It was, in short, a delegated function; it was committed to the "wiser" presbyters (S. Chrys. Hom. 3 in Epist. i. ad Corinth. Op. ed. Migne, vol. x. p. 26), and therefore, in some churches, could not be exercised in the presence of a bishop (S. Hieron. Epist. 52 [2] ad Nepot. c. 7, who objects to this exclusion; 2 Conc. Hisp. A.D. 619, c. 7). But after the establishment of the parochial system, the privileges of presbyters in parishes became extended in this and in other respects; and the Western church seems to have thenceforth counted preaching as an ordinary function of a parish presbyter (3 Conc. Vas. A.D. 529, c. 2; Conc. Cloves. A.D. 747, c. 9); so the ninth-century writers on church institutions, e.g. Hraban. Maur. de Instit. Cleric. i. 6; cf. Quesnel, Dissert. xi. in S. Leon. M. Op. c. 12).

(4) Benediction.—The Christian churches continued the Jewish practice of blessing both persons and things, and since the blessing of persons assumed a superiority in the person who gave the benediction over the person who received it (cf. Heb. vii. 7), in the Christian, as in the Jewish, assemblies, it was a function of the president. Ordinarily it was thus a function of the bishop; but, in the absence of the bishop, a presbyter might bless, whether publicly in church or privately elsewhere (Const. Apost. 3, 20; 8, 27; S. Basil. Epist. 2 ad Amphiloch. c. 27, where suspension from this function is the punishment of a presbyter who has contracted an unlawful marriage). But in the West the rights of presbyters in this respect became much restricted. In the 5th century, Conc. Regiens, c. 5, allows presbyters to give the benediction in private houses and in the country, but not in church; and early in the following century Conc. Agath. c. 44 expressly forbids a presbyter to give it in church; but 2 Conc. Hispal. (A.D. 619, c. 7) narrows the prohibition to cases in which the bishop is present, and this has continued to be the Western rule.

PRILIDANUS, martyr with Urbanus and Epolonus, three youths, who suffered with bishop Babylas at Antioch; commemorated Jan. 24. (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart. PRILIDANUS; Florus ap. Bed. Mart. PARILIDANUS, under Numerian; Mart. Rom. PRILIDIANUS.) [C. H.]

PRIMATE. The word primate ("primas") seems to have come, like some other ecclesiastical terms, from the civil law. From its first use, in which it was applied generally to the chief men of a community, it came to be used in an official sense (a) of the presidents of the Jewish communities, after the title "patriarch" had ceased, Cod. Theodos. 16, 8, 8, 29; (b) of the "decuriones" of a municipality, Cod. Theodos. 7, 18, 13; 12, 1, 4; (c) of the heads of the bureau of a provincial governor, Cod. Theodos. 9, 40, 16; 12, 6, 3, cf. Bethmann-Hollweg, Der Römische Civil-prozess, Bd. iii. p. 142. It is a probable inference from the Pseudo-Isidorian Epist. Analecti, ii. c. 26, that it was also applied in the post-Imperial organization of the West to officers who had judicial functions corresponding to those of ecclesiastical primates; but of the existence of such officers no direct trace can be found. (For the Carolingian "primates palatii," see Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, Bd. iv. 277.)

In its ecclesiastical use it is found in three senses. (The use of its Greek equivalent ἡ πρωτεύων, which is found in several Syrian inscriptions, one of which bears the date A.D. 514, Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, Nos. 8627, 8630, 8631, is here omitted, because there is no clue to its precise signification.)

(1) Its earliest sense seems to be that of seniority, whether in respect of age or of office. Leo the Great uses "primatus" of seniority among presbyters (Epist. 19 (18) ad Dorum Benevent. vol. i. p. 735). Pope Hilary (Epist. 8, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lviii. 25) transfers the power of ordaining bishops from Hermes, metropolitan of Narbonne, to Constantius, bishop of Uzez, as being "aevo honoris primas;" just as in a similar case Leo the Great (Epist. 10, vol. i. p. 641) transfers the functions of metropolitan from Hilary of Arles to Leontius, expressly on the ground of his seniority. The word was consequently used in Africa to denote the senior bishop of the province, who there held the place which in most other parts of the Christian world was held by the bishop of the civil metropolis. The exact title of this bishop was "primae sedis episcopus," and 3 Conc. Carth. c. 26 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 39 enacts that he is not to take the appellations "summus sacerdos," or "princeps sacerdotum;" but the word "primas" is used, apparently with the same meaning, in 2 Conc. Carth. c. 12; 3 Conc. Carth. 28 (in 3 Conc. Carth. c. 7 = Cod. Eccles. Afric. c. 19, there is an important variety of reading between "primatem" and "primates"); to this African usage Gregory the Great, Epist. i. 74, vol. ii. p. 559, expresses strong objections.

(2) The word is occasionally used in reference to the office or status of a metropolitan: e.g. in the dispute between the bishops of Vienne and Arles, which was settled by Conc. Taurin. A.D. 401, c. 2; in 1 Conc. Brac. A.D. 563, c. 6: so also sometimes in the Latin translations of the Greek canons, e.g. in Dionysius Exiguus Can. Apost. 35 ap. Sirmond; Codex Can. Vet. Eccles. Roman., in Ferrandus, Breviatio Canonum, c. 4, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. lxvii. 950, "metropolitani vel primatis;" in Martin of Braga, Capit. c. 4, ap. Mansi, ix. 849; and in S. Leon. M. Epist. 108 (83) ad Theodor. Forojuliens, vol. i. p. 1173 (in the plural).

(3) The title was not in ordinary use until the 9th century, and it was then applied to a new distinction which was created among bishops, chiefly by the influence of the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals. In the Eastern divisions of the empire the church had closely followed the gradations of civil rank. The provinces (ἐπαρχίαι), each of which had its civil praeses or consularis, and its ecclesiastical metropolitan, were grouped into dioceses, each of which had its civil vicarius, comes, or praefectus, and its ecclesiastical exarch or patriarch [Patriarch (2)]. But in the West each province was in almost all respects a separate ecclesiastical unit; there was no officer corresponding to the civil vicarius: there was no appeal from the provincial synod and the provincial metropolitan, except the appeal, which was oftener claimed than allowed, to the bishop of Rome. The earlier policy of the Roman see was to support the authority of metropolitans; e.g. S. Leo M. Epist. 108 (83) ad Theodor. Forojul. vol. i. p. 1173, objects to direct appeal from a bishop to Rome. But its later policy was the reverse of this: and from the 6th to the 8th centuries the influence of metropolitans visibly declined, so that Pippin consulted pope Zachary as to the best means of reviving it (S. Zachar. pap. Epist. ad Pippin, ap. Mansi, vol. xii. 326). It was accordingly revived under the Carolingians (Pippin, Capit. Verm. Duplex, A.D. 755, c. 2; Caroli Magn. Capit. A.D. 779, c. 1), and the revived office played an important part in political as well as in ecclesiastical affairs (see Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, vol. iii. p. 351 sqq.). But both the suffragan bishops and the Roman see found the metropolitans inconvenient: the former preferred a remote to a near superior, the latter disliked the exercise of ecclesiastical discipline by judges who, if supported, as they seemed likely to be, by the influence of the temporal power, might weaken its direct control over the Western churches. In addition to this there appear to have been, in the troubled times which followed the death of Charles the Great, several cases in which bishops had met with severe, if not unjust, treatment at the hands of metropolitans. The author of the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals consequently introduced into the West the Eastern distinction between metropolitans and exarchs, to the latter of whom he confined the word primate, which had hitherto been occasionally used for any metropolitan, and which he identified with the earlier Eastern equivalent of exarch, viz. patriarch, Epist. Annic. c. 3, "nulli archiepiscopi primates vocentur nisi illi qui primas tenent civitates quarum episcopos et successores eorum regulariter patriarchas vel primates esse constituerunt, nisi aliqua gens deinceps ad fidem convertatur, cui necesse sit propter multitudinem episcoporum primatem constitui. Reliqui vero qui alias metropolitanas sedes adepti sunt non primates sed metropolitani nominentur:" so Anaclet. Epist. ii. c. 26; Zepherin. Epist. c. 2; Felic. i. Epist. c. 4; Steph. Epist. ii. c. 10; Julii Decret. c. 12: so also Benedict. Levit. Capit. iv. 439, ap. Pertz, Legum, vol. ii. pars 2, p. 130; Capit. Angilramni, c. 22, ap. Hinschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isidor. p. 762. The letter of pope Hormisdas which Hincmar of Reims quotes in his controversy with Hincmar of Laon as giving a primacy to the see of Reims, with a reservation of the rights of metropolitans, resembles the false decretals too closely to be treated as genuine (Hincmar Remens. Opusc. in Causa Hincmar. Laudun. c. 16, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. vol. cxvii. 338). After this date the title was in frequent use, especially in reference to the metropolitans to whom the bishops of Rome entrusted in their respective districts the powers of the Roman see.

The functions of primates in the later sense of the term, so far as they differ from the ordinary functions of metropolitans, are almost wholly judicial. In the Pseudo-Isidorian decretals, which are the foundation of all subsequent canon law on the subject, an accused bishop who suspects the impartiality of his metropolitan and comprovincials, may claim to be tried by the primate, Clement. Epist. i. c. 29; Anaclet. ii. c. 26; Felic. i. c. 4; Zepherin. c. 2; Jul. c. 12: so also Capit. Angilram. c. 5; a primate has also an immediate jurisdiction in the case of a metropolitan who oppresses his suffragans or otherwise exceeds the limits of his authority, Annic. 3, 4; Vict. 6; and also in all "maiores ecclesiarum negotia," Clement. i. c. 29; Anaclet. ii. c. 26; Steph. ii. c. 10. But while in some passages the decretals make this jurisdiction of the metropolitan alternative with an appeal to Rome, Vict. 6, Jul. 12, in other passages they make the validity of the sentence of the primate contingent on its confirmation by the Roman see, Zeph. 2, Damas. 8, elsewhere they appear to give a final authority to the primate and his synod, Pelag. II. ad universos episcopos, and elsewhere on the contrary they ignore primates, and give an immediate appeal from the metropolitan to Rome, Felic. ii. c. 20.

(The best account of primates in the later sense of the word will be found in P. de Marca, Dissertatio de Primatu Lugdunensi et ceteris Primatibus, first published in 1644, and edited by Baluze in 1659.) [E. H.]

PRIMICERIUS. The name of these officials ["primus in ceram relatus" (Ducange Gloss.), the first entered on the wax tablet, or roll, of the clergy] sufficiently indicates their office as the head or leader of an ecclesiastical corporation. The word appears to be identical with the "primicerius," or head of the inferior clergy, of the Spanish church. (Conc. Emerit. cc. 10, 14.)

1. The office is frequently mentioned in connexion with the ecclesiastical notaries. In the council of Chalcedon frequent mention is made of Aetius, the primicerius of the notaries. In the council of Ephesus (act. 1) the task of reciting the edict of the emperor Theodosius was allotted to Peter, a presbyter of Alexandria and primicerius of the notaries. Anastasius the librarian, in his life of pope Julius, says that he caused all the records (monumenta) belonging to the church to be placed in the care of the primicerius of the notaries. In the postscript to the works of Aratus (Bibl. Patrum, t. vi. p. 700) it is said that Vigilius gave the poems in charge to the "primicerius" of the school of notaries. Gregory the Great, writing to Antoninus, a sub-deacon of Salonica, during the vacancy of the see (Epist. iii. 22), directs him to take an inventory of the property belonging to the see, and hand it over for safe keeping to Respectus the deacon, and Stephen the primicerius of the notaries.

2. A letter from Remigius of Rheims (Sermonum Conc. Gall. i. p. 205) mentions a primicerius of the lectors, "primicerium scholae clarissimae militiaeque lectorum."

3. Chrodegang, in his rules for the chapter of Metz (last chapter), speaks of a primicerius of the MATRICULARII, who was to exercise a general supervision over them, and to whom, with the archdeacon, was entrusted the distribution of their allowances.

4. They were also members of the cathedral body, with authority, apparently as the deputy of the archdeacon, over the inferior clergy. The council of Merida, A.D. 666 (c. 10), orders that every cathedral should have an archpresbyter, an archdeacon, and a primicerius; and (c. 14) divides the offerings into three parts—one belonging to the bishop, another to the presbyters and deacons to be divided among themselves, and the third to be handed over to the primicerius, and by him allotted at his discretion to the subdeacons and inferior clergy, according as he knows them zealous and diligent in their duties. Isidore of Seville, in his epistle to Ludifred, bishop of Cordova (Isidori Op. p. 413), states that the primicerius has charge of the acolytes, the exorcists, the psalmists, and the lectors. In the Ordo Romanus (tit. 25) the primicerius is said to occupy a position like that of the archpresbyter under the archdeacon, and to have special charge of the teaching and discipline of the deacons and the other inferior clergy. [CHAPTER, p. 349.]

It is certain that this office, though subordinate to that of the archdeacon, was reckoned one of trust and honour. In a letter of Pope Martin (Ep. 15) the duty of presiding over the see of Rome, in the absence of the pope, is allotted to the archdeacon, the archpresbyter, and the primicerius. A letter of John IV. to the church of England (Baronius A.D. 639, 6, 7) is signed by John himself, the archpresbyter, the primicerius, and the consiliarius, the primicerius taking precedence of the consiliarius. PRINCEPS. The bishops, as the chief officers in the Christian church, were honoured at an early period with this and synonymous designations. [BISHOP.] But according to the different idea which moulded the development of the Celtic ecclesiastical polity in the British Isles, and framed it after a monastic rather than a diocesan or purely episcopal model, these terms received a corresponding destination. The ecclesiastical unit in the early Irish church was the monastery, whose head was the abbat, the praesul, primarius, or princeps of the monastic family. Hence in the Annals of Ulster (O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Scrip. iv.) the abbat is called abbas or princeps concurrently from A.D. 681, until in the 10th century the princeps has all but superseded the abbas in the list of obits. During the 9th and 10th centuries the princeps is found occasionally as a secular prince (A.D. 808, 809, 835), but very much more frequently he is evidently the monastic head, and appears at times also as bishop (A.D. 825, 857, 873, &c.), Ferleighinn (A.D. 878) and tanist abbat at one monastery and princeps or abbat of another (A.D. 895–6, “proximus abbati Cluanae mac nois et princeps Damhinishensis”). Desgabair is “dominatrix Princeps Troeit moir,” i.e. at Drogheda (A.D. 792). But the princeps seems also at other times to have been subject, though only second to the abbat, and as exercising a certain authority in the monastery as either successor or Erenach (Reeves, S. Adamnan, 364). In the continental monasteries the princeps was usually a subordinate, as is probably intended in the Rule of S. Pachomius, “Vestimenta . . . accipiet, qui huic rei praepositi sunt, et inferentur in repositorio, et erunt in potestate Principis monasterii” (Du Cange, Gloss. t. v. 447 a). In Wales Gwengad, prince of Penaly, and Sadwrn, prince of the city of Taff, sign charters as clerical witnesses in the 6th century (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 141, 292–293), while Gwonocadwy, prince of Penaly, and Sadoc, presbyter, sign after king Morgan among the laity, though both probably clerics (Ib. 143, 395).

The monastic praepositus was of a lower rank as “habens potestatem ordinandi, abbate absente, omnia, quae abbas praesens facit” (Du Cange, Gloss. t. v. 405 a), as head of an affiliated house, under the direction of the parent house and its abbat (Reeves, S. Adamnan, 59, 60, 65, 78, 86, 127, 339); or oeconomus to the monastery (Ib. 339, 365) having charge of its secular affairs (“praepositus domus”), as the episcopal oeconomus was “praepositus ecclesiae.” They thus as oeconomi or erenachs might come by violent deaths probably in the discharge of their secular duties to the monastery (Ann. Ult. A.D. 604, 731, 813, 817, &c.). Their office was praepositatus or praepositura, and the prioress was Praeposita, sometimes Praepositissa. (Du Cange, Gloss. t. v. 404 sq.) [J. G.]

PRINCES, ALLEGIANCE TO (Hominum, Honagium, Hominatus, Sacramentum fidelitatis). It is almost superfluous to say that the general duty of obedience to the temporal sovereign was recognized by the primitive Christians as resting upon the precepts of the New Testament itself. The very remonstrances indeed which are there addressed to Christians—“Who-soever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God”—may be thought to be indicative of a spirit of resistance amongst certain individuals of the body; but the general mind and practice of the early church are no doubt correctly sketched in the boast of Tertullian (Ad Scapulam, cap. iv.), "The Christian is the enemy of no man, much less of the emperor."

But besides this general allegiance which Christians were so ready to acknowledge as due from them to the secular power, there was a submission of a more special and technical character, which was professed on the assumption of ecclesiastical office. It was not, however, until bishops so grew in temporal importance as to be formidable opponents or themselves possible rivals of a sovereign, that a formal profession of fealty could have had much significance. Hence we must not expect to find such professions recorded amongst quite the earliest annals of Christianity. In process of time a recognition of general allegiance occurs in the inscription of episcopal acts, as when Cyrus, patriarch of Alexandria, is spoken of (Conc. Trull. act. 13) as holding his position by the mercy of God and the will of the emperor. It may, however, be doubted whether this allegiance ever rested upon an oath in the East; for it was specially enacted by the emperor Justinian (Col. lib. 1, de Ep.) that bishops should never be made to swear, their simple promise being as inviolable as the most solemn oaths.

It is indeed not in the East, but in the West, and specifically in Spain, that the first beginnings of the oath of fidelity are to be sought. The Spanish monarchy, says Thomassin, was elective, and ecclesiastics were sometimes tempted to transfer to a fresh aspirant the allegiance which they had promised to the existing ruler. Hence arose the solemn oath of fidelity by which laics and ecclesiastics alike were bound to their princes. The seventh council of Toledo (cent. vii.) speaks of the oath as an accepted usage, and brands its violation as "perjurious." By the tenth council of Toledo in the same century the penalty was decreed to be deposition, without power of restoration, except by the will of the prince himself. The penalty was actually carried into effect in the case of Sisbert, metropolitan of Toledo at the close of the 7th century (Conc. Tol. xvi. can. 6).

The oath of allegiance to the temporal sovereign was not confined to bishops on their taking office. The second canon of the tenth council of Toledo (cent. vii.) enacts penalties against any ecclesiastic (religious), from a bishop down to a clerk of the very lowest order or a monk, who with profane intention violates his "generalia iuramenta in salutem Regiam gentisque aut patriae data." By this term "generalia iuramenta" it is not to be understood, as Thomassin justly remarks, that every humble clerk or monk took an oath of allegiance before the sovereign, but that at the coronation or in the senate or at the councils the bishops and superiors took the oath in their own name and in that of their inferiors. In England, however, it is impossible to forget that an oath of allegiance personally and individually administered may form one of the preliminaries of admission into holy orders.

The form of the oath is given in the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633), "Whosoever of us, or of the peoples of the whole of Spain, shall, by any conspiracy or purpose, violate his oath of fidelity which he promised for the condition of his country and the race of the Goths, or for the preservation of the king's health," &c. This formula was reiterated, and response was made by the whole clergy or people. "Qui contra hanc vestram definitionem praesumpserit, Anathema, Maranatha," &c. (can. 75). The fifth council of Toledo determined (can. 7) that this general decree for the preservation of the kings and the kingdom should be renewed in all the councils of Spain. In some subsequent councils the renewal actually took place. On the other hand, the relation thus sketched has been sometimes reversed. It is laid down by Bellarmine (de Offic. Princ. Christ. cap. 5) that "the bishop is the father and pastor and doctor as well of the prince as of the rest of the people; and in accordance with these names the prince ought to be subject to the bishop, not the bishop to the prince."

The form of the oath of allegiance under Charlemagne was this: "Promitto partibus Domini mei Caroli Regis et filiorum ejus quia fidelis sum et ero diebus vitae meae sine fraude et malo ingenio." It may be added on the authority of Hofmann (Lex. s. v. Fideles) that laymen only took the oath, bishops being bound to a simple promise.

In early times we find traces only of a promise, rather than an oath, of fidelity. St. Leger, bishop of Autun, on being pressed to recognize Clovis III. as king, replied that he would sacrifice life rather than the fidelity which he promised before the Lord to Theodoric (Thomassin, pt. ii. Liv. ii. c. 38). About the same period St. Eloi, bishop of Noyon, on being pressed to swear fidelity to the king over the relics of the saints, excused himself till the king at length desisted, at the same time assuring him that he should henceforth have more confidence in him for having avoided the oath than he should have had if he had sworn.

In the African church we do not find any objection to an oath of fidelity in general, but only to an oath with whose terms the bishops were imperfectly acquainted. Huneric, king of the Vandals, required that the Catholic bishops should swear to the contents of a paper unknown to them. They suspected treachery, and refused. They were not "irrational animals," they pleaded that they should swear lightly and inconsiderately without knowing what the paper contained. We may infer from these expressions that they did not object to an oath altogether, but only to an oath blindly and thoughtlessly taken. It was afterwards declared to them that it was a kind of oath of fidelity, expressing their desire that Huneric should be succeeded by his son Hilderic. Some at length took the oath, while the rest persistently refused. But one and all the bishops were in evil case. For those who took it were banished for having transgressed the prohibition of the Gospel, "Swear not at all;" while the non-jurors were equally banished, as being unwilling that the son of the king should reign after him.

In the East the early bishops resented the attempt to impose upon them an oath of any kind. The attempt of Theodosius the younger to exact an oath of the bishops drew from Basil of Seleucia the vigorous protest, "Hitherto we know not that an oath was presented to bishops"

(Conc. Chalced. Act. 1). In the same council we find a similar objection to oaths of any kind felt by a presbyter: "Five and twenty years," cries Cassian, "I have been in communion, in business (as a barrister) at Constantinople, and God knows I never swore to any man: and now when I am a presbyter, will you force me to swear?" The solemn affirmation upon the Gospels was in those days felt to constitute the strongest possible obligation upon a Christian in matters of every kind.

A gradual relaxation, however, took place in the stiffness of their ideas; so that by the time of the Trullan council (A.D. 680) we find George the deacon, who was what we should call chancellor and librarian of the church of Constantinople, taking an oath on the book of the Gospels, "By those holy Scriptures and by Him who spake in them."

The ceremonies practised at the profession of fidelity have been different in different countries. The subject was required to extend his hands between those of his lord. A remnant of this may perhaps be seen when a degree is conferred in Cambridge. This was known as Homagium Manuale. In Spain the subject kissed the hand of his lord. Compare the practice when a modern English bishop "does homage." The subject knelt on both knees before a prince, while the prince himself was seated.

PRINCES, CONSENT OF. The privileges conferred upon the clergy [IMMUNITIES AND PRIVILEGES OF THE CLERGY] appear to have had the effect of inducing men of wealth to accept ecclesiastical offices in order to escape from their duties and obligations as citizens. This disposition was kept in check by a long series of imperial decrees, all enunciating the same principle, that the liability of all property to render certain services to the state, must not, under any circumstances, be evaded. A law of Constantine (Cod. Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. 2, leg. 3) provides that no decurion, or son of a decurion, or anyone liable to public duties by possession of property, should escape his obligation by enrolling himself among the clergy (ad clericorum nomen et obsequium confugiat), and that in future no one should be permitted to be ordained but those who were of small fortune, and not liable to civic duties. The clergy who had been ordained after the issue of this decree, and in defiance of its provisions, were to be again enrolled in their curiae, and made to discharge their public duties, but those who had been ordained before the passing of the law were not to be molested. Another edict of the same emperor (ibid. leg. 6) provides that the clergy should be chosen from those who were liable to no civic duties, nor of sufficient fortune to discharge public offices, for, it is added, it is reasonable that the rich should provide for the necessity of the state, and the poor be provided for from the wealth of the church.

The principle of these laws was somewhat modified in later edicts, which more distinctly laid the obligation to render public services on the estate itself rather than on the donor, and in cases of disobedience substituted a forfeiture of property for a recalling to personal service. [ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1484.] [P. O.]

PRINCIPPUS, martyr with Agathonicus and others under Maximinus; commemorated Aug. 22 (Basil. Menol.). [C. II.]

PRIOR, MONASTIC. 1. Title. 2. Prior Claustralis: (a) His status; (8) mode of election; (7) duties; (6) priors different from deans. 3. Prior Conventualis. 4. Small priories. 5. Prioresses. The title "Prior" for a monastic official is much later in date than the office itself. According to Du Cange the word was not so used before the time of pope Celestine V., towards the end of the 13th century (Du Cange, Glossar. Lat. s. v.). But the office so designated is as old probably as the beginning of monasticism, certainly as the first attempts to organize the coenobitic life; "praepositus" and "praelatus" being the words used in the early days (Martene, Commentar. in Reg. S. Benedicti, c. 65; cf. Greg. Magn. Dialog. I. cc. 2, 7). In one passage where Benedict of Casino enjoins on the younger monks the duty of being reverent to their "priors" ("piores suos nonnos appellent juniores"), it is supposed with reason that he means their elders or superiors in the monastery (Bened. Reg. c. 63). Ménard contends that wherever in the rule of Benedict the term "prior" is used in the singular number and absolutely, not relatively, it signifies the abbat himself, and quotes, in support of his argument, a passage from Caesarius of Arles (Ménard, Comment. in Bened. Anian. Concordia Regularum, c. 47; cf. Caesarii, Regula ad Virgines, c. 3). Where Benedict in his rule orders that if any monk has an urgent question to ask during the hours of silence, he must ask it of the "prior," Ménard, with other commentators, explains the word to mean the abbat or some monk senior in standing, or higher in official position than the others present (Bened. Reg. c. 6. Comment.). Similarly in the chapter of the rule about the reader for the week, the "prior" only is allowed to interrupt the reader, if necessary, and to interpose a remark; here Ménard understands the abbat to be intended, Boherius, the monk, at the head of the table (ib. c. 38). Again, on the quantity of liquor permissible, the "prior" to whose discretion it is left to order in extraordinary cases a larger quantity than the hemina or pint, is supposed by Boherius to be the father-abbat himself. Martene cites Haeften to shew that the deans (decani) in a monastery were sometimes called priors, the first dean being the prior, the second the sub-prior, and so forth (Martene, u.s. c. 21). But this was not usual.

There is a distinction to be observed between the prior of the cloister ("prior claustralis"), a subordinate officer of the abbat, and the prior of the convent ("prior conventualis") who exercised supreme authority within a monastery of his own (Alteserrae Asceticum, ii. 8). In the latter sense the Greek equivalent of prior is HEGUMENOS, according to Alteserra, who quotes a canon of the second council of Nicaea which speaks of the abbat or the Hegumenos; but perhaps this is a mere tautology (ib. cf. ii. Conc. Nicaen. A.D. 787, c. 14). Alteserra quotes also a passage from Evagrius, equally precarious in its application, where Cyril is called Hegumenos of the "sleepless monks" (ἡγούμενων τῶν Ἀκοιμήτων) (Evang. Hist. Eccl. iii. 19). Later Latin writers, according to Alteserra, in their affectation of Greek fashions, were fond of styling priors Hegumeni; but the instances which he cites from Paulus Diaconus relate to monks in the Eastern empire (Alteserra, u. s.).

The prior of the cloister ranked next in the monastery to the abbat, and, subject to the abbat's veto, exercised similar authority (Bened. Reg. c. 65; cf. Concil. Aquisgran. A.D. 817, c. 55). He was the abbat's lieutenant (secundus domus), acting in the name of his superior officer (Ménard, Commentar. in Bened. Anianens. Concord. Regul. c. 27), doing nothing on his own independent responsibility, but always as subject to the approval of the abbat—head of the abbat's executive, but in theory nothing more (Fruct. Reg. c. 20). Practically an ambitious prior was apt to usurp the abbat's functions, especially if his abbat were of less energetic temperament. According to the ancient Egyptian rule ascribed to Pachomius, the monks might complain to the abbat of the prior's behaviour (Pachom. Reg. 127-8). The prior was inspector and controller of the deans (Ib. c. 12), the first in order of whom took precedence in the monastery next after the prior (Conc. Aquisgr. u. s.).

By primitive custom in the West the prior was appointed by the abbat alone (Bened. Reg. c. 65). A rule, calling itself the Rule of the East ("Regula Orientalis"), but probably compiled by Vigilus Diaconus in France during the fifth century (Ménard, ad Codex Regularum Benedicti Anianensis), says that the prior is to be appointed by the abbat, with the concurrence of the brethren (cum consilio et voluntate fratrum). Gregory the Great seems to have appointed priors and abbats on his own authority by letter (e.g. Gregor. M. Ep. vii. 42; ix. 42). It was the rule for the prior to be elected from among the inmates of the monastery; in other words, the election was to be "gremial" (Martene, Commentar. Bened. Regula, c. 65; cf. Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 817, c. 31). Priors often, as was to be expected, were selected for the office of abbat; deans in the same way were often promoted to be priors.

The tenure of the office of prior was for life, conditionally always on good conduct. A faulty prior rendered himself liable to public correction after four admonitions, which were to be administered to him, according to Martene, by the abbat in private. In the case of an ordinary monk the warning was to be given twice, in the case of a dean thrice, before proceeding to punish. The several degrees or stages of punishment, according to Hildemar, quoted by Martene, were public rebuke, excommunication, extra fasting, flagellation if necessary, deposition, expulsion from the monastery (Martene, Commentar. ad Bened. Reg. cc. 21, 45). Recourse was requisite occasionally even to the last and severest penalty (e.g., Ardo, Vita S. Benedicti Anianens. n. 24). Gregory the Great is quoted by Martene as specifying profligacy, insubordination, or wastefulness as valid reasons for deposing a prior (Martene, u. s.).

The prior's first and especial duty was to look closely after the discipline of the monastery, and to report any breach of discipline to the abbat (Pachom. Reg. 152, 154; Bened. Reg. cc. 63, 65; Reg. Tarnatensis, c. 23; Fruct. Reg. c. 11; Concil. Mogunt. I. A.D. 813, c. 11). He was to watch over the conduct of his brethren day and night, in the refectory, in the dormitory, and elsewhere (Hieron. Ep. ad Eustochium; Augustine, De Moribus Ecclesiae, c. 31). In the sleeping-chamber the prior was to be the first to rise in the morning, the last to go to his bed; he was to remain standing in the middle of the room, till all the rest were asleep, to guard against any irregularity; at midnight, after the appointed lecture, the prior was to expound (Fruct. Reg. c. 5; Concil. Aquisgran. c. 31). He was to lead the brethren forth to their labours in the field, and to superintend their noonday repose as in the heat of summer (Pachom. Reg. c. 58; Stephani Reg. c. 55). He was empowered to enforce discipline by the lesser excommunication (Fruct. Reg. c. 11; Reg. Tarnat. c. 6). It is related by Bede how St. Cuthbert was transferred by his abbat from Melrose to Lindisfarne, as prior, to keep order among the monks on the island (Bede, Hist. Eccles. iv. 27). It was another part of the prior's office, in order that the abbat might have more leisure for spiritual concerns, to look after the temporal possessions of the monastery, a responsibility which increased with the increasing wealth of monasteries, but which he shared with steward or oeconomus. On him also devolved, together with the care of the monastic property, the charge of the litigations in which the brotherhood might be engaged (Isidori Hispal. Reg. c. 20). He was also to superintend the food and clothing provided for the monks severally, not excluding the abbat's portion, rendering his account duly from time to time to his superior (Fruct. Reg. c. 11). To discharge rightly these various and important duties the prior was required to be diligent, obedient, trustworthy; grave and sedate in character, but not too advanced in years to be still active (Pachom. Reg. 128; Ferreol. Reg. c. 17; Reg. Cujusdam).

It is easy to see that the prior, holding so important a position in the monastery, might become a rival to the abbat rather than an assistant. He presided in the abbat's absence (Basili Regula, c. 45), and it was hardly to be expected that an ambitious man, after once tasting the sweetness of authority, should abdicate cheerfully. In case of any slackness or delinquency on the part of the abbat, the prior was to set matters right (Gregor. M. Epist. iv. 4); after once reproving his superior, he was scarcely likely to receive orders from him submissively; in short, though intended to be a comfort and support to his commanding officer (Ferreol. Reg. c. 17; Fruct. Reg. c. 11), he proved too often a thorn in his side. All this Benedict anticipated with his shrewd, statesmanlike instinct. He was jealous of anything like a divided allegiance; he was afraid of insubordination and dissension from what might practically come to be two abbats in the same monastery. The prior would fancy himself a second abbat; he would make a party among the brethren; he would play the part of Absalom to David, seducing the subjects from their loyalty to their ruler. Benedict much preferred deans to a prior as the abbat's executive; they would be more amenable to control, less factious and self-asserting. Thus the reins of government would be in the abbat's own hands. If, however, for some special reason, a prior should be indispensable to a monastery, he was to be chosen by the abbat, with the advice of the brethren in chapter, that is of all the brethren, according to some commentators, and according to others of the elders only (Benedicti Regula Commentata, c. 65). The wisdom of the great reformer's policy has been demonstrated again and again by experience. His canon on this point was reaffirmed by Charlemagne in the council of Mainz (Conc. Mogunt. I. c. 11). Lay abbats subsequently found it far more convenient for their purposes to be represented by deans than by a prior (Altes. Ascet. ii. 9). Lay priors, another innovation on the primitive strictness of the Benedictine rule, were prohibited by Charlemagne (Capitul. A.D. 805, c. 15).

The forms of institution are of comparatively recent origin (Bened. Reg. Comment. u. s.).

The conventual prior was a later development of monasticism, and was, of course, essentially more independent than his claustral brother. Next in rank to him in larger monasteries was the sub-prior (Anselmi Epist. iii. 29. Ad monachos Cantuar.). Among the "canonici regulares" the bishop was supreme generally, but the prior in questions relating to the rule, or while the see was vacant (Altes. Ascet. v. s.). The conventual priors were summoned to provincial synods, and in some cases to the election of bishops. They were sometimes styled "summi priors," or "majores"; they were to be over twenty-five years of age, and in priest's orders. They exercised the same powers of discipline in their priories as the abbat in his abbey—they were elected as he was; but their investiture belonged to the abbat, under whose jurisdiction they nominally were. The order of Premonstratensians was at first under priors, afterwards under abbats (Altes. Ascet. v. s.). Very small priories were invariably discouraged by those who desired to preserve the true monastic spirit. Priories of this kind were the result of several different causes. Sometimes they were simply an overflow from a monastery more than usually popular for the abbat's sake, or for some other reason; sometimes they were the consequence of a monastery, which had known better days, being annexed in its decrepitude as an appendage to another more flourishing; sometimes the priory was merely an outpost of the monastery which gave it birth, on some detached grange or farm. Whatever might be its origin, a priory on a very small scale was only too apt to degenerate into laxity and secularity. Benedict, in the very commencement of his rule, reprobates strongly the vicious custom of two or three monks herding together promiscuously, being really neither hermits nor monks (Bened. Reg. c. 1). Monks of this description were termed "Sarabaitae," or "Remoboth." Bernard calls such priories "synagogues of Satan" (Bernard. Epist. 254 ad Guarinum abbatem). It was ordered by a council at Aachen that no priory should consist of fewer than six members (Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 817, c. 44). Peter the Venerable, of Clugny, required at least twelve, and this became the rule of the Cistercians and Carthusians (Bened. Reg. Comment. c. 1). It is matter of notoriety in the history of the English reformation in the 15th century that the most flagrant immoralities were generally found in the smallest monasteries. [CELLITAE, p. 328.]

The office of prioress, under an abbess, was very similar to that of the claustral prior. She was to be firm and discreet; old in character though not in years; she was to superintend the behaviour of the nuns, chiding and, if necessary, whipping them for their faults; she was held responsible in particular for their clothes and dormitories (Regula Cujusdam, c. 2). The nuns, by this rule, which is one of more than ordinary strictness, were only allowed to make any communication of their abbess through their prioress (Ibid. c. 22). PROCESSION. I. The word processere was used by the early Christians in the especial sense of leaving the house and going forth for some stated and grave purpose; in particular and chiefly for going to a religious service. Tertullian, A.D. 192, addressing Christian women says, "With you every reason for going forth (procedendi) is of a solemn character: either some sick brother is to be visited, or the sacrifice is offered, or the word of God is ministered" (De Cult. Poem. 11). Dissuading from marriage with a heathen, he says, "If you have to go to a service (si procedendum erit), never will household business be more urgent" (Ad Uxor. ii. 4). See other examples in St. Jerome (Ep. 128 ad Gaud. 3; Ep. 107 ad Laet. 9; Ep. 22 ad Eustoch. 17), St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, § 22), Urbanus (De Obitu Paulini, 11), Ennodius (Vita Epiphani Ticin. Migne, lxiii. 214), and Pseudo-Ambrose (Serm. vii. 3, inter Opp. Ambr.). When the fame of a saint attracts many to a church in which his relics lie, "major est (it is said) pro meritis ejus frequentia procedendi" (Passio S. Quirini, 4; in Ruinart, Acta Mart. 439, ed. 1731).

Hence processio acquired the conventional sense of going to church. Tertullian: "Where the fear of God is, there is . . . devout attendance, and a modest going to church (processio) and an united congregation" (De Praescr. Haer. 43). This usage led to the application of the word to the assembly or to the service itself. Thus Leo of Rome, A.D. 445, writing to the bishop of Alexandria of an Alexandrian presbyter, who had sojourned some time at Rome: "Nostris processionibus atque ordinationibus frequenter adfuit" (Epist. 11, al. 81, ad Diosc. 2). The context shews that by processionibus we are to understand congregations for the celebration of the Eucharist. Gelasius of Rome, 484, advised a bishop to suspend the services (processionem) of a certain church, because the lord of the place seized all the oblations (Victori Episc. Hard. ii. 927). In the version of the seventeenth canon of Laodicea, probably about 365, by Dionysius Exiguus, 533, we find the word συναγῆρι (religious assemblies [SYNAXIS]) rendered by processionibus (Hard. Concil. i. 783). The Liber Diurnus Romanorum Pontificum, compiled in the 9th century, gives the form of letter by which the bishop of Rome sanctioned the consecration of monastic oratories. This was permitted, "sic tamen ut non illud publica processione a conditore aliquatenus teneatur" (v. 13). So of a baptistery added to an old church: "Nihil illic juris fundatori ulterius jam debere, nisi processionis gratiam, quae Christianis omnibus in commune debetur" (ibid. 20).

II. Processions in the ordinary sense (Processus, Processio, Litania, Letania, Laetania, Rogationes, Supplicationes, Pompa, Λιτανεία, Λιτή, Ῥογήματος) were common in the early church. Having regard to such passages as Num. x. 33; Josh. vi. 13; 2 Sam. vi. 4, 5; 1 Chron. xiii. 7, 8; 2 Chron. xx. 27, 28; Ps. lxxviii. 25, &c. the first Christians probably believed that they had the sanction of Scripture. They certainly inherited a taste for them from their Greek and Roman forefathers, and appear to have taken the more ancient processions in some respects as their model. [See, for instance, Δαφνηφορία and TRIUMPHUS in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiq.] In the triumphal processions from the Campus Martius to the Capitol (to omit what is less to our purpose) flowers were strewn, images were carried, incense burnt, and songs of praise sung (Livy, iii. 29, xxxix. 7; Pliny, v. 5; Ovid, Tristia, iv. 2, 3-6; De Arte Am. i. 213-220; Pontica, ii. 1, 35-40, iii. 4, 23-40). Many features of these ancient rites reappear under Christian sanction after the conversion of the empire. The people naturally clung to every custom of their fathers not condemned by the gospel, and their rulers indulged them in it.

A. Processions in the Churches.—These were probably in use in larger churches with many clerks before the toleration of Christianity.

(1) Processions before the Service.—The earliest Ordo Romanus about 730 describes an elaborate rite. All met and rested in the SECRETARIUM, or by the door of it, the bishop was led out by the archdeacon and the second deacon, each taking a hand. "The sub-deacon, following with a censer, goes (procedit) before him . . . and the seven acolytes of the region, whose turn comes on that day, precede the pontiff up to the altar, carrying seven stands of lighted wax candles. But before they come to the altar, the deacons take off their planetae in the presbytery, and the sub-deacon of the region takes them, and hands them to the acolytes of the region to which they belong" (Ordo Rom. i. 8, in Mus. Ital. ii. 8; Comp. Ord. ii. 4, p. 43; iii. 8, p. 53; v. 5, p. 65; vi. 2, p. 70). (Compare Capit. Reg. Franc. v. 372.) The Greeks have for many ages had a procession in monasteries on the vigils of the greater feasts (Diataxis Philothei, in Euchologion, Goar, 8; comp. Lucernarii Orationes, 40-43).

(2) For the Procession before the Reading of the Gospel, see ENTRANCE; GOSPEL. For that on PALM SUNDAY, see p. 1549.

(3) After the Gospel.—This eastern rite is thus described by John Maro: "After the reading of the gospel the ancients used to go out (of the bema) and make a procession or circuit through the church. And first in the procession were carried lights that mystically denoted the prophets and John the Baptist, who glowed and shine as stars before the Sun of Righteousness. But the deacons and presbyters who went in procession with songs of praise represent symbolically the evangelists and twelve apostles who went forth and preached before Christ" (Expos. Minist. u. s. 9).

(4) After the Liturgy.—"Then the seven candlestands and the subdeacon of the region precede the pontiff to the secretarium. But as he descends into the presbytery, let the bishops first say, 'Jube, domne, benedicere.' Resp. 'Benedicat nos Dominus.' Resp. 'Amen.' After the bishops, the presbyters, then the monks, then the school (choir), then the milites draconarii, i.e. those who bear the standard (see the notes of Lindenbrogius and the Valesii to Ammianus, xx. 4), after them the bearers of the wax candlestands, after whom the acolytes who keep the sacred gate [RUGA], after them, without the presbytery, those who carry the crosses, then the junior churchwardens;—and he enters the secretarium." This is the description of the procession to the vestry after a pontifical mass at Rome in the 8th century (Ordo Rom. i. 21; comp. Ord. ii. 15; iii. 18).

B. Public Processions.—The earliest allusion to them appears to be in the writings of St. Basil. When, in the year 375, the clergy of Neocaesarea objected that the method of psalmody in use in his church, as elsewhere in the East, was unknown in the days of Gregory Thaumaturgus, who died about 270, Basil replied, "So were the litanies which ye now practise" (Epist. 207 ad Neoc.). These were evidently of a penitential character, for he adds, "I do not say this as accusing you, for I would that ye all lived in tears and constant penitence." But we find that in the West processions were at the same period used on festive occasions also, at least by the monks; for St. Ambrose, in 388, speaks of monks "singing psalms after the custom and ancient use, as they went to the celebration of the feast of the Maccabean martyrs" (Epist. 40, § 16, ad Theodos.). About the same time the Arians at Constantinople sang hymns antiphonally as they went through the city to their church; whereupon St. Chrysostom, to counteract the effect of such public demonstrations, organized processions of the orthodox, in which silver crosses, given by the empress, and lighted tapers, were borne, and psalms sung (Sozom. Eccl. Hist. viii. 8; Pallad. Dial. de Vita Chrys. 15).

(1) The Procession on St. Mark's Day.—On the 25th April (VII. Kal. Maii) a procession ("obstitit in mediâ candida pompa via," Ovid, Fast. iv. 906) was held by the Romans in honour of the goddess Robigo, and prayers offered to her for the preservation of the fruits of the earth from mildew (Ovid, u. s. 905-942; Pliny, xviii. 69; Varro, De Re Rust. i. 1; De Ling. Lat. vi. 3). A document issued by Gregory of Rome in 591 speaks of a "laetania quae major ab omnibus appellatur," which was held on a Friday in that year, with a procession from the church of St. Lawrence, "qui appellatur Lucinae," to that of St. Peter, as if it were already an old custom, "solemnitas annuae devotionis" (Charta Epist. lib. ii. praef.). Referring to some of the most ancient MSS. of the Gregorian sacramentary, we find set down for the 25th of April, "Letania majore ad S. Laurentium in Lucinae" (Liturg. Rom. Vet. Murat. ii. 80; Rituale PP. Pamel. ii. 285). This procession also ends at St. Peter's, as the last prayer ("in atrio") proves by its reference to the intercession of that saint. The inference is that this procession is the same as that of which St. Gregory speaks. His procession, therefore, took place on the 25th of April, and, from its antiquity, may be supposed with probability to have been a Christian substitute for the heathen Robigalia, formerly held on the same day. In France the procession of St. Mark's day was traditionally held to be celebrated "pour les fruits de la terre" (De Moleon, Voyages littéraires, 307).

Other churches took this rite avowedly from Rome. The council of Cloveshoo, 747, orders litanies "on the seventh day before the calends of May after the custom of the church of Rome" (can. 16). The second council of Aachen, 836, recognizes the "Roman" observance of the 25th of April as the custom of the empire, and decrees its continuance (can. 10; see also Capit. Reg. Franc. vi. 74). Similarly Herard of Tours, 858, "De Letania Romana vii. Kalendas Maii rememoretur" (Capit. 94). This procession was observed in France during the last century at Nantes, Orleans, Rouen, &c. (De Moleon, 79, 186, 306, &c.).

(2) The Procession of the Litanía Septiformis.—On the 29th of August, 602, Gregory I. of Rome ordered a sevenfold procession of clerks, laymen, monks, nuns, matrons, widows, poor persons and children (i.e. probably those supported by the alms of the church) to depart in separate bands from seven several churches, and all to meet in the church of St. Mary (Sermo inter Epist. Greg. xi. 2, given also at length by Amalarius, De Eccl. Off. iv. 25). [LITANY, p. 1003.]

(3) On ROGATION DAYS, see that heading.

(3) Occasional Public Processions. (1) At times of Public Calamity.—These were very common, especially in the West. Thus Gregory of Tours tells us that at Limoges, about 580, when very violent rains were falling, near the harvest, after a night spent in watching and prayer, "the deacons took the relics of the saints, suitably and reverently covered with a silken pall, and went forth in white dresses to a procession" (Vita S. Aridii, 8). A similar rite was observed at Rome under Adeodatus, A.D. 671, when the letaniae took place daily during the rains (Liber Pontif. n. 78). In a plague at Rheims, 546, "having taken a pall from the tomb of the blessed (Remigius), and arranged it like a bier, and having lighted wax candles on crosses and stands, they raised their voices in canticles, and so went the circuit of the city; nor did they pass any hospice without including it in their perambulation" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 79; see also Hist. Franc. iv. 5; Vitae PP. vi. 6). Gregory I. in 600 advised a procession twice a week to stay the threatened invasion of Sicily (Epist. ix. 45). Public processions with similar objects were also frequent in the East; e.g. during an earthquake at Constantinople in the time of Theodosius II. (Cedrenus, i. 600). A similar procession was celebrated every year in memory of the great earthquake in the twenty-seventh year of Justinian (Id. ii. 674).

None of the processional prayers now in use proper to a special object, as relief in a drought, deliverance from storms, &c. (Goar, Euchol. 766-769), appear to be of primitive antiquity. Some of them are ascribed to one of the patriarchs named Callistus, who sat about 1400 (ibid. 785).

It is probable that all litanies ordered for a special purpose were sung in procession, though it is not always so expressed. [LITANY.]

(4) The Processions after Baptism.—So long as many were baptized on the eves of Easter and Pentecost, it was the custom for the neophytes to leave the church after their baptism, and again to repair to it on the seven following days in procession, clothed in albis, there to receive the holy communion. The earliest witness is Gregory Nazianzen, A.D. 370, who, preaching on Easter Day, says: "Beautiful yesterday was the wearing of white and the carrying of lights, which we observed together both in private and public, men of almost every rank, and the whole magistracy, lighting up the night with a fiery blaze" (Orat. 45, § 2). There is direct testimony in the West to the repetition of these processions during the week after baptism. Thus Amalarius: "Our baptized, their past sins done away, are conducted daily to the church, a lighted pillar of wax" (an allusion to Exod. xiii. 21) "going before them" (De Eccl. Off. iv. 33; Pseudo-Alcuin. de Div. Off. 21).

(5) Before Baptism.—When Clovis was to be baptized, A.D. 496, there was a procession, with all the usual accompaniments, to the baptistery (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. i. 13), a ceremony probably common in the case of great personages, but of which other examples do not occur to me.

(6) Before laying of the first stone of a Church, &c.—A law of Justinian, 527, says: "We decree that, before all things, no one be free to commence the building of a monastery or oratory before the most God-loving bishop of the city, coming thither, pour out prayers on the spot, and, a public procession having been instituted, set up a cross, and make the fact manifest to all" (Novella, 67).

(7) At the Dedication of Churches.—Processions on such occasions were evidently usual within our period, both in the East and West; but they seem to have been somewhat differently managed. When the first encaenia of St. Sophia at Constantinople were celebrated in 530, there was a procession (lite), which "started from the holy Anastasia, Menas the patriarch being seated in the imperial chariot, while the emperor joined in the procession (συλλειτουργούντος) with the people" (Theophanes, Chronogr. ad an. i. 338, ed. Nieb.). At the second encaenia (the church having been restored after injury from an earthquake), after vigils kept in the church of St. Plato, a procession was formed, in which the emperor himself again took part, "the patriarch Eutychius riding in a chariot, and dressed in his apostolical habit, holding the holy gospels in his hands, the people all chanting, "Lift up your heads," &c. (ibid. 360). The Western rite is best seen in the early English pontificals. [CONSECRATION, p. 431.] The English pontifical, formerly at Roumèges, now No. 362 in the public library at Jumièges, directs the first procession to go round the church thrice before it enters (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. ii. 250; or Archæologia for March, 1833, p. 259).

(8) Ad Stationes.—In the cities of the West, from the 7th century downwards, there were processions on many of the greater days from one church, at which the people collected by appointment, to another, at which the service took place. Hence the phrases "collecta ad Sanctum M." (used first for the gathering, then for the prayers, at the church of St. M.), and "statio ad S. N." (the church at which the procession stopped and entered on the chief service of the day. See Ménard's notes to the sacramentary of St. Gregory, Opp. Greg. iii. 604, 662; ed. Ben. and art. STATION).

(9) Other processions which may be mentioned are, that on Easter Eve, on the Annunciation (Goar, Eucholog. 34), at the translation of RELICS, or with relics at other times, and at funerals [OBSEQUES, § xiv.]

C. Procession held at the will of the Bishop.—From a spurious addition to Gennadius (De Vir. Illust. 99), we infer that in the 5th century processions were celebrated irregularly, as the bishop thought them required for the good of his flock. For it tells us of Honoratus, bishop of Marseilles, 490: "Litaniæ ad supplicandam Dei clementiam cum plebe sibi credita pro viribus agit." A law of Justinian, 527, made the concurrence of the bishop necessary: "Omnibus autem laicis interdicitur ne supplicationes publicas peragant sine religiosissimis episcopis, et qui sub eis sunt reverendissimis clericis." The context shews that these "supplicationes" were made in processions: "Sed et venerabiles cruces, cum quibus sacerdote in supplicationibus ingrediuntur non alibi quam in locis venerabilibus reponuntur" (Novella, 123).

On the foregoing subject the reader may consult Jac. Gretser de Eccles. Roman. Processionibus, lib. ii. Ingoldst. 1604; Nic. Serrarius de Sacris Process. Col. 1607; Jac. Eveillon de *Process. PROCESSUS, martyr with Martinianus, said to have been baptized by the apostles Peter and Paul; commemorated at Rome in the cemetery of Damasus July 2 (Bed., Wand., Usuard Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Mart. Rom.). Hieron. Mart. has also May 31 for his natale. In Gregory's sacramentary the natale of these saints is observed on July 2, and both are mentioned in the collect (Greg. Sacram. Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 105). Pope Paschal I. erected an oratory to them, in which their bodies are believed to lie (Ciamp. de Sac. Aedif. 57, 1).

PROCESSUS. In the liturgy of Gothic Spain, a part of the church which might be either a chamber in the sacristy, a part of it, or a place close to it, was so called, obviously because the clergy formed in it before they entered the church in procession. Thus, on Easter-eve, the deacon and clerks, after vesting, "enter the processus," in which is "a seat set for the pontiff according to custom." There he gives tapers to all present, which he afterwards lights with the "new fire" (See LIGHTS, § v.). This is followed by a procession of the clergy through the vaulted way towards the choir. "Vadunt per bubata ad chorum" (Missal Mozar. Leslie, 174, 175, 521).

PROCHORUS, one of the seven deacons; commemorated Ap. 9 (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart. at Antioch; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. i. 828); by the Greeks July 28 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 264; Boll. l. c.). [C. H.]

PROCLUS (1), martyr with Hilarius, both natives of Ancyra, under Trajan; commemorated July 12 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 263; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. iii. 279, or PROCLUS with HILARION or HILARIUS; Mart. Rom.).

(2) Deacon, Sept. 19. [PROCLUS (2).]

(3) "Our father," patriarch of Constantinople; commemorated Oct. 24 (Basil. Menol.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. x. 637); Nov. 20 (Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

PROCOPIUS (1), confessor with Basilus, under Leo Iconomachus; commemorated Feb. 27 (Basil. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.), bishop of Decapolis; Daniel, Cod. Liturg. iv. 254, Decapollita).

(2) Martyr, commemorated July 8 (Wand.; Basil. Menol. Dux Alexandriae, magnus martyr in city of Aelia); in Palestine (Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Mart. Rom.); Cal. Byzant. "glorious and holy martyr;" Daniel (Cod. Liturg. iv. 262), "great martyr" at Caesarea; Hieron. Mart. PROCOBUS, which Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 577 from the same passage read PROCOPIUS, with Quartus and Felix at Caesarea [C. H.]

PROCLUS (1), martyr at Interamna with Efybus and Apollonius, all disciples of Valentinus presbyter of Interamna; commemorated Feb. 14 (Bed. Mart.; Mart. Rom.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 756, cf. p. 862); Ap. 14 (Usuard. Mart. at Interamna; Mart. Rom.; Hieron. Mart. at Interamna with Valentinus and others).

(2) Deacon, martyr with Januarius; commemorated Sept. 19 (Basil. Menol. PROCLUS at Puteoli; Vet. Rom. Mart., at Naples; Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart.; Mart. Rom.).

(3) Bishop, martyr at Autun; commemorated Nov. 4 (Usuard. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Mart. Rom.).

(4) Presbyter, martyr at Narnia; commemorated Dec. 1 (Usuard. Mart.).

PROCURATIONS. The fees due at visitations to bishops and archdeacons from the parishes within their respective jurisdictions, intended to cover the expenses of their journeys. A series of canons and decrees of councils were found necessary to keep these fees within their lawful limits, and to prevent extortion under various pleas. The second council of Braga A.D. 570 (c. 2) prohibits a bishop when he visits his diocese, "per dioceses suas ambulat," from taking any fee beyond two solidi, the honorary payment due to the office, "honorem cathedrae suae," especially forbidding him to claim the third part of the offertories made in parish churches, which is allotted to the lighting and repairs of the churches themselves. The seventh council of Toledo A.D. 646 (c. 4), after reprehending the extortionate practices of the bishops of Galicia, re-enacts the canon already quoted of the council of Braga, fixing two "solidi" as the legal fee, but exempts from payment the churches belonging to monasteries. It also provides that when a bishop visits his diocese he is not to be unfairly burdensome to any particular parish, nor to demand an unreasonable number of horses for conveyance (see Bruns. Councils, i. p. 264, note) nor to remain more than one day in any parish. The council of Merida, A.D. 666 (c. 11), provides that all clerics, whether presbyters, abbats, or deacons, should receive a bishop at his visitation with all due honour, and provide him with all things reasonably necessary according to their means, "prout habuerint aut ratio permisit." The second council of Châlons A.D. 812 (c. 14) rebukes the oppressions and exactions sometimes practised by bishops at their visitations, and (c. 16) forbids them to exact anything for the lamps and oil of their churches, and (c. 17) speaks of an annual tax (census) of 12 or 14 denarii, which some bishops were in the habit of exacting, and emphatically prohibits it, "quod penitus abolendum est." In the same council (c. 15) the archdeacons are rebuked for certain exactions from their presbyters and parochial clergy, and exhorted to be content with their legal dues. It was probably to excessive demands made under the name of procurations that the council of Paris A.D. 829 (cc. 25, 31) referred when they denounced the extortions practised in some places by the bishops (episcoporum ministros), not only on the presbyters but on the laity agents. The fourth council of Valentia A.D. 855 (c. 22) orders that no visitation fee shall be claimed if the parish has not been visited that year, and the second council of Ticine in the same year limits the quantity of bread and wine and meat which a bishop may demand at his visitation.

The same principle that procurations were only intended to cover the legitimate expenses of a visitation pervades all legislation on the subject. A Capitulary of Ludwig the Pious (l. i. c. 100, Sirmondi Conc. Gall. ii. 432) expressly prohibits bishops from becoming a burden to their flocks when they visit their parishes for the purpose of preaching or confirming, and orders them so to arrange their visitations that they may not be burdensome or unwelcome (importuna vel onerosa). Hincmar of Rheims appears to have been most anxious to check all extortionate practices under the name of procurations, and his writings clearly indicate the abuses which had crept into this part of the system of the church. Thus, in his epistle to the clergy of Laon (Sirmondi Conc. Gall. ii. 660) he warns the bishops not to oppress the parishes which they visit, nor to exact more than the contribution (collatio) which had satisfied their predecessors, nor to require a separate contribution from each church and its dependent chapelries, but only one paid in due proportion by the whole parish; nor were they to claim or exact, under pretence of receiving a voluntary contribution (accipiat, id est rapiat), any subsidies (adjutoria) in money or provisions under the plea of meeting expenses incurred in the reception of the king or his ambassadors, or for the adornment of the cathedral church. Again in his precepts to his archdeacons (id. ii. 378) he forbids them (c. 1) during their visitations of their country parishes, either when accompanying him or by themselves, to be guilty of oppression by demanding things not necessary, or by taking with them a superfluous retinue, or their own relations, to be quartered upon the parishes which they visited; or (c. 2) by visiting their parishes too frequently, so as to live at their expense and save their own income; or (c. 5) by demanding as offerings (eulogiae) any contribution either in money or in any other way from the presbyters when they came to attend a synod, or to obtain the chrism, or for enquiry into their ministry, beyond such as they might be disposed to make willingly.

A Capitulary of Charles the Bald (id. iii. 2, 3) enacts (c. 1) that bishops were to receive either a definite quantity of provision or the two "solidi" allotted to them by the councils of Braga and Toledo (c. 4); that the bishops should choose the richer parishes for their visitations, and that four parishes might unite to share the expenses of a visitation; and (cc. 5, 6) that they might visit parishes once a year and receive procurations, but could require nothing from parishes not visited. If they visited any parish more than once in the same year, they were to pay their own expenses. [P. O.]

PROCURATOR. In its general meaning a person in charge of the interests of another as agent or factor (see Ducange, Gloss.), but more usually applied in a more limited sense to clerics in the civil, or proctors in the ecclesiastical, courts.

These employments were in general forbidden to the clergy, as involving secular business inconsistent with their office and position. Augustine (de Op. Monach. c. 15) draws a distinction between occupations which are carried on by manual labour, and those whose nature it is to distract the mind with cares and anxieties about secular business (ipsium animum occupare curis colligendae sine corporis labore pecuniae), and expressly numbers "procuratores," probably using the word in its general meaning, among the latter class. So Jerome (ad Nepot. c. 16) asks how the clergy, who are bidden to renounce all care for their own temporal possessions, can possibly undertake to be managers (procuratores et dispensatores) of the houses and estates of others. The decrees of the church speak with united voice in the refusal to admit into the number of the clergy any who were actually engaged in managing the affairs of others. The first council of Carthage, held in the year A.D. 348, expressly decreed (cc. 8, 9) that no "procuratores," or those in any way engaged in the affairs of others (obnoxii alienis negotiis), should be admitted to number of the clergy, till they were free from their secular obligations, lest disgrace should be brought upon the church. The third council of Carthage, A.D. 397 (c. 15), prohibits not only bishops and priests, but any of the clergy from being procurators, or seeking their livelihood by any ignoble or dishonest occupation, giving as a reason that those entrusted with the service of God must not be entangled in secular affairs. The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (c. 3), forbids any belonging to the clerical or monastic orders to charge himself with any secular business (ἐπιεσθῆναι αὐτὸν κοσμικαῖς διοικήσεσιν) making, however, exceptions in case of any business imposed upon them by law, or committed to them by the bishop of the diocese, or undertaken on behalf of widows and orphans. The council of Tarragona, A.D. 516 (c. 11), forbids any monk to take any part in any legal business (forensis negotii susceptor aut executor existat) except on behalf of the monastery, and under order of the abbat. This exception, however, was not allowed by Justinian, who in one of his laws (Novell. cxxiii. c. 6) positively prohibits any bishop or oeconomus, or clergy of any grade or any mark, from acting as manager (procuratorem litis), either on their own behalf, or of any church or monastery. Later councils, however, appear to have insisted on retaining the principle that the clergy might act as advocates in certain cases. The council of Verno, A.D. 755 (c. 16), forbids any of the clergy to conduct any legal business, except on behalf of widows and orphans, or in cases where the property of the church was concerned, and then acting under orders for their bishop or abbat. In like manner, the council of Mayence, A.D. 813 (c. 14), forbids any of the clergy to act as agents or managers (conductores aut procuratores) in any secular matters, except in defence of widows and orphans. See also LAWYERS, p. 947. [P. O.]

PROEORTIA. The προεορτία of the Greek church corresponds in the main to the Eve or VIGIL of the Latins. But some of the greatest festivals have a προεορτία of more than one day. Thus the προεορτία of the Epiphany begins on January 2, of Christmas on Dec. 20 (Neale, Eastern Ch. Introd. p. 764). [C.]

PROFANATION. [SACRILEGE.]

PROFESSION. For the profession of faith in Baptism, see BAPTISM, §§ 43, 46; CREED, § 4, p. 489; INTERROGATIO, p. 865. To these it may be added that the form of profession given by the council of Lestines (Concilium Liptinense, A.D. 743) is one of the oldest specimens of a liturgical formula in a Teutonic language. It is given as follows by Professor Swainson (The Nicene and Apostles Creeds, &c., p. 22):—"Gelobistu in got al'mehtigan fadaer. Ec gelobo in got al'mehtigan fadaer. Gelobistu in crist godes suno. Ec gelobo in crist godes suno. Gelobistu in halogan gast. Ec gelobo in halogan gast." That is: "Q. Believest thou in God the Father Almighty? A. I believe in God the Father Almighty. Q. Believest thou in Christ God's Son? A. I believe in Christ God's Son. Q. Believest thou in the Holy Ghost? A. I believe in the Holy Ghost." [C.]

PROFESSIONS. [TRADES.]

PROHIBITED BOOKS. I. Heathen Precedent.—The suppression by public authority of books adverse to the prevailing religion was common long before the Christian era; e.g. the Athenians scandalized by a declaration of Protagoras, B.C. 411, that he was uncertain of the existence of gods, "called in his books from their possessors by the voice of a public crier, and burned them in the market-place" (Diogen. Laert. Vitae Philos. ix. 8, § 3; sim. Lactant. de Irâ Dei, 9). Another instance, in which the actors were Greeks, is recorded in the First Book of Maccabees (i. 56): the officers of Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 168, "rent in pieces the books of the law which they found, and burnt them with fire." Examples are frequent among the Romans. During the second Punic war, B.C. 213, when foreign superstitions were gaining a footing in Rome, a senatus-consultum was passed, and published by the praetor urbis, to the effect that any one possessed of "books of soothsaying, or prayers or written treatises on the art of sacrificing," should give them up to the praetor by a certain day (Livy, Hist. xxvi.). On a discovery of the nature of the Bacchanalian rites, B.C. 186, the consul Posthumius, when explaining the cause of their suppression to the people, declared that the magistrates had often been charged with the duty of "forbidding the performance of foreign rites . . . collecting and burning books of soothsaying, and abolishing every mode of sacrifice not after the Roman custom" (ibid. xxxix. 16). Five years later the Greek books found near the tomb of Numa were immediately burnt "per victimarios . . . in conspectu populi, quia aliqua ex parte ad solvendam religionem pertinere existimabantur" (Valerius Max. Memorab. I. i. 14. Compare Plutarch in Numa, Reiske, i. 298; Lactant. Instit. i. 22). When Augustus became Pontifex Maximus, he collected and burnt above two thousand "libri fatidici" (Suetonius, Octav. 31). The works of political opponents were exposed to the same fate. Thus the writings of Labienus, about 12 B.C. (Seneca, Controvers. vi. Praef.), those of Cremutius, A.D. 25 (Tacitus, Annal. iv. 35), those of Fabricius Veiento, A.D. 63, of Arulenus Rusticus and Herennius Senecio ("monumenta clarissimorum ingeniorum," Tacit. Agricola, 2) were in the same manner publicly destroyed. The books of the Manichaeans were also under the ban of heathen princes. Thus Diocletian and Maximian, A.D. 289, ordered the teachers of the "Persian doctrine to be burnt with their abominable books" (Baron, ann. 288; iii. 252, ed. 1738), and Cabades, king of Persia, A.D. 516, after a great slaughter of the sect, caused their books to be burned throughout his dominions (Theophanes, Chronogr. ad ann. i. 263, ed. Bonn).

II. Christian Books suppressed by Jews and Heathens.—When Christianity began to acquire strength, this familiar mode of suppression was applied both by Jews and Gentiles to all writings that were supposed to teach or favour it. Addressing the Jews of his day, Anastasius-Sinaita, A.D. 561, says: "Your fathers, who were then completely worsted, . . . commanded that none of the Jews should possess in writing an account of the things done by Christ, or seek after them at all, or read them" (Disput. adv. Judaeos; Migne, Ser. Gr. lxxxix. 1246). The existence of such a law explains, as nothing else can, the total silence of Philo and the probable silence of Josephus on that subject; or if the passage in his Antiquities (xvii. 4, § 3) be not an interpolation, it accounts for the very brief notice which the facts on that supposition extorted from the latter. The Jews hoped that the new religion would die out if left to oral tradition. The heathens were influenced by the same policy. "Through the agency of wicked demons," says Justin Martyr, "death was decreed against those who read the books of Hystaspes, or the Sibyl, or the prophets" (Apol. i. 44; comp. Clem. Alex. Stromata, VI. v. 43). Diocletian ordered "the destruction of the Scriptures by fire," in edicts published throughout the empire (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. viii. 2). In every persecution, in fact, they were demanded of the Christians for this purpose, and many were required to attest their abjuration of the gospel by burning its sacred records themselves. Those who gave them up were conventionally termed "traditores" [TRADITOR], a name which, according to St. Augustine, came into use some forty years after the death of St. Cyprian (d. 258), when a great "burning of the divine books" took place in Africa under Maxentius (De Baptismo, v. 1; vii. 2; Optat. de Schism. Donat. i. 13).

III. Christian Prohibition of Heathen Books.—The works of the heathen were, on the other hand, proscribed by the Christians, but not without discrimination. Some writers were more severe and strict than others, but we are evidently to understand their denunciations for the most part of those books only which had a bearing on religion, or encouraged a loose morality. The Apostolical Constitutions (i. 6) in both recensions say: "Refrain from all the books of the Gentiles; for what hast thou to do with strange discourses or laws, or with false prophets, which even turn the light-minded from the faith?" Gregory Nazianzen, A.D. 363, hearing that his namesake of Nyssa, instead of reading to the people as before the "sacred and refreshing books" of holy Scripture, had turned to the "brackish and undrinkable" founts of heathen knowledge, accused him at once of "desiring rather to be called a rhetor than a Christian" (Epist. 12, al. 43). St. Basil, the brother of the latter, has left a discourse addressed "to the Young on the Way to profit by the Hellenic Literature." His opinion is that much good may be obtained from it by those who resolutely put aside the evil part, and study to bring the innocent into the service of religion. Then, "if the two literatures are at all in harmony with each other, the knowledge of them both will be of great service to us; but if not, to have compared them, and ascertained the difference will tend not a little to the confirmation of the better" (§ 2; ii. 175). St. Jerome, 378, referring to Eph. vi. 4, says: "Let those bishops and presbyters read it who train their sons in secular literature, and make them read comedies, and sing the shameful writings of the actors," &c. (Comm. iii. in Ep. ad Eph. u. s. See also Epist. 22 ad Eustoch. § 30; comp. Aug. in Ps. 103, Enarr. S. ii. § 4; in Ps. 31, Enarr. S. ii. § 18; De Anima et ejus Orig. ii. 17, § 23). One ground of abstinence from even the more innocent productions of heathen writers is mentioned by Germanus, the monk, in Cassian (Collat. xiv. 12), viz. the distractions that arise at prayer from images suggested by a study of poetry and history. Paulinus of Nola (Poema, 10) tells us that hearts devoted to Christ are closed to Apollo and the Muses. The council of Carthage, 398, decrees: "Ut episcopus Gentilium libros non legat, haereticorum autem pro necessitate temporis" (can. 16). Much later Gregory I. strongly denounces a French bishop who was said to teach belles-lettres, "quia in uno se ore cum Jovis laudibus Christi laudes non capiunt" (Epist. ix. 48). John the Deacon says that Gregory "forbade the reading of Gentile books to all pontiffs without exception" (Vita Greg. iii. 33). Isidore of Seville, about 630, says that the Christian is "forbidden to read the fictions of the poets," on account of their tendency to corrupt the mind (Sentent. iii. 13). Of Gentile books in general he says: "Cavendi sunt tales libri, et propter amorem sanctorum scripturarum vitandi" (ibid.).

Monks were especially bound to renounce the works of heathen writers. Isidore of Pelusium, A.D. 412, writing to one, says: "What is there among them to be preferred to ours? What is there that is not full of falsehood and matter for laughter in the subjects which they study? Are not their divine principles framed out of passions? Are not their many actions for the sake of passions? Are not their conflicts for passions? Shun, therefore, the reading of the shameful stuff, for it hath a terrible power to reopen wounds that are skinned over," &c. (Epist. i. 63). St. Nilus, 440, to a monastic collector of books: "The rubbish and ashes and mud of the books of the Gentiles why dost thou with such diligence rake together, to no profit, but to hurt, after renouncing them in a monastery" (Epist. ii. 73). To a disciple he says: "Read not the books of the heathen, neither historical nor tropological, nor touch the old literature at all; but read the New Testament, and the accounts of the martyrs, and the lives of the fathers, and the sayings of the aged" (iv. 1). Isidore of Seville, in his Regula Monachorum: "Let the monk be careful not to read the books of the Gentiles, or the volumes of the heretics; for it is better to be ignorant of their pernicious tenets than by experiment to run into any snare or error" (viii. 3). Eginhard, who had been secretary to Charlemagne, but afterwards an abbat, to his son, a monk at Fulda: "Grammatica et rhetorica, caeteraque liberalium artium studia, vana sunt, et valde nociva servis Dei nisi per gratiam Divinam bonis moribus subesse nescantur, quia scientia inflat, caritas vero aedificat. Melius mihi quidem est ut te mortuum videre contingat quam inflatum et scatentem vitiis" (Epist. 30, ad Vussin. Migne, 104, col. 519).

It is probable that in no single instance are we to understand a Christian writer as desiring the absolute suppression, without qualification or exception, of the entire body of the ancient literature. This was, for example, very far from the meaning of St. Jerome, who elsewhere defends the appeal of Christian writers to the testimony of the heathen, and instances Cyprian, Quadratus, Aristides, Justin Martyr, Clemens of Alexandria, and many others, as men who had made a good use of secular learning (Epist. 70 ad Magnum Orat.). Long before this we find Origen exhorting Gregory Thaumaturgus to study the philosophies of the Greeks as προπαιδευματα to Christianity, and "geometry and astronomy as likely to be useful in the interpretation of the holy Scriptures" (Epist. ad Greg. § 1, ed. Lomm. xvii. 49). It is clear that these pursuits were even carried to a dangerous excess by some, and that so early as the 5th century. For a proof we may refer to the applause which Sidonius, bishop of Clermont (472), bestows on the secular poems of Consentius (Epist. viii. 4), and to the spirit in which he compares the work of Mamertus (de Statu Animae) with the productions of various heathen, as well as Christian, writers (iv. 3). The poem of Mamertus himself (Contra Poetas Vanos) "bears evidence of its writer having carefully studied some of the Roman poets" (Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biogr. n. Mamertus); nor does he in the course of it condemn the study of them as sinful, but rather as unsatisfactory, and fit for children only, desiring to direct his friend to the higher themes which the gospel can supply (Biblioth. Vet. PP. v. pt. i. 979).

IV. Spurious and supposititious Writings claiming to be Christian.—These were very numerous at an early period, and as their object was in almost every case to recommend some heresy, cautions against them abound from the 3rd century downwards. Thus one of the apostolic canons (n. 60): "If anyone shall publicly set forth as holy in the church the books of the impious with false titles (ψευδεπίγραφα) to the destruction of the people and the clergy, let him be deposed." We may remark that the canon is evidently dealing with a well-known class of writings. The Apostolical Constitutions, in the longer Greek recension: "You must not regard the names of the apostles, . . . for we know that the disciples of Simon and Cleobius have compiled poisonous books in the name of Christ and His disciples . . . Also among the ancients some have composed apocryphal books of Moses and Enoch, and Adam and Esaias, and David and Elias, and the three patriarchs, that are pernicious, and opposed to the truth" (vi. 16).

For details of this literature see Dict. Chr. B. s. vv. ACTS, APOCRYPHAL; APOCALYPSEE, APOCRYPHAL; EPISTLES, APOCRYPHAL; GOSPELS, APOCRYPHAL; CLEMENTINE LITERATURE; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIC LITERATURE; the several names of the supposed authors of apocryphal works, and the titles of anonymous works.

V. Fictitious Martyrologies.—Stories of persecutions and martyrdom were naturally popular, and were easily made the vehicle of heresy. A decree against such false or tainted narratives by the council in Trullo (A.D. 690) shews that the danger from this source was still recognized, and that the church in the East was still vigilant against it, at the end of the 7th century: "We command that the martyrologies falsely compiled by the enemies of truth to do dishonour to the martyrs of Christ, and lead those who hear them to unbelief, be not read publicly in the church, but that they be delivered to the fire" (can. 63). An illustration occurs in the document transcribed in the next section, viz. in Passio Quirici, &c., Passio Georgii.

VI. The Roman Index Librorum Prohibitorum.—The earliest example of a list of proscribed books proceeding from Rome is a document variously ascribed to pope Gelasius (A.D. 494), or to Hormisdas (514), but more probably of the 8th century. It will be well to give this in extenso with such notes as may appear useful. We print it from Hard. Conc. ii. 940, where it occurs among the decrees of a Roman council, said to have been held in the time of Gelasius:—

"Notitia Librorum Apocryphorum qui non recipiuntur (al. qui recipi non debent).

"In primis Ariminensem synodum a Constantio Caesare Constantini Augusti filio congregatam (A.D. 359, Arian against its better mind), mediante Tauro praefecto, ex tunc et nunc, et usque in aeternum, confitemur esse damnatum.

"Item itinerarium (= περίοδος) Petri apostoli, quod appellatur Sancti Clementis, libri octo (al. novem, al. decem), apocryphum. (The Recognitions of Clement (Ἀναγνωρισμός), so called by Rufinus, who translated it (De Adult. Libror. Origenis ad calc. Opp. Orig. xxv. 386, ed. Lomm.); otherwise "Clementis Itinerarium, Gesta, Historia, Historiae, Chronica, and Clemens; and from Peter, Petri Periodi and Itinerarium, Petri Actus, i. e. by Clement [see Photius, Biblioth. 113], other than those Acts of Peter, of which Peter is the alleged author; and the Disputatio Petri cum Apione;" (Cotel. PP. Apost. i. 484.)

"Actus nomine Andreae Apostoli, apocryphi. (See Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii. 25; Philastr. de Haer. 88; Epiph. Haer. xlvii. 1, lxi. 1, lxiii. 2; Innoc. Epist. ad Exuper. 7; Turribius, Epist. § 5 inter Epp. Leon. M.)

"Actus nomine Thomae apostoli libri decem, apocryphi. (Twofold, one Manichaean mentioned by Turribius (u. s.), and Augustine (De Serm. Dom. i. 20, § 65), and another put forth by the Eneerates and Apostolics; Epiph. Haer. xlvii. 1, lxi. 1).

"Actus nomine Petri apostoli, apocryphi (Eusebius, u. s. iii. 3; Philastrius, Haer. 88; Hieron. Viri Illustr. 1; Isidorus Pelus. Epist. ii. 99).

"Actus nomine Philippi apostoli, apocryphi.

"Evangelium nomine Thaddaei, apocryphum.

"Evangelium nomine Matthiae, apocryphum (Origen in S. Luc. Ev. Hom. 1, in init.; Euseb. H. E. iii. 25; Ambr. Expos. Ev. Luc. i. 2; Jerome Praef. in Comm. super Matth. Ev.; Innoc. u. s.; Bede, Comm. in S. Luc. Ev. i. 1).

"Evangelium nomine Petri apostoli, apocryphum (Origen, Comm. in Matth. Ev. x. § 17; Eusebius, u. s. iii. 3, 25, vi. 12; Jerome de Vir. Illust. 1; Theodoret, Haer. Fab. ii. 2).

"Evangelium nomine Jacobi minoris, apocryphum. (The Protevangelium, because treating briefly of the infancy of Christ. Mentioned by Origen, Comm. in S. Matth. x. § 17; Epiph. Haer. xxx. 23; Innoc. u. s. Probably quoted by Justin Martyr, Dial. c. Tryph. 78 (see the Protev. c. 18), Clemens Alex. Strom. vii. 16, § 93 (comp. Protev. 19), and Epiph. lxxix. 5 (comp. Protev. 1, 2).)

"Evangelium nomine Barnabae, apocryphum.

"Evangelium (al. evangelia) nomine Thomae, quo (al. quibus) utuntur Manichaei, apocryphum (al. apocrypha). (Written by Thomas, a Manichaean; see Origen in Luc. Hom. i.; Hippol. Refut. Omn. Haer. v. 7; Euseb. H. E. iii. 25; Cyril. Hier. Catech. iv. 21, vi. 18; Amb. u. s.; Jerome, Praef. in Comm. super Matth.; Innoc. u. s.; Leontius Byz. de Sectis, iii. 2; Petrus Siculus, Hist. Munich. 16; Bede, u. s.; Pseudo-Athan. u. s.)

"Evangelium (al. evangelia) nomine Bartholomaei apostoli, apocryphum (al. apocrypha). (Jerome, u. s.; Bede, u. s. Possibly under this name is condemned by mistake the Hebrew copy of St. Matthew, taken by St. Bartholomew into India; Euseb. v. 10.)

"Evangelium nomine Andreae apostoli, apocryphum (Innoc. u. s., who ascribes it to Xenocharides (or Nexocharides) and Leontius; August. c. Advers. Leg. et Proph. i. 20, § 39).

"Evangelia quae falsavit Lucianus, apocrypha.

(The forger more commonly known as Leucius Charinus; see below.)

"Liber de Infantia Salvatoris, apocryphus. (Irenaeus, c. Haer. i. 20, § 1, ascribes a story found in this to the Marcosians. Anastasius Sinaïta perhaps refers to it, Hodegus 13. Pseudo-Jerome seems to speak of this, or a part of it (Epist. ad Chromat. et Heliod. inter Opp. Hieron.) under the title of Liber de Nativitate S. Mariae. He ascribes it to Seleucus (= Leucius). Its full title is Libellus de Miraculis Infantiae D. J. C., but the first twenty-four chapters have been known as Liber de Nativitate Mariae, et de Infantia Salvatoris.)

"Evangelia quae falsavit Esitius (al. Isicius), apocrypha. (St. Jerome (Epist. ad Damasum) couples Hesychi with Lucianus as giving name to books held genuine by a few.)

"Liber de Nativitate (al. Infantia) Salvatoris, et de Maria et obstetrice (al. ejus), apocryphus. (Probably, from the matter, the Protevangelium Jacobi before mentioned under another title.)

"Liber qui appellatur Pastoris, apocryphus. (The Shepherd of Hermas. No book is more frequently cited by early writers, as Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clemens Al., Origen, Athanasius, &c. It proceeded from Rome, and the ground of its condemnation here is only matter of conjecture.)

"Libri omnes quos fecit Leucius discipulus diaboli, apocryphus. (This arch-forger is so called by Evodius (de Fide c. Manichaeos, 4, inter Opp. Aug. App. vi. ed. Ben.); but the older editions give Leontius and one Vatican MS. Locutius), by Innocent (u. s.) as author of a 'book under the name of Peter and John,' by Turribius (u. s.), Photius (Biblioth. 114), according to whom all the 'Apostolorum Periodi,' containing 'Acts of Peter, John, Andrew, Thomas, and Paul,' were written by 'Leucius Charinus.' St. Augustine writes the name Leutius (Acta cum Felice, ii. 6; but some MSS. give Leviticus or Lentitio). His full name, Leucius Charinus, is also thought to be disguised under 'Xenocharides and Leonidas' in Innocent (u. s.). Atto Vercell. calls him Seleucius (Hard. in loc.); Pseudo-Jerome (u. s.), Seleucus, and in the present document he has appeared as Lucianus; and so Jerome; Ep. ad Damas., as above.)

"Liber qui appellatur Fundamentum, apocryphus. (Ascribed to the founder of the Manichaeans, Aug. de Nat. Boni, 42, 46; comp. Acta cum Felice, ii. 1. It was in the form of an epistle.)

"Liber qui appellatur Thesaurus, apocryphus. (Cyrill. Hier. Catech. vi. 13. It is ascribed by him to Manes, but by Archelaus, A.D. 278, Disp. cum Manich. (Galland. Biblioth. iii. 569), to Terbinthus or Turbo (572). See Photius, 85.)

"Liber de Filiabus Adae Leptogeneosae, apocryphus. (Mentioned by Epiphanius, Haer. xxxix. 6; Jerome, Ep. 78 ad Fabiol. 18; Cedrenus, Compend. Hist. 9, ed. Nieb.)

"Centones de Christo, Virgilianis compaginati versibus, apocryphi. ('Proba, uxor Adelphi, centonem ex Virgilio de Fabrica Mundi et Evangelii plenissime expressit . . . Et quidam Pomponius ex eodem poeta . . . Tityrum in Christi honorem composuit: similiter et de Aeneide'; Isid. Hispal. Etymol. i. 39, § 26.)

"Liber qui appellatur Actus Theclae et Pauli apostoli, apocryphus (Tertullian de Bapt. 17; Greg. Naz. Orat. iv. 69, xxi. 22, xxiv. 10; Greg.

Nyss. Hom. xiv. in Cant. Cant. i. 676; Jerome, Ep. 21 ad Eustoch. § 40; Aug. de Sanc. Virginitate, 44, § 45; and many others.)

"Liber qui appellatur Nepotis, apocryphus. (The work of a Judaizing Egyptian bishop of that name, Euseb. H. E. vii. 24; Vigilius, de Trib. Capit. 60.)

"Liber Proverbiorum, qui ab haereticis conscriptus, et sancti Xysti nomine praenotatus est, apocryphus. (The Sententiae of Sextus Pythagoreus mistaken for a Christian book in the unfaithful translation of Rufinus, and ascribed to Xystus of Rome; Orig. c. Cels. viii. 30; Jerome, adv. Jovin. i. 49, Ep. 133 ad Ctesiph. 3, Comm. in Jerem. xlii. 24, Comm. in Ezek. xviii. 5; Aug. de Nat. et Grat. 64, § 77, Retract. ii. 42; Gennadius, de Vir. Illust. 17.)

"Revelatio quae appellatur Pauli apostoli, apocrypha. (Probably the Ἀναβατικόν (founded on 2 Cor. xii. 2), a Cainite forgery. See Tertull. Praescrypt. 24; Epiphani. Haer. xxxviii. 2; Aug. Tract. 98 in S. Joan. Ev. § 8; Sozom. H. E. vii. 19, &c.)

"Revelatio quae appellatur Thomae apostoli, apocrypha.

"Revelatio quae appellatur sancti, Stephani, apocrypha. (Epistola Luciani de Revelatione corporis Stephani. Probably condemned, because the writer was mistaken for Leucius. See Aug. Serm. 318, § 1, 319, § 6; Gennad. de Vir. Illust. 46. There is a Latin translation by Avitus inter Opp. Aug. App. vi. ed. Ben.)

"Liber qui appellatur Transitus, id est, Assumptio sanctae Mariae, apocryphus. (Pseudo-Jerome, ad Paul. et Eustoch. de Assumpt. B. V.; Bede, in Acta Apost. Retract. 8, 13; Pseudo-Alcuin, Opp. Alc. P. ix. Hom. 3, de Nat. M.)

"Liber qui appellatur Poenitentia Aadae, apocryphus. (Gnostic; and probably the same as the Apocalypsis Aadae; Epiph. Haer. xxvi. 8; Celrenus, u. s. 17.)

"Liber Ogiae (Thiel's second copy ascribed to Hormisdas reads Eugenio, Epist. Rom. Pontif. i. 396; others variously), qui ab haereticis cum dracone post diluvium pugnasse fingitur, apocryphus. (Probably the Manichaean Book of the Giants; Timoth. C. P. de Haeret. Recept. in Meursii Varia Dicina, 117; Photius, Biblioth. 85.)

"Liber qui appellatur Testamentum Job, apocryphus.

"Liber qui appellatur Poenitentia Origenis, apocryphus.

"Liber qui appellatur Poenitentia sancti Cypriani, apocryphus. (The Confessio S. Cypriani, a spurious tract, in which he is made to represent himself as having practised magic, &c., before his conversion; printed by Fell, ad Calc. Opp. Cyp. 53, 2nd pagination. See below.)

"Liber qui appellatur Poenitentia Jamrae et Mambrae, apocryphus. (2 Tim. iii. 8.)

"Liber qui appellatur Sortes sanctorum Apostolorum, apocryphus. [SORTILEGY.]

"Liber qui appellatur Laus (al. lusus; Thiel, 466, Lusa, 937, Jus) Apostolorum, apocryphus. (The true reading is most probably Jussa, by which we are to understand the Constitutions. This is confirmed by the immediate mention of the canons in some MSS.)

"Liber qui appellatur Canones Apostolorum, apocryphus.

"Liber Physiologus qui ab haereticis con-scriptus est et beati nomine Ambrosii signatus (al. praenotatus), apocryphus.

"Historia Eusebii Pamphili, apocrypha. (But see below, sect. VIII.)

"Opuscula Lactantii (al. Firmiani), apocrypha. (Not a theologian, and therefore falling into some minor errors, though probably orthodox in intention.)

"Opuscula (Julii) Africani, apocrypha. (Condemned for no better reason, we presume, than that the Chronicon of Eusebius was founded on his Chronica.)

"Opuscula Postumiani et Galli, apocrypha.

"Opuscula Montani Priscillae et Maximillae, apocrypha. (See Apollon. in Euseb. H. E. v. 18; Petrus Siculus Hist. Manich. 23.)

"Opuscula omnia Fausti Manichaei, apocrypha. (The writer confuted by St. Augustine.)

"Opuscula Commodiani, apocrypha. (On account of some errors in his poems, partly akin to those of Lactantius in reference to the Millennium, the Resurrection, &c.)

"Opuscula alterius Clementis Alexandrini apocrypha. (This author could hardly have been understood in the West in the 8th century, and we may conjecture that his 'gnostic' was ignorantly confounded with the heretic so called.)

"Opuscula Tascii Cypriani, apocrypha. (The saint's full name was Thascius Caecilius Cyprianus. As the 'Opuscula beati Caecilii Cypriani Martyris et Carthaginiensis episcopi' are fully approved in the former part of the alleged decree of Gelasius, Hard. ibid. 939, the reference here must be to the magician Cyprian of romance, with whom he was confounded, Greg. Naz. Orat. 18; Prudent. de Cor. 13. See before.)

"Opuscula Arnobii, apocrypha. (His work Adv. Nationes was a very able defence of the Gospel and exposure of paganism, but written before he was fully instructed in Christian doctrine.)

"Opuscula Tychonii, apocrypha. (A Donatist, who yet wrote against his own party, A.D. 390. See Aug. de Doctr. Christ. iii. 30-37, where his Book of Rules is dissected.)

"Opuscula Cassiani (al. Cassionis) presbyteri Galliarum, apocrypha. (John Cassian, the Semipelagian founder of monachism in the Latin church.)

"Opuscula Victorini Pictaviensis (al. Petabionensis), apocrypha. (Bishop of Pettaw on the Drave, a Millenarian.)

"Opuscula Fausti Regensis Galliarum, apocrypha. (The Semipelagian, A.D. 472.)

"Opuscula Frumentii Caeci, apocrypha.

"Epistola Jesu ad Abagarum regem, apocrypha. (Received by Eusebius, H. E. i. 13, Darius, whose epistle to Augustine is extant (Ep. 230 inter Epp. Aug. § 5), Procopius (de Bello Persico, ii. 12) and others.)

"Passio Quirici (al. Cyrici) et Julittae, apocrypha. (By Manichaeans or other heretics. So Theodorus Icon, who wrote the more trustworthy Martyrium printed by Ruinart, Acta Martyrium, 419, ed. 2. Condemned also by Nicephorus, the Confessor, A.D. 806, Const. Eccl. 13, al. 46, Spicil. Solesm. iv. 390.)

"Passio Georgii, apocrypha. ('Of all the Acts of St. George which we possess now—and they are sufficiently numerous—there are none that can claim any credence, or that do not carry on their face visible marks of falsehood' (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. v. 81). Two Martyrdoms of St. George are condemned by Nicephorus, u. s.)

"Scriptura quae appellatur Contradictio Salomonis, apocrypha.

"Phylacteria omnia, quae non angelorum (ut illi confingunt), sed daemonum magis arte (al. nominibus) conscripta sunt, apocrypha. [See "HYLACTERY.]"

VIII. Modified Judgments.—In the earlier part of the Pseudo-Gelasian decree it is said of certain "new narratives of the invention of the cross, and the invention of the head of John the Baptist," "When they come into the hands of Catholics, let the sayings of the blessed Paul the apostle go before, prove all things: hold fast that which is good." On the works of Rufinus, the reader is referred to the judgment of St. Jerome. Some of the works of Origen which Jerome does not reject may be read. "Reliqua autem omnia cum auctore suo dicimus esse renuenda" (Hard. ibid. 940). On the works of Origen see especially Jerome, Epp. 86-100, 124; Epist. Synod. Theophili, inter Epp. Hieron. 92, § 1; Socr. H. E. vi. 7, 10; Soz. H. E. viii. 11, 14; Sulp. Severus, Dial. i. 3; Vita Pachomii, 17. The Chronica and Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, though the latter is condemned in the Notitia Apocryphorum, are for their utility not "altogether to be rejected, but the lukewarmness of the First Book, and his defence of Origen are noted" (Hard. u. s.).

IX. Suppression effectual.—When the bishops could appeal to no express law of the empire, they could at least excommunicate for the offence of reading books condemned by the church: and they did so. E. g. the patriarch of Constantinople, 595, punished a priest of Lycaonia for possessing and reading a book "in which many heretical things were contained." He fled to Rome, but was not received to communion there, until he made a declaration of having done it "in simplicity," professed the orthodox faith, condemned everything heretical in the book, manifest or latent, and pledged himself never to read it again (Epist. Greg. M. v. 24).

Gretser de Jure et More prohibendi, expurgandi, et abolendi, Libros Haereticos et Noxios, Ingolst. 1603; in the Supplementum Duplex to the same work, Ingolst. 1604; and the later Epimetrum sive Auctarium; all printed together in the 13th volume of his works, Ratisb. 1739. PROHIBITED DEGREES. In order to prevent incest, marriage has been forbidden in all civilized nations between persons related to one another by blood or through marriage. How far the prohibition should extend has differed in different nations or in the same nations at different times.

The words "prohibited degrees" are not free from ambiguity. They mean that marriage is forbidden between persons related or connected with each other within certain degrees or steps of nearness. Thus, in the direct line father and daughter are related in the first degree; the same man and his grand-daughter are related in the second degree; the same man and his great-granddaughter are related in the third degree, and so on, whether in the descending or ascending line. The principle here is plain—there is one step between father and daughter, two between grandfather and granddaughter, three between great-grandfather and great-granddaughter; consequently they are related to one another in the first, second, and third degrees respectively. But when we pass from the direct line to the collateral line, a confusion arises, owing to a different manner of calculation adopted by canonists and civilians. According to the canon law, brothers and sisters are related in the first degree, because there is but one step from each to the father, in whom their blood unites. First cousins are said to be related in the second degree, because from each there are two steps to the grandfather in whom their blood unites; and similarly the children of first cousins, commonly called second cousins, are said to be related in the third degree, because each is separated by three steps from the common grandfather. When one of the parties is distant only two steps from the common stirps, and the other three steps, they are said to be related to each other not in the second but in the third degree.

But the civil lawyers calculate otherwise. According to them, the brother and sister are related in the second degree, because from the brother to his father is one step, and from the father to his daughter (that is, the brother's sister) is a second step. On the same principle an uncle and niece are related in the third degree, because from the uncle to his father there is one step, from that father to his son a second step, and from that son to his daughter (the uncle's niece) a third step. First cousins, according to this calculation, are related only in the fourth degree, because from one cousin to the grandfather there are two steps, and from the grandfather to the other cousin there are two steps more.

Consequently, when we speak of "prohibited degrees" of propinquity, we must understand whether we are speaking the language of the canon or of the civil law. In the Digest, lib. xxxviii. tit. x. (Corpus Juris Civilis, tom. i. p. 1423, Paris, 1627), an enumeration is made of all relationships in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh degrees, but it will be seen at once how much these must differ from the relationships calculated on the principles of the canon law (see Vinnius, In quatuor libros Institutionum Commentarius, De Nuptiis, § 4, p. 53, and De Gradibus Cognationum, p. 507, ed. 1672; Selden de Jure Gentium, v. ii. Op. vol. i. p. 558, Lond. 1726; Brouwer de Jure Conubiorum, lib. ii. c. 9, p. 442, Delphis, 1714). Degrees of affinity are calculated in the same way as those of consanguinity; a man is therefore in the first degree of affinity (according to the method of calculation adopted by the canon law) with his brother's wife, in the second degree with his cousin's wife, in the third degree with the wife of his second cousin.

It is necessary to have a clear apprehension of what is meant by consanguinity or affinity in the different degrees, in order to follow the changes of the canon law as it varied its prohibitions from time to time.

The early Christians found two tables of prohibitions already framed, one contained in the books of Moses, the other in the Roman law. They supplemented these lists by two other tables, which they created for themselves by Imperial legislation and by the decrees of councils.

The Mosaic Code.—In the law of Moses, marriage is forbidden with the following blood relations:—Mother (Lev. xviii. 7), daughter (Lev. xviii. 17), sister and half-sister (Lev. xviii. 9; xx. 17; Deut. xxvii. 22), granddaughter (Lev. xviii. 10), aunt (Lev. xviii. 12, 13; xx. 19). In this list the mother, daughter, and sister are related in the first degree of consanguinity, the granddaughter and aunt in the second degree. The grandmother and the niece are omitted. By the same law, marriage is forbidden to the following relations by affinity:—Mother-in-law and grandmother-in-law (Lev. xviii. 17; xx. 14; Deut. xxvii. 23), daughter-in-law (Lev. xviii. 15; xx. 12), brother's wife (Lev. xviii. 16; xx. 21), except in one case where it is sanctioned by a positive enactment for a special political purpose (Deut. xxv. 5), step-mother (Lev. xviii. 8; xx. 11; Deut. xii. 30), step-daughter (Lev. xviii. 17), step-granddaughter (ibid.), aunt by marriage, or uncle's wife (Lev. xviii. 14; xx. 20), "a wife to her sister" (Lev. xviii. 18). In this list the wife's mother, the wife's daughter, the wife's sister (if such be the meaning of the expression "a wife to her sister"), the step-mother, the daughter-in-law, the brother's wife would be related in the first degree of affinity, the wife's granddaughter and the uncle's wife in the second degree.

Whether marriage with two sisters successively is either allowed or forbidden, or not touched by Lev. xviii. 18, is a question which has been hotly contested. The verse, as translated in our version, reads thus: "Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, to vex her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other in her lifetime." These words cannot be construed to condemn successive marriage with two sisters. If they refer to such marriage at all, they must be regarded as permitting it; for the words "in her lifetime" cannot be understood otherwise; but the Hebrew words may be translated in such a way as to give a very different sense to the verse. Accordingly the marginal reading runs,

"Neither shalt thou take one wife to another," in place of the words, "Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister." Thus rendered, the verse forbids not merely the simultaneous marriage of two sisters, but of any two women; in other words, it is a prohibition of polygamy. Though the marginal reading was first suggested only in the 16th century, there is no doubt that grammatically the Hebrew phrase may be so rendered (see Exod. xxvi. 3, 5, 6, 17, and Ezek. i. 11, 23), and it is rendered in some such manner in every other place in the Bible where it occurs. The objections taken to such rendering are minute and arbitrary. But though grammatically unassailable, it lands us in this difficulty, that the verse, if so interpreted, appears to be a distinct prohibition of polygamy, and yet there are other passages which seem equally clearly to permit it (Ex. xxi. 7-11; Deut. xxi. 15-17; xvii. 17). And it cannot be denied that, if polygamy was to be forbidden, we should expect it to be forbidden in a more unmistakable manner. To this objection it may be replied that the verse does not contain a general prohibition of polygamy, but that it commands a man not to take one wife to another "to rex" the latter. According to this interpretation, the verse would neither be a prohibition to marry two sisters during the lifetime of both of them, nor consequently a permission to marry a wife's sister after the decease of one of them, nor again would it be a prohibition of polygamy in general, but it would be an injunction addressed to a polygamist forbidding him to marry a woman who would be likely "to rex" a wife whom he had already married, from being known to have a spite against her, or any other reason. If this is the true interpretation of the verse, as seems probable, it has no bearing upon our subject. Marriage with a wife's sister is not forbidden by the Mosaic tables unless it come under the general prohibition, "None of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him to uncover their nakedness" (Lev. xviii. 6), where there is no doubt that the expression "near of kin" denotes those related not only by consanguinity but by affinity. The fact of a wife's sister being in the first degree of affinity and the argument from analogy make it likely that she is included under the generic term, "near of kin," but she is not specifically named.

The Roman Code.—By the Roman code marriage was forbidden with the following blood-relations (natural or adopted):—Mother, daughter, grandmother, granddaughter, sister, half-sister,^a and aunt. Marriage with a niece was likewise regarded as incestuous, but when Claudius desired to marry Agrippina, he obtained from the senate a decree, "quo justae inter patruos fratrumque filias nuptiae etiam in posterum staturerentur" (Tac. Annal. xii. 7), thus causing marriage with a brother's daughter to be legalized, though marriage with a sister's daughter still continued illegal. The innovation introduced in Claudius' favour, though afterwards acted upon by Domitian, was never sanctioned by public feeling.

The marriage of first cousins was also originally disallowed, but by the 2nd century A.C. it had come to be regarded as unobjectionable.^b

According to Roman law, therefore, marriage with blood relations was forbidden to those related in the first and second degrees of proximity, except so far as the ancient severity was relaxed by custom in respect to cousins, and in respect to brothers' daughters, for the sake of indulging the desires of Claudius.

By the same law, marriage was forbidden with mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, step-mother and step-daughter (natural or adopted), that is, with those related in the first degree of affinity, omitting the brother's wife and the wife's sister.

It will be seen that the Mosaic and the Roman tables almost coincide. The chief difference is that the Roman table named the niece, until altered at the instance of Claudius, while the Hebrew table omits to name her, though she at least is undoubtedly covered by the expression, "near of kin." The Koran, basing its regulations on the Mosaic code, specifies the niece, and adds foster-mother and foster-sisters (Sur. iv. 20).

We may note in passing that the Greek tables of prohibition were less austere than those of the Romans, as would be expected from the character of the two peoples. In Athens and Sparta marriage with half-sisters and nieces was permissible. But Greece was chaste in comparison with Persia and Egypt, in the first of which marriage with mothers was the custom, and in the last marriage with sisters (see Selden, who enters at length into the question of gentile licence (De Jure Gentium, v. 11; Op. vol. i. p. 553).

The Imperial Code.—The Christian Imperial code was not a separate whole in itself. It took up the old Roman law where it found it, and enlarged, curtailed, or otherwise modified it, according to the altered needs of the times (see Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. iv. leg. 17, de Cognatis et Affinibus). In respect to marriage there were three questions on which opinion was divided: 1. Marriage with a niece; 2. Marriage with a deceased wife's sister; 3. Marriage with a first cousin.

The shock given to public opinion and religious feeling by the legislation which sanctioned the marriage of the emperor Claudius with his brother's daughter Agrippina was not got over. Domitian indeed followed the example of Claudius, and married the daughter of his brother Titus; but such marriages were forbidden by Nerva, who prohibited all marriages with a niece, whether she were the daughter of the brother or of the sister. By the time, however, of Caracalla we learn from Ulpian that marriage with a brother's daughter was again permissible, and this continued to be the law down to the time of Constantine. Sozomen reports (Hist. Eccles. lib. i.

^a The consanguinity and affinity resulting from adoption was called legal relationship. It ceased to be an impediment to marriage in the case of brothers and sisters by adoption as soon as the adoption itself had ceased by the death of the adopting parent or the emancipation of either the adopted or the real child. Legal relationship was acknowledged by the church as an impediment (Nicholas, I. Resp. ad Bulg. c. ii.).

^b Spurius Ligustinus, A.C. 171, says, while recounting the good things that he had done or which had befallen him, "Pater mihi uxorem fratris sui filiam dedit" (Liv. xiii. 34). Vitellius, in arguing for Claudius's marriage with his niece, A.C. 56, says: "Conjugia sobrinorum diu ignorata tempore addito percrebuisse" (Tac. Annal. xii. 6).

cap. viii. p. 21, Cantab. 1720) that Constantine passed some laws to restrain unlawful marriages, but no such laws have come down to us. Constantius, in the year 339, took up the question of marriage with a niece, and not only utterly forbade it, whether she were the daughter of a brother or of a sister, but imposed the penalty of capital punishment on any guilty of the offence, thus restoring the Roman law (except as regards the penalty) to the state in which it was before the innovation of Claudius, and at the same time bringing it (with the same exception) into accordance with Christian feeling (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xii. leg. i. tom. i. p. 294).

In the year 355, Constantius took up the question of marriage with a deceased wife's sister and with a deceased brother's wife. These marriages he forbade as peremptorily as those with the niece; but allowing that they were regarded in old times as admissible, he did not impose such extreme penalties; but he denied them the name of marriage, and declared the children born of them to be illegitimate (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xii. leg. 2, tom. i. p. 296). This legislation was confirmed by Theodosius the Great, Arcadius, Theodosius junior, and Anastasius. The frequent repetition of this law shews that it was frequently infringed, and we have a remarkable example of its infringement in the marriage of the emperor Honorius with the two daughters of Stilicho. In Constantius' law, marriages with a deceased brother's wife and a deceased wife's sister are placed upon the same footing, and no distinction is drawn between cases in which the previous marriage had been dissolved by death and those in which it had been dissolved by divorce—in both alike the second marriage is made unlawful. This continued to be the law of the empire.

Theodosius the Great took in hand the question of marriage between first cousins. We have seen that the earliest Roman law did not permit these marriages (Tac. Annal. xii. 6), but by the year 171 A.C. they had come to be looked upon without any disapprobation (Liv. xlii. 34). Theodosius condemned them utterly in a law made in the year 384 or 385. This law is no longer extant, but it is referred to in the writings of St. Ambrose^c and St. Augustine, and by Arcadius and Honorius, in their subsequent laws of A.D. 396 and 409, in a way to dispel all doubt as to its bearing. St. Ambrose says: "Theodosius the emperor forbade under the severest penalties the union of first cousins, whether born of the father's brother or sister" (Epist. lx. (al. lxvi.) ad Paternum, Op. tom. ii. p. 1018; Paris, 1690). St. Augustine says, that within his own memory such marriages had been allowed by the civil law, but that at the time that he was writing the De Civitate Dei (about A.D. 428) they were prohibited (De Civitate Dei, xv. 16, Op. tom. vii. p. 459, ed. Migne). Arcadius states that the punishment inflicted by the Theodosian law (for it is to that to which he clearly refers, Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. xii. leg. 3, tom. i. p. 297) consisted of Ignes and bonorum proscription, explaining thus the meaning of St. Ambrose when he speaks of its penalty as being severissima. Honorius refers to it as a law of his father's (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 10, tom. i. p. 287). In the year 396 Arcadius repeated the prohibition of marriage between first cousins, removing only the terrible penalties which his father had imposed; eight years later, A.D. 404, he changed his mind, and made the marriage of first cousins lawful for the Eastern empire. (See two very valuable notes of Gothofredus on Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. x. and tit. xii. leg. 3, tom. i. pp. 288, 298). Five years later (A.D. 409) Honorius published a law by which the same marriages were declared to be only legitimate in the Western empire by the rescript or dispensation of the emperor, causing thus a difference of sentiment and of law in East and West (Cod. Theod. lib. iii. tit. 10; Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. iv. leg. 19). Arcadius' law of A.D. 404 was adopted by Justinian, and its provisions became acknowledged as the rule of the Eastern empire. In the West also, marriages with cousins became freely permissible, but were never looked upon with so much favour as in the East. The barbaric codes for the most part regard them as unlawful.

Canon Law.—The canons of the early church, in so far as they deal with prohibited degrees of marriages, are concerned with the same three cases that we have seen engage the attention of the civil legislator, and also with attempted marriages between step-parents and step-children. Thus the council of Elvira, A.D. 305, imposes the penalty of a five years' excommunication on any one who marries his deceased wife's sister, can. lxi., and that of perpetual excommunication on any one who marries his stepdaughter, can. lxvi. (Hefele, History of the Councils, Eng. transl. i. pp. 164, 165). The council of Neo-Caesarea, A.D. 314, imposes perpetual excommunication on a woman who marries two brothers, can. ii. (ibid. p. 224). The Apostolical Canons declare that a man who has married two sisters or his niece may not be a clergyman can. ix. (ibid. p. 465).^d A Roman synod under Innocent I. A.D. 402, forbids marriage with a deceased wife's sister, can. ix. and with a deceased uncle's wife, or the son of an uncle, i.e. a first cousin, can. xi. (ibid. ii. p. 429). The council of Agde, A.D. 506, defines as incestuous those who marry their brother's widow, wife's sister, stepmother, cousin, uncle's widow, uncle's daughter, stepdaughter, or any kinswoman, can. lxi. (Labbe, Concil. tom. iv. p. 1393). The first council of Orleans, A.D. 511, forbids marriage with a brother's widow or a deceased wife's sister, can. xviii. (ibid. p. 1407). The council of Epaone, A.D. 517, forbids marriage with a brother's widow, wife's sister, stepmother, cousin, uncle's wife, or daughter, stepdaughter, or any kinswoman, can. xxx. (ibid. p. 1580). The council of Auvergne, A.D. 533, repeats the legislation of the councils of Epaone and Agde, can. xii. (ibid. p. 1805). The second council of Orleans, A.D. 533, forbids marriage with a stepmother, can. x. (ibid. p. 1718). The third council of Orleans, A.D. 538, prohibits marriage with stepmother, stepdaughter, brother's widow, wife's sister, cousin, and uncle's widow, can. x. (ibid. tom. v. p. 297). This canon was renewed by the fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541, can. xxvii. (ibid. p. 326). The third council of Paris, A.D. 557, prohibits marriage with brother's widow, stepmother, uncle's widow, wife's sister, daughter-in-law, aunt, stepdaughter, stepdaughter's daughter, can. iv. (ibid. p. 816). The second council of Tours, A.D. 567, recites the marriages forbidden in Leviticus xviii. and adds to them those with niece, cousin, wife's sister, and confirms the canon of 1 Orleans, Epaoene, and Auvergne, can. xxi. (ibid. p. 872). The Capitulary of Martin of Bracara, A.D. 573, forbids marriage with two sisters, cap. lxxix. (ibid. p. 914). The council of Auxerre, A.D. 578, forbids marriage with stepmother, stepdaughter, brother's widow, wife's sister, cousin, uncle's widow, can. xxvii. 33 (ibid. p. 957). The third council of Lyons, A.D. 583, renews the ancient canons against incest, can. iv. (ibid. p. 974). So, too, the second council of Mâcon, A.D. 585, can. xviii. (ibid. p. 987). The fifth council of Paris, A.D. 615, renews the legislation of Orleans, Epaoene, Auvergne, Auxerre, can. xiv. (ibid. p. 1652). The council in Trullo, A.D. 691, forbids marriage with cousin (uncle's daughter), and prohibits a father and a son marrying a mother and a daughter, or two sisters, and two brothers marrying a mother and a daughter, or two sisters, can. liv. (ibid. tom. vi. p. 1167). The first Roman council under Gregory II., A.D. 721, forbids marriage with brother's wife, niece or grandchild, stepmother and stepdaughter, cousin, all kinsmen, and any one married to a kinsman, can. v.-ix. (ibid. p. 1456). See also the Judicia of Gregory III. Jud. xi. (Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 1873). Pope Zachary, A.D. 743, forbids marriage with two sisters, Ep. vii. c. xxii. (Labbe, Concil. tom. vi. p. 1512). The first Roman council under pope Zachary, A.D. 743, forbids marriage with cousin, niece, mother-in-law, brother's wife, and all relatives, cap. vi. (ibid. p. 1547). The same council states, that pope Gregory had allowed marriage after the fourth degree, on account of the rudeness of the persons with respect to whom he was writing, but as a general rule it lays down the principle that there should be no marriage where any relationship is known, cap. xv. The council of Vermerie, A.D. 752, pronounces that those married in the third degree of relationship are to be separated, while those in the fourth degree are only to do penance, can. i. (ibid. p. 1657). The council of Metz, A.D. 753, prohibits marriage with stepmother, stepdaughter, wife's sister, niece, granddaughter, cousin, aunt; any offender to be fined, and if unable to pay the fine to be sent to prison in case he is a freeman, and if not, to be beaten with many stripes, cap. i. (ibid. p. 1660). The council of Compiègne, A.D. 757, orders separation of those who are (even one of them) in the third degree of propinquity, can. i. (ibid. p. 1695). The sixth council of Arles, A.D. 813, makes the same prohibitions as previous councils, can. xi. (ibid. tom. vii. p. 1236). The council of Mayence, A.D. 813, forbids marriage in the fourth degree, can. liv. (ibid. p. 1252).

The impediment of affinity was considered to be created by illicit connexion, as well as by marriage (Council of Agde, can. lxi. Hard. Concil. tom. ii. p. 1004).

Prohibitions on the ground of spiritual relationship belong both to the civil and to the canon law. They were first introduced by the emperor Justinian, who passed a law, A.D. 527, forbidding any one to marry a woman for whom he had stood as godfather in baptism, the tie of the godfather and godchild being so analogous to that of the father and child as to make such a marriage appear improper (Cod. Justin. lib. v. tit. 4, leg. 26). The council in Trullo, A.D. 691, prohibited marriage between the godfather and the child's mother, ordering that all who should hereafter enter upon such marriages should be separated, and do penance, can. liii. (Labbe, Concil. tom. vi. p. 1167). The first Roman council under Gregory II., A.D. 721, anathematizes all who marry their commatrem, can. iv. (ibid. p. 1256). Pope Zachary, A.D. 741, forbids the marriage of the godfather with mother or child, Ep. vii. c. xxii. (ibid. p. 1512). The first Roman council under pope Zachary, A.D. 743, forbids marriage with "presbyteram, diaconam, nonnam, monacham, vel etiam spiritualem commatrem," cap. 5 (ibid. p. 1547). The council of Metz, A.D. 753, forbids marriage with "commatrem suam aut cum matrina spiritali de fonte et confirmatione episcopi," cap. i.; that is, it prohibits the marriage of the father with the godmother of his child, and the marriage of the child with his godmother, and the marriage of the confirmed person with the person who presented him for confirmation (ibid. p. 1660). The council of Compiègne, A.D. 757, lays stress on the spiritual relationship created by confirmation. If a husband offered for confirmation the son of his wife by a previous husband he thereby became so nearly connected by spiritual kinsmanship with his own wife as to have to put her away, and he was not allowed to marry again, can. xii. (Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 2005). The council of Mayence, A.D. 813, forbids marriage with the godchild or the godchild's mother, or the mother of the child offered for confirmation, can. lv. (Labbe, Concil. tom. vii. p. 1252). This kind of relationship is recognized also by pope Nicholas I., A.D. 860, in his reply to the Bulgarians (Hard. Concil. tom. v. p. 343). For a list of spiritual relatives between whom marriage was prohibited in later times, reference may be made to the council of Saltsburg, A.D. 1420, can. xv. (ibid. tom. viii. p. 980). The council of Trent found it necessary to restrain these extravagances by confining spiritual relationship to sponsors and the child and the parents of the child, to the baptizer and the baptized and the parents of the baptized, to the confirmer and the confirmed and the parents of the confirmed, and to the presenter for confirmation and the confirmed and the parents of the confirmed (Conc. Trident. Sess. xxiv.; De Reform. Matrimon. cap. 2; Hard. Concil. tom. x. p. 151).

It will be seen from the above review that during the whole of the eight first centuries marriages were never allowed, either by civil or canon law, in the first degree, whether of consanguinity or affinity, nor, with one exception—that of cousins—in the second degree. The first degree of consanguinity comprises the mother, the daughter, and the sister. With regard to these no question has ever been raised among Christians. The first degree of affinity comprises the stepmother, the wife's mother, the wife's daughter, the son's wife, the wife's sister, the brother's wife. The repetition of prohibitory canons shews that it was necessary to guard against the force of temptation by again and again re-affirming the law of the church with respect to these cases, but there is no wavering or hesitation as to what was the law binding upon Christians. The prohibitions of marriage with the stepmother, stepdaughter, mother-in-law, daughter-in-law, sister-in-law, and wife's sister are as decided as those of marriage with the mother, daughter, and sister.

The second degree of consanguinity comprises the grandmother, the father's sister, the mother's sister, the son's daughter, the daughter's daughter, the brother's daughter, the sister's daughter, the first cousin. Marriage with all of these was unanimously prohibited, with the one exception of the cousin, on which, as we have seen, great differences of sentiment existed. The second degree of affinity comprises the following: Grandfather's wife, wife's grandmother, father's brother's wife, mother's brother's wife, wife's father's sister, wife's mother's sister, son's son's wife, daughter's son's wife, wife's son's daughter, wife's daughter's daughter, brother's son's wife, sister's son's wife, wife's brother's daughter, wife's sister's daughter. With regard to these there has been no difference of sentiment. The church of England in its "table of kindred and affinity, wherein whosoever are related are forbidden in scripture and our laws to marry together," confines itself to the relationships of the first and second degree (omitting, what the early church omitted, that of cousins), for within these two degrees are practically comprised all the relatives that a man could or would marry; but during the period with which we have to do marriages within the third and fourth degree were also pronounced unlawful, and, indeed, the prohibition was extended by the end of the 6th century to the seventh degree; and so it continued until in the Western church it was once more reduced to the fourth degree by the Lateran council under Innocent III. in the year 1215.⁶ Two inferior kinds of affinity, arising from the second marriage of a sister-in-law, and of that sister-in-law's second husband, were also abolished by the fourth Lateran council; and the affinity caused by illicit connexion was declared by the council of Trent not to extend beyond two degrees (Sess. xxiv. c. 4).

It is not necessary to quote the judgments of the great church teachers with respect to any prohibition, except that which related to the marriage of cousins. For on all other cases there is an universal agreement; and we have only to say that every writer who deals with the subject at all, witnesses to the prohibitions of the canon and civil law, and endorses sometimes one and sometimes another of them. Thus St. Ambrose insists upon the prohibition of marriage with a niece in writing to Paternus, who had proposed a marriage between his son and granddaughter (Epist. lx. al 66; Op. tom. ii. p. 1018). St. Basil argues with great force and ingenuity, in his letter to Diodorus, against marriage with a wife's sister (Epist. 197; Op. tom. iii. p. 213, Paris, 1638). But on the subject of the marriage of cousins there is no such consensus. St. Augustine gives it as his opinion that such marriages are not contrary to the divine law, as they were not contrary to Roman law until the legislation of Theodosius the Great. Until that time, that is, the end of the 4th century, no objection appears to have been taken to these marriages by the church; but when the state changed its mind, and after having vehemently condemned them for twenty years, once more declared them permissible, the church, which had followed the imperial lead in the first instance, did not change back again so readily. From the 5th century onwards ecclesiastical authority first frowned upon the marriage of first cousins, and then condemned them, partly as being in the second degree of propinquity, and partly for physiological reasons, as stated by pope Gregory in his fifth answer to St. Augustine of Canterbury. "Sed experimento didicimus, ex tali conjugio sobolem non posse succrescere. Et sacra lex prohibet cognationis turpitudinem revelare. Unde necesse est ut jam tertia vel quarta generatio fidelium licenter sibi jungi debeat; nam secunda quam prae diximus, a se omni modo debet abstinere" (Bede Hist. Eccles. i. 27, p. 49, Oxon. 1846). We have already noted that they were condemned by the councils of Agde, A.D. 506, of Epaone, A.D. 517, of Auvergne, A.D. 533, by the third council of Orleans, A.D. 538, by the fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541, by the second council of Tours, A.D. 567, by the council of Auxerre, A.D. 578, and by others, including even the great Eastern council in Trullo, A.D. 691. But these prohibitions did not begin till after the legislation of Theodosius, out of which they sprang at the end of the 4th century. It is noticeable that ⁶ The growth of the enlargement of the area of prohibitions may be studied in the history of our own country. In the time of Augustine of Canterbury, A.D. 601, marriages in the first and second degrees of relationship were forbidden, those in the third degree being counted of doubtful legality. (See Gregory's Answers to Augustine, answer v.; Johnson's English Canons, vol. i. p. 69, Oxf. 1850.) Seventy years later, in the time of Theodore of Canterbury, A.D. 673, marriages in the first, second, and third degrees were forbidden, and those in the fourth were only not to be dissolved (Theod. Paenit. ed. Petit, c. xi. p. 12). By the time of Lanfranc, A.D. 1075, the prohibition, in England as elsewhere, had been extended to the seventh degree. (See Lanfranc's Canons, made in London, can. vi.; Johnson's English Canons, vol. ii. p. 14.) It was owing only to the "rudeness" of the English that marriages so far as the seventh degree were not forbidden as early as even the time of St. Augustine. Gregory explains that elsewhere he prohibited them to that extent. (See his Rescript to Felix, bishop of Messina; Hard. Concil. tom. iii. p. 518.) On like grounds Gregory II. "concedes" marriages after the fourth degree to the Germans (Epist. ad Bonif.; ibid. p. 1858).

prohibitions of marriage on the ground both of cousinhood and of spiritual relationship originated not with the church, but with imperial legislation.

PROKIMENON (προκείμενον). A short anthem consisting of a verse and response, generally, but not always, taken from the psalms, and often chosen so as to point the lesson contained in the Epistle for the day. It answers on the whole in the Greek liturgy to the Western Gradual, notwithstanding that it is sung before the Epistle, while the place of the Gradual is between the Epistle and Gospel. The custom in both cases doubtless arose from the earlier custom of singing a psalm between every two lections. [GRADUAL.] In the liturgy of St. Chrysostom the prokimenon is preceded by a proclamation of the deacon, viz. ψαλμὸς τῷ Δαυὶδ, Σοφία, though no psalm is sung there. The words ψαλμὸς τῷ Δαυὶδ are repeated after the Epistle, where again no psalm, but only "Alleluia," is sung. This probably represents a remnant of the ancient custom, and supports the inference that, as the Gradual of the West stands for the psalm between the Epistle and Gospel, so the Prokimenon represents that which used to divide the Old Testament lection (now disused in that liturgy) from the Epistle.

A Prokimenon is also sung in the Vesper office of the Greek church, and on Sundays and festivals in that of Lauds also. The ordinary Vespers prokimenon is invariable for the day, but on the other occasions it refers to the Epistle, as in the liturgy. [C. E. H.]

PROPERTY OF THE CHURCH. [Compare ORDERS, HOLY, p. 1490.]

A. SOURCES OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

1. Lands.—In the earliest days of the church those who had lands and houses sold them and gave the price to the church fund (Acts iv. 34). This continued to be the custom of the church of Rome (Theod. Lector. Coll. ii. p. 367), which, as Valesius thinks had no immovable property until the time of Gregory the Great, excepting of course church buildings and cemeteries. So Augustine would never purchase land or houses, but if such were given or bequeathed to the church he accepted them (Posid. Vita Aug. c. 24).

We find the church in possession of land before it was a body recognized by the state. Alexander Severus adjudged to the church a piece of common land to which the vintners also laid claim (Lamprid. 49). In A.D. 261 Gallienus restored the cemeteries. The edict of Constantine A.D. 313 declares that the Christians are known to possess places belonging not to any individual but to the whole body, and he commands Anulinus to restore the houses, gardens, and other property to the several churches (Euseb. Hist. x. 5). From this time immovable property was given to the church in abundance. Sometimes the donor reserved the usufruct to himself or some near relative, as Ambrose (Surius, Apr. 4), but many bestowed all their farms and property absolutely. Augustine (Ep. 199) rebukes Eudocia for impoverishing her household in this way.

(For the alienation of church property, see ALIENATION.) The statute of limitations did not apply to church property; recovery was not barred for a hundred years (Cod. Just. 1, 2, 23), which was afterwards reduced to forty (Nov. cxxi. 6), the regular limit being thirty. An annual charge upon land by gift or legacy could not be redeemed (C. J. 1, 3, 46), A.D. 530, or in any way cease to be paid in perpetuity; if alienated it could be recovered with interest (ibid. 57), but it might be exchanged with another church.

Leases.—The usufruct of church property could be enjoyed by a layman for his lifetime or a term of years, in return for an equivalent paid at death or the end of the contract (Nov. vii. 4). Justinian forbade church estates to be let according to the ius colonarium (a kind of beneficial lease (Nov. vii. praeft.)). EMPHYTEUSIS was permitted only for the life of one tenant and two specified heirs (Nov. vii. 3); it was forbidden in perpetuity (ibid. 7) unless the estate was profitless and could not be improved (Nov. cxx. 1). An ordinary lease was limited to twenty years (C. J. 1, 2, 24), which was afterwards extended to thirty (Nov. cxx. 3).

Another method of granting church money or farms was per precarium, so called either "quia illud precario possidet" or "quia precibus obtinetur" (Ducange). This is sometimes regarded as a kind of benefice. One form was a lease for one or a few, generally five, years, and rent was paid; sometimes the terms were the same as the emphyteusis of Justinian (Nov. vii.), of which kind forms are found in Marculphus, ii. form. 39, 40.

The earliest notice of precariae is in a canon ascribed by Gratian to some African council (Labbe, Conc. ii. p. 1178), which permits a rector to revoke any precariae made by his predecessor to the injury of the church. [PRECARIAE.]

2. Legacies.—A.D. 321. Constantine decreed that any one might bequeath to the church any property he pleased (Cod. Just. i. 2, 1). Full liberty was taken of this privilege, and it was soon abused. Many bequeathed all their property to the church, leaving in poverty those dependent upon them. Augustine refused to receive legacies if they were needed by poor relatives (Posidonius, Vita Aug. 24). He was obliged to defend himself against the charge of discouraging legacies. Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, restored his property to a man who, having given all to the church, afterwards had a son; so when an angry father disinherited his son, Augustine would not accept the legacy for the church (cf. Sermo de diversis, 49). Ambrose (in Lucam. 18) forbids to pinch relatives in order to leave money to the church. Jerome (Epit. Mar.) applauds Marcella for surrendering her own wishes to her mother's, and bequeathing her property to relatives rather than the church. On the other hand he advises the widow Furia, in spite of the opposition of her father, to leave her money to the church. Gregory the Great restored an estate rather than impoverish the children.

A.D. 455. The law of Valentinian (Cod. Just.

xvi. 2, 20), which forbade clerics to receive legacies from virgins and other religious persons even as trusts, did not probably prevent legacies to the church, for Jerome (ad Nepotian.) and Ambrose (ep. 50) do not complain of the law, but of the greediness of those will-hunters who made the law necessary. Theodosius (xvi. 2, 27, A.D. 390) forbade deaconesses to make bequests to the church; they might however give what they pleased in their lifetime (ibid. 28). Full liberty was restored to them by Marcian (Cod. Just. i. 2, 13).

Augustine advised those who had sons to add Christ as one more heir and give the church an equal share with the rest (De Div. Sermon. 49); dead children were to be counted in and their portion go to the church (ibid. 44). Justinian ordered that, on accepting a legacy, the bishop should enrol the amount and the date before the civil magistrate (Cod. i. 3, 28). Also (Nov. 131, 9, A.D. 541), if a legacy be left to God or Christ, it is to go to the church of the place where the testator lived; when a saint or angel is named, but not the place, then if there are many chapels so named, the legacy is to go to the poorest (unless there be one which the testator was known to favour, C. J. i. 2, 26); if there are no chapels in the city, to one in the province, and failing that, to the church of the testator. If money were left to build a house for charitable uses, the work must be completed within a year (C. J. i. 3, 46). The canons of Carthage (Con. iv. c. xviii. xix., A.D. 398) forbid the bishop to enforce a bequest by law, but Justinian commands the bishop to see that a bequest is duly carried out (Nov. cxxxi. 11.). Annual legacies might not in any way be changed, but were to remain annual (C. J. i. 3, 46, A.D. 530; confirmed ibid. l. 57, A.D. 534).

The minute requirements of the Roman law were sometimes relaxed in favour of the church—e.g. bequests to the poor (C. J. i. 3, 24), or for the redemption of captives (ibid. 28), were valid, although the persons benefited were uncertain, and the claim to such money was not barred for a hundred years (C. J. i. 2, 23). The French kings confirmed the canons which ordered that wills in favour of the church should be valid, although in some points informal (C. Lugdun. ii. 2; Paris, iii. 1). [MORTMAIN.]

The Lex Falcidia, which forbade a man to leave more than three-fourths of his property in legacies, was repealed in the case of the church (Nov. cxxxi. 12). A.D. 772 a Bavarian council (c. ii.) arranged for the alteration of a will leaving property to the church.

3. Grants.—Grants from the imperial funds formed another source of revenue. Constantine gave a large sum to be distributed by Caecilian, bishop of Carthage, among the clergy of Africa, Numidia, and Mauretania (Euseb. Hist. x. 6), to defray expenses—a precedent which was frequently followed by later emperors. He also granted an annual allowance of corn to the widows, virgins, and clergy in each province (Theod. iv. 4). This was revoked by Julian, but one-third was restored by Jovian and confirmed by Marcian (Cod. Justin. i. 2, 12). At the council of Chalcedon, Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, was accused of appropriating it (act. 3). Gregory the Great (viii. ep. 20) writes to the proconsul of Italy not to withhold this grant from the church of Naples. In iv. 42 he blames Leontius for appropriating the corn at Ariminum. The civilis annona, or grant of bread to the poor, is oftener mentioned along with the immovable property of the church, and could not be alienated (Cod. Just. i. 2, 14; Nov. vii. praeft. and cxx. 1). There is a decree of Marcian, A.D. 454, which is thought to refer to this corn (C. J. i. 2, 12): "Et quia nostrae humanitatis est egenis prospicere et dare operam ut pauperibus alimenta non desint, salaria etiam quae sacrosanctis ecclesiis in diversis speciebus de publico hactenus ministrata sunt, jubemus nunc quoque inconcussa et a nullo prorsus imminuta praestari."

Anastasius granted seventy pounds of gold to the church of Constantinople for the proper conduct of funerals (C. J. i. 2, 13; cf. Nov. lix.).

When the barbarians divided the lands of the empire, the church estates remained sacred; generally they were increased. Clovis and his first successors awarded large tracts. St. Remigius received a great number of lands to be distributed among the destitute churches. The royal exchequer was greatly impoverished (Greg. Turon. vi. 46). Ludwig made grants to the church of Orleans (Con. Aurel. i. c. 5, A.D. 511). Dagobert I. gave the royal revenue from Tours to the church of St. Martin (Eligii Vita. l. 32). So rapidly and alarmingly was the church of France becoming rich, that king Chilperic annulled all testaments in which the church was made heir, but this was repealed by Gunthram soon after. Charles Martel seized a quantity of church land to reward his soldiers, A.D. 740, but part was restored by Pippin (Gesta Francorum, Planck). Frequently the gifts made by kings were confirmed in synods, as those of Gunthram at Valence, and of Dagobert (Planck, ii. 203), and of Pippin at Ratisbon, A.D. 742.

4. Slaves.—A.D. 590 the first council of Seville (c. 1) was requested by the deacons to annul some manumissions of the late bishop Gaudentius. They found that the existing canons forbade the alienation of church property, and rendered all such transactions void. It was decreed that if Gaudentius had left property to the church the slaves might remain free, otherwise he ought not to injure the church. Still, to judge more according to the precepts of humanity than by strict law, such freed men were to remain in ius ecclesiae, ut idonei: their property they might leave to their sons, but to no others. See SLAVERY.

5. Occasional sources of revenue were the estates of clerics and religious persons who died intestate and without relatives (Cod. Just. i. 3, 20). Theodosius extended to the church this privilege which all other collegia possessed. Clerics without relatives were expected to leave their property to the church (Salvian. ad Salonici.), and were allowed no heirs but their nephews by C. Agath. c. 24, A.D. 506. Also all the property of a bishop, except what he possessed before his appointment or inherited from relatives (Nov. cxxxi. 13; cf. C. Rhem. c. 10, 20): the estates of freed men of the church who died childless (Greg. M. v. 12): the marriage fees of slaves on church land (ibid. i. 42): property stolen from a church tenant, if recovered (this was forbidden by Gregory, l. c.): fines for ecclesiastical offences: the estates of clerks who became seculars again (C. J. i. 3, 55). The goods of heretics were sometimes bestowed on the church, as were those of Nestorius when he was sent into exile by Theodosius. So also were the houses where Montanists assembled (Cod. Theod. xvi. 5, 57), and Donatists (ibid. 54). Honorius gave several heathen temples (Cod. Theod. xvi. 10, 20). Constantinus gave a temple of the sun at Alexandria (Sozomen, v. 7), and some basilicas, as the Sessorian and the Lateran. The statue of Serapis and other idols at Alexandria were melted down for the use of the church, the emperor giving orders that the gods should help to maintain the poor (Socrates, vii. 7).

Fees for baptism were at one time paid. Greg. Naz. (de Bapt. Fr. 655) writes against it. The Con. Eliberis, c. xlviii. forbids this practice, so does Gelasius (Ep. ix. c. 5); and for confirmation also. Con. Braccara, ii. c. 7, forbids the exaction of a pledge at baptism from those who were too poor to make an offering; and c. v. forbids the bishop to extort a fee from the founder at the consecration of a church. Jerome (Quaest. Hebraic. Gen. xxiii.) censures the practice of exacting money for a burial-place.

6. Benefices.—Ducange defines a benefice to be “prædium fiscale quod a rege vel principe vel ab alio quolibet, ad vitam viro nobili utendum conceditur. Ita autem appellatum est, quod is ex mero dantis beneficio ac liberalitate illud possideat.” The word had a wider sense in ecclesiastical usage, “beneficia ecclesiastica dicebantur universim res ecclesiae in beneficium datae, sive a principibus sive ab ipsis ecclesiis et earum praelatis in beneficium datae essent.” It has apparently the sense of oblations in the first canon of the council of Auxerre, A.D. 578. In the laws of the Visigoths (ix. 5, 5), it is equivalent to merces, and is used in this widest signification by Thomassin in his work, Vetus et Nova Ecclesiae Disciplina circa Beneficia et Beneficiarios, which treats of every kind of payment to the clergy.

Originally a benefice was not separate from ordination. By the fact of ordination a clergyman was attached to a church and could claim maintenance. All the funds throughout the diocese were handed over to the bishop, who gave the clergy their portions. Gradually the custom grew up of making special reservations to particular places; the right to maintenance was no longer personal but local; the principle prevailed, “ut qui titulum haberet ius quoque fructus percipiendi ex bonis titulo annexis consequeretur.” Ultimately the canonists defined a benefice as “ius perpetuum percipiendorum fructuum quorumcumque ex bonis ecclesiasticis seu Deo dicatis” (Van Espen. vol. i. part 2, tit. xviii.). For other sources from which the clergy were maintained, see also TITHES, OBLATIONS, FIRST-FRUIT.

Thomassin considers the history of the word to be as follows (ii. lib. iii. c. xiii.). Benefices were originally lands granted by the emperor: when laymen seized church lands, these were held also of the prince or the church by military tenure, and called benefices; the name remained after they had been restored to the church. The other explanation is that they were granted to the soldiers of Christ on condition of serving faithfully in the army of the church.

Binnus, followed by Baronius (anno 502), fixes the origin of benefices at the beginning of the 6th century. That benefices were only just coming into use in the church at this time is supported by the fact that some clergy, after enjoying the usufruct for thirty years or forty (Just. Nov. cxxxi. 6), claimed the lands as their own by prescription. The first council of Orleans (c. xxiii.), A.D. 511, decreed that if the kindness of the bishop had allowed clerics or monks to till or hold lands or vineyards, even though many years could be proved to have passed, the church was to suffer no harm, and the secular law of prescription (thirty years) was not to be put forward to the prejudice of the church. It was also found necessary to forbid all clerics to go to the prince to seek for benefices without letters commendatory from the bishop (can. vii.). In A.D. 517 it was decreed (Conc. Epaonense, c. xiv.) that if a beneficed priest be elected bishop of another church, he is to return all gifts previously made to him by his church. Canon xviii. enacts that the secular law of prescription is not to apply to the church.

Although a benefice was altogether the free gift of the bishop, yet his right to revoke his gift was questioned. In A.D. 538 the third council of Orleans (c. xvii.) forbade a bishop to revoke the benefices (munificentias) granted by a deceased predecessor, except for improper conduct, but he could force an exchange; his own gifts he might revoke if the recipients proved contumacious.

Benefices were granted by word of mouth or by writing (C. Aurel. iv. c. xviii. A.D. 541), as the bishop thought fit; in neither case could the benefice be alienated. If a benefice were granted to a cleric of another church, at his death the benefice returned (ibid. c. xxxvi.). Improvements went to the church at the death of the beneficiary (ibid. c. xxxiv.). If a bishop, by will, left a farm to a cleric, who entered upon it during the vacancy, the new bishop might confirm or annul the legacy (ibid. c. xxxv.). A.D. 554 the fifth council of Arles (c. v.) forbids clerics to deteriorate the property of which they have the use; the younger are to be punished; the older to be regarded as murderers of the poor. A.D. 567 the second council of Lyons (c. v.) forbids bishops to withdraw the gifts of their predecessors; if the beneficiaries need punishment, it should be on the persons rather than their property. Such canons were rendered necessary by the frequent quarrels of the bishop and his clergy, (Gregory of Tours, Hist. iv. 7; v. 49; vi. 36). The will of Hadoind, a Gallican bishop (apud Baronium, A.D. 652), mentions a villa “quam Lupus quondam per beneficium nostrum, tenere visus fuit, similiter villa quam ex munificentia nostra concessimus.” Lupus is to enjoy the usufruct, and on his death they are to be restored to the church.

In the Church of Italy the epistle of Symmachus to Caesarius of Arles probably describes the custom of that time, to give a benefice only to deserving clergy, or monks or strangers, when there is some strong necessity (Epist. v.). This was confirmed by a council held at Rome (cap. iv. A.D. 502). Gregory the Great granted a benefice to a presbyter at the request of his bishop; but ordered the annual value of the benefice to be deducted from the presbyter's share at the ordinary division (Thomassin, pars 3, lib. 2, cap. v.).

In Spain, the second council of Toledo (can. iv. A.D. 531) enacts: "si quis clericorum agellos vel vineolas seu alia aedificia in terris ecclesiae sibi fecisse probatur, sustentandae vitae suae causa, usque ad obitus sui diem possideat. Post decesum, ius suum ecclesiae restituat, nec testamentario aut successorio iure, cuiquam haeredum aut prohaeredum relinquit nisi forsitan episcopus pro servitiis aut praestatione ecclesiae largiri voluerit." A.D. 589 the third council of Toledo, c. iii., enacts that bishops are not to alienate the property of the church. However, if they give to the churches of their diocese anything which does not seriously hamper the utility of the church, "firmum maneat"; and to strangers, clerics, and the needy, "salvo iure ecclesiae praestare permittantur." "Firmum maneat" implies that the land would never return to the mother church; it is the contrary to the phrase "salvo iure ecclesiae." So canon iv. allows a grant to a monastery. Sometimes a benefice was granted by way of reward and incentive to further effort: if the bishop's hopes were disappointed he might recall his gift (Con. Emerit. c. xiii. A.D. 666).

The laws of the Visigoths (iv. 5, 6) forbid the usual law of prescription to apply to benefices, and order the bishops to supply rectors of churches with a list of the property of the benefice: the widow and children of a deceased beneficiary were not to be turned out of the benefice (i. 1, 4).

A.D. 779. Charles the Great ordered "decima et nona cum ipso censu sit soluta" by those who held church estates, and Selden explains nona to mean (Tithes, chap. vi.) that, in addition to the tithe which all land was supposed to pay, a ninth part was to be paid as rent to the church. A.D. 794 the council of Frankfurt, c. xxv., orders "decimas et nonas sive census, donent qui debitores sunt ex beneficiis et rebus ecclesiarum." Can. xxvi. orders churches to be restored by those "qui beneficia exinde habent."

In the East there is no trace of the custom of granting benefices. The decree of Leo and Anthemius (A.D. 470, Cod. Just. 1, 2, 14), which Thomassin quotes, has reference, not to granting a benefice, but to making a lease in the usual way; for the usufruct is granted only in exchange for usufruct of equal value (sec. 5). So also Nov. vii. 4.

B. ADMINISTRATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

The administration of church property was the duty and privilege of the bishop, as is declared by the council of Antioch, can. xxiv., A.D. 341; cf. Cl. Rome, vi. c. 7; Gelasius, ep. x.; Gregory the Great, ii. 13. All subordinate officials were bound to give an account to the bishop and to act according to his judgment, whether they were oeconomi (Chalcedon, c. xxvi.), or managed the guest-houses (Greg. Mag. iii. 24), or poorhouses (Chalcedon, c. viii.), or parishes (Ibid. c. xvii.), or charitable trusts in general (Justin. Nov. exxiii. 23). Yet the power of the bishop was far from absolute. He was controlled by (1) the rights of the clergy, (2) by the laws of the empire, and (3) by the decrees of his metropolitan and of the provincial synod or of general councils. [BISHOP.]

1. The rights of the clergy cannot be defined

with exactness, but they possessed the following privileges. A.D. 341. The council of Antioch, c. xxiv., decrees that the bishop is to administer, but the presbyters and clergy are to be made acquainted with, the property of the church, that it may not be confused with the private property of the bishop. (Cp. to the same purpose Apostolic Canon xxxix. or xl.) Canon xxv. reserves to the bishop the right of dispensing to the poor, but if the presbyters and deacons disapprove they may summon the bishop before the provincial synod. So the Cl. of Bracara, iii. c. 16, A.D. 572. The Cl. of Carthage, iv. c. 32, A.D. 398, declared a sale or gift to be void if made by the bishop without the consent and subscription of the clergy. The edict of Leo, A.D. 470 (Cod. Just. 1, 2, 14), recognizes the clergy of Constantinople as having a voice in the alienation of church property. So also Justinian, A.D. 536 (Nov. xlvii. 1, 2), relaxing the strict prohibition of Nov. vii. 1, allows to the clergy of a church the right of judging whether it were expedient to alienate property; and by Nov. vii. 3 the consent of five priests and two deacons is required to make valid the kind of lease called emphyteusis. [ALIENATION.] Thus the rights of the clergy were limited to control, the active administration being the privilege of the bishop. In some cases presbyters seized this privilege, but it was held to be an act of insubordination (Greg. Turon. ii. 23). The council of Gangra, c. vii. viii., A.D. 324-371 (the date is doubtful), anathematizes any who give or receive gifts for the church, save the bishop and his appointed officer. This has reference most probably to heretics who persuaded people to trust the dispensing of alms to them rather than to the orthodox bishop (Binii Annot.).

2. The imperial laws limiting the power of the bishop as to alienation and leases will be found in the article ALIENATION, and above under the heading leases.

3. A council had at all times the right to overrule a bishop. Charges of maladministration are frequent in the history of the church. Athanasius was charged before the council of Tyre; Dioscorus also, bishop of Alexandria, before the council of Chalcedon, where Iba of Edessa was also tried. See COUNCIL.

The increase of wealth, and in some cases the negligence or dishonesty of the bishop, required that he should have the aid of an official. The Arabic canons of the council of Nicaea (c. lviii. iv.) decree that the citizens of each city are to choose some monk or ecclesiastic to manage the hospitals. Canon lxxxvi. orders an oeconomus, or steward, to be appointed in each church, and with him others, to manage the estates, farms, fruits, and vessels. (Cf. chap. lxxiii. of the other Arabic version in Labbe, Conc. ii.) Gregory of Nazianzum, when made bishop of Constantinople, found no account of the property of his see, and during his occupancy he kept no accounts (Carmen de Vita Sua). Chrysostom was accused of managing his revenues without giving any account to the clergy (Photius, Bibl. Cod. 59). Soon after his time the church of Constantinople possessed more than one steward, as we find from the sometimes bestowed on the church, as were those of Nestorius when he was sent into exile by Theodosius. So also were the houses where Montanists assembled (Cod. Theod. xvi. 5, 57), and Donatists (ibid. 54). Honorius gave several heathen temples (Cod. Theod. xvi. 10, 20). Constantinus gave a temple of the sun at Alexandria (Sozomen, v. 7), and some basilicas, as the Sessorian and the Lateran. The statue of Serapis and other idols at Alexandria were melted down for the use of the church, the emperor giving orders that the gods should help to maintain the poor (Socrates, vii. 7).

Fees for baptism were at one time paid. Greg. Naz. (de Bapt. Fr. 655) writes against it. The Con. Eliberis, c. xlviii. forbids this practice, so does Gelasius (Ep. ix. c. 5); and for confirmation also. Con. Braccara, ii. c. 7, forbids the exaction of a pledge at baptism from those who were too poor to make an offering; and c. v. forbids the bishop to extort a fee from the founder at the consecration of a church. Jerome (Quaest. Hebraic. Gen. xxiii.) censures the practice of exacting money for a burial-place.

6. Benefices.—Ducange defines a benefice to be “praedium fiscale quod a rege vel principe vel ab alio quolibet, ad vitam viro nobili utendum conceditur. Ita autem appellatum est, quod is ex mero dantis beneficio ac liberalitate illud possideat.” The word had a wider sense in ecclesiastical usage, “beneficia ecclesiastica dicebantur universim res ecclesiae in beneficium datae, sive a principibus sive ab ipsis ecclesiis et earum praelatis in beneficium datae essent.” It has apparently the sense of oblations in the first canon of the council of Auxerre, A.D. 578. In the laws of the Visigoths (ix. 5, 5), it is equivalent to merces, and is used in this widest signification by Thomassin in his work, Vetus et Nova Ecclesiae Disciplina circa Beneficia et Beneficiarios, which treats of every kind of payment to the clergy.

Originally a benefice was not separate from ordination. By the fact of ordination a clergyman was attached to a church and could claim maintenance. All the funds throughout the diocese were handed over to the bishop, who gave the clergy their portions. Gradually the custom grew up of making special reservations to particular places; the right to maintenance was no longer personal but local; the principle prevailed, “ut qui titulum haberet ius quoque fructus percipiendi ex bonis titulo annexis consequeretur.” Ultimately the canonists defined a benefice as “ius perpetuum percipiendorum fructuum quorumcumque ex bonis ecclesiasticis seu Deo dicatis” (Van Espen. vol. i. part 2, tit. xviii.). For other sources from which the clergy were maintained, see also TITHES, OBLATIONS, FIRST-FRUIT.

Thomassin considers the history of the word to be as follows (ii. lib. iii. c. xiii.). Benefices were originally lands granted by the emperor: when laymen seized church lands, these were held also of the prince or the church by military tenure, and called benefices; the name remained after they had been restored to the church. The other explanation is that they were granted to the soldiers of Christ on condition of serving faithfully in the army of the church.

Binus, followed by Baronius (anno 502), fixes the origin of benefices at the beginning of the 6th century. That benefices were only just coming into use in the church at this time is supported by the fact that some clergy, after enjoying the usufruct for thirty years or forty (Just. Nov. cxxxi. 6), claimed the lands as their own by prescription. The first council of Orleans (c. xxiii.), A.D. 511, decreed that if the kindness of the bishop had allowed clerics or monks to till or hold lands or vineyards, even though many years could be proved to have passed, the church was to suffer no harm, and the secular law of prescription (thirty years) was not to be put forward to the prejudice of the church. It was also found necessary to forbid all clerics to go to the prince to seek for benefices without letters commendatory from the bishop (can. vii.). In A.D. 517 it was decreed (Conc. Epaonense, c. xiv.) that if a beneficed priest be elected bishop of another church, he is to return all gifts previously made to him by his church. Canon xviii. enacts that the secular law of prescription is not to apply to the church.

Although a benefice was altogether the free gift of the bishop, yet his right to revoke his gift was questioned. In A.D. 538 the third council of Orleans (c. xvii.) forbade a bishop to revoke the benefices (munificentias) granted by a deceased predecessor, except for improper conduct, but he could force an exchange; his own gifts he might revoke if the recipients proved contumacious.

Benefices were granted by word of mouth or by writing (C. Aurel. iv. c. xviii. A.D. 541), as the bishop thought fit; in neither case could the benefice be alienated. If a benefice were granted to a cleric of another church, at his death the benefice returned (ibid. c. xxxvi.). Improvements went to the church at the death of the beneficiary (ibid. c. xxxiv.). If a bishop, by will, left a farm to a cleric, who entered upon it during the vacancy, the new bishop might confirm or annul the legacy (ibid. c. xxxv.). A.D. 554 the fifth council of Arles (c. v.) forbids clerics to deteriorate the property of which they have the use; the younger are to be punished; the older to be regarded as murderers of the poor. A.D. 567 the second council of Lyons (c. v.) forbids bishops to withdraw the gifts of their predecessors; if the beneficiaries need punishment, it should be on the persons rather than their property. Such canons were rendered necessary by the frequent quarrels of the bishop and his clergy, (Gregory of Tours, Hist. iv. 7; v. 49; vi. 36). The will of Hadoind, a Gallican bishop (apud Baronium, A.D. 652), mentions a villa “quam Lupus quondam per beneficium nostrum, tenere visus fuit, similiter villa quam ex munificentia nostra concessimus.” Lupus is to enjoy the usufruct, and on his death they are to be restored to the church.

In the Church of Italy the epistle of Symmachus to Caesarius of Arles probably describes the custom of that time, to give a benefice only to deserving clergy, or monks or strangers, when there is some strong necessity (Epist. v.). This was confirmed by a council held at Rome (cap. iv. A.D. 502). Gregory the Great granted a benefice to a presbyter at the request of his bishop; but ordered the annual value of the benefice to be deducted from the presbyter's share at the ordinary division (Thomassin, pars 3, lib. 2, cap. v.).

In Spain, the second council of Toledo (can. iv. A.D. 531) enacts: "si quis clericorum agellos vel vineolas seu alia aedificia in terris ecclesiae sibi fecisse probatur, sustentandae vitae suae causa, usque ad obitus sui diem possideat. Post decessum, ius suum ecclesiae restituat, nec testamentario aut successorio iure, cuiquam haeredum aut prohaeredum relinquit nisi forsitan episcopus pro servitiis aut praestatione ecclesiae largiri voluerit." A.D. 589 the third council of Toledo, c. iii., enacts that bishops are not to alienate the property of the church. However, if they give to the churches of their diocese anything which does not seriously hamper the utility of the church, "firmum maneat"; and to strangers, clerics, and the needy, "salvo iure ecclesiae praestare permittantur." "Firmum maneat" implies that the land would never return to the mother church; it is the contrary to the phrase "salvo iure ecclesiae." So canon iv. allows a grant to a monastery. Sometimes a benefice was granted by way of reward and incentive to further effort: if the bishop's hopes were disappointed he might recall his gift (Con. Emerit. c. xiii. A.D. 666).

The laws of the Visigoths (iv. 5, 6) forbid the usual law of prescription to apply to benefices, and order the bishops to supply rectors of churches with a list of the property of the benefice: the widow and children of a deceased beneficiary were not to be turned out of the benefice (i. 1, 4).

A.D. 779. Charles the Great ordered "decima et nona cum ipso censu sit soluta" by those who held church estates, and Selden explains nona to mean (Tithes, chap. vi.) that, in addition to the tithe which all land was supposed to pay, a ninth part was to be paid as rent to the church. A.D. 794 the council of Frankfurt, c. xxv., orders "decimas et nonas sive census, donent qui debitores sunt ex beneficiis et rebus ecclesiarum." Can. xxvi. orders churches to be restored by those "qui beneficia exinde habent."

In the East there is no trace of the custom of granting benefices. The decree of Leo and Anthemius (A.D. 470, Cod. Just. 1, 2, 14), which Thomassin quotes, has reference, not to granting a benefice, but to making a lease in the usual way; for the usufruct is granted only in exchange for usufruct of equal value (sec. 5). So also Nov. vii. 4.

B. ADMINISTRATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

The administration of church property was the duty and privilege of the bishop, as is declared by the council of Antioch, can. xxiv., A.D. 341; cf. Cl. Rome, vi. c. 7; Gelasius, ep. x.; Gregory the Great, ii. 13. All subordinate officials were bound to give an account to the bishop and to act according to his judgment, whether they were oeconomi (Chalcedon, c. xxvi.), or managed the guest-houses (Greg. Mag. iii. 24), or poorhouses (Chalcedon, c. viii.), or parishes (Ibid. c. xvii.), or charitable trusts in general (Justin. Nov. cxliii. 23). Yet the power of the bishop was far from absolute. He was controlled by (1) the rights of the clergy, (2) by the laws of the empire, and (3) by the decrees of his metropolitan and of the provincial synod or of general councils. [BISHOP.]

1. The rights of the clergy cannot be defined

with exactness, but they possessed the following privileges. A.D. 341. The council of Antioch, c. xxiv., decrees that the bishop is to administer, but the presbyters and clergy are to be made acquainted with, the property of the church, that it may not be confused with the private property of the bishop. (Cp. to the same purpose Apostolic Canon xxxix. or xl.) Canon xxv. reserves to the bishop the right of dispensing to the poor, but if the presbyters and deacons disapprove they may summon the bishop before the provincial synod. So the Cl. of Bracara, iii. c. 16, A.D. 572. The Cl. of Carthage, iv. c. 32, A.D. 398, declared a sale or gift to be void if made by the bishop without the consent and subscription of the clergy. The edict of Leo, A.D. 470 (Cod. Just. 1, 2, 14), recognizes the clergy of Constantinople as having a voice in the alienation of church property. So also Justinian, A.D. 536 (Nov. xlvii. 1, 2), relaxing the strict prohibition of Nov. vii. 1, allows to the clergy of a church the right of judging whether it were expedient to alienate property; and by Nov. vii. 3 the consent of five priests and two deacons is required to make valid the kind of lease called emphyteusis. [ALIENATION.] Thus the rights of the clergy were limited to control, the active administration being the privilege of the bishop. In some cases presbyters seized this privilege, but it was held to be an act of insubordination (Greg. Turon. ii. 23). The council of Gangra, c. vii. viii., A.D. 324-371 (the date is doubtful), anathematizes any who give or receive gifts for the church, save the bishop and his appointed officer. This has reference most probably to heretics who persuaded people to trust the dispensing of alms to them rather than to the orthodox bishop (Binii Annot.).

2. The imperial laws limiting the power of the bishop as to alienation and leases will be found in the article ALIENATION, and above under the heading leases.

3. A council had at all times the right to overrule a bishop. Charges of maladministration are frequent in the history of the church. Athanasius was charged before the council of Tyre; Dioscorus also, bishop of Alexandria, before the council of Chalcedon, where Iba of Edessa was also tried. See COUNCIL.

The increase of wealth, and in some cases the negligence or dishonesty of the bishop, required that he should have the aid of an official. The Arabic canons of the council of Nicaea (c. lviii. iv.) decree that the citizens of each city are to choose some monk or ecclesiastic to manage the hospitals. Canon lxxxvi. orders an oeconomus, or steward, to be appointed in each church, and with him others, to manage the estates, farms, fruits, and vessels. (Cf. chap. lxxiii. of the other Arabic version in Labbe, Conc. ii.) Gregory of Nazianzum, when made bishop of Constantinople, found no account of the property of his see, and during his occupancy he kept no accounts (Carmen de Vita Sua). Chrysostom was accused of managing his revenues without giving any account to the clergy (Photius, Bibl. Cod. 59). Soon after his time the church of Constantinople possessed more than one steward, as we find from the clergy are to receive the other half to be divided according to their degrees; the farms are to remain under the bishop's power. Canon xv. orders that lands, vineyards, slaves, and cattle given to the parishes are to be in the bishop's power. Of the offerings upon the altar only one third is to be paid to the bishop. But as some of the parishes were very poor the council of Carpentras, A.D. 527, ordered the gifts to the parishes to go to the clergy and to repairs of the church, if the bishop's see was adequately rich; if not, the parishes are to keep only so much as is absolutely needed for the clergy and repairs; the surplus to go to the bishop. A.D. 538. The third council of Orleans, c. v., decreed that oblations made in city churches were to be in the power of the bishop, who might set apart what he thought fit for repairs. The parishes and country churches are to keep their own customs. Canon xi. withholds the stipends of the contumacious; so does the council of Narbonne, c. x. A.D. 589, and also from priests or deacons who could not read (c. xi.). Gregory of Tours (Spicil. tom. v. p. 107) allows some who were suspended to receive their share (sportulam).

In Spain the division was into three parts, the duty of repairing the churches being thrown upon the bishop. A.D. 516. The council of Tarraco, c. viii., complains of the state of the churches, and orders the bishop to go round annually and see that they are repaired, according to old custom; for by an ancient tradition the bishop receives a third of all. A.D. 563. The council of Braccara, c. vii., orders three equal portions to be made: for the bishop, the clergy, and for repairs and lights, of which last fund the arch-priest or archdeacon who administers it is to account to the bishop. By canon xxi. the oblations of the faithful and gifts in memory of the dead are to be divided once or twice a year among all the clergy equally. As the bishops unjustly seized the revenues of the smaller churches in their dioceses, the fourth council of Toledo, c. xxxiii. A.D. 633, ordered them to take no more than a third, and to go round annually and repair the churches (c. xxxvi.). A.D. 655. The ninth council of Toledo, c. vi., allows the bishop to bestow his third of the oblations on any church he pleases. A.D. 666. The council of Emerita, c. xiv. divides the money offered in divine service into three parts: one for the bishop, one for the priests and deacons, who are to apportion their share according to order and dignity, and one share to the subdeacons and clerics. Canon xvi. forbids the bishop to take a third of the oblations from a parish, and throws the duty of repairing their church on the priests. A.D. 693. The sixteenth council of Toledo, canon v., decrees that as the ancient canons allowed the bishop a third, he may exact it if he thinks he ought, but must then take the duty of repairing the churches; if he waive his claim, the worshippers must keep their church in repair under the supervision of the bishop; but when all the churches are in good repair the bishop is to have his third. Many of these canons regard the property of a diocese as no longer a fund controlled by one head, but as more or less separated and attached to particular places. At what time this practice began cannot be exactly fixed. Theodorus

Lector (i. p. 553) says that about A.D. 460 Marcion, oeconomus of Constantinople, was the first to order the clergy of each church to receive the offerings of their church. Under Justinian founders of churches gave endowments (Nov. lvi. 2; cxiii. 18), which would naturally be reserved to their churches, though the Novels do not state this; on the other hand, the law prohibiting the clergy or any manager of a charitable house to alienate, speaks only of ecclesia or sacra domus.

3. Churches.—It was found desirable to regulate church building by law. The council of Chalcedon, c. iv., forbids the erection of a domus oratoria [ORATORIUM] without consent of the bishop. Justinian decreed (Nov. lxxi. 2, A.D. 538), that any one who desired to build a church must get leave from the bishop, and must also give first an endowment for lights, repairs, and the support of the clergy; if he cannot afford so much, he may restore an old church. The bishop is to consecrate the ground and fix a cross there, and when the building is once begun the civil judge is to enforce its completion by the donor or his heirs (Nov. cxxxi. 7, A.D. 541). If funds are bequeathed for building a church, the bishop and civil judge are to see it completed within three years (Cod. Just. 1, 3, 46, A.D. 530), which was afterwards extended to five years (Nov. cxxi. 10). Consecration is forbidden before endowment by c. v. of the third council of Braccara, A.D. 572. See CHURCHES, MAINTENANCE OF, p. 388.

4. The Poor.—In the earliest account of church property (Acts ii. 45) we read "that distribution was made to every man according as he had need." The first council of the church ordered that the poor should be remembered (Gal. ii. 10). During the first eight centuries of the church, almsgiving was carried to a pernicious excess. The earliest notices of church service (Justin M. Apol. 2; Tertull. Apol. 39) tell us that the collections were made for the orphans, widows, the sick and shipwrecked, all who suffered for the faith in mines, in prison, or in exile. Also as in apostolic times the wealthier churches made grants to the poorer; the church of Rome was especially noted for its liberality (Dionysius, Bp. Cor. Epist.).

First in the ranks of the poor were found the clergy. Some clergy, it is true, were notoriously wealthy; but a natural reaction against such unbecoming luxury, aided by the influence of the monks, led many to abandon all their property to relatives, or bestow it upon the church. Augustine was especially anxious to promote community of goods among the clergy. He refused to accept for the church a legacy from a presbyter who had been apparently supported from the common fund (Sermo 49). He declared he would ordain none but those who would profess poverty, and would deprive all who broke this rule. But he was unable to carry this out, and made poverty optional (Sermo 46). Many of the most eminent fathers of the church gave up all their property upon being ordained, as Cyprian and Ambrose, Gregory of Nazianzum and Basil (Thomassin, iii. 3, 3). There are many references in the fathers and a few in the councils to the duty of the church to support the poor. [POOR, CARE OF.]

5. Pensions.—The council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, assigned pensions to four persons: to

Domnus, ex-bishop of Antioch, was granted maintenance (Act x.); two rival claimants to the bishopric of Ephesus were to have an annual allowance of 200 gold solidi (Act xii.); another disappointed candidate for the office of bishop was to be kept as the funds of the church might permit (Act xiv.). Agapetus (Ep. 2) orders the bishops of Africa to support the heretical clergy who returned to the faith, although forbidding them all clerical functions. The letters of Gregory furnish many instances of pensions in the church of Rome. [PENSIONS.]

PROPHECY, LITURGICAL (1). A lesson from any part of the Old Testament read in divine service.

(1) Incidental Notices.—The Old Testament was read, it is believed, universally at the celebration of the eucharist in the first liturgic period. Thus Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, describing that service: "The commentaries of the apostles and the writings of the prophets are read as time permits" (Apol. i. 67). In the Constitutions, Greek and Coptic, the apostles are made to speak of "the reading of the law and prophets, and of their epistles, and of the gospels" (viii. 5; sim. more fully, ii. 57). According to St. Chrysostom, 398, Christians "heard the prophets and the apostles" in that service (Hom. iii. de David et Saul, 2). St. Augustine, 396, refers to first lessons from the Old Testament read in it, as from Isaiah (Serm. 45, § 1, "Prima lectio Isaiae"), Micah (48, § 2, "Lectio prima prophetica"), and Proverbs (82, § 8, "Primitus audivimus"). In his church, however, the Old Testament was not always read first, or perhaps was sometimes, already, not read at all; for elsewhere he says, "Primum lectionem audivimus Apostoli" (Serm. 176; see also S. 165). In France, 554, Childebert, in a decree for the suppression of idolatrous practices, speaks of the priest giving out from the altar the teachings of "the gospel, the prophets, and the apostles" (Baluz. Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 7). Germanus of Paris, his contemporary, in his description of the Gallican, or more correctly the Frankish liturgy, says, "The prophetic lesson keeps its own place, reproving evil things and declaring the future, that we may know Him to be the same God who has thundered in the prophecy, taught in the apostle, and shone forth in the brightness of the gospel" (Epist. i.; Migne, Patrol. Lat. 72, col. 90). Gregory of Tours, 573, speaks of the "three books" read at masses, "viz. of the prophecy, the apostle, and the gospels" (Hist. Franc. iv. 16). Elsewhere he mentions an occasion on which "the prophetic lesson having been read, the reader was already standing before the altar to read the lesson of the blessed Paul" (De Mirac. S. Mart. i. 5). Pseudo-Dionysius in the East, probably about 520, tells us that "then (i.e. after the Psalms) follows the reading of the sacred volumes by the ministers in course" (De Eccl. Hier. iii. 2). These volumes are, according to Maximus, his commentator, 645, the Old and New Testament (Schol. in loc.). An Armenian canon of the 6th century: "Let them duly celebrate the liturgy, singing psalms, prophecies, epistles, and gospels, in their order" (Script. Vet. Nova Collect. Mai, x. 278).

The Ecclesiastical Books.—The liturgy of St. James: "Then (after the prayer of the TRISAGION) are read in great detail (διεξοδικά-τατα) the sacred oracles of the Old Testament and of the prophets, and the incarnation of the Son of Man, His sufferings, &c., are set forth" (Lit. of St. James, ed. Trollope, 41). It is evident that when this rubric was composed the prophecies were not short extracts appointed for the day, but were left to the discretion of the officiant. We should naturally infer also that the New Testament was not yet in the hands of the church at Jerusalem; for while the Old Testament is "read," the subjects of the New are "set forth."

The Old Testament lesson has long disappeared from the Greek liturgies of St. Mark, St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom; nor are there now any traces of it in the Eastern liturgies derived from them in use among the Abyssinians, Copts, and Syrians, whether Melchites or Jacobites. The Nestorians retain it under the name of Karyāna, or "reading." Sometimes they have two lessons from the Old Testament; but generally the second before the epistle is taken from the Acts of the Apostles (Badger's Nestorians, ii. 19, 217; Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. ii. 589, 599, "ad Lectiones"). The prophecy is preserved in the Armenian rite, where it is still preceded by a psalm (Le Brun, Dissert. x. 14; Neale, Introd. Hist. East. Ch. i. 402). A psalm, we may mention, is also left in the Syrian Ordo Communis, but it is there now followed by the epistle (Renaudot, ii. 7).

In the West, the Gothic-Spanish Missal provides lessons from the Old Testament for every celebration (Missale Mozar. Leslie, i. 7, 19, &c.). They are called lectiones. Thus: "Lectio Libri Esaye prophete" (12); "Lectio Libri Ecclesiastici Salamonis" (29). The old Gallican lectionary found at Luxeuil, which is assigned to the 7th century, gives one or more prophecies under similar headings for most, not for all, days (Liturg. Gall. (106-173)). We also observe some left in the Besançon sacramentary of the same date (Mus. Ital. i. 278, 283, 289, &c.), though that rite is in several respects conformed to the practice of Rome. In the Ambrosian, a "Lectio Prophetica" is read in every mass, except the first two on Christmas day (Le Brun, Dissert. iii. art. 2). It was revised by Charles Borromeo, after a period of neglect; but had lasted in some of the churches of Lombardy till the 14th century, the greater number being then "content with a single lesson [before the gospel] after the custom of Rome" (Radulph. Tungr. de Canonum Observ. prop. 23). This single lesson was, we further learn, taken at that period sometimes from the one, sometimes from the other, Testament (ibid.). The old Roman lectionary, the Liber Comitis, testifies to that "custom of Rome;" for there also the one lesson before the gospel is taken indifferently from either book (inter Opp. Hieronym. x. 523, ed. Vallars.; Cap. Reg. Franc. ii. 1309; Rituale SS. PP. Pamel. ii. 1, &c.). We take this as an indication that, during the first liturgic period, the church of Rome agreed with all other churches in reading from the Old Testament at every celebration. A remnant of that rite is still found in the substitution of lessons from that book for the epistles on the week-days of Lent, and in the use of such lessons, even with epistles, on the ember days. Another witness to the primitive rule at Rome is the third ambo for the prophecy still to be seen in the church of San Clemente in that city. It stands with that for the epistle on the right of the altar; while that for the gospel, which is higher and more ornate, is on the left (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. iv. 3).

Later Testimony.—From Rupert of Deutz, 1111 (de Off. Div. iii. 15), we learn that "two lessons," i. e. a prophecy and an epistle, were read at mass "tam die quam nocte" at Christmas. Durandus, whose experience lay in France, A.D. 1286, says that some churches read "prophecies" before the epistles on Christmas eve and Christmas day (Rationale, vi. 12, n. 3; 13, n. 20). Such lessons are found in many of the mediaeval missals of France (Mart. de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iv. xii. 21).

Posture of the Hearers.—According to the Apostolical Constitutions (ii. 57) the people sat while the Old Testament, the Acts, and Epistles were read, rising for the gospel. In the West, the earliest custom was to stand during all; for we find Caesarius, A.D. 502, giving permission to the women to sit when the "lessons," i. e. the prophecy and epistle, were longer than usual (Serm. 95, § 1). But from the language of Amalarius, who wrote about 827, we gather that the practice had become obsolete long before his time: "Quamdiu haec duo celebrantur, id est, lectio et prophetia, solemus sedere, more antiquorum" (de Eccl. Off. iii. 11).

The Old Testament lessons in the daily service of the Mozarabes are also called "prophetiae" (Breviarium Gothicum, Lorenzana, 7, 9, 12, 17, 19, &c.).

For notices of this subject see Sala's note (4) on Bona Rer. Liturg. ii. 6, § 2; Mabillon de Liturgia Gallic. i. 5, § 4; Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 4, § 1; Neale, Hist. of the Eastern Church, Gen. Introd. p. 369; Notitia Eucharistica, 238-243, ed. 2.

(2) The hymn of Zacharias, "Benedictus Dominus," &c. (St. Luke i. 68-79), was always sung, except in Lent, before the eucharistic lessons in the old Gallican liturgy suppressed by Pepin and Charlemagne in the 8th century; and as so used was conventionally known as "the prophecy." Its connexion with the lessons is thus explained by Germanus of Paris, 555: "Canticum autem Zachariae pontificis in honorem sancti Johannis Baptistae cantatur, pro eo quod primordium salutis in baptismi sacramenta (sic) consistit . . . et Johannes medius est, prophetarum novissimus et evangelistarum primus" (Epist. i. or Expos. Miss. de prophetia).

The prophecy was on some days, in most of the Gallican liturgies, followed by an "Oratio" or "Collectio post Prophetiam." In the Frankish Missal this seems to have been said in every ordinary mass (Lit. Gall. 322-325). In the Besançon sacramentary collects "post prophetiam" are provided for Advent (Mus. Ital. i. 285, 287), St. John the Baptist's day (340), and most Sundays (365, 370, 373). The Gothic-Gallican gives two only, one for Christmas day, and the other for the first Easter mass (Lit. Gall.

190, 251). There is but one left in the Reichenau fragment (Forbes and Neale, Gallican Liturgies, 8). A second, the title of which, "post Prophetia" (sic) remains, has been supplanted by an Apologia Sacerdotis (28). There are none in the Missale Gallicanum Vetus of the collections.

The Frankish Missal has substituted Roman collects which have no reference to "the prophecy" for its original prayers "post prophetiam." All the other examples extant shew that these were properly founded on the canticle itself. Some of them preserve much of its language: e.g. "Blessed holy God of Israel, visit Thy people, bless Thy people, and deliver it from all its sins; and grant, O Lord of Hosts, that we may be delivered out of the hands of our enemies, and may attain to serve Thee alone with righteousness and holiness all our days; and direct our feet in the way of peace, that we may be able to fulfil Thy will in all things" (Sacr. Gall. (Vesont) in Mus. Ital. i. 370).

PROPHETEUM (προφητεῖον). Churches or memorials erected in honour of a prophet, or in his name, were in ancient times called Prophetia. In the council of Constantinople under Mennas (Act. iii. A.D. 538, Labbe's Concil. v. 5, 67) mention was made of the Propheteum of Isaiah, and Theodore the Reader (lib. ii. p. 568) speaks of the remains of the prophet Samuel being deposited in a separate shrine of his own (ἐν τῷ προφητείῳ αὐτοῦ). Compare APOSTOLIUM. (Martigny, Dict. des Antiq. chrét. s. v.)

[E. C. H.]

PROSA. In singing the Alleluia [ALLELUIA] a custom grew up of prolonging the last syllable upon a series of notes. This was called the jubilatio, and sometimes sequentia. A further development followed, of setting words to these, not in strict metre, but in rhythmical prose, hence called Proses: then metrical hymns (Sequences) were introduced. Notker, abbot of St. Gall in the 9th century, is commonly said to have been the first writer of them. The Syrian liturgies have a hymn called Sedra, which is strictly a prose.

PROSDOCIUS (PROSDUCUS), martyr at Antioch with Veronica and Romanus; commemorated Ap. 20. (Wright, Syr. Mart.) [C. H.]

PROSMANARIUS. The word προσμανάριος seems to designate the verger or watchman whose office it was to trim and extinguish the church-lamps, and to remain permanently in the building to guard it from pollution or robbery. Thus the recluses (ἐγκλειστοί) and prosmanarii are mentioned by Theodorus Hermopolites as the persons who were bound not to leave the church. It seems to be equivalent to the Latin MAN-SIONARIUS (Suicer, Thesaurus, s. v.). Compare PARAMONARIUS. [C.]

PROSPHONESIS, the act or office of calling on the congregation to pray, and suggesting the several subjects of their prayer.

The council of Laodicea, about 365, directs that in the liturgy, after the dismissal of the catechumens and penitents, "the three prayers of the faithful be said as follows: one, viz. the first, in silence; but the second and third by the method of prosphonesis" (διὰ προσφωνήσεως, can. 19). By reference to the liturgy in the Apostolical Constitutions (viii. 6), we learn the meaning of this to be, that those prayers are to be "bidden," or dictated to the people, who respond.

Κηρύττειν is used in the same sense as προσφωνεῖν. Thus the Constitutions: "After this [the departure of the competentes], let the deacon proclaim (κηρυττέτω), Pray ye that are under penance;" and petitions for them are then dictated to the faithful, as before, for the other non-communicating classes (viii. 8). So on a certain occasion, St. Athanasius "ordered the deacon" κηρύξαι εὐχὴν (Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 13). By a canon of council of Ancyra, 315, deacons who had sacrificed to idols during the persecutions of that period were no longer to "make the proclamations" (κηρύσσειν, can. 2). Such biddings of prayer are called by St. Basil, 373, κηρύγματα ἐκκλησιαστικὰ. See Epistle 155 (ed. Ben.), where he mentions some of the subjects suggested; as the welfare of brethren in foreign lands, of those in military service, &c.

Examples of prosphonesis from liturgies that were in actual use will be interesting. In St. James, after the sermon, "the deacon says, Let us all say, Lord, have mercy. O Lord Almighty, the God of our fathers, we beseech Thee, hear us. For the peace from above, and the salvation of our souls, let us beseech the Lord. For the peace of the whole world, let us beseech the Lord," &c. (Lit. Hieros. Trollope, 42). Again, after the offertory and creed, "the deacon makes the universal synapte," or collection of petitions for all sorts and conditions of men. "The deacon: Let us beseech the Lord in peace. The people: Lord, have mercy. The deacon: . . . For them that bear fruit and perform good works in the holy churches of God, for them that remember the poor, the widows and orphans, strangers and them in need, and for those who have desired us to remember them in the prayers, let us beseech the Lord. For them that are in age and infirmity, for the sick and afflicted, . . . let us beseech, &c. For travellers by sea or land, for Christians in foreign lands, . . . let us beseech," &c. (55). Compare St. Chrysostom, in which, after a similar beginning, the deacon bids the people pray thus: "For this holy house, and for those who enter it with faith, devotion, and the fear of God, let us beseech the Lord. Choir: Lord, have mercy. The deacon: For our archbishop N., for the honourable presbytery, for the ministry (deacons) in Christ, for all the clergy and the people, let us beseech the Lord. The choir: Lord, have mercy. The deacon: For our most religious God-protected emperors," &c. (Euchol. Goar, 64; similarly, 70, 71, 74, 80). A similar ectene is bidden by the deacon in the Armenian liturgy (Neale's Introd. Hist. East. Church, 420), in several clauses, to each of which the choir responds; as it does to those of another bidden by the whole body of priests and deacons chanting (398). Instances in the Latin church are the two litanies used in the Milanese liturgy alternately on the second and three following Sundays in Lent: "The inpressa ended, the preces bidden by the deacon, the choir responding. Imploring the gifts of divine peace and pardon, from our whole heart and our whole mind, we pray Thee. R.: Lord, have mercy. For Thy holy catholic church, here and throughout the world, we pray Thee. R.: Lord," &c.

(Pamel. Rituale SS. PP. i. 328). In the second form, the deacon bids thus: "Let us all say. R.: Kyrie eleyson. The deacon: Almighty God of our fathers. R.: Kyrie, &c. The deacon: Look down, O God, from heaven, and from Thy holy seat. R.: Kyrie, &c. The deacon: For Thy holy catholic church," &c. (331).

It will be observed that, in the foregoing examples, the prosphonesis is, except in one case, assigned to the deacon alone. It was at first his office in every church, and the fact is recognized by many early writers. E.g. St. Chrysostom: "Ye all in common hear the voice of the deacon commanding and saying, Let us pray for the bishop," &c. (de Prophet. Obscur. ii. 5). In another homily (ii. in 2 Cor. § 5), this father, commenting clause by clause on the prayer for the catechumens, mentions it as bidden by the deacon. (See Socrates, u. s.) It was owing to this that the eirenica of the Greek liturgy were also called diaconica. Latin witnesses are St. Augustine in Africa: "communis oratio voce diaconi indicitur" (Ep. 55 ad Januar. 18, § 34); Caesarius (502) and Germanus (555) in France: "Oratio clamante diacono indicitur" (Caes. Serm. 85, § 1), "Preces vero psallere levitas pro populo ab origine libris Moysacis ducit exordium" (Germ. Epist. i. "De Prece," Migne, lxxii. 92); and Isidore in Spain, 610: "Ad ipsum quoque [sc. diaconum] pertinet officium precum" (Epist. ad Leudefr. 8).

The prosphonesis of the deacon is lost in most of those Oriental liturgies in which the petitions of the diaconica are now gathered or expanded severally into long prayers and assigned to the priest; as in the Coptic St. Basil (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient. i. 5, 7; but see a trace in the previous "Deacon: Pray ye for the Holy Gospel," p. 7), in St. Mark (ibid. 138, 150-153); in the Ethiopic (505-507); in the Syrian anaphorae of Clement of Rome (ibid. ii. 192), of Severus of Antioch (325), St. James of Edessa (375), St. Basil (555), &c.; and in the Nestorian of Theodore (ibid. 619) and Nestorius (630). It is preserved in the Syrian Ordo Communis, the first part common to all the liturgies (5), and in the anaphora of St. James (34-38), which is used by Melchites and Jacobites alike.

PROTHESIS (πρόθεσις; Credentia; Copt Takaddemet). The term was clearly adopted into Christian ritual from the Mosaic, where it is part of the Alexandrine equivalent for shewbread (ἄρτοι τῆς προθέσεως and πρόθεσις ἄρτων).

In the Greek ritual, the term is applied both to the recess upon the left of the holy table and to the lesser altar which the recess contains. Bingham observes that in many churches "there was a place where the offerings of the people were received, out of which the bread and wine was taken that was consecrated at the altar . . . This is called πρόθεσις" (Antiq. viii. vi. 22). Similarly, with a slight enlargement, Renaudot describes it as "that part to the right of the bema in which the priest, about to celebrate Mass, arranges and prepares what is necessary, and from which he proceeds to the altar with a certain solemn ritual" (Liturgiae Orient.). Du Cange. (Gloss. Graec. s. v.) confines his account to this sense of the word, and does not even hint that any other is possible. Suicer, however, says that Prothesis was altare minus, to the left of the principal altar, and that it had its name from the fact that the bread which was to be consecrated by the priest was first placed upon it (Thesaurus, p. 842). In this sense the term prothesis corresponds to the modern Credence. It is remarked by Renaudot that the term "altare minus" is improperly applied to the table of the prothesis "because the sacrifice is not offered upon it" (Lit. Orient. i. 188, ed. Paris, 1716).

Most of the writers upon the subject appear to be agreed that the prothesis stood to the left of the holy table as you face it. So it is placed by Leo Allatius, by Goar, and by Beveridge (in the plan given by Bingham, though Beveridge's own words, subsequently quoted, seem to place it otherwise). The points on which they differ are two: (1) whether the Prothesis was a part of the bema or distinct from it; and (2) whether there was a direct approach to the prothesis from the bema or not. Beveridge (Annot. in Can. Conc. Nic. Primi in can. xi. 16) considers that the prothesis was a distinct place from the bema, and that there was an immediate communication from one to the other, basing his conclusion upon these words from the liturgy of St. Chrysostom: "Καὶ εὐλογῶν τὸν λαόν, εἰσέρχεται" (sc. into the bema) μετὰ δὲ τὴν ἀπόλυσιν, εἰ οὐκ ἔστι διάκονος, εἰσέρχεται ὁ ἱερεὺς εἰς τὴν Πρόθεσιν, καὶ μεταλαμβάνει τὸ ὑπολείφθην ἐν τῷ ἁγίῳ ποτηρίῳ προσεχῶς καὶ εὐλαβῶς καὶ ἀποπλύνει τὸ ἅγιον ποτήριον τρίς, καὶ ὁρᾷ μὴ μείνῃ τὸ λεγόμενον παργαρίτης. He afterwards quotes a passage of Marcus Hieromonachus to shew that the censor minister sometimes had to make his entrance into the sanctuary through the prothesis and not through the holy doors. That the prothesis was, in some sense, a distinct apartment from the sanctuary, and that sundry liturgical actions had to be performed in it and not in the sanctuary seems clear; but it may fairly be doubted whether ancient churches were always built in the same way. In a modern church, a vestry is sometimes a distinct construction and sometimes an apartment merely curtained off from the church. And it seems quite conceivable that when Leo Allatius places the prothesis in the bema, while Goar separates it from it, both may be correct. In a handsome church the prothesis may very well have been the apse of an aisle, whilst in a church of humbler pretensions the liturgical requirement of the prothesis may have been met by separating off a part of the bema itself. This appears actually to be the case at the present day according to the description given by Dr. Neale: "The chapel is usually divided by a wall from the bema, a passage being pierced through it; sometimes it is separated by a screen, and in poor country churches has occasionally no division at all" (Holy Eastern Church, Introd. p. 190).

The view of Mr. Freshfield is that the construction of the prothesis in an apse is a question of date; that Byzantine churches had not at first an apse for the prothesis, but that it was introduced to meet the requirements of the ritual when developed beyond its pristine simplicity. He says that "where an ancient Greek church is found with three apses it is subsequent in date to the emperor Justin II. (i.e. the middle of the 6th century), or has had a new east end applied: where it has only one apse it is prior to that date" (Archaeologia, vol. 44, xxiv.).

It should be noticed that in Beveridge's plan of an ancient church as given by Bingham, the prothesis is placed on the left of the spectator looking towards the altar, whereas Beveridge's words seem to insist upon the contrary. He seems, indeed, to take some pains upon the point, as if he were writing against the conclusions of previous authors. He says, "Ἐν διακονικῶν quidem ad dexteram Pontificis in throno sedentis et Occidentem respicientis collocatur, πρόθεσις ad sinistram," and much more to the same purport (Annot. in Can. Conc. Nic. Primi, in Can. xi. 15). In point of fact, amongst the several writers there seems to be some confusion in the use of the terms "right" and "left."

In the Eastern ritual the procession from the prothesis to the altar with the sacred elements is called the Great ENTRANCE (p. 612) μεγάλῃ εἰσόδῳ, while that with the Book of the Gospels is called the Little Entrance (μικρὰ εἰσόδῳ). The complete rite is described by Goar (Euchol. p. 131). The office of the prothesis is the preparation of the oblation for the eucharistic service. It opens with the rite of washing the hands on the part of the priest and deacon, saying the Psalm, "I will wash my hands in innocency, O Lord, and so will I go to thine altar." Dr. Neale infers the extreme antiquity of this rite from the words of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, "Ye have seen the deacon giving water to the priest to wash his hands, and to the presbyters who surround the altar of God" (Catech. Mystag. 5). The whole office is given in English by Dr. Neale (Eastern Church, Introd. p. 341). [H. T. A.]

PROTOAPOSTOLARIUS, the first epistoler. The liturgical epistle is called the apostle, because taken from the writings of the apostles, in the Greek and Oriental churches (Liturg. S. Chrys. in Goar, Euchol. 68; S. Marc. in Renaud. Collectio Lit. Orient. i. 137; the Coptic rite, ibid. 6; the Ethiopic, 508; the Syrian [Melchite and Jacobite], ii. 19, but "epistle" also 8, 19; the Nestorian, 585), as formerly among the Latins (Childeberti Constit. A.D. 554, Capit. Reg. Fr. Baluze, i. 7; Germanus Paris. 555, Expos. Missae in Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iv. 12; Cons. Tolet. A.D. 633, can. 12; and some copies of the Gregorian sacramentary, Murat. Lit. Rom. Vol. ii. 1, Ménard. Opp. S. Greg. iii. 1, ed. Ben., Rocca, Opp. Greg. V. 63, ed. 1615). Hence the epistoler was called by the later Greeks apostolarius. Describing the ceremonies of Easter Eve at Constantinople, Codinus tells us that "the protoapostolarius reads the prophecy and the apostle" (de Offic. vi. p. 46, ed. Niebuhr).

PROTOLICUS, martyr with Bassus and Antonius at Alexandria; commemorated Feb. 14 (Usuard. Mart.; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

PROTONOTARIUS. By this hybrid word the Greeks denoted the ecclesiastical officer at Constantinople, who had his counterpart at Rome in the primicerius notariorum. "The office [of the protonotary] is evident from the name; for he is the first of the notaries or scribes" (Codinus, de Offic. Palat. C. P. v. 41, ed. Bekk.). In a very ancient Notitia Officialium, or "catalogue raisonné" of church officials at C. P., printed by Goar, we read: "The protonotary stands in the church for the service of the bishop, and it is his business to write, if there be any occasion for it. He also examines (or makes a visitation of) the lawyers, and writes wills and manumissions, and precepts and the like." (MS. Allat. in Euchologion, 276). Another document of the same kind tells us that his station was in the bema, that at the time of the elevation he gave the basin to the bishop, that he might wash his hands, and that he also held the DICERUM (ibid. 269). He read the gospel on Palm Sunday (277; similarly 270). The protonotarius took precedence after the EXOCATACOELI (Joan. Citrii Resp. 8, Jus Graeco-Rom. v. in the notes of Gretser and Goar to Codinus, 132). In the 12th century, under Georgius Xiphelinus, the protecdicus [ECDICUS] was charged with the duties of the protonotary, their offices being amalgamated under the former name (Joan. Citr. u. s. in Goar, Euchol. 283). In what century the title of protonotary was first used by the Greeks, I cannot say. The imperial officer, so called, is termed by Socrates, A.D. 439, πρωτοστάτης τῶν βασιλικῶν ὑπογραφέων (Hist. Eccl. vii. 23). Agatho, who had been employed as a notary at the sixth oecumenical council, writing in 712, calls himself "protonotary of the patriarchic secretum" (Epilogus, Hard. Conc. iii. 1833). This is, I think, the earliest example. The term was adopted by the Romans not much later. Ammianus, 389, calls the civil officer merely "primus inter notarios omnes" (Res Gestae, xxv. 8). Gregory of Rome, in 592, still uses the phrase "primicerius notariorum" (Epist. ii. 22) when speaking of the ecclesiastic. Similarly, in the Liber Pontificalis (Julius, No. 36): "Hic constitutum fecit, ut . . . omnium monumentorum in ecclesia per primicerium notariorum confectio celebraretur." Hadrian of Rome, 772, uses the word, but applies it only to a chancellor of the empire (Epist. ad Car. M. Hard. Conc. iii. 2017; inter Epp. Hadr. 85). After our period, however, it became the common title of the papal officers. Thus e.g. John de Trembley was "protonotary of the apostolic see and of the sacred council of Constance" (Hard. viii. 492). A bull of Leo X. speaks of the "protonotariatus officium" and "protonotariatus habitus" (Hard. ix. 1776).

[W. E. S.]

PROTOPAPAS (πρωτοπαπᾶς, πρωτοιερεύς, πρωτοπρεσβύτερος). I. The chief of the pres-

byters in an episcopal church was so called. Hence he may be compared to the dean of a western cathedral. At Constantinople, "when the bishop celebrates the liturgy, the protopapas stands above all the rulers of the church, and in the divine liturgy gives the holy communion to the bishop. The bishop likewise gives it to the πρωτοιερεύς. He is also the chief in the higher ranks of the church; thus occupying the place of the bishop in the church" (Official. Catal. ex. Allat. antiquissimo MS. printed by Goar, Euchol. p. 277; compare the similar Catal. p. 271). He is "the first of the bema," says Codinus, "and has the second place after the bishop" (De Offic. Palat. i. p. 6, ed. Bekk.). A brief form of appointment is given by Goar from an ancient Euchologion (287). Some special duties of the protopapas of Constantinople are mentioned by Codinus, which probably did not differ from those discharged by the same officer in other great churches (xiv. 79).

II. The chief of the clergy in attendance on the emperor was also called the protopapas. Thus Codinus: "The emperor has a protopapas among his clergy, the church has the same" (De Off. xvii. 94). Under Constantine VIII. "the protopapas of the palace was commanded to precede the army with the precious wood of the cross" (Cedrenus, Hist. Comp. ii. 285, ed. Nieb.). One Stylianus is mentioned as the protopapas of the great palace under Nicephorus II. (ibid. 525).

III. Parish priests who had others under them were also called protopapas. The eighth canon of Antioch, A.D. 341, forbids "presbyters in the country districts to give canonical epistles," but permits the chorepiscopi to do so. Balsamon, commenting on this, says, "some maintain that the presbyters in the country districts, i.e. the protopapades, can give letters of peace" (Pandect. Bever. i. 437). Again, he says that "because the canons forbade bishops in small cities and villages, therefore they ordained for them presbyters; that is, protopapades and chorepiscopi" (Comm. in Cem. x. p. 439). They probably had some power over their brethren, as well as precedence, from the first, but its extent does not appear. In the modern Greek church the protopapas "in vicis episcopo absente, reliquis sacerdotibus semper praeeminet, et in eos jus exercet" (Goar, 287).

PROTOPRESBYTER. The protopapas was anciently so called. In the acts of the synod at the Oak, A.D. 403, we read of "Arsacius (of Constantinople), the protopresbyter, who succeeded Chrysostom" (Hard. Concil. i. 1041). A protopresbyter of Alexandria is spoken of at about the same time (Socr. Hist. Eccl. vi. 9). In the Monumenta Syn. Nic. ii. A.D. 787, one of the Roman legates is called πρώτος πρεσβύτερος of the church at Rome (Hard. iv. 28). See PROTOPAPAS, ARCHPRESBYTER, DECANUS. [W. E. S.]

PROTUS (1), pedagogus, martyr with his pupils Cautianus and Cantianilla; commemorated May 31 (Usuard. Mart.; Hieron. Mart., at Aquileia; Mart. Rom.); June 15, with Cautianus and Clemens (Hieron. Mart.).

(2) Martyr with Jacinctus, both eunuchs, under Gallienus; commemorated Sept. 11, on the old Via Salaria (Usuard. Mart.; Bed. Mart., with Hyacinthus, both eunuchs of St. Eugenia; Hieron. Mart., with Jacinctus, at the cemetery of Basillae on the old Via Salaria; Vet. Rom. Mart., Kal. Antiquiss. Patr. Lat. cxxxviii. 1191, with Hyacinthus; Mart. Rom., with the same). The natale of Protus and Hyacinthus on Sept. 11 is observed in the sacramentary of Gregory, their names mentioned in the collect, the "super oblata," and the "ad complendum" (Greg. Mag. Sacr.). [C. PSACHNION. This word, whose meaning is quite uncertain, occurs in the account of the sufferings of pope Martin I. (ob. A.D. 655). After very cruel treatment had been inflicted on him at Constantinople, the sacellarius (see Ducange, s. v.) ordered one of the guards standing by, a barber, to remove at once the pope's psachnion (Patrol. lxxxvii. 115). This done, he was delivered to the prefect of the city with a view to his being put to death, which he but narrowly escaped.

Ducange (Glossarium, s. v.) considers that the text is corrupt, and that saccion should be read, the saccus being an article of dress worn by patriarchs, &c. This does not seem very probable, because the pallium would be above all the other vestments, and the removal of that is subsequently mentioned. In the text as given by Baronius (Annales, A.D. 651, cc. 10, 11), the reading psachnion is found, which, however, leaves the matter quite as doubtful. Baronius gives the rather far-fetched theory that the meaning is that of a satchel or purse (pera). Maer (Hierolexicon, s. v.) considers the word to refer to the tonsure, laying stress on the fact that it is a barber who is bidden to act on this occasion. This would be tantamount to a degrading from the clerical office, so that the secular power could be then called upon to act.

PSALLENDA, the proper antiphon on a saint's day in the Ambrosian offices of lauds and vespers. Ex. On St. Andrew's day at vespers. "I'ssall. Inveni David servum meum: Oleo sancto meo unxi eum. Gloria Patri, &c. Inveni, &c." [W. E. S.]

PSALLENDUM, the anthem between the prophecy and epistle in the liturgy of Gothic Spain: "Postea, iterato Dominus sit semper vobiscum, canitur aut profertur psallendum, quod idem paene est atque responsum, non dispar graduali officii Latini" (Ordo Div. Off. Goth. from Roblesius, Vita Ximenii, 27, in Conc. Hisp. Aguirre, iii. 264). Leslie (in Psallendo, Miss. Mozar.) denies its close resemblance to the gradual. In the Missal this anthem is always headed by the word "psallendo," which is, I conceive, not the oblique case, but the lower Latin form. Compare sono for sonum in the Breviar. Goth. Lorenzana, 1, 6, 8, &c. [W. E. S.]

PSALLENTIA, a method of singing the psalms, hymns, &c. "Graecorum psallentiam ad nos dirigere tua fraternitas dignetur." This occurs in a letter to Jerome, which has been ascribed to Damasus of Rome, the ground of the request being the rudeness of the Roman psalmody at that time: "Nec psallentium mor- tenetur, nec hymni decus in ore nostro cognoscitur." The authenticity of the epistle and of Jerome's reply is denied by Hardouin, &c. (Mansi, Concil. iii. 428). [W. E. S.]

PSALLENTIUM (or PSALLENTIUS), a service of psalms and hymns; a word in very common use in France in the 6th century and later; but less frequent elsewhere. "Cum psallentio sacerdotum crucem Domini vel pignora sanctorum commendavit" (Baudonivia in Vita Radekundis, 19): "Dum sub muro cum psallentio sanctum ejus corpus portaretur" (Ib. 28). "Prostrati solo Dominum diebus singulis cum psallentii modulamine deprecantur" (Greg. Turon. de Vit. PP. i. 1; see Hist. Franc. i. 43: "Psallentium audierunt in caelo; ii. 21, in a procession; 37, of an antiphon, &c.). In 653 Clovis II. made a grant to the church of St. Denys, "ut sicut tempore domini genitoris nostri ibidem psallentius per turmas fuit institutus; vel sicut ad monasthirium St. Mauricii Agaunis die noctoque tenetur, ita in loco ipso celebretur" (De Re Diplom. Mabill. 466). "That on the Lord's Day every priest go round his church, together with the people cum psallentio" (Capit. Reg. Fr. v. 372). [W. E. S.]

PSALMELLUS, an anthem from the Psalms sung after the prophecy in the Ambrosian liturgy (Rituale SS. PP. Pamel. i. 295), and therefore corresponding to the PSALLEN- DUM of the Mozarabic. Its analogy to the GRADUAL is observed by Ralph of Tongres, who speaking of the responsories of the mass, says, "In the Roman office they are called graduals, and in the Ambrosian, psalmeli" (sic.; De Can. Observ. 12). The following rule for its use is given in the Missal of 1609; "Post lectionem [prophetiae], responso per ministrum Deo gratias, dicitur psalmellus, quando sequitur epistola; alioquin post lectionem dicitur alleluia cum suo versu, vel cantus" (Lebrun, Dissert. iii. art. 2).

PSALMISTA. The Statuta Antiqua of the African Church (c. 10) declare that a "psalmista, i.e. cantor," may undertake the office of a church singer at the mere bidding of the presbyter, without consulting the bishop. The presbyter is to say to him, "tu vide ut quod ore cantas corde credas, et quod corde credis operibus comprobas." Compare ORDINATION, p. 1509. [C.]

PSALMODY. The object of this article is to give some account of the rise, method, and peculiarities of Psalmody in early Christianity and to trace the progress of ideas that were associated with it.

It has been already stated in this work [see OFFICE, THE DIVINE] that psalmody formed so prominent a constituent of ancient choir services as actually to have given its name to some of the earliest service books that are known to us. Indeed, the psalmody of any given service may be considered as the thread upon which the pearls of lesson, versicle and collect are strung.

Gems of Choir Services.—We can trace the rise of the elaborate services that have been used in the Christian church in the little that has come down to us about the practice of the ancients in psalmody.

The earliest writers as well as the uniform tradition of Christendom imply that the musical performance of psalms has always formed a part of Christian worship. The first passage in Christian literature which makes any reference to the subject is the well-known passage from the epistle of St. Ignatius to the Ephesians. He uses expressions there which can only be explained on the hypothesis that the early Christians sang. He does not indeed say that what they sang was the Psalms of David. But if we bear in mind the practice of the age immediately subsequent and that of the Jewish church before, there can be no reasonable doubt that the Psalms of David formed at least a part of what the early Christians sang.

Justin Martyr, again, in his Apology addressed to the emperor Antoninus Pius, speaks of the Christians singing "hymns." But the learned Benedictine editor observes there that "it is plain enough that the name of hymns was given both to the Psalms of David and to lyrics composed by Christians themselves, which used to be sung in church." Tertullian (Apol. 39), mentions the singing of compositions taken from the Holy Scriptures, amongst which it can hardly be doubted (though he does not distinctly say so) that the Psalms of David were included. Origen too (contra Celsum, viii. 37) makes use of expressions which may fairly be interpreted in the same direction; yet he does not explicitly affirm that the psalms were sung in public worship. Indeed the earliest mention known to the present writer of the use of ψαλμοί in Christian worship is contained in a passage quoted by Eusebius against Artemon, the heretic, ψαλμοὶ δὲ ὅσοι καὶ ῥῆσαι ἀδελφῶν ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ὑπὸ πιστῶν γραφεῖσιν τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ τὴν Χριστὸν ἠμνοῦσι θεολογοῦντες (Hist. Eccl. v. 28). There is indeed one passage which may contest the priority with this quotation of Eusebius. It is a passage attributed to Hippolytus in the oration on the end of the world: τὸ στόμα ἡμῶν πρὸς δοξολογίαν καὶ αἶνον καὶ ψαλμοὺς καὶ ῥῆσας πνευματικὰς ἡντρεῖσθαι λαλεῖν. But though the passage is ancient, yet it is of doubtful authenticity, and therefore cannot be advanced with confidence in the argument. After this period the mention of psalmody properly so-called is so frequent as to enable us to dispense with specific citation.

Athanasius (de Virginitate) tells a lady, "Say as many psalms as you can, and to every psalm let there be joined prayers and bending of the knees with tears, . . . and after three psalms are finished, say Allchua."

This practice seems to be the prototype of that which was long afterwards the Mozarabic and Gallican rule, according to which it was directed that after each antiphon which followed the psalm there should be said collects, which were for the most part compiled from the language of the psalm itself. These prayers are probably the Collectiones spoken of in the council of Agde in the year 506 (can. 30), which were to be said by bishops and presbyters. If neither bishop nor presbyter but only a deacon were present, then these prayers were not said. There is a difference of opinion as to where the practice originated of interspersing psalms with collects. Tomasi attributes it to the Spanish and Gallican churches. Gerbert thinks it was brought by Cassian from the East into Gaul. In the council of Laodicea (4th century) there is a canon which forbids psalms to be said without a lection between them (Conc. Laod. can. 17).

The use of any human composition is expressly forbidden by the first council of Braga: "Ut ultra psalmos vel canonicarum Scripturarum novi et veteris Testamenti nihil poetice compositum in ecclesia psallatur, sicut et sancti præcipiunt canones" (Conc. Brac. l. c. 12). The stiffness of this prohibition was afterwards modified (Conc. Tolet. iv.). It seems however that it was not meant to exclude what we should call hymns, but only the so-called psalms of Solomon and other compositions which might seem to claim rank as canonical scripture. (See Balsamon on Conc. Laod. can. 59.) By a canon (67) amongst the capitula of Martin of Braga it was forbidden to use psalms in church that were not in Scripture (compositos et vulgares). The same thing is repeated in the 9th century, shewing that former prohibitions had been ineffectual (Conc. Aquisgr. can. 86). In connexion with this branch of the subject it will be remembered that there was often a disposition to propagate false teaching through the medium of psalms composed by such teachers themselves; as in the case of Paul of Samosata, mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vii. 30); Valentinus, mentioned by Tertullian (de Carne Christi, 17); Apollinarists in Sozomen (Hist. Eccl. vi. 25); and the most famous example of all—the Donatists, attacked by St. Augustine (Ep. 55, al. 34). The use of such psalms, however, does not seem to have been confined to the schismatic party; for St. Augustine himself composed a long psalm against the Donatist party. He says Retract. lib. i. 20) that he meant it to be sung by the multitude, in order that the unlearned might become acquainted with the errors of the Donatists. The psalm is peculiar in its structure. It is an alphabetic psalm (Abecedarius) with an intercalated antiphon. It consists of strophes of twelve lines each. The strophes begin with the letters of the alphabet down as far as V, the antiphon being said at the beginning of the psalm, and after each strophe. The antiphon in question is the line:

"Omnes qui gaudetis de pace, modo verum judicate."

This antiphon the writer himself calls Hypo-psalma. The whole is followed by an epilogue, which is an address from the Catholic church exhorting the people to a loyal adherence to her. Such psalms of human composition were sometimes called Psalmi plebei or vulgares; and in Greek ἰδιωτικοί.

The commanding position which psalmody occupied in the early monastic life cannot be better depicted than in the striking phrase of St. Jerome's about the convent at Bethlehem, "extra psalmos silentium est." St. Ambrose even proposes the example of birds, as a consideration which should lead people to begin and end the day with psalmody: "Quis enim sensum hominis gerens non erubescat sine psalmodum celebrare diem vel inchoare vel claudere; cum etiam minutissimæ aves solemnī devotione et dulci carmine ortus dierum et noctium persequantur?" (S. Ambr. in Ps. 118.)

In later times we meet with a curious term, which appears to have arisen from this universal obligation to psalmody—Psalmi superpositi. In the Benedictine Rule it denotes certain psalms enjoined for meditation upon itinerant monks, who were too illiterate to read the psalter at large. (See Du Cange, Gloss. s. v. "Superpositi.")

It is sometimes inferred from a passage in St. Augustine, that psalmody was not introduced into the church of Milan until the Arian persecutions in the time of St. Ambrose, "tum hymni et psalmi ut canerentur secundum morem orientalium partium, ne populus maeroris tædio contabesceret, institutum est." (St. Aug. Conf. lib. ix. cap. 7.) His meaning, however, probably is not that the use of psalms was hitherto unknown in the Milanese church, but that until this emergency the congregation had not performed them "secundum morem orientalium," i.e. had not sung them antiphonally, and with the people joining in. (See Mabillon de Cursu Gallicano Disquisitio.) Indeed, it will be sufficient to quote the phrase of Augustine himself to shew that the practice of singing the psalms was not confined to any particular church, but was universal, "toto orbe cantantur" (St. Aug. Conf. ix. 4.)

Amongst special uses the psalmody of the ancient Gallican church occupies a prominent position. Cardinal Tomasi observes that in more modern times it is represented, subject to certain alterations of detail, by the Mozarabic (or ancient Spanish) rite (Opp. Omnia, tom. iii. præf., Romæ, 1748). The rise and progress of psalmody in the Gallican church are described at length by Mabillon (de Cursu Gallicano Disquisitio). It will be seen later in this article that one of the specialities of Gallican psalmody was the use of Gloria Patri at the end of every psalm, as is done at present in the English church. As to the Roman mode of psalmody in early days Mabillon (u. s.) says that it is not easy to define it; but he gives his opinion that it differed in some respects from that laid down in the Benedictine rule. The phrase which Mabillon uses is modus psallendi. By this he probably does not mean the features of execution, that is, whether it was done by a single voice or by many, whether it was responsory or otherwise, but he probably means the choice and assignment of psalm and canticle in the several offices.

Of the condition of psalmody in this country before the arrival of Augustine (A.D. 596) very little is known. Of the British chant we know nothing but from a passage in Gildas, who praises its sweetness (Dei laudes canora Christi tyronum voce suaviter modulantes). Some writers have supposed that the Gallican psalmody was used here by Augustine; but Johnson (Canons, preface, xiii.) refuses to allow this. There are indications, indeed, that considerable pains were bestowed upon the subject in the ancient English church. Bede (Hist. iv. 18) gives an account of the work that was done here in the improvement of psalmody by John, the precentor (archicantor) of St. Peter's at Rome, who came here by command of pope Agatho. So great was the influence of his work that by the council of Cloveshoo (A.D. 747) the Roman psalmody was made of obligation in those parts of the British Islands which were under the jurisdiction of archbishop Cuthbert (can. 13, 15). With respect to the language in which the ancient English church performed their psalmody, authorities seem scarcely to be agreed. Johnson, indeed, admits that for the first 250 years after the arrival of Augustine it was done in Latin for the public service (Canons, preface, xiii.). An ancient MS. in the Cotton library is quoted by Collier (Eccl. Hist. book i. p. 48, vol. i. fol. ed.) to the effect that Germanus and Lupus brought the Gallican Cursus (ordinem cursus Gallorum) to this country in the 5th century. If that be so, the question is settled; for there can be no reasonable doubt either (1) that the term Cursus includes psalmody; or (2) that the psalmody of the Gallican rite was in Latin. On the relation between the Gallican Cursus and ancient English psalmody the reader may consult with advantage bishop Stillingfleet's Origines Britannicæ, chap. iv. From that work, which takes in the period before the arrival of Augustine, it may be gathered how little is really known of the practices of Christianity in these islands during the first six centuries.

Upon the ancient distribution of the psalms for the service of the church Gavanti (Thesaurus Sacrorum Rituum, tom. ii. s. ii. cap. i. 3) writes to this effect: Walafrid Strabo reports that, to avoid confusion arising from variety of uses, pope Damasus, at the instance of Theodosius, ordered St. Jerome to arrange the psalms for the several services of day and night; that the distribution was made, was approved by Damasus, and received by the whole church. It is not unreasonable to assume that in the 9th century (Strabo's period) there were extant documents from which it could be inferred that St. Jerome really did make some such distribution as that which is alleged.

Attempts were made to introduce uniformity of use into the psalmody. Thus in the council of Vannes (A.D. 465), "Rectum quoque diximus, ut vel intra provinciam nostram sacrorum ordo et psallendi una sit consuetudo" (Can. 15). The same thing occurs again in the second council of Bracara, which guards against the introduction of private uses from the monasteries. (Conc. Brac. ii. cap. 1.)

The regular psalms that would have occurred in the office of the day were at times set aside in favour of proper psalms. A capitulum of the synod of Aix in the year 817, runs thus: "Ut prætermisiss partitionibus psalterii, psalmi speciales pro elemosynariis et defunctis cantentur" (cap. 50).

It ought to be noticed that in the performance of psalmody the headings or titles of the psalms seem always to have been recited. It is well known that in his popular sermons on the Psalms, St. Augustine often makes a great deal out of the strange words which the English reader commonly passes quite unnoticed. Indeed, he speaks of the title as the herald of the psalm (præco Psalmi). In this respect Christianity probably followed what had always been (and still is) the usage of the synagogue, where the title is always recited as an integral part of the psalm, when the psalm is used for devotional purposes, either by a single individual or by the assembled multitude.

Mode.—The methods of performing psalmody in the ancient church are reducible to these:—

1. The psalm was executed by a single voice, whilst all the rest of the congregation listened.

2. Sometimes it was done by the whole congregation singing together.

3. The congregation was divided into two parts or choirs, which sang alternate verses.

4. One voice sang the first part of a verse (as we say, incepted it), and the rest of the congregation all together succeeded it, that is, sang the close of it.

To these methods some writers add yet another; e.g. Martene (de Eccl. Rit. IV. iii. 7) describes a method which he calls Responsorius. This very common term, however, has another meaning, which we shall consider subsequently. In this method, according to Martene, the cantor or lector recited each verse of the psalm, and then the whole chorus repeated it after he had done. He quotes indeed several passages to establish this; but it may be doubted whether they cannot one and all be otherwise explained.

(a) The method in which a single voice sang and the rest listened was afterwards called Tractus. It is described by Cassian: "Prædictum vero duodenarium psalmodum numerum ita dividunt, ut si duo fuerint fratres, senos psallant; si tres, quaternos; si quatuor, ternos. Quo numero nunquam minus in congregatione decantant; ac proinde quantalibet multitudo convenierit, nunquam amplius psallunt in synaxi, quam quatuor fratres" (De Coenobiis Instit. lib. ii. cap. 11, ad fin.). The reason why a psalm was executed sometimes by a single voice and sometimes by the assembly at large is given by St. Augustine: "Ideo in Psalmis aliquando plures cantant, ut ostendatur quia de pluribus fit unus; aliquando unus cantat, ut ostendatur quid fiat de pluribus." (In Jo. Tract. xii.)

(b) Cardinal Thomasius says that when the whole choir sings a psalm together, not alternately, the ancients called this method the "direct" (directus, directaneus). Mention of this is made in the Rule of St. Benedict. It was practised in the Milanese rite, in which at matins one psalm after the chapter was sung in this manner. In the monastic rite the psalms before and after meals were to be said in this manner, without antiphon on ferial days, but with antiphon or alleluia on feasts.

(γ) The antiphonal method seems to be Eastern in its origin. [ANTIPHON, p. 94.]

It is often in the present day debated whether the psalms ought to be sung antiphonally by half verses or by whole verses. It is therefore relevant to observe that in the council of Aix (8th century) a direction is given that they should be sung according to the division of the verses (ut psalmi digne secundum divisiones versuum modulentur); that is, the clergy were not to hurry one verse into the next as if there were no division (Conc. Aquisgr. cap. 70). There is, so far as the present writer knows, no trace in early Christian antiquity of the psalms having been sung by half verses by equal choirs.

(8) In this part of the subject the word Responsorium demands some notice. There is an ambiguity about it. First, certain psalms were so called from the liturgical position assigned to them. In very early times it appears that the epistle and gospel were divided by a psalm. [GRADUAL.] Psalms appointed for this function were called Responsoria. Bingham quotes this use of the term in the fourth council of Toledo, which complains of the omission of Gloria Patri at the end of such psalms—"Sunt quidam qui in fine responsiorum Gloria non dicunt." But, secondly, any psalm might be called a responsory psalm, not from the liturgical use of it, but simply from the mode of its performance. St. Isidore of Seville, for instance, applies Responsorium to a psalm that was begun by one voice and taken up by the chorus, "Vocata hoc nomine quod, uno cantante, chorus consonando respondeat" (De Off. i. 8).

The people seem at times to have done their part most lustily. "The church is well compared to the sea," says St. Ambrose, for "Responsoriis psalmodum, cantu virorum, mulierum, virginum, parvulorum consonans undarum fragor resultat" (Hexam. iii. 5).

The mode of performing psalmody in the East is described by St. Basil the Great. The people, he says, having divided themselves into two parties, perform (ἀντιψάλλουσιν) antiphonally to one another. . . Then, again, having entrusted to one person the duty of incepting the tune, the rest succent (ὑπηχοῦσι) (S. Bas. Mag. Ep. 207, Ad clericos Neocæsarienses). [ANTIPHON, p. 94.] This seems to have been the ordinary method of performing psalmody in St. Chrysostom's part of the church (whether Constantinople or Antioch), for he complains that as soon as they had succented (ὑπηχῆσαντες) two or three psalms, they hurried off from church and thought it was enough for their salvation (Hom. xi. in Matt.).

It may be gathered that in very early times there were leaders of the psalmody who became afterwards called κανονάρχαι, and in Latin, precentores. [PRECENTOR.] One of the most famous examples of this mode of performance is the escape of St. Athanasius when the church was surrounded by Arian soldiers, and he says, "Sitting on my throne, I ordered the deacon to read a psalm and the people to respond (ὑπακοῦεν al. ὑπηχεῖν), for His mercy endureth for ever" (Ath. Apol. de Eugén. p. 717, tom. i. ed. Colon. 1686).

In the rule of St. Benedict and elsewhere in connexion with psalmody there is a phrase of very frequent occurrence, psallum imponere. It means to lead the choir in performing the psalm; as we should say, to set the psalm. By the Capitula of Martin of Bracara (cent. 6) no one was to lead the psalmody (psallere) in the desk unless he had been ordained lector by the bishop (Cap. Mart. Brac. can. 45).

The ritual of the psalmody as it was practised amongst the monks of Egypt is thus described by Cassian, a writer of the 4th century: "Unus in medium psalmos Domino cantaturus exsurgit. Cumque sedentibus cunctis (ut est moris nunc usque in Aegypti partibus) et in psallentis verba omni cordis intentione defixis, undecim psalmos orationum interjectione distinctos contiguis versibus parili pronuntiatione cantasset, duodecimum sub Alleluia responsione consummans, ab universorum oculis repente substractus, questionari pariter et caeremoniis finem imposuit" (De Cocnobiolum Instit. lib. ii. cap. 5). From this passage it will be gathered that while the singer of the psalm stood, the others sat down.

From some of the expressions already used it will be gathered that the recital of the psalms was commonly—it would obviously be too much to say always—musical. In this respect they shared the privilege that belonged to other passages of Scripture. So far as we know, it appears that in the Jewish church the Scriptures were never read in the colloquial inflexions of ordinary speech, but were recited with fixed solemn musical intonation. Every word in the Hebrew Bible is accompanied by a mark or accent, which indicates not only the logical position of the word in the sentence, but also the particular musical inflection with which the word is to be recited. That distinction applies to the words of the Book of Psalms as to every other book of Scripture. In such a matter, what every Israelite was familiar with, the Christian Church would be likely to continue. Basil the Great (and after him other writers) explains two of the names that occur in the titles of the psalms as having reference to the mode of their execution. A psalm, he says, is a composition which is instrumentally accompanied (ὅταν εἰσρῶθῃς κατὰ τοὺς ἀρμονικοὺς λόγους πρὸς τὸ ὄργανον κρούηται): a song on the contrary is a melodious utterance without the accompaniment of an instrument (φωνὴ ἐμμελὴς ἀποδομένη ἑναρμονίως χωρὶς τῆς συννήξεως τοῦ ὄργανου. Hom. in Ps. 29). We may gather from a phrase of St. Basil's that the music with which the psalms were performed was at times as elaborate as the condition of musical art permitted. He says that "harmonious tunes of psalms were devised by us" in order that those who were young in years or character might be attracted and instructed thereby. (S. Bas. Mag. Sermo ii. de Doctrina).

Protests against irreverent methods of psalmody occur from time to time. "Psalmi in ecclesiâ non cursim et excelsis atque inordinatis seu intemperatis vocibus, sed plane ac dilucide et cum compunctione cordis recitentur" (Conc. Agripp. c. 137). At one time it seems that the psalmody was even accompanied by gesticulations of the hands (ὀρχήσεις τῶν χειρῶν). (See Balsamon on Conc. Trull. can. 75.) The conditions of good psalmody are well described in a regulation of Louis the Pious: "Psalmi namque in ecclesiâ non cursim et excelsis atque inordinatis intemperatisque vocibus, sed plane ac dilucide et cum compunctione cordis recitentur, ut et recitantium mens illorum dulcedine pascatur et audientium aures illorum pronunciatione demulceantur, quoniam quamvis cantilenæ sonus in aliis officiis excelsâ solet edi voce, in recitandis tamen psalmis hujusemodi vitanda est vox" (Ludovici Pii Reform. Eccl. de Reg. Cleric. cap. xxiv. ap. Melchior Goldastus, ed. Frankf. 1673, tom. iii. p. 217).

Gloria Patri in Psalmody.

(1) For the various forms in which the Doxology has appeared, see DOXOLOGY.

(2) The use of it appears to have differed in the East and West. It is implied by Cassian (Instit. ii. 5) that the use of Gloria Patri as a response at the end of every psalm is a Western practice, whilst in the East, or at least amongst the monks of Egypt, it was only after the antiphon which followed the last psalm that it was said. St. Benedict enjoins that at the end of a psalm Gloria Patri be said "in the Western manner." Some of the longer psalms he divides into two Glorias. This practice of dividing psalms (as we still do the 119th psalm in the English psalter) is referred to in the third council of Narbonne (A.D. 589). "Ut in psalendis ordinibus per quemque psalmum Gloria dicatur omnipotenti Deo, per majores vero psalmos, prout fuerint prolixius, pausationes fiant et per quemque pausationem Gloria Trinitatis Domino decantetur."

The reader will specially observe that the use of Gloria Patri was one of the points which distinguished the Gallican from the Roman rite. The Gallicans said it at the end of every psalm, thus furnishing an early precedent for the rule of the English Prayer Book that "at the end of every psalm . . . shall be repeated this hymn;" but the Romans did not. The authorities may be seen in Collier, Eccl. Hist. book 1, cent. 5.

Versions Used.—It is not within the scope of this work in any way to discuss the character, origin, or authorship of the several versions of the psalms; but one or two points about the use of them may be advanced here.

A long discussion of them is given by Lorinus (Praef. in Ps. cap. xiii.), from whom these facts may be gathered.

At the request of St. Jerome, pope Damasus caused one of his versions of the psalms to be sung in the churches of France—a version which from that use of it has been since known as the Gallican psalter. It should be stated, however, that there is some reason for thinking that it did not generally prevail in the French Church till after this date.

The churches of Rome, including the church of St. Peter's, until long after the period embraced in this work used the old version of the psalms which St. Augustine calls Itala, St. Gregory the Great Vetus, and St. Jerome Vulgata. The psalter used in the church of Milan, and known as the Ambrosian psalter, does not differ materially from this.

On a point about which it is easy to make mistakes it may be well to set before the reader the very words of some accepted authority. Zaccaria, then, says this:—"Duplex porro Latinae versionis, psalterium habemus, Veteris, quam Italiam vocant, a S. Hieronymo, sive Damasi jussu, sive amicorum precibus Romæ, sed ut ipse ait cursim emendatæ, et Hieronymianæ quam scilicet Paullæ atque Eustochii votis satisfactorus S. Doctor postea suscepit. Illam Romanum vocant, quod Romæ præsertim in usu fuerit; hanc Gallicanam quod hujus versionis psalterium in Gallias finitimasque Germaniæ ecclesias inductum fuerit, atque hinc ad alias etiam Italiæ ecclesias propagatum. Primæ tamen seu Romanæ versionis psalterium ad S. Pii V. tempora in omnibus urbibus ac suburbicariis intra xl. ab urbe lapidem constitutis ecclesiis retentum est; ab eo autem Pontifice Vulgatæ editionis, quæ ad Hieronymianam seu Gallicanam interpretationem maxime accedit, psalterium præscriptum, Romæ in solâ Vaticanâ S. Petri ecclesiâ, in reliquâ Italiâ apud Mediolanenses, atque in Venetâ S. Marci Basilicâ, in Hispaniis apud Mozarabes veteris Romani

alis*, lib. i. cap. iv. art. 3).

Maillon, observing that the Gallican Christians had their own version of the psalms for their psalmody—a version which differs from the Roman psalter—quotes Walafrid Strabo upon the point:—"Psalmos autem cum secundum LXX interpretes Romani adhuc habeant, Galli et Germanorum aliqui secundum emendationem quam Hieronymus pater de LXX editione composuit, psalterium cantant, quam Gregorius Turonensis episcopus a partibus Romanis mutuatam in Galliarum dicitur ecclesiasticis transtulisse" (Wal. Strab. de Rebus Ecclesiasticis, cap. 23). This latter point as to the Gallican version having been introduced into France by Gregory of Tours seems open to some doubt.

This feature of Gallican psalmody—that they had their own version for it—is of some interest to us in England, as the version in question has influenced our psalmody at the present day. It will be observed that the Prayer Book version contains a verse at the end of Ps. 136, "O give thanks unto the Lord of lords; for His mercy endureth for ever," which is not in the Bible version, and which is not found in the Hebrew original. The Gallican Psalter, which now indeed has taken its place in the Vulgate, is the only ancient psalter which contains it.

Posture.—All that we can gather on this branch of the subject is what may be inferred from a few incidental expressions of early writers. From the phrases of Cassian in the passage already quoted, "Unus in medium psalmos Domino cantaturus exsurgit cumque sedentibus cunctis," &c., we have a trace of the executant standing, while the listeners sat. The use of the terms στάσις and κάθισμα, too, as applied to the lesser and greater divisions of the Greek psalter, contain, no doubt, some reference to the posture maintained during and at the close of the psalm, though learned writers are not agreed as to the precise reason for their adoption. Durandus speaks of its being customary to stand for psalmody, assigning a mystical reason for it, "ad ostendendum quod stantes in bonis operibus vincimus" (Rationale, lib. iv. rubr. 2). That this posture was an ancient one may be inferred from the bitter words of St. Jerome, addressed to the recreant deacon Sabinianus; "Tu stabas in choro psallentium" (Ep. xlviii. in Sabin.). So, again, after the meal had been taken in a recumbent posture, the guests in St. Chrysostom's time were to stand up for the psalmody, which closed the repast (S. Chrys. Hom. in Ps. 41). That the clergy sometimes sat in their stalls during psalmody appears from the account of the bishop of Rouen given by Gregory of Tours, "Cumque inter psallendum formulæ decumberet" (Hist. Franc. viii. 31). It was the custom amongst some of the ancient monks to stand during psalmody with outstretched hands pointing to heaven (see Martene, de Antiquis Monachorum Ritibus, I. ii. 56). The greatest care seems to have been necessary to guard against sleep during the services, which were so long in some monasteries. All monks, of course, could not have a book in those days, and so they were even to plait straw in order to keep awake, and one of the brethren walked about the choir with a lantern and thrust it into the face of any one who might be overcome with sleep (Martene, ib.).

One other posture remains to be noticed here—that of leaning upon the staff (reclinatorium), which was a common support in church before the days of seats. The monks of Fulda even complained to Charlemagne about the tyranny of their abbat, that even in the case of the infirm he would allow them the use of neither staff nor stall. The rule of Chrodogang, bishop of Metz (9th century), in prescribing the disciplina psallendi, directs that the clergy should not keep their staves in their hands during psalmody, save on account of bodily infirmity (Reg. Chrod. cap. vii.). Lorinus, while contending for the antiquity of the sitting posture during psalmody (sc. amongst the Egyptian monks, as recorded by Cassian), remarks that in the opinion of some writers the psalms which are called "penitential" were recited kneeling, and the rest of the psalms standing (Praefatio in Pss. cap. xiv.).

Psalmody without Book.—One remarkable effect of the prevalence of psalmody and the scarcity of books was that the psalter was frequently learnt by heart. In the 6th century this is reported by Cyril of Scythopolis to have been done by St. Theodosius. St. Jerome desired that it should be done even by very young people. Sketching the perfect monk, he requires that by such a character it should be learnt word for word (ad Rusticum). The damsel Pacatula was to commit the psalms to memory at seven years old (ad Gaudentium). No one of the sisters in the Jerusalem convent might be ignorant of the psalter (ad Eustochium). Even the Huns, he says, are learning the psalter (ad Laetam.). Cyril of Scythopolis, in the Life of St. Sabas, says that monks were not admitted till they had learnt the psalter and the rule of psalmody. Hence it was ruled by the second council of Nicaea (can. 2), that no one should be advanced to be a bishop unless he knew the psalter by heart, and that he was to be examined by the metropolitan. Gregory the Great says that he would not ordain John the Presbyter because he did not know the psalms (S. Greg. M. lib. 4, Ep. 45). The same pope would not allow Rusticus the deacon to be made bishop of Ancona for a similar reason. He was a vigilant man, indeed, he said, but according to report, he did not know the psalms.

A curious story of an ineffectual attempt to learn the psalter by heart is told of the archimandrite Theodore, a portion of whose life is given in the Acts of the second council of Nicaea. He had been miraculously cured of an epidemic sickness which had threatened to prove mortal; and on his recovery, apparently by way of thank-offering, he resolved to learn the psalter. He learned the first seventeen psalms; but the eighteenth baffled him, presumably by its length. He was in despair about his task. But prostrating himself on the pavement of an oratory, he prayed for success. At length on rising, he gazed upon the image of the Saviour; he felt in his mouth a taste sweeter than honey; his prayer was granted, and from that moment his task proceeded smoothly till he had learned the entire psalter.

So great was the zeal of holy men for psalmody that wonderful achievements are recorded as to the number of psalms which they recited. St.

Gregory Thaumaturgus passed entire nights in church with prayers and psalmody. St. Isidore had no fixed number of psalms which he said in the service of God, for the night and the day used to be spent upon it. St. Germanus, who was bishop of Paris in the latter half of the 6th century, would say fifty psalms or more before he rose from his bed and called his companions (Vita, ad fin.). Of St. Maur, the disciple of St. Benedict, it is related that he would repeat commonly fifty psalms, often a hundred, and sometimes even the entire psalter before the night office. St. Gregory of Tours (de Glor. Confess. 47) has even a wonderful story of two dead priests miraculously taking part in the psalmody of the choir with the rest of the clergy.

Palaemon, the abbat, would say the whole psalter and the canticles by night without any sound. By the rule of St. Benedict (Reg. c. 18) the whole psalter was to be gone through in the week—a light rule, he urges, seeing that the holy fathers did as much in a single day. In England, also, a similar devotion to the psalter appears to have prevailed. King Egbert even made a vow that besides the psalmody in the canonical offices he would daily chant the whole psalter (Bede, Eccl. Hist. iii. 27).

Laymen seem at one time to have equalled, if not surpassed, the clergy in their zeal for psalmody. A constitution of the emperor Justinian draws from this fact a consideration as to why the clergy should not neglect to say the daily service: “Si enim multi laicorum, ut suae animae consulant, ad ecclesias confluentes studiosi circa psalmodiam ostenduntur, quomodo non fuerit indecens, clericos ad id ordinatos non implere suum munus” (Cod. lib. i. 41).

As a specimen of a very ancient allotment of psalms we subjoin the day and night canons of psalms of Eusebius, which shew what psalms were to be said at the several hours:—

(2) Arrangement of Psalms in the Offices.—This portion of the article confines itself to reciting the contents of the principal arrangements of the Psalter, after it had been definitely distributed for the “Divine Office,” the “Opus Dei.” It may, however, be permitted to point out the coincidence (surely more than accidental) by which certain psalms have become attached to and associated with certain hours, e.g. (the Western church), 94 [95],^a as an introductory psalm to the psalmody of the day; and both in East and West, 62 [63], 66 [67], to the early morning; 50 [51], to the early morning and to terce; 56 [57], to sext; 85 [86], to none; 90 [91], to sext or compline; 4 and 133 [134], to nocturns or compline; 19 [20] and 20 [21], to Sunday morning.

We will take the Eastern church first, to follow the order of the article, OFFICE, THE DIVINE.

The Psalter, according to the Greek church, is divided into twenty sections called cathismata [καθίσματα],^b each of which is subdivided into three staseis [στάσεις],^b and at the end of each stasis, Gloria is said—

Stasis	I. contains Pss. 1–8.
II.	9–16 [17].
III.	17 [18]–23 [24].
IV.	24 [25]–31 [32].
V.	32 [33]–36 [37].
VI.	37 [38]–45 [46].
VII.	46 [47]–54 [55].
VIII.	55 [56]–63 [64].
IX.	64 [65]–69 [70].
X.	70 [71]–76 [77].
XI.	77 [78]–84 [85].
XII.	85 [86]–90 [91].
XIII.	91 [92]–100 [101].
XIV.	101 [102]–104 [105].
XV.	105 [106]–108 [109].
XVI.	109 [110]–117 [118].
XVII.	118 [119].
XVIII.	119 [120]–131 [132].
XIX.	132 [133]–142 [143].
XX.	143 [144]–150.

These cathismata are said in the following order:—

From the octave of Easter (ἀντήπασχα) till the Sunday after the octave of the exaltation of the cross [September 14], the Psalter is said once a week, thus:—

On Saturday, at vespers ,	cathisma 1,
On Sunday, at matins ,	2, 3
On Monday, at matins ,	4, 5 At vespers , 6
On Tuesday, at matins ,	7, 8 At vespers , 9
On Wednesday, at matins ,	10, 11 At vespers , 12
On Thursday, at matins ,	13, 14 At vespers , 15
On Friday, at matins ,	19, 20 At vespers , 18
On Saturday, at matins ,	16, 17 At vespers , 1 as before.

Thence onwards to the vigil of Christmas,^c the same arrangement is followed, except that at vespers on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, cathisma 18 (containing the gradual psalms) is always said, and the cathisma assigned to vespers and those days is added to those for ^a In this article the Psalms are numbered as in the Vulgate. The numbers of the English version are added in [].

^b Cardinal Bona says the sections are called by these names because at each pause in the psalmody (στάσεις), the monks rose two and two by turns to recite, and that while they stood, the rest sat.

^c Cardinal Bona says up to Tyrophagus, “usque ad Dominicam in Quinquagesimā.”

matins, so that three cathisma are then said. During the same period cathisma 17 is added to those of Sunday. Thence to the Sunday of Tyrophagus, which corresponds to Quinquagesima Sunday, the arrangement according to the table given above. From Sunday of Tyrophagus up to Wednesday before Easter, the Psalter is said twice in the week, thus:—

On Saturday, at vespers, cathisma 1.

On Sunday, at matins, cath. 2, 3, 17.

On Monday, at matins, cath. 4, 5, 6; at terce, 7; at sext, 8; at vespers, 18.

On Tuesday, at matins, cath. 9, 10, 11; at prime, 12; at terce, 13; at sext, 14; at none, 15; at vespers, 18.

On Wednesday, at matins, cath. 16, 19, 20; at prime, 1; at terce, 2; at sext, 3; at none, 4; at vespers, 18.

On Thursday, at matins, cath. 5, 6, 7; at prime, 8; at terce, 10; at sext, 11; at none, 12; at vespers, 18.

On Friday, at matins, cath. 13, 14, 15; at terce, 19; at sext, 20; at vespers, 18.

On Saturday, at matins, cath. 9, as usual. From Thursday before Easter to the Octave of Easter (exclusive) the Psalter is not said.

The fixed psalms said at the hours in addition to the cathismata are as follows:—^d

At nocturns (μεσονύκτιον), on Sunday, Ps. 50 [51]; on week days, except Saturday, 50 [51], 118 [119], (i.e. cathisma 17, and known as δ ἡμωμος), 120 [121], 133 [134]; on Saturday, 64 [65] to 69 [70] (i.e. cath. 9), 120 [121], 133 [134].

At lauds, Pss. 19 [20], 20 [21]–3, 37 [38], 62 [63], 87 [88], 102 [103], 142 [143] (these six known as the Hexapsalmus), 50 [51], 148, 148, 149 (οἱ αἱνοί).

At prime, 5, 89 [90], 100 [101]. At the mesorion of the first hour, 45 [46], 91 [92], 92 [93].

At terce, 16 [17], 24 [25], 50 [51]. At the mesorion of the third hour, 29 [30], 31 [32], 60 [61].

At sext, 53 [54], 54 [55], 90 [91]. At the mesorion of the sixth hour, 55 [56], 56 [57], 69 [70].

At none, 83 [84], 84 [85], 85 [86]. At the mesorion of the ninth hour, 83 [84], 84 [85], 85 [86]. At the typics (τὰ τυπικά), 102 [103], 145 [146]; 33 [34].

At vespers, 103 [104] (the proemia psalm, ψ. προημαικός), 140 [141], 141 [142] (these two psalms are known as the Κύριε ἐκέκραξα), 129 [130], 116 [117], 122 [123].

At great compline, 4, 6, 12 [13], 24 [25], 30 [31], 90 [91]; 50 [51], 101 [102], 109 [110], 142 [143].

At little compline, 50 [51], 69 [70], 142 [143].

The Armenian church divides the Psalter into eight sections, called canons, as follows:—

I.	contains Pss. 1–17	[18].
II.	18	[19]–35 [36].
III.	36	[37]–54 [55].
IV.	55	[56]–71 [72].
V.	72	[73]–98 [99].
VI.	99	[100]–105 [106].
II.	106	[107]–118 [119].
VIII.	119	[120]–150.

^d These have been mentioned in the article, THE DIVINE OFFICE, but for completeness they are here inserted.

These canons are divided among the daily services, so that the Psalter is gone through once a week, and in monasteries every day in the following order:—During nocturns, sections or canons, 1, 2; after nocturns and before lauds, 3, 4, 5; at terce, 6; at sext, 7; and at none, 8.

The following psalms are also appointed for the hours:—

At nocturns (called midnight), Pss. 3, 87 [88], 102 [103], 142 [143].

At lauds (called daybreak), 89 [90] (v. 14: “O satisfy us with Thy mercy,” to end), 50 [51], 148 [149], 150, 112 [113]–5, 114 [116, vv. 1–9], 129 [130], 53 [54], 85 [86] (last two verses).

At prime (called sunrise), 71 [72] (v. 19 to end), 91 [92], 62 [63], 64 [65], 21 [22], 142 [143] (v. 8 to end), 44 [45], 69 [70], 85 [86] (last two verses).

At terce, 50 [51], 21 [22], 142 [143] (v. 8 to end).

At sext, 40 [41] (first four verses), 90 [91].

At none, 50 [51], 114 [116, vv. 1–9], 115 [116, v. 9 to end], 116 [117].

At vespers, certain verses from the Psalms: Pss. 85 [86], 139 [140], 140 [141], 141 [142], 120 [121], 90 [91], 122 [123], 53 [54].

Compline (called peace or rest) is double. The former is said in church immediately after vespers; the latter is said by each individual in private at the end of twilight.

At the former compline are said Pss. 87 [88] (vv. 1, 2, 4, 6), 12 [13], 15 [16], 16 [17], 41 [42], 69 [70], 85 [86] (last two verses), 26 [27].

At the latter, 42 [43] (3 to end); the following four sections from Ps. 118 [119]: “Et veniat super me”; “Memor esto servi tui”; “Iniquos odio habui”; “Appropinquet deprecatio”; 35 [36] (9 to end), 90 [91], 122 [123], 53 [54], 150, 137 [138] (last two verses), 141 [142] (6 to end), 85 [86] (last two verses), 4.

In the Western church the three most important distributions of the Psalter are, (1) the Gregorian, (2) the Benedictine, (3) the Ambrosian, called respectively after the names of their reputed authors, and all, with change of detail only, in use at the present time. Of these, the Gregorian is the Psalter of the secular breviary of the Roman obedience, the Benedictine that of the monastic, and the Ambrosian that of the diocese of Milan. Hence the two former, from their wide-spread adoption, are practically of most importance.

Taking them in order:—

(1) The Gregorian or Roman Psalter.

The following is the distribution “juxta antiquiorem psallendi modum Ecclesiae Romanae, ex antiquis monumentis excerpta,” as given by Thomasius, and with the exception of two points, which will be noticed in their place, is still that of the present Roman breviary.

On Sunday, at matins, Ad vigiliis in primo galli cantu, 94 [95] (said daily); in nocturn 1, Pss. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9 [9 and 10], 10 [11], 12 [13], 14 [15]; in nocturn 2, 15 [16], 16 [17], 17 [18]; in nocturn 3, 18 [19], 19 [20], 20 [21].

At lauds (“Ad matutinis diluculo”), 92 [93], 99 [100], 62 [63], and 66 [67], said as one psalm under one Gloria, Benedicite (“Benedictiones sive canticum trium puerorum”), 148, 149, 150, said under one Gloria, and called Laudes, Benedictus ("Canticum evangelicum Zachariae").

At prime, 21 [22], 22 [23], 23 [24], 24 [25], 25 [26], 53 [54], 117 [118], 118 [119]. (1) "Beati immaculati"; (2) "In quo corriget" (said under one Gloria); (3) "Retribue"; (4) "Adhaesit," under one gloria; Athanasian Creed ("Fides Catholica S. Athanasii Episcopi").

[In the later revisions of the Roman breviary, Pss. 21 [22]—25 [26] are not said on Sunday at prime, but are thus said on the several week days:—On Monday, Ps. 23 [24]; on Tuesday, 24 [25]; on Wednesday, 25 [26]; on Thursday, 22 [23]; on Friday, 21 [22]. This is the first change above alluded to. In the Sarum and other English breviaries the old arrangement by which these psalms were all said on Sunday was adhered to.]

On Sundays from Septuagesima to Palm Sunday inclusive, the following changes are made:—

At lauds, instead of the two Psalms, 92 [93], and 99 [100], 50 [51] and 117 [118] are said.

At prime, instead of 117 [118], 92 [93] is said.

At terce, 118 [119] (5) "Legem pone," and (6) "Et veniat"; (7) "Memor esto," and (8) "Portio mea"; (9) "Bonitatem," and (10) "Manus tuae," under three glorias.

At sext, 118 [119] ((11) "Defecit," and (12) "In aeternum"; (13) "Quomodo," and (14) "Lucerna"; (15) "Iniquos," and (16) "Feci," under three glorias).

At none, 118 [119] ((17) "Mirabilia," and (18) "Justus es"; (19) "Clamavi," and (20) "Vide"; (21) "Principes," and (22) "Appropinquet," under three glorias).

These psalms are said daily at terce, sext, and none, whatever be the office.

At verspers, 109 [110], 110 [111], 111 [112], 112 [113], 113 [114] and 115. Magnificat.

At compline, 4, 30 [31], vv. 1–6, 90 [91], 133 [134], Nunc dimittis. These psalms are said daily at compline, whatever be the office.

On Monday, at matins (in the nocturn), 26 [27], 27 [28], 28 [29], 29 [30], 30 [31], 31 [32], 32 [33], 33 [34], 34 [35], 35 [36], 36 [37], 37 [38].

At lauds, 50 [51], 5, 62 [63] and 66 [67] (said under one gloria), Song of Isaiah ("Confitebor," Is. xii.), 148, 149, 150 (said under one gloria), Benedictus.

At prime, 53 [54], 118 [119] (the first four sections, said under two glorias as on Sunday).

[These psalms are said on every week day, whether a festival or not, except where specially directed.]

At verspers, 114 [116, vv. 1–9], 115 [116, ver. 10 to end], 116 [117], 119 [120], 120 [121], Magnificat.

[On ordinary week days throughout the year, except in Eastertide, at all the hours except nocturns, Ps. 50 [51] is said with intercessory prayers (in precibus).]

N.B.—In the later revisions of the breviary this is no longer the case. Preces (curtained) are only said in Advent, Lent, and on a few other days of fasting, in which Ps. 129 [130] is said at lauds, and 50 [51] at verspers. At the little hours no psalm is said at preces. Here also the English, which were not subject to this revision, retained the old arrangement. This is the second of the two points changed, which were mentioned at the outset as alone of any importance.

On Tuesday, at matins, in the nocturn, 38 [39], 39 [40], 40 [41], 41 [42], 43 [44], 44 [45], 45 [46], 46 [47], 47 [48], 48 [49], 49 [50], 51 [52].

At lauds, 50 [51], 42 [43], 62 [63], and 66 [67] (said as usual, as before), Song of Hezekiah ("Ego dixi," Is. xxxviii. 10), 148, 149, 150 (as before), Benedictus.

At verspers, 121 [122], 122 [123], 123 [124], 124 [125], 125 [126], Magnificat.

On Wednesday, at matins, 52 [53], 54 [55], 55 [56], 56 [57], 57 [58], 58 [59], 59 [60], 60 [61], 61 [62], 63 [64], 65 [66], 67 [68].

At lauds, 50 [51], 64 [65], 62 [63], and 66 [67], The Song of Hannah ("Exsultavit," 1 Sam. ii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At verspers, 126 [127], 127 [128], 128 [129], 129 [130], 130 [131], Magnificat.

On Thursday, at matins, 68 [69], 69 [70], 70 [71], 71 [72], 72 [73], 73 [74], 74 [75], 75 [76], 76 [77], 77 [78], 78 [79], 79 [80].

At lauds, 50 [51], 89 [90], 62 [63], and 66 [67], The Song of Moses ("Cantemus," Ex. xv.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At verspers, 131 [132], 132 [133], 134 [135], 135 [136], 136 [137], Magnificat.

On Friday, at matins, 80 [81], 81 [82], 82 [83], 83 [84], 84 [85], 85 [86], 86 [87], 87 [88], 88 [89], 93 [94], 95 [96], 96 [97].

At lauds, 50 [51], 142 [143], 62 [63], and 66 [67], The Song of Habakkuk ("Domine audi," Hab. iii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At verspers, 137 [138], 138 [139], 139 [140], 140 [141], 141 [142], Magnificat.

On Saturday, at matins, 97 [98], 98 [99], 99 [100], 100 [101], 101 [102], 102 [103], 103 [104], 104 [105], 105 [106], 106 [107], 107 [108], 108 [109].

At lauds, 50 [51], 91 [92], 62 [63], and 66 [67], The Song of Moses ("Attende coelum," Deut. xxxii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At verspers, 143 [144], 144 [145], 145 [146], 146 [147, vv. 1–11], 147 [147, ver. 12 to end], Magnificat.

The outline of the scheme is thus seen to be very simple. The psalms from 1 to 108 [109] are said in order at matins, and the remainder, from 109 [110] to the end, at verspers, throughout the week, omitting those psalms which are said at other hours, and are thus distributed:—

On Sunday, at matins, in the first nocturn, twelve psalms; in the second and third, three psalms in each.

On week days, twelve psalms said in one nocturn.

At verspers, five psalms are said daily.

For the other hours, at lauds, five psalms [i.e. what reckons as five] are said daily.

At prime, three daily, with additional psalms on Sunday.

At terce, sext, and none, three daily.

At compline, four daily.

In addition, Benedictus is said daily at lauds, as are Magnificat at verspers and Nunc dimittis at compline.

Into the festal arrangements of the Psalter it is not necessary to enter. The chief variations are the following:—

In festivals of nine lessons, nine psalms taken from the matin psalms are said at matins in three nocturns of three psalms each, instead of the psalms in course.

At lauds and vespers, the Sunday psalms are for the most part said, instead of the psalms in course. At vespers on festivals, Ps. 116 [117] is often substituted for the last Sunday psalm, 113 [114 and 115]. Earlier usage assigned special psalms for lauds and vespers much more rarely than was afterwards the case.

(2) The Benedictine or Monastic Psalter.

The germ of the monastic rite is supposed to have been derived from the solitaries of Egypt. St. Benedict framed a rite for monks, which was approved by Gregory the Great, and henceforth adopted for the use of monastic congregations. It is used, with slight modifications of detail, by the Cistercians, Carthusians, and other monastic orders. The so-called mendicant orders use the secular breviary.

The main idea, so to speak, of the distribution of the Psalter is the same as that of the Gregorian office, that the Psalter should be said once a week, but the order in which it is said differs in many important points. Dealing here with the psalms only, the following is the general outline of this office:—

At matins on Sundays there are three nocturns; in each of the first two, six psalms are said; and in the third, three canticles. Week days have twelve psalms, said in two nocturns.

At lauds, five (i.e. what count as five) psalms are said.

At each of the lesser hours, three, at vespers four, and at compline three psalms are said.

The following is the distribution:—

On Sunday, at matins, Pss. 3, 94 [95] (these two psalms are said daily); in nocturn 1:—20 [21], 21 [22], 22 [23], 23 [24], 24 [25], 25 [26]; in nocturn 2:—26 [27], 27 [28], 28 [29], 29 [30], 30 [31], 31 [32]; in nocturn 3, three canticles.

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51] (these two psalms are said daily), 117 [118], 62 [63] (these two counting as one), Benedicite, 148, 149, 150 (as one), Benedictus.

In Eastertide, and on certain other festivals when they fall on Sundays, instead of Pss. 50 [51] and 117 [118], these two, 92 [93] and 99 [100], are said.

At prime, 118 [119] (“Beati”—“In quo corriget”—“Retribue”—“Adhaesit”—said as four).

At terce, 118 [119] (“Legem pone”—“Et veniat”—“Memor esto.”)

At sext, 118 [119] (“Portio mea”—“Bonitatem”—“Manus tue.”)

At none, 118 [119] (“Defecit”—“In aeternum”—“Quomodo”—said as three).

At vespers, 109 [110], 110 [111], 111 [112], 112 [113], Magnificat.

At compline, 4, 90 [91], 133 [134]. These psalms are said daily throughout the year. On the three days before Easter 30 [31] vv. 1-6, and Nunc dimittis are added.

On Monday, at matins, in nocturn 1:—32 [33], 33 [34], 34 [35], 36 [37] (said in two parts, vv. 1-26, and ver. 27 to end), 37 [38].

In nocturn 2:—38 [39], 39 [40], 40 [41], 41 [42], 43 [44], 44 [45].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 5, 35 [36], Song of Isaiah (Is. xii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 1, 2, 6.

At terce, 118 [119] “Lucerna”—“Iniquos”—“Feci.”

At sext, 118 [119] “Mirabilia”—“Justus es”—“Clamavi.”

At none, 118 [119] “Vide”—“Principes”—“Appropinquet.”

At vespers, 113 [114 and 115], 114 [116, vv. 1-8] 115 [116, ver. 9 to end], and 116 [117] (as one), 128 [129], Magnificat.

On Tuesday, at matins, in nocturn 1:—45 [46], 46 [47], 47 [48], 48 [49], 49 [50], 51 [52].

In nocturn 2:—52 [53], 53 [54], 54 [55], 55 [56], 57 [58], 58 [59].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 42 [43], 56 [57], Song of Hezekiah (Is. xxxviii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 7, 8, 9 (to “non peribit in finem”), [9, vv. 1-18].

At terce, 119 [120], 120 [121], 121 [122].

At sext, 122 [123], 123 [124], 124 [125].

At none, 125 [126], 126 [127], 127 [128].

These psalms are said at terce, sext, and none, on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday.

At vespers, 129 [130], 130 [131], 131 [132], 132 [133], Magnificat.

On Wednesday, at matins, in nocturn 1:—59 [60], 60 [61], 61 [62], 65 [66], 67 (pt.) [68, vv. 1-18], 67 (pt.) [68, ver. 19 to end].

In nocturn 2:—68 (pt.) [69, vv. 1-16], 68 (pt.) [69, ver. 17 to end], 69 [70], 70 [71], 71 [72], 72 [73].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 63 [64], 64 [65], Song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 9 (pt.) [9, ver. 19 to end, and 10], 10 [11], 11 [12].

At vespers, 134 [135], 135 [136], 136 [137], 137 [138], Magnificat.

On Thursday, at matins, in nocturn 1:—73 [74], 74 [75], 76 [77], 77 [78] (in two), 78 [79].

In nocturn 2:—79 [80], 80 [81], 81 [82], 82 [83], 83 [84], 84 [85].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 87 [88], 89 [90], Song of Moses (Ex. xv.), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 12 [13], 13 [14], 14 [15].

At vespers, 138 [139] (in two), 139 [140], 140 [141], Magnificat.

On Friday, at matins, in nocturn 1:—85 [86], 86 [87], 88 [89] (in two), 92 [93], 93 [94].

In nocturn 2:—95 [96], 96 [97], 97 [98], 98 [99], 99 [100], 100 [101].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 75 [76], 91 [92], Song of Habakkuk (Hab. iii.) (in three divisions), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 15 [16], 16 [17], 17 [18] (1-24).

At vespers, 141 [142], 143 [144] (in two), 144 [145] (1-9), Magnificat.

On Saturday, in nocturn 1:—101 [102], 102 [103], 103 [104] (in two), 104 [105] (in two).

In nocturn 2:—105 [106] (in two), 106 [107] (in two), 107 [108], 108 [109].

At lauds, 66 [67], 50 [51], 142 [143], Song of Moses (Deut. xxxii.) (in two divisions), 148, 149, 150, Benedictus.

At prime, 17 [18] (25, “Cum sancto,” to end), 18 [19], 19 [20].

At vespers, 144 [145] (10, “Confiteantur,” to end), 145 [146], 146 [147, vv. 1-11], 147 [147, ver. 12 to end], Magnificat.

The general plan then is this:—

Pss. 1–19 [20] are said at prime on week days, beginning on Monday, three each day.

Pss. 20 [21]–108 [109], are said at nocturns throughout the week, beginning on Sunday, twelve each day, said in two nocturns of six psalms each.

Pss. 108 [109] to end are said at vespers throughout the week, four each day.

Psalms which are said in other parts of the office are omitted when they occur in course.

Pss. 118 [119] is said at prime on Sunday, and at terce, sext, and none on Sunday and Monday.

Certain of the gradual psalms are said at terce, sext, and none daily on each of the other week days.

Pss. 3 and 94 [95] are said daily before nocturns.

Pss. 66 [67], 50 [51], 148, 149, 150, are said daily at lauds.

Benedictus is said daily at lauds, and Magnificat daily at vespers.

In comparing these two great psalters of the Western church, the Benedictine arrangement appears somewhat inferior in simplicity to the Gregorian. The reason for beginning the psalms on Monday at prime is not obvious, and the division of the longer psalms into parts, so as to equalize in some degree the length of the psalmody on different days, while the number of psalms is the same, is not without awkwardness when the divisions of a psalm fall into different days (see prime and vespers for Friday and Saturday). The distribution of the psalms for the little hour is also less natural. On the other hand, there is a greater variety in the psalms at lauds, though one misses the daily use of Ps. 62 [63], and the psalms at nocturns are more nearly of the same length than in the Gregorian Psalter.

(3) We come now to the Ambrosian Psalter, equally venerable and interesting with the two preceding and more curious, and still a living rite, though of much less practical importance, owing to the small area over which it is used. In its main features, it is doubtless the work of St. Ambrose, and shows Eastern influences.

The chief peculiarity in this rite is the arrangement of the matin psalms (1–108 [109]), which are divided into ten decuriae, and are gone through in the course of a fortnight. Each decuria is divided into three nocturns, and is said under three antiphons, one to each nocturn; and gloria is said only at the end of each nocturn. The decuriae are as follows:—

Decuria I. Pss. 1–16 [17].

II.	17 [18]–30 [31].
III.	31 [32]–40 [41].
IV.	41 [42]–50 [51].
V.	51 [52]–60 [61].
VI.	61 [62]–70 [71].
VII.	71 [72]–80 [81].
VIII.	81 [82]–90 [91].
IX.	91 [92]–100 [101].
X.	101 [102]–108 [109].

The name decuria is plainly derived from the fact that they all, with the exception of the first, second, and tenth, contain ten psalms. Psalms which are said in other parts of the office are also said in course.

The psalms at matins are thus arranged:—

There is no invitatory psalm, but in its place the first part of the Song of the three Children (called Benedictus, as distinguished from the second part, known as Benedicite). This is said daily.

On Sunday no psalms are said; but three canticles, one in each nocturn.

Matins, on Sunday, in nocturn 1, Song of Isaiah ("De nocte vigilat," Is. xxvi.); in nocturn 2, Song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii.); in nocturn 3, in winter, Song of Habakkuk (Hab. iii.); in summer, Song of Jonah (Jon. ii.).

On Monday in the first week . . . Decuria I.
(Feria 2^a in Hebdomada 1^{ma}.)

Tuesday		II.
Wednesday		III.
Thursday		IV.
Friday		V.

Saturday, in nocturn 1, Song of Moses (Ex. xv.); in nocturns 2 and 3, Ps. 118 [119], 1–88, said consecutively, but divided into parts, one in each nocturn.

On Monday in the second week .	Decuria	VI.
Tuesday		VII.
Wednesday		VIII.
Thursday		IX.
Friday		X.

Saturday, in nocturn 1, Song of Moses (as in first week); in nocturns 2 and 3, Ps. 118 [119], 89 ("In aeternum") to end, said as in the first week.

The first decuria is said on Monday after Septuagesima Sunday. The regular course is interrupted by holy week (called authentic week) and Easter week. Dec. i. is said on Monday after Low Sunday (Fer. 2^a post albas). The course is again interrupted by Whitsunday and Corpus Christi, with their octaves, and on the Friday after the octave of Corpus Christi, Dec. x. is said; and so on.

Lauds. On Sundays, Benedictus (Song of Zachariah), Song of Moses ("Cantemus," Ex. xv.), Benedicite, Pss. 148, 149, 150, 116 [117], a direct psalm ("Psalmus directus"), so called because said straight through and not antiphonally, and sometimes a psalm of four verses, so called because four verses only, almost always the first four, are said.

On week days (except Saturdays), Benedictus, Pss. 50 [51], 148, 149, 150, 116 [117], a direct psalm, and a psalm of four verses.

On Saturdays, Benedictus, Pss. 117 [118], 148, 149, 150, 116 [117], a direct psalm, and a psalm of four verses.

The direct psalms are these. They are the same for both weeks.

Sunday, 92 [93] (said also on festivals). Monday, 53 [54]. Tuesday, 66 [67]. Wednesday, 69 [70]. Thursday, 112 [113]. Friday, 142 [143]. Saturday, 89 [90].

The psalms of four verses are:—

Monday, in the first week, 5, vv. 1–4; in the second week, 83 [84], vv. 1–4. Tuesday (in both weeks), 87 [88], vv. 1–4. Wednesday, 66 [67], vv. 1–4. Thursday, 62 [63], vv. 1–4. Friday, 107 [108], vv. 1–4. Saturday, 88 [89], vv. 1–4.

On ordinary Sundays there is no psalm of four verses. The psalms at the other hours are nearly the same as the Gregorian for the same hours, and were doubtless taken from that psalter.

Prime, 53 [54], 118 [119] (first four sections, said as two), Athanasian Creed (said daily, and headed Symbolum).

These psalms are said daily on Sundays and week days. In the week day office ("in officio feriali") 50 [51] is said also "in precibus."

Terce, 118 [119] (next six sections, said as three, as in the Gregorian Psalter). Also in the week day office, 50 [51], "in precibus."

Sext, 118 [119] (next six sections, said as three). In the week day office, 56 [57], "in precibus."

None, 118 [119] (next, and last, six sections, said as three). In the week day office, 85 [86], "in precibus."

Vespers. The daily psalms, including Magnificat, are the same as the Gregorian, with the addition of a psalm of four verses on week days, and in special seasons on Sundays. These are—on Monday, 8, vv. 1-4. Tuesday, 14 [15], vv. 1-4. Wednesday, 30 [31], vv. 1-4. Thursday, 36 [37], vv. 1-4. Friday, 74 [75], vv. 1-4. Saturday, 91 [92], vv. 1-4.

Compline. The daily psalms are 4, 30 [31], vv. 1-6, 90 [91], 132 [133], 133 [134], 116 [117], Nunc dimittis, and in the week day office 12 [13], "in precibus."

There is no distinction between the weeks in any of the hours but matins and lauds.

The festal arrangement of psalms differs in the following points. The psalms at matins are unchanged except on a few special days and seasons, when a complicated series of psalms and extracts of psalms, of varying number, and not arranged according to their order in the Psalter, is said.

On vespers, at festivals, instead of the psalms in course, two psalms, the latter followed by 133 [134] and 116 [117], the three said under one gloria, are said at different parts of the office.

The direct psalms, and psalms of four verses, vary. The psalms throughout are said according to the old Italian version ("Veterem septuaginta versionem"), as in the breviary of the canons of the Vatican Basilica at Rome.

It will not have escaped notice, as bearing upon the connexion of the church of Milan with the East, that the decuria of the Ambrosian rite have a close family likeness to the cathismata of the Eastern church, and that the psalms said "in precibus" at the third, sixth, and ninth hours are among those said at the corresponding hours in the Eastern Psalter. The difference between the office for Saturday and that for other days of the week is strong evidence of such connexion.

The Mozarabic rite has the strange peculiarity, that the psalms are never said in course. In the first three weeks of Lent, and on a few other days psalms are said at terce, sext, and none. Instead of the fixed psalms, three at each hour; and a psalm is said at vespers, but the order in which they are taken is very irregular, and while many psalms are frequently repeated, nothing like the whole psalter is said. This peculiarity is so unlike what is found in any other known rite that some have conjectured that the distribution of the psalms as said in regular course has dropped out of the breviary as we possess it; and that in its present shape it only contains the fixed psalms at the daily hours and those for special days. This, however, as far as we are aware, is pure conjecture.

The following are the psalms assigned to the several hours. The psalms are said after the old version, and not after the Vulgate.

At matins, Pss. 3, 50 [51], 56 [57], or one of them.

At lauds, a canticle (varying), Benedictus (i.e. an abridgment of both parts of the Song of the Three Children) not said "in feriis", 148, 149, 150.

At aurora (said before prime on week days, throughout the year, "in diebus feriis per totum annum"), 69 [70], 118 [119] ("Beati immaculati"—"In quo corriget"—"Retribue" in two).

At prime, 66 [67], 144 [145] (in two), 112 [113], 119 [118] ("Adhaesit pavimento"—"Legem pone"—"Et veniat"), and on Sunday and festivals, Te Deum.

At terce, 94 [95], 118 [119] ("Memor esto"—"Portio mea"—"Bonitatem").

At sext, 52 [53], 118 [119] ("Feci judicium"—"Mirabilia"—"Justus es Domine").

At none, 145 [146], 121 [122], 122 [123], 123 [124].

At vespers (no psalms on ordinary Sundays and week days).

At compline, 4 (two last verses), 133 [134], 90 [91].

The later Western arrangements of the Psalter, such as those of Cardinal Quignon, or of the reformed French breviaries, besides being of less interest, are not within our limits of time.

PSALTER. When we call to mind the use which has been made of the Psalms in both Jewish and Christian churches, we must expect to find distinct volumes containing them. Thus there are in the Bodleian Library alone eleven Hebrew MSS. containing the Psalms without any other book, and in the main without note or commentary. It would seem evident that these MSS. were prepared for devotional use.

2. And so we find, even in the west of Europe, a few early MSS. containing the Psalms in Greek. The most famous and the most beautiful of these is the Greek Psalter, in the Stadt-Bibliothek at Zürich, which Tischendorf reproduced in his Anecdota Sacra. In this, as in all other Greek Psalters, according to Zaccaria (Bibliotheca Ritualis, p. 80, ed. 1776), the Psalms are followed by the ten canticles of the Greek church, as they are also in the Alexandrine MS. Tischendorf mentions six such psalters. Of these the Veronese contains the Magnificat but not the song of Zachariah or of Simeon. The Zürich MS. contains the ὑμνος ἐκθιδος of the Alexandrine MS. and the three canticles from St. Luke. The others contain (apparently) the three canticles. Sometimes, as in the Veronese Psalter, Isaiah xxvi. 9-20 is displaced for the hymn in Isaiah v. 1-9. (See CANTICLES.)

3. The Greek Psalms were used in some of the monastic churches of Italy, and possibly of France, even as late as the 8th century, after these churches had become otherwise thoroughly Latinized. For this purpose copies of the Greek Psalms were made in which were reproduced the Greek words in Latin letters; thus—"Meta su e arche en imera tes dynameos su en te lamprotete ton agion." The oldest MS. of this character extant is the famous Veronese Psalter to which we have already referred. It is supposed to be of the 6th century. Its contents are printed by Bianchini in his Vindiciae, with a facsimile of two pages. The Septuagint, in Latin letters, is on the left page, the old "Itala" on the right. It contains the apocryphal Psalm Pusillus eram in Greek and Latin, but this (in Bianchini's opinion) was added by a writer of the 7th century.

Another famous psalter forms part of the Codex Seguerianus, the Paris manuscript of Cyprian (St. Germain des Près, 186, now Paris, 10,592). The Psalter was considered by the Benedictines to be of the 7th century.^a It contains the Greek, and a Latin version "very different from ours" (Nouveau Traité, tom. iii. p. 55, note), in two columns. There is the latter portion of another psalter, Greek and Latin, at St. Gall. (No. 17); this is of the 10th century. It contains the Canticles, and also the Lord's Prayer and Apostles' Creed, and also a Litany in Greek and Latin.

4. The Library of St. Germain des Près contained a beautiful MS., which, according to tradition, belonged to St. Germanus himself; the vellum is coloured purple. The letters are silver, except that the names of God are in gold; it is now in the National Library in France, No. 11,947. A facsimile is given by Silvestre, vol. ii. plate 113. It is considered possibly to be of the 6th century (see Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes, series vi. vol. iii. p. 343). It is represented as having the famous words—"Dominus regnavit a ligno" (Psalm xcv.), whence it would appear that it contains either the old translation, or what is called the Roman version of Jerome. This Roman version was the result of Jerome's first attempt to correct the translation current in his day, which he did, according to his own account, after the Septuagint "licet cursim" (Migne, xxix. 121). This was done at the request of pope Damasus; and it was in use at Rome for some centuries, and is still used at the Vatican Basilica. Indeed, the Canticles of the modern Breviary follow this version. It seems to have been brought into England with St. Augustine, and so was used at Canterbury. Copies are found in the British Museum, Vespasian A. 1 (to be described just now); Regius II. B. 5; and also in the Cambridge Psalter, Ff. i. 23.

5. The Psalter, Vespasian A. 1, has peculiar interest. By comparing it, page by page, with the account of a volume described by Thomas of Elmham, as having been placed "super tabulam magni altaris,"^b at the church of the great monastery of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, there can be no doubt that it is the one that is so described; the contents correspond exactly in the two, although unfortunately the modern paging, which differs from the original reckoning of the folia, produces some confusion. It begins with the tract "Omnis scriptura divinitus inspirata," which is followed by the letter of Damasus to Jerome, and Jerome's reply. Then it contains an account of the various books into which the Psalms are divided: this and other similar matters fill up the first ten leaves. According to the account of Thomas, the eleventh leaf began with the text of the Psalter, having on it a picture of "Samuel the Priest." This leaf has been torn out, and so the first Psalm is missing, the next leaf beginning with Psalm ii. v. 4, "Qui habitat." The picture of Christ, which is now placed at the beginning of the volume, was clearly inserted at the binding, when the old silver figure of our Lord was removed. There are a few curious drawings in the volume, and at the end of Psalm cl. there comes, apparently on an inserted leaf, the apocryphal Psalm "Pusillus eram." The canticles for the various days of the week follow, and the hymn "Benedicite." After that we have the song of Zachariah, the "Magnificat," and three old hymns: "Splendor paternae" for the matins, "Creator omnium" for vespers, and the "Rex eterne" for Sundays. Here the original volume ended, but appended to it, at a confessedly later date, we find the "Te Deum," the "Fides Catholica," and a few prayers. This volume has of course attracted great attention. Some account of it will be found in Professor Westwood's Palaeographia Sacra, No. 40, and in the same writer's Miniatures, p. 10, plate 3. The early part of this MS. is supposed to be of the 8th century, and so falls within our date. (It is sometimes spoken of as St. Augustine's Psalter.) The others which we have mentioned are assigned to the 10th and 11th respectively.

6. In the public library at Rouen there is a psalter which belonged originally to the abbey of St. Evroult in Normandy, and from that passed to the church of St. Ouen. An account of this is given in Silvestre, vol. iv., and in Prof. Westwood's Miniatures, p. 81. The Benedictines (Nouveau Traité, ii. 226) considered it to be of the 7th or 8th century; Prof. Westwood of the 10th. It contains the two more recent translations of Jerome in parallel columns, the one which he corrected from the Septuagint version of Origen's Hexapla, and which, from its obtaining use north of the Alps, is called the Gallican Psalter and has subsequently been adopted in the Vulgate; the other, which he took direct from the Hebrew, and is therefore called the Hebraic. A marginal note, considered to be of the 11th century, has been found in the volume: "Hoc psalterium anglicum est, ut ipsa littera manifestat" (Nouveau Traité, p. 383).

Of the Gallican Psalter we have numerous copies, because this version was adopted in the writing-schools of Charlemagne, after orders were given that every priest should possess his own psalter. There are several volumes containing this version, of remarkable beauty and interest. One is in the library at Vienna (No. 1861), and is supposed to have been prepared by the order of Charlemagne for presentation to the pope Hadrian I. Of this there is a long account in Kolzar's Catalogue, vol. i. pp. 347-415, and a facsimile in Silvestre, ii. 126; see, too, Denis, i. xxviii. Of another beautiful copy notice has been given by the Palaeographical Society (see Plates lxi. lxx. xciii.); this seems to have belonged to the emperor Lothair, A.D. 825. A third is in the great library at Paris (1152), and retains still the beautiful ivory plaques which formed its original binding. This belonged to Charles the Bald (see Silvestre, ii. 129, 131). Another of almost equal beauty is in the Douce collection at Oxford (No. 59), and a fifth is in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge (No. 272, O. 5. It belonged to a certain count Achadeus). The same Gallican version is found in the celebrated psalter Claudius C. vii., which belonged to the Cotton collection, but is now in the library at Utrecht. The Vienna copy has much prefatory matter, corresponding in some degree to that in Vespasian A. 1, including, however, the creeds of St. Gregory of Rome, St. Gregory of Neocesarea, of "Jerome" and St. Ambrose, together with the genuine Nicene creed. They all, or almost all, contain the full series of Canticles, the "Te Deum," the "Quicunque vult," the "Lord's Prayer," and the Apocryphal psalm.^c The MSS. assigned to Lothair and Charles the Bald, and that in the C. C. C. library, contain litanies by which, indeed, their original ownership is established. There is another MS. in the library at Paris, No. 13,159, which contains the same Gallican version, together with prayers belonging to each psalm, and copies of two litanies, of which one is called "Litanía calula," and the other "Litanía Gallica." If this MS. is contemporary with the litanies it contains, we must assign it to some date between A.D. 795 and 800. It is probably later. It contains the Athanasian creed.

^a Later writers say of the 8th century.

^b The position of the volumes mentioned by Elmham may be seen in the MS. in the library of Trinity Hall, Cambridge; a copy of the drawing is given in Dugdale's Monasticon, under St. Augustine's monastery, Canterbury. The work of Thomas of Elmham has been published in the series of the Master of the Rolls, but unfortunately the drawing was omitted.

8. At a period somewhat below our date, great attention was paid to St. Jerome's three versions, and several psalters are in existence in which we have two or three in parallel columns. There is one, indeed, in the Vatican library (Regin. xi.) which was given to it by queen Christina, and is assigned by some authorities to the 7th, the 6th, or even the 5th century. This contains the Gallican and Hebrew in parallel columns. In the library of Trin. Coll. Cambridge is a volume of remarkable size and beauty, in which are found the three versions, with notes in the intermediate spaces and margins. A volume corresponding to it in most respects (being almost a facsimile) is in the library at Paris, No. 8846; of this Silvestre gives a notice in vol. iii. no. 188. The former of these has reproductions of the drawings of the Utrecht Psalter, and the latter has some of the drawings.

Further information as to later psalters will be found in Prof. Westwood's works, above cited. An account of an important Bamberg psalter is given by Dr. Schönfelder in the Serapeum of Nov. 1865. This has, in four columns, the Gallican, Roman, and Hebraic versions, and the Greek in Latin letters. See, too, Cardinal Thomasius' Psalter, published separately at Rome, 1697, and in his collected works. The Psalterium Quincuplex of J. Le Fevre, published first by Henry Stephens, 1509, contains in the text the three versions of Jerome, and in a kind of appendix the Vetus and what he calls "Psalterium Conciliatum," an attempt to produce a version from the Gallican agreeing "more with the truth and the Hebrew." Mr. Birch of the British Museum promises a work on this subject.

Some notes on more recent volumes will be found in the writer's volume on the creeds, Murray, 1872, chaps. xxiii. and xxiv. Copies of Jerome's Roman and Gallican translations, with the "obeli" and asterisks, will be found in Migne, vol. xxix. pp. 119-420; of the Hebraic in vol. xxviii. pp. 1183-1306. The last is also given from the Codex Amiatinus, in the notes of the edition of the Vulgate by Tischendorf, Leipsic, 1873. An interesting account of the Psalterium Aureum of St. Gall (no. 26) has been recently published by the Historical Society of St. Gall, but it is mainly occupied with its palaeographical and artistic characteristics.

PUNISHMENTS. [CORPORAL PUNISHMENT; DISCIPLINE; FINE; PENITENCE.]

PURIFICATION OF THE ALTAR VESSELS. I know of no reference to the subject in any document within our period. It is noticed, however, in the general instructions given to parish priests in the West at the visitation of the bishop in the 9th or 10th centuries, and we may presume that the practice which they prescribe had been in some degree observed previously. In the Sermo Synodalis, ascribed to Leo IV. 847, but perhaps later, we read, "Wash and wipe the holy vessels with your own hands . . . Let a place be prepared in the sacarium (secretarium, Rather.; Admon. Synod. below) or near the altar, where the water may be poured out when the sacred vessels are washed, and there let a clean vessel with water be hung, and there let the priest wash his hands after the communion" (Hard. Concilia, vi. 785). The same directions appear also in a very early recension of this document printed by Baluze (Admonitio Synodalis, ad calc. Reginon. de Discipl. Eccl. 502), and in the Synodica of Ratherius, A.D. 928 (Hard. u.s. 790). They have also been preserved in the later pontificals of Rome (Regin. u.s. 505, 508). Yet the order that the celebrant should himself cleanse the vessels could hardly have been general, for in the 11th century we find John of Avranches, about 1060, assigning this office to the deacon (Epist. ad Maurilium, in App. ad Opp. Greg. M. ii. 256, ed. Ben.).

PURIFICATION, FESTIVAL OF THE. [MARY, FESTIVALS OF, § 1, p. 1140.]

PURPURA. The band or stripe of purple used as an ornament in the dresses of the ancients. [CLAVUS.] Caesarius of Arles, in his rules for nuns, forbids them to use "vestimenta lucida vel nigra vel cum purpura," &c. (Reg. ad Virg. Recap. 7; Patrol. lxvii. 1118). A canon of the second council of Nicaea (787 A.D.), in ordaining that clerics should dress plainly, adds that anciently they did not wear variegated dresses of silk, nor προσετίθεσαν ἐπερχορα ἐμβλήματα ἐν τοῖς ἄκροις τῶν ἱματίων (can. 16; Labbe, vii. 609). Another illustration of the practice is furnished us by Gregory of Tours, who dwells on an incident where a mafors holoserica is turned into an altar-cloth, a strip torn off being used for the above-mentioned decoration (Hist. Franc. x. 16; Patrol. lxxi. 548).

PYTHON. The word is connected with the Hebrew נִחַשׁ, pethen, a venomous serpent, which is rendered in the Septuagint by ὄφεις, Deut. xxxii. 33; Job xx. 14; Ps. lvi. 4; Isaiah xi. 8; by δράκων in Job xx. 16; and by βασιλίσκος in Ps. xci. 13, b. v. Throughout the East evil spirits received names from this reptile, an usage originating, we cannot doubt, in traditions of the event recorded in Gen. iii. In Scripture itself we have "the great dragon . . . that old serpent called the devil" (Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2). One result was that the attributes of the demon and the serpent were interchanged. Hence the python slain by Apollo at Delos was thought to have inspired the oracle before the god took his place: "Pythone serpente interfecto totius vaticinationis auctore et principe" (Orosius, adv. Pagan. Hist. vi. 15); "Ante Apollinem responsa dare solitus" (Hyginus, Fabul. 140). Hence, also, it was that both in Jewish and Christian antiquity the name of python was given to prophesying spirits. Hesychius says, Πύθων Δαίμονιον μαντικόν. In Acts xvi. 16, we read of "a certain damsel, who had a spirit of python" (in Eustathius, de Engastrim. 11, τὴν πυθόμαντιν). In the Vulgate of Lev. xx. 27, we have, "Vir aut mulier in quibus pythoneus vel divinationis fuerit spiritus." Compare Deut. xviii. 11; 1 Sam. xviii. 7, 8 (Eustath. u. s. 20, πυθόμαντις); 2 Kings xxiii. 24; 1 Chron. x. 13, "pythoneissam"; Isaiah viii. 19; xiii. 3.

The lower animals were supposed to be subject to this possession. In the time of Justinian there was a dog at Constantinople that would scratch up and return to their several owners rings of iron and gold that had been buried together; and indicate correctly the characters of men and women in a crowd,—“on which account they said that the dog had a spirit of python” (Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. i. 657, ed. Nieb.).

Among modern writers consult especially J. B. Deane, The Worship of the Serpent traced throughout the World, Lond. 1830; Leo Allatius, de Engastrimutho Syntagma, appended to Eustathius, u. s.; J. H. Keidegger, Dissertatio de Pseudo-Samuele, Tigur. 1675. [W. E. S.]

PYX (Greek, πυξίς, πυξίον; Latin, pyxis, pyrida, a box). In ecclesiastical usage the box in which the host is reserved after consecration. The word is used in this sense in a decree of pope Leo IV., A.D. 847–855 (Labbe and Mansi, Concil. ed. Venet. t. lxiv. p. 891), "Super altare nihil ponetur nisi capsae cum reliquiis sanctorum aut pyxis cum Corpore Domini ad viaticum pro infirmis." In the first Ordo Romanus (Migne, vol. lxxviii.), in the part which contains the detail of the order of the procession before the celebration of the Eucharist by the pope, the passage occurs, "duo acolythi tenentes capsas cum sanctis apertas." This is generally interpreted to mean vessels in which the Eucharist was placed; but a comparison with the decree of pope Leo IV. seems to make it doubtful whether such is the true meaning. [RESERVATION.]

It is the opinion of many writers that the earliest receptacles for the reserved portion of the Eucharist were vessels in the form of a dove [DOVE, EUCHARISTIC], but such was probably not invariably the case; and the round boxes formed from a section of an elephant's tooth, dating from various periods, from the 4th to the 7th century, nearly all of which bear sculptured on them subjects which may be held to have some reference to the eucharistic sacrifice, have been (v. observations by Padre Garrucci, Archeologia, vol. xlv

p. 322) confidently supposed to have served for this purpose. Such may very possibly have been the case in some instances; but it must be observed that the subjects carved upon many of them would be well suited to appear on a receptacle for a BRANDEUM or cloth, which, as we learn from St. Gregory's (the pope) letter (Ep. lib. iv. ep. 30) to the empress Constantina, was, down to his period, the customary substitute for a relic, and was habitually enclosed in a pyxis. His words are as follows: "Cognoscat autem tranquillissima Domna quia Romanis consuetudo non est quando Sanctorum reliquias dant ut quidquam tangere praesumant de corpore sed tantummodo in pyxide brandeum mittitur atque ad sacratissima corpora Sanctorum ponitur. Quod levatum in ecclesia quae est dedicanda debita cum veneratione reconducitur."

One which we can scarcely doubt to have been made for the purpose of containing a brandeum (or possibly a vessel of oil) is that which has been engraved and commented on in the Archeologia (vol. xlv. p. 321). On it are two subjects, one the martyrdom of St. Menas, the other the saint in a glorified condition [RELIQUARY]. Several examples of such boxes bear secular subjects, as one in the museum at Zürich, on which are Venus and Adonis; on another is Bacchus; on one, in the treasury of the cathedral of Sens, a lion hunt; and a like subject is on one in the British Museum. Of those which bear Christian subjects, the earliest and finest is that in the museum at Berlin, on one side of which is Abraham about to sacrifice Isaac, on the other our Lord teaching in the Temple. This is probably as early as the 4th century.

In this instance it is difficult to see the appropriateness of the latter subject to a vessel employed in connexion with the Eucharist, though in the former it is obvious. By Mr. Westwood (Fictile Ivories, p. 272) the second subject is said to be Christ seated among His apostles; but one of the figures would seem to be that of a woman pressing in through a crowd, and the next figure an elderly baldheaded man raising a hand with a gesture of surprise, figures which would seem to point to our Lord's teaching in the Temple. Several examples present the history of Jonah; the raising of Lazarus is found upon at least five; the three Hebrew youths in the furnace on one, various miracles of our Lord on others. All these may be thought to refer in some way or other to the Eucharist, but most would be applicable to pyxides containing brandea or oils from the holy places in Palestine.

These boxes appear to vary in date from the 4th to the 7th century, and in size from about 3½ inches to 5 inches in diameter and height; several have had locks; among them that of St. Menas. A lock is perhaps an indication of the use of a pyx as a reliquary rather than as a receptacle for the host, for while many would have stolen a relic few would have dared to steal a host.

It is difficult to find examples of pyxes (in the restricted sense) earlier than A.D. 800 which, either by inscriptions or ornamentation, indicate clearly their destination. We find, however, great numbers of pyxes made in the 12th (some possibly in the 11th) and 13th centuries, chiefly at Limoges, of copper enamelled and gilt. These are usually circular, with a conical cover, and about 3 inches in diameter. [A. N.]

QUADRAGESIMA. [LENT.]

QUADRAPOLA. This word, whose meaning is quite uncertain, often occurs in Anastasius Bibliothecarius. He tells us (e. g.) that Adrian I. made for the church of St. Peter "cortinas . . . de palliis stauracinis seu quadrapolis" (p. 320). It has been suggested that by the name is to be understood pieces of cloth, in whose four corners gold or silken threads are interwoven. This, however, seems nothing more than a guess. QUIRIO, martyr, Mar. 11. [SEBASTE, FORTY MARTYRS OF.]

R

RACANA, a word whose spelling is as varied as its meaning is disputed. Thus Gregory the Great, in the two passages we have cited below, spells it on one occasion racana, on another rachana. The former spelling is that found in Ennodius, the latter that in Anastasius Bibliothecarius. In the Regula Magistri, and the remaining passages referred to below, it is spelt rachina.

It seems to us most likely that the racana was some kind of rug or blanket, not, apparently, of the thicker or coarser kind. The following order from the Regula Magistri tells pretty strongly for both points, "in lectis habeant . . . et lanas, in aestate vero pro lanis rachinis propter aestus utantur" (c. 81, Patrol. lxxxviii. 1031: cited in the Concordia Regularum, Patrol. ciii. 1255, where see Ménard's note). On one occasion we find Gregory the Great sending a present of thirty racanae with laenae and lecti; on another he receives a present of two (Greg. Mag. Epist. xi. 1, 78; Patrol. lxxvii. 1119, 1210, where the notes may be referred to).

It was made of hair cloth (r. cilicina), sometimes at any rate (Vita S. Radegundis, c. 4; Patrol. lxxii. 666). It was a thing worth stealing (Audoenus, Vita S. Eligii, ii. 38; Patrol. lxxxvii. 570). This last was a r. caprina . . . valde optima, and perhaps therefore better than the ordinary run, for in Anastasius we read of four rachanellae being sold numismate uno. In a later passage the association cum storeis et rachanis is important for the view which we have adopted as to the meaning of the word. It ought to be added, as seemingly conflicting with the Regula Magistri, that the words following the above-cited clause are per totam hiemem (Vita Johannis Eleemos. 9, 52; Patrol. lxxiii. 356, 363). The word is also used by Ennodius (Epist. ix. 17; Patrol. lxxiii. 156), who asks that a laena and racana, which are to be presented to him, shall be "coloris rubei aut fuscii." On a survey of the foregoing passages it will be seen that something of the nature of blanket makes very good sense throughout. The same can hardly be said of some other views. Thus Sirmond (Ennodius, not. in loc.) thinks it must be some kind of boot, by assuming that racanae are the same as ragae [RAGAE], and that these latter are boots, because the Theodosian Code prohibits them in company with tsangae, which certainly are boots! Ducange's theory is equally unsatisfactory, which explains it of a patched and worn dress, such as monks would wear, thus deriving it from ῥάκος. It is hard on this theory to understand such an allusion as that we have cited, where a rachana is called valde optima, and is thought quite worth stealing, or to explain several passages distinctly connecting it with bed furniture. Other views which explain the word as a kind of breeches, or as something worn round the neck, need not be discussed, in the absence of anything like evidence in support of them.

Besides the notes we have already mentioned, reference may be made to Rosweyd, Onomasticon in Vitas Patrum, s. v. (Patrol. lxxxiv. 489), and Ducange's Glossarium, s. v. [R. S.]

RAGAE. The Theodosian Code (lib. xiv., tit. 10, l. 3), in a law put forth by Honorius in A.D. 399, forbids the wearing within the city of ragae and tsangae. [TSANGAE.] The meaning of the former word is very doubtful. The preceding law, issued two years earlier, had prohibited the wearing of brachae and tsangae; and thus one theory has been to read brachae in both passages. This view, not very probable in itself, is rendered still less so by the existence of a diminutive ragella (Ducange, Glossarium, s. v.). Others connect it with ῥάκη, ῥάκια, and illustrate it by such words as ῥακοδυτεῖν, ῥακενδυτεῖν. This would give us the meaning of a monkish cloak, so-called from its apparently ordinary condition. This view also seems somewhat unsatisfactory, seeing that the object of the two laws appears to be to put down the wearing of foreign dresses in Rome, under a penalty of total confiscation of property and perpetual exile. The theory that a monkish dress is intended does not seem to harmonize with the direct object of the law, and the penalty in this case would be out of all proportion. Others, again, would read ruchae, deriving it from ῥούχον, a garment (Ducange, Glossarium Graecum, s. v.). It seems to us, however, that the prohibition appears aimed at something too special to be satisfied by a quite general word. (See Gothofredus, not. in loc.; Ducange, Glossarium, s. v.) [R. S.]

RAILS. [CANCELLI.]

RAM. The Ram is not unfrequently used as a symbol on Christian monuments, and there seems to be ground for thinking that it was employed to symbolize other ideas than those signified by the Lamb. St. Ambrose (Ep. lxiii.) says that it is used as a symbol of the Word, even by those who deny the coming of Christ, and finds in the fleece of the ram a symbol of the "clothing-upon" of Christians (2 Cor. v. 2); in his defence of the flock against the wolf, a symbol of Christ's victory over Satan; in his leading the flock, a symbol of the Divine guidance; in his substitution for Isaac, a symbol of the one sacrifice; in his dumbness before his shearers (Is. liii. 7), a symbol of the meekness of Christ. And another father of the Church (Prosper of Promiss. Dei, pars 1, c. xvii.) sees in the "thicket" a type of the crown of thorns. Where found on fonts and other monuments having any reference to baptism, it was probably used as a symbol of force, and as an encouragement to "fight manfully" (Perret, Catcombes de Rome, v. iii. pl. 8); and under the same idea of encouraging themselves with the device of a valiant animal in times of persecution, Christians seem to have worn rings with a ram engraved upon the stone. It may be added that two rams face to face, with a cross between them, are not an uncommon symbol, and may be seen on the capitals of columns in the churches of St. Ambrose and St. Celsus at Milan (Allegranza, Sacr. Mon. di Milano, tav. vii. etc.).

RATISBON, COUNCILS OF. (1) A.D. 768, says Mansi (xii. 699), but this being the year in which Pepin died, it could not well have been held for another year or more, to have been held under his son Charles, who seems to refer to it in a later capitulary as having legislated on the subject of country bishops. We learn from another source that it disallowed their performing any episcopal functions, unless they had been ordained by three bishops.

REBRACHIATORIUM. We once meet with this word in Cassian's description of the monastic dress (De Coenob. Inst. i. 6; Patrol. xlix. 71), where, from the number of synonyms used to describe the article (ἀναβολαί, succinctoria, redimicula), it may fairly be said with Gazaenus (in loc.) to be "obscuratus potius quam illustratus." It would seem to mean some sort of cords or bands (resticulae duplices) passing over the neck and down the two sides, being then so fastened as to hold the garments together, while leaving the arms free. See Isidore (Etym. xix. 33, 5, where Cassian is cited), Gazaenus (not. in loc.), and Ducange's Glossary, s. v. [R. S.]

RECONCILIATION OF PENITENTS.

This was the last stage in the discipline of PENITENCE. By it the penitent was fully restored to all the sacred privileges which he had forfeited. This restoration was expressed by different terms. Tertullian uses the phrases, "veniam, abolitionem delictorum, indulgentiam, remissionem, concessionem, &c., sacramentum benedictionis, pacis redditionem, communicationem." With Cyprian the ordinary expressions are, "pacem dare, accipere, ad pacem admitti, communicationis jus accipere, dare, veniam, peccatorum remissionem, indulgentiam." The council of Elvira has "communione dare, accipere, praestare, Dominicae communioni sociari, reconciliari." Many canons express reconciliation simply by the word "communio," and Greek councils speak of those unreconciled as ἀκοινωνήτοι. In the council of Nice (c. 13), absolution is called a viaticum, τὸ τελευταῖον καὶ ἀναγκαῖότατον ἐφόδιον. The same word was adopted by 1 Conc. Arausiac. c. 3; 1 Conc. Vasens. c. 2; Conc. Gerund. c. 9; 3 Conc. Aurelian, c. 25, &c. A general term in ecclesiastical documents of a later age was "absolutio" (λύσις). The act expressed by these several phrases was the solemn absolving of public penitents, and restoring them to full communion. The act of reconciliation was outward and visible, but a spiritual remission of sins was held to accompany it. Although in the theological doctrine of absolution regard must be paid both to the forum internum—the conscience of the sinner, and the forum externum—the discipline of the church, there is no trace of any such formal distinction having been drawn through the period embraced by this work. It was considered that when a penitent was reconciled, his sin was pardoned. His whole course of penance had been a petition for the divine forgiveness, and when the term of the sentence expired, the offence was judged to be fully expiated; the offender was then restored to communion, and that restoration presupposed the forgiveness of God. The office of the priest in the forum internum was ministerial, and the form through which he exercised his ministry was an intercessory prayer. A judicial absolution of sin was reserved for the Almighty. "Christ alone," says Clemens Alexand. (Pedagogog. i. 18, vol. i. p. 138), "is able to forgive our sins, He alone being able to discern the sincerity or insincerity of our obedience." The early doctrine on absolution is well expressed by Pacian (Ep. i. 15): "Not indiscriminately to all is this very pardon through penance granted, nor until there shall have been either some indication of the divine will, or perchance some visitation, may men be loosed; that with careful pondering and much balancing, after many groans and much shedding of tears, after the prayers of the whole church, pardon is in such wise not refused to true penitence, so that no one thereby prejudgeth the future judgment of Christ." The language of Ambrose (de Spirit. Sanct. iii. 18) is equally clear: "By the Holy Spirit sins are pardoned; men do but apply their ministry towards the remission of sins; they do not exercise any power of authority. Nor do they remit sins in their own names, but in that of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. They ask, God gives." Compare at a later date the statement of Gregory (in Evangel. Hom. 26, vol. i. p. 1555): "Then only is the absolution of the bishop valid, when it follows the decision of the judge within." In the forum externum, the court of the church, the bishop's office was more directly judicial. By his own authority, through imposition of hands, he restored the penitent to the peace and communion of the church, and this restoration so far partook of a sacramental character that an African synod under Cyprian (Ep. lxiv. 1) ruled that peace, however irregularly given by a priest of God, was not to be taken away.

The complete ritual of reconciliation in the early ages is nowhere preserved, but there can be little doubt that it comprised one or more of these ceremonies: public prayer was offered in behalf of the returning penitent; hands were solemnly laid upon his head; the Eucharist was administered to him as a token of his return to communion, and a declaration was made that he was again in the society and peace of the church. In the most primitive times, perhaps, even these rites were wanting. It seems probable that then the delinquent, who had been subjected to a certain penance, during which the hands of the bishop were frequently laid upon him, was ipso facto reconciled at the conclusion of his sentence, and with the last imposition of hands. Morinus (de Poenit. vi. 21) raises the question whether, at a later date, when the station of the consistentes was in use, the penitent was absolved as he entered upon the station, or at the close of it. He argues that the "viaticum" of Conc. Nicaen. c. 13, is not participation in the sacrament, but a sacerdotal absolution, and that therefore absolution is distinct from communion, and from this he infers that absolution was given as the penitent was advanced to the stage of consistentia, and full communion only as he left it. But the whole tenor of the canons which mention a viaticum is opposed to this view, and a statement of 1 Conc. Arausic. c. 3, seems to put the matter beyond doubt, for after declaring that a dying penitent might communicate without imposition of hands, it adds that the fathers fitly named a communion of this sort a viaticum.

1. Petitions for Absolution.—In the simple mode of discipline administered in the earliest times, it rested entirely with the discretion of the bishop to determine what length and severity of penance entitled the penitent to absolution. It seems to have been the custom for members of a congregation to petition the bishop to take back again any one of their number who had been ejected, as soon as they were persuaded of his repentance, and for the penitent at the same time to join with the clergy and bishop in earnest prayer that he might be worthy of restoration. The entire congregation thus participated in their erring brother's return. In the Apost. Const. (ii. 16) this duty of intercession is committed to the deacons. But more usually the penitent himself, by the depth and earnestness of his self-abasement, was his own best intercessor. An instance of a successful petition to be absolved is that of the confessor Natalis (Euseb. H. E. v. 27); an unsuccessful one, though supported by the supplication of the people, is related by Synesius (Ep. 67) of a certain Lamponianus. In no case does it appear that reconciliation was granted as a matter of course; the penitent must ask for it, and beseech the congregation to unite with him in his request. Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9) says that he "ought to enjoin all the brethren to bear the message of his prayer for mercy;" and in the following section (c. 10), "When thou throwest thyself before the knees of the brethren, thou entreatest Christ." Similar language was held by Pacian (Ep. i. 15, Paroen. ad Poenit. c. 24). In the letters of Cyprian and the Roman clergy, there are frequent references to the part borne, in the reconciliation of the lapsed, by the prayers and intercessions of those who had stood firm, "stantis plebis" (Cyp. Epp. xix., xxx. 9, xxxvi. 6, xliii. 5). Ambrose likewise speaks (de Poenit. i. 16, ii. 9, 10) of the pardon of an offender being sought by the tears and lamentations of the whole congregation. This supplication of the people ceased after the 4th century to be part of the ritual of reconciliation in the East; but in the West the pontificals and rituals of a date as late as the 13th century exhibit the practice of the whole body of the clergy and all the people on the Thursday of holy week offering public prayers for the penitents about to be absolved, and the bishop pronouncing the prayer of absolution in the name of the whole church; and as Morinus (viii. 13), writing at the close of the 17th century, adds, "idem adhuc ritus in hunc usque diem perdurat, sed verbo tenus tantum."

2. Absolution withheld till the Completion of Penance.—The original idea of absolution was that of a correlative to public discipline; restoration to communion implied its having been before withheld, and those only could properly be said to be loosed who had previously been bound. Accordingly it was for many centuries an inflexible rule of the church that absolution should not be granted till the offender had shewn some proof of contrition by the performance of certain outward acts of penance. The evidence of this practice is spread over the whole penitential literature. See especially Tertullian, de Poenit. passim; also the canons of Elvira, so many of which attach the words "acta legitimâ poenitentia" as a condition of restoration; also the indignation expressed throughout Cyprian's epistles against those of his presbyters who transgressed the settled laws of the church by reconciling the lapsed without penance, an abuse equally corrected and condemned in the 6th century by 3 Conc. Tolet. c. 11; and for pontifical decisions see Syric. Ep. i. 3; Innocent. Ep. i. 7; Leo, Ep. xci. The principle, of course, holds good only in respect to penitents strictly so called; in the case of simple separation from communion (ἀφορισμός, segregatio, separatio), where no penalty was attached, none could be exacted. The rule was sometimes relaxed in time of persecution, as in Africa, after conspicuous zeal and resolution succeeding a lapse (Cyp. Epp. xxiv., xxv.), or in deference to the request of the martyrs [LIBELLATICI]; or in favour of the sick; or in case of the clergy who were suspended or deposed, but not subjected to penance. There are also traces in the Eastern ritual, of a comparatively early date, of absolution being granted immediately after confession, and prior to penance. Morinus (vi. 24) assigns the origin of this custom to the abrogation of the office of the penitentiary. The earliest documentary evidence is to be found in the penitential of John the Faster, the date of which is yet to be determined. In that treatise the penitential course begins with a minute confession of sin, immediately upon which follow several prayers of absolution (ἀφῳεις), but even after these the penitent is still held to be ἀκωνῶντος, his final and complete restoration being delayed, and communion withheld, till after the completion of his penance, which in some cases did not take place for long years after he had been absolved (Morin. de Poenit. appendix, p. 628). On the contemporary Greek practice of absolution, see the evidence collected by Morinus (ibid. p. 660). If, in consequence of the duration of the sentence, abstinence from communion was much prolonged, the penitent was allowed at intervals to receive an ἀντιδωρον [EULOGIAE, p. 629]. It was probably the influence of his Greek training which led Theodore to introduce among his canons (Poenitential, I. xii. 4) a permission for communion to be given "pro misericordia," at the end of a year or six months, although the penance was still unfinished. The history of the steps by which in the Western church the primitive custom gave place to the mediæval practice of first absolving and reconciling, and then inflicting penance, belongs to a date which lies outside this work.

3. Form of Absolution.—Till long after the Carolingian era, absolution was given in the supplicatory, not in the indicative, form. No penitent was reconciled without imposition of hands, and imposition was never unaccompanied with prayer. "Nihil est aliud," says August. (de Bapt. iii. 16), "manus impositio nisi oratio super hominem." And this in itself is strong evidence that the form was precatory. The union of prayer with laying on of hands had strong scriptural authority (S. Matt. xix. 13; Acts vi. 6; xiii. 3; xxviii. 8), and was supported by the practice of the church for many centuries. The precatory form was used both in public and private reconciliation and in absolving equally the sound, or the sick, or the dying. And for 1200 years no other form, as an appointed ordinance of the church, usurped its place. Morinus sums up (viii. 11) his investigation into the practice of the Latin church with the broad statement, "Demonstratum videtur continuâ antiquæ ecclesiæ traditione peccatorum remissionem publice privatimque deprecative concessam esse." An indicative absolution first appears about the year 1300. Its use occurs in an ancient MS. of that date, in Gothic characters, of the abbey of St. Remigius. The MS. contains various episcopal benedictions, after which, in addition to a form of reconciliation, similar to that contained in the Ordo Romanus, there is given, "Item absolutio," in these terms, "Auctoritate, et vice B. Petri principis apostolorum, cui traditæ sunt claves regni caelorum, cui dedit Deus potestatem animas ligandi atque solvendi, dicens ei familiaris prae ceteris. Quodcumque ligaveris, &c. Vice inquam ejusdem B. Petri, cui licet merito longe sumus dissimiles, quoniam potestate a Deo concessâ existimamus consimiles, ego divinitus vos absolvo a vinculis peccatorum vestrorum." Morinus considers the term "absolution" in this MS. to be of the nature of a blessing, partly confirmatory, partly dismissory, after the final reconciliation, rather than signifying a remission of sins; and that this was the ordinary signification of the word at that period. A copy of the Gregorian sacramentary of about the same date, contained in the library of the cathedral of Tours, has a form which combines the two modes. After a long discourse on the scriptural authority for declaring the remission of sins, the ritual continues, "Cujus nos virtute freti, et clementiâ confisi, humillime imprecantes pietatem suam, absolvimus te a vinculo tuorum omnium delictorum, et quidquid pro eis mereris, oramus ut avertat propitius, et merearis cernentem omnia cernere, suâ frui visione et uti consolatione, ad gloriam resurgere, et interim sine læsione manere aggregatus sanctorum omnium consortio, tribuente Deo Patre." Then follows another form, but entirely precatory. It does not appear that these forms superseded the solemn supplicatory reconciliation, they were rather supplementary benedictions. Speaking generally, the history of the change from one form to another is this, the supplicatory was the almost universal use of the church up to the 13th century; in the course of that century the indicative gradually crept in, and before its close had altogether taken the place of the earlier and more scriptural precatory absolution (Morinus de Poenit. viii. 8–12; Bingham, Antiq. XIX. ii. 5). The following is a very old form of supplicatory reconciliation from a Latin missal, cited by Bingham from cardinal Bona (Rer. Liturg. appendix, p. 763): "Qui mulieri peccatrici omnia peccata dimisit lacrymanti, et latroni ad unam confessionem claustra aperuit paradisi, ipse vos redemptionis suae participes ab omni vinculo peccatorum absolvat," &c. For other forms in the Latin church, see Sacramentar. Gregor. ed. Ménard, p. 226.

In the Greek church the supplicatory form has never been abandoned. Both in the earliest and more recent Euchologies, the absolution is distinctly a prayer to God for pardon, εὐχή ἐπὶ τῶν ἐξ ἐπιτιμίων λυομένων. The following compendious form was represented to Morinus (vii. 12) as in general use through the Greek church in the middle ages, having come down from an earlier date: Αὐτὸς Δέσποτα ἄνεις, ἄφες, συγχώρησον τὰς ἁμαρτίας τοῦ Δ., ὅτι σὺν τῷ κρᾶτος, &c.

4. Rites.—The most conspicuous act in the ceremonial of reconciliation was the imposition of hands. There is no occasion to cite authorities for a practice which was as essential to the rite of reconciliation as to that of confirmation or ordination. Indeed in many passages the expression "imposition of hands" is identical with absolution; see, for instance, Apost. Const. ii. 18; Pacian, Ep. iii.; Statut. Eccl. Antiq. cc. 76, 78; August. de Bapt. iii. 16; v. 20; Leo, Ep. xcii. 17. With the exception of this act, no other part of the early ceremonial is known. It is probable that for many centuries the whole form of reconciliation consisted in the bishop laying his hands on the head of the penitent and saying certain prayers, and perhaps making a public announcement of his return to the peace of the church. Afterwards, no doubt a more elaborate ritual was introduced, but there are no materials from which to ascertain even approximately the date of its introduction. The Gelasian sacramentary is adduced by Morinus as the earliest authority on the subject. After the prayers of the Mass, on "Feria 5 in Coen. Dom." it publishes an "ordo agentibus poenit. public." to this effect: "On the morning of Holy Thursday the penitent is to come forth from the place where he has done penance, and to present himself in the body of the church prostrate on the ground." The deacon (in the Ordo Rom. the archdeacon) is then to accost the bishop in an address which begins thus: "Adest, O venerabilis Pontifex, tempus acceptum, dies propitiationis divinae et salutis humanae," &c., at the end of which the bishop, with the whole congregation, is to say certain verses of Psalm li. The archdeacon is then to ask the bishop to pray that the penitent may be brought near to God by the divine grace of reconciliation. After which the penitents, having been solemnly warned against a relapse by an attendant priest, are to be formally absolved by the bishop. Similar directions, under the heading "de Reconciliatione Poen. Capital. Criminis," are given in the Rule of Chrodogang, of Metz (c. 28). This ritual is also found, with some additional prayers, in the most ancient MSS. of the Ordo Romanus; in the Gregorian sacramentary, "in Feriâ 5 de Coen. Dom.;" and with some further additions, which indicate a later compilation, in the spurious de Divinis Officiis, cap. de Coen. Dom., which bears the name of Alcuin, and there can be little doubt that it represents in general outline the use of the Latin church on both sides of the Alps from a very early age (Morin. de Poenit. viii. 11; ix. 30). In the English church, public reconciliation was never appointed, as there was no public penance (Theodor. Poenitential, I. xiii. 4). In the Gallican church there are traces of a more elaborate ceremonial. Morinus prints (Appendix, pp. 598–608) an office book from the cathedral of Toulouse, apparently of the date of the 9th century, containing very full and interesting directions for the reconciliation of penitents. Palm Sunday it calls the Sunday of indulgence, and appoints that at 8 o'clock in the morning of the following Thursday the archdeacon is to approach the bishop, seated on his throne, surrounded by his clergy, and to bow and kiss his knees, and announce to him that a crowd of penitents is standing outside waiting to be reconciled by his ministration. Upon hearing which, the bishop will arise and walk in procession with his clergy to the door of the church, and, seating himself there, will investigate the case of each, and set apart those who are to be reconciled. He will then re-enter the church and ascend the steps of the altar, with his face turned towards the penitents at the door, while four singing men, placed at the door, chant an antiphon, "If Thou, Lord, wilt be extreme," &c., and four others from behind the altar respond, "As a shepherd gathereth his flock that is lost, so have I gathered thee." The deacon is then to bid the penitents enter the church, where they prostrate themselves, while an office with special lections is sung on their behalf, after which a special Mass, with appropriate prayers and readings, is offered for them; and immediately after the gospel, the priest is to preach to them, and when he has finished, the deacon is to read a long exhortation, the priest explaining particular points in it. When the missa poenitentium is over, then are to follow the missa pro baptizandis and the missa chrisimalis, and then comes the final office of reconciliation. The bishop ascends the pulpit, the penitents prostrating themselves round it, and the deacon addresses him with the same formula contained in the earlier rituals: "Adest, O venerabilis Pontifex, tempus acceptum," &c., at the conclusion of which he leaves the pulpit and kneels before the altar, while a long penitential litany is sung; he then again mounts the pulpit, the priests standing in front of it, and on the deacon saying "Orate poenitentes," they prostrate themselves; and while the bishop pronounces the prayer of absolution, seven forms of which are given, two or four or more of the attendant priests lay their hands on the penitents' heads. The deacon then accosts them, "surgite de terrâ reconciliati Deo," and they are admitted to communion, receiving before the rest of the congregation, and, after one more admonition, finally cease to be penitents.

Private reconciliation would differ from the public form only in the absence of ceremonial, the two essential points of prayer and laying on of hands being maintained. For a specimen of this administration of the private rite, see what is published from a Rouen MS. of the 10th century by Morinus (ix. 31).

5. Minister.—The universal practice of the church committed the power of absolution to the hands of the bishop absolutely. The decrees of Nice (cc. 12, 13) and Ancyra (cc. 2, 5), leaving to him the determination of the length and severity of penance, assume the prevalence of this power. At a later date it was the subject of special enactments. Thus the second council of Carthage (c. 3) altogether forbade a presbyter to administer public reconciliation, a decision repeated by Conc. Agath. c. 44, and 2 Conc. Hispal. c. 7. See also Conc. Eliber. c. 32; 3 Conc. Carthag. c. 32; 1 Conc. Arausic. c. 1; Conc. Epaon. c. 16; Leo, Ep. 88. Similarly the penitential of Theodore (I. xiii. 2) confines the office to the bishop. And in the Western church, so long as public discipline was in force, he was the sole minister of reconciliation. In the East the office was delegated to the penitentiary, one of whose functions Sozomen expressly states (H. E. vii. 16) was that of absolving penitents. But although the bishop was alone formally invested with the power, in practice it was sometimes delegated to the presbyters. There is a long array of canons authorizing the ministry of a presbyter in case of emergency, only, however, with the sanction and as the representative of the bishop, as in the absence of the bishop (2 Conc. Carthag. c. 4, 3 Conc. Carthag. c. 32), or when the penitent was in danger of death (Ep. Dionys. Alex. ap. Euseb. H. E. vi. 44; Conc. Eliber. c. 32; Cyp. Epp. xviii., xix.; 1 Conc. Arausic. c. 1; Conc. Epaon. c. 16). And not only a priest, but if the danger was urgent a deacon might take his place; if the priest had ordered him (Conc. Eliber. c. 32), or if a priest could not be found, and death was imminent (Cyp. Ep. xviii.). The same usage is apparent from c. 2 of the first council of Toledo, A.D. 398, which prohibits the ordination of penitents, and decrees that if one has been ordained deacon, he shall be placed among the sub-deacons, and denied the privilege of laying on hands. Imposition of hands was used only in ordination, confirmation, and reconciliation; deacons took no part in the two former rites, it must therefore have been customary for them sometimes to administer the last. The same custom reappears in the 9th century, in a ritual of Noyon, printed by Martene (de Rit. i. 6), and at a later date in the introduction to the ps. Roman Penitential (Wasserschleben, Bussordnungen, p. 360). No such privilege appears to have been given to deacons in the Greek church. On the force of lay absolution, and on the opinions of the Roman canonists on its validity, see Bingham, Antiq. XIX. iii. 4; Morinus, de Poenit. viii. 24). In Africa, under the administration of Cyprian, the clergy joined with the bishop in laying on hands. Reference is made to this on two occasions (Epp. xvi. 2, xvii.). The custom appears to have been an isolated one, and as the second council of Carthage, A.D. 390, forbade presbyters to undertake the rite of public reconciliation, it had probably fallen into disuse by that date. In the Toulouse Pontifical, to which reference has been already made, the attendant priests laid their hands on the penitents, while the bishop read the prayers of absolution.

6. Time.—Reconciliation being consummated by a public admission to communion, it must always have taken place in public service during the celebration of the sacred mysteries. "Reconciliare quemquam in publicâ missâ" was the language of councils both in the 4th and 7th centuries (2 Conc. Carthag. c. 3; 2 Conc. Hispal. c. 7). All extant ritual books similarly connect public reconciliation with the service of the Mass. But there is some variety of custom with regard to the particular period in which the rite was administered. Some place it at the beginning of the office, and this appears to be the intention of the Ordo Romanus; but the more usual interval was immediately after the reading of the Gospel. In the Gelasian sacramentary the penitential office is succeeded by the direction, "Postea offert plebs," that is to say, it immediately preceded the offertory. In the Toulouse Pontifical (Morin. App., pp. 598–608) the ritual of reconciliation is intermingled with three masses, but the final absolution takes place after the gospel of the last and the most solemn of them. In the Greek euchologies the prayers of absolution for one under excommunication are to be said just before the priest places the elements on the altar.

With regard to the time of year, reconciliation appears from an early age to have been restricted to the paschal season, although there is no evidence by which to ascertain when the restriction began. In the time of Innocent I., A.D. 402–417, both the season and the day had become fixed. "De Penitentibus . . . quintâ feriâ ante Pascha eis remittendum Romanæ ecclesiæ consuetudo demonstrat" (Ep. i. 7). The Thursday in Holy Week, from a period at least as early as the beginning of the 5th century, was therefore the day in general use in the Western church. So the Penitential of Theodore (I. xlii. 2), and the subsequent penitentials, to which an "ordo" is attached. A passage in Ambrose (Ep. 33 ad Marcell.) points to Good Friday as the usual day for relaxing penance in the north of Italy, a supposition which is perhaps supported by the prayers appointed for "Feria sexta in Parasceue," in the Ordo Ambrosianus, all of which relate more directly to pardon and remission of sins than those of the Thursday previous. Morinus relying on a passage in 4 Conc. Tolet. c. 7, would extend the same custom to the Spanish church, but the words of the canon clearly refer, not to penitence, but to repentance generally. There was no reason why one day in the Holy Week should not be held as suitable as another, and it is highly probable that in different parts of the church different days were selected; but after the 7th century all trace of variety of time ceases. No surviving ritual or pontifical alludes to any other day than the Coena Domini, and all Roman canonical writers cite the assertion of Innocent as conclusive with respect to the western custom. In the east public reconciliation was granted apparently on any day at the close of the Holy Week, or even on Easter Day. This appears incidentally from a letter addressed by certain monks under excommunication to the council of Chalcedon; they complain that the times of Christ's passion and the holy eve, and day of Resurrection, on which festival penance was wont to be remitted by the Fathers, had passed by and they had not yet been absolved (Bingham, Antiq. XIX. ii. 10). Gregory of Nyssa, at the opening of his canonical epistle, similarly speaks of Easter as a time suitable for the sinner's restoration. In the case of the sick or dying, reconciliation was given of course at any season; and so with respect to private penance, absolution could not have been confined to a particular season although, to a great extent, the private ministration kept to the time of the public and more solemn rite.

7. Place.—When the system of the station [PENITENCE, p. 1591] was rigidly enforced, the penitent was moved station by station towards the sanctuary, till he arrived among the consistentes, and stood with them near the altar when the sacred mysteries were being celebrated. So when his own time of reconciliation came, the bishop's hands were laid upon him, kneeling in front of the altar: "divino altario reconciliatus" (1 Conc. Tolet. c. 2). The third council of Carthage has a canon (c. 32), which, after stating the conditions on which a priest may reconcile, adds, that where the crime has been scandalous the reconciliation shall take place, "ante apsidem;" on the principle, no doubt, that when the offence had been open and notorious, the absolution should be open and public also. In the elaborate Gothic ritual cited above from the Codex Tolosanus of Morinus, the penitents are gathered round the pulpit to receive imposition of hands, and their reconciliation is afterwards completed by reception with the faithful, of course at the altar. In the Ordo Romanus, Feria 5, in Coen. Dom., in the Gelasian sacramentary, and in the later pseudo-Alcuin, De Divinis Officiis, the penitents are directed to present themselves for reconciliation, "in gremio ecclesiae." And in a MS. of Evreux appended to the Pontifical of Egbert (Martene, de Rit. i. 6) directions are given that the bishop is not to mount his throne on the day of reconciliation, but is to remain either near or in front of the altar.

8. Absolution of the Sick.—There are two leading decisions on the treatment of the sick in the early centuries, which at first sight are at variance. The first council of Arles (A.D. 314) (c. 22) had decreed that apostates and others who sought communion on a sick bed were to be refused it until they recovered, and had had an opportunity of performing penance. And this is in accordance with what Innocent (Ep. iii. ad Exsuper.) states to have been the early custom, that at first penance was granted to such delinquents, but not communion; and that afterwards, on the conversion of the empire, a more lenient rule prevailed, and communion was refused under no circumstances to a dying man. On the other hand, the council of Nice (c. 13) orders the παράδος καὶ κανονικὸς νόμος to be maintained of giving an ἐφόδιον to a dying man. The explanation of the apparent discrepancy is that the canon of Arles applied to delinquents generally, while the Nicene canon, as is evident from the decisions immediately before and after it, had reference to those who were already penitents. The primitive church order therefore was that notorious offenders, whose repentance began only on their death-bed, were to be granted penitence, but not communion, while those who were already penitents were always to be allowed plenary reconciliation when in danger of death. Afterwards, from the beginning of the 4th century, the former restriction was removed, and all sick men who desired it were to be allowed the benefit of absolution. "They," said Leo (Ep. xci.), "who in time of urgent danger seek the safeguard of penance and subsequent reconciliation must not be refused, because we cannot restrict the time to God's compassion nor put any limit upon it. Therefore we ought not to be hard in dispensing the gifts of God, nor ought we to ignore the tears and the contrition of the penitent, because we believe that that very emotion of repentance springs from the inspiration of God." He therefore rules in the same epistle that the grace of communion is to be given if the sick penitent has lost his voice, and can only make a sign. At the same time there was not the same assurance felt of the final pardon of the sinner. "I can give him penitence and absolution," said Ambrose (in Exhort. ad Poenit.), "I cannot give him certainty." The fourth council of Carthage (c. 76) had decreed that if the patient had become senseless before his request for absolution could be complied with, he should still be absolved, and the sacred elements be put into his mouth, to which the eleventh council of Toledo, A.D. 675 (c. 11), added that the communion would be complete though the sick man could drink the cup only, and was too weak to swallow the bread (see 12 Conc. Tolet. c. 2, 13 Conc. Tolet. c. 9). And further, if any penitent was snatched away by sudden death, in the fields or on a journey, without communion, the first council of Vaison, A.D. 442 (c. 2), decided that his memorial and funeral rites should be the same as if he had died in the peace of the church. The 4 Conc. Carthag. c. 79, and 11 Conc. Tolet. c. 12, came to the same decision. In the Roman church, however, a severer practice prevailed. "We cannot," says Leo (Ep. xcii. 6), "communicate with those when dead with whom we did not communicate when living." This strictness was maintained by the subsequent popes Gelasius and Vigilius, but afterwards abandoned in the fifth Roman council, A.D. 553, and the whole western practice was then uniform. From the ecclesiastical rule that a penitent did not die out of communion with the church, who, from the accident of his death, was unable to obtain the eucharist, arose the custom of absolving the dead. Gregory the Great ordered a prayer of absolution to be read over the body of a certain monk who had died suddenly under excommunication, with miraculous results, according to John the deacon (Vita Greg. i. 45). For similar instances of absolution of the dead see Gregor. Dialog. ii. 23, iv. 55. At first the absolution went no further than the offering of prayers and masses for the souls of the dead, but in the time of Innocent III. it was decreed that the whole ceremonial of absolution, with penitential psalms, &c., was to be observed. Early Greek euchologies contain many special prayers for absolving the dead (Morin. de Poenit. x. 9).

There is no record of any early rites peculiar to the reconciliation of the sick. The ceremony would probably be confined, with more or less formality, to prayer and imposition of hands, and administration of the eucharist. The third council of Toledo (c. 12), followed by 12 Conc. Tolet. c. 2, 13 Conc. Tolet. c. 9, ordains that the sick penitent, no less than the sound, should be shaved, and if a woman, be veiled, and be sprinkled with ashes, and clothed in sackcloth. And this practice, with some variety, long continued, for some ancient MSS., quoted by Ménard in his notes to the Gregorian sacramentary, refer to sackcloth being laid about the head of the dying, and a cross made of ashes and water being placed in some instances on his breast, and in others on his forehead. It was the custom of the Benedictines to wrap a brother in extremity altogether in haircloth. For further particulars see VIATICUM, and for clinical penance generally PENITENCE, p. 1605.

9. For reconciliation of heretics, which was consummated sometimes by imposition of hands, sometimes by unction, sometimes by a profession of faith on the part of the returning heretic, see HERESY. [G. M.]

RECONCILIATION, OF A CHURCH POLLUTED. (Reconciliatio; Aperiō.) A church under a ban was said to be clausa. Certain passages of the Old Testament and Apocrypha doubtless served to quicken and guide the instinct of the church, when occasion unhappily arose, to the propriety and the need of doing something to free her sacred buildings from the pollution contracted. 2 Chron. xxix. (for instance) relates at great length how king Hezekiah "opened the doors of the house of the Lord," after they had been "shut" by the wicked Ahaz, and with what rites and sacrifices he "made reconciliation" (v. 24) upon the altar. The chief instance of reconciliation of the (second) temple took place after the pollution of it by Antiochus Epiphanes, all the details of which are given in full in 1 Macc. i. 4. And that which gives this ritual its abiding interest and influence is not only that the anniversary was soon after observed as the Feast of Dedication, but that it was kept by the Saviour Himself (St. John x. 22), even by Him who twice drove the buyers and sellers out of the temple, using the significant words, "make not My Father's house a house of merchandize."

The early part of the 4th century, which was an active time for church building, was also marked by the rise and spread of the Arian heresy, which, as it was aggressive in the employment of litanies, in a like spirit gained for the heretics the (temporary) possession of the sacred buildings. The pious horror entertained by the Catholics of any contact with heretics doubtless led them to institute and use some kind of rite suitable to the occasion when they recovered their own churches, though no early instance or form has come down to us. Nicephorus refers to the edict of Jovian by which the churches of God were again "opened." In the sacramentary of Gelasius, No. xciii., there is an office for dedicating a building hitherto used as a synagogue, "quod perditum fuerat ante latibulum, et quia infidelium turba in isto loco conveniebat adversa" (p. 617; ed. Murat.). "I would scarcely venture to affirm (says Gussanvillæus, the annotator on St. Gregory the Great) that the churches of the Catholics, after occupation by Arians and other heretics and restoration to the Catholics, were always dedicated by a fresh rite. But whatever took place in former times, Gregory certainly, a most experienced Ritualist, consecrated anew churches polluted by heretics."

And accordingly we find instances recorded in Gregory's writings. In a letter to Peter, a subdeacon of Campania (Epist. lib. iii. 19), he expresses his great anxiety to dedicate to the reverent worship of the Catholic religion places once given up to execrable error; e.g. a church in the third region in Rome, which the Arian superstition had for a long time retained, he now desired to consecrate in honour of St. Severinus, and in order to accomplish his purpose he asked for some relics of St. Severinus, &c. Again, in Dialog. iii. 30, he says, "The church of the Arians, in that region of the city called Suburra, as having been shut up (cf. 2 Chron. above) for two years, was to be dedicated afresh in the Catholic faith." And this was done. "We entered the church, with a great multitude of people, singing praises to Almighty God, and whilst the solemnities of the Mass were going on, and the crowd stood without the sacrarium, some of them felt a pig pressing in here and there, and it made its way to the gates—a proof (says Gregory) that from the same place was going out the unclean inhabitant of the place." He records sundry other "wonders" of the same kind.

The story receives illustration from Victor of Utica in his account of the persecution of the Vandals (lib. ii. 2, no. 6). "A presbyter saw the basilica of Faustus filled with crowds of people, and after a little while emptied and filled with a multitude of swine, a parable of its being given up to the Arians."

A very old MS. of the sacramentary of Gregory contains an office entitled "Reconciliatio Ecclesiae violatae" (p. 490; ed. Muratori).

Agapetus, bishop of Rome, is said to have purged by his catholic prayers the veils of the altar and of the see polluted by the sacrilegious fables of the (Eutychnian) Anthimus, patriarch of Constantinople (Goar, p. 618). Gratian (de Consecrat. Dist. I. c. 20 et seqq.) records the direction of pope John I., in the same century, to the bishops of Italy, saying it was what he had done himself at Constantinople for the sake of the Catholic religion and king Theodoric, the pious orthodox emperor Justin extirpating the Arians. Whatever churches we found in their parts, we consecrated, &c. (See Milman's Latin Christianity, bk. iii. cl. 3.)

Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, who died A.D. 806, had like work to do. Amongst the forms collected by Goar (Euchol. Graec.) is found "a prayer of Tarasius on the opening or reconciliation of a church profaned by the heretics" (p. 618). Other forms are given; e.g. "a prayer on the release, i.e. the reconciliation of a temple polluted by a heretic or by heathen, to be said before the vestibule of the church." "A prayer to be said by the bishop over the holy table where the heretics have celebrated." "A prayer to be said, before the customary one at the beginning of the Mass, on the reconciliation of a church in which it has happened that a man has met with a violent death."

Martene (tom. ii. lib. ii. cap. xv.) supplies several offices with special prayers from the pontifical of Egbert, from the book of Jumièges, &c.

Hospinian (de Orig. Templorum, lib. iv. p. 379, ed. Tiguri), according to his custom of disparagement, ridicules all ritual of this kind. And he refers with more approval to the case of a deacon of Nestorius, who had polluted a church at Constantinople, when Nestorius "did not use holy water or the like, but simply removed the deacon from his place and office." To inflict punishment on the offender is, he says, the right course. Of old, however, a different view was taken of such calamities. Socrates (Eccl. Hist. vii. 33) relates: "The slaves of a rich barbarian master, to escape his cruelty, fled to the church, and with drawn swords leaped on the altar. Of course the divine office could not go on. They threatened every one that came near, killed one, wounded another, and then killed themselves. One of those who were there said that the profanation of the temple foreboded no good. Nor was that saying false, for it portended the rupture of the people, and the deposition of him who caused it (i.e. Nestorius).” [H. B.]

RECTOR. (1) The word rector is used by Gregory the Great in the Regula Pastoralis as equivalent to pastor; and a priest is said to rule (regere) his people (Conc. Elib. c. 77). See PARISH, 3, iv. p. 1560.

(2) The leader of each side of an antiphonal choir is called rector chori, as in an ancient Sarum missal quoted by Martene, De Rit. Ant. i. 240.

(3) The pope is sometimes styled rector sanctae sedis (Macri Hierolex.). [C.]

REDEMPTION (Redemptio).—Commutation of ecclesiastical penance. The origin of the system is doubtless to be traced in the dispensing power vested in the hands of the bishop. This power existed from the very first. Indeed the later custom of assigning fixed sentences to particular sins was a development of a far earlier practice, which left the determination of the length of penance entirely in the hands of the bishop. But even after a code of penitential laws was established all authorities agreed in leaving to the bishop the power of relaxing or remitting a sentence. The bishop, declared the council of Ancyra (c. 5), shall be the judge of the sincerity of a penitent's contrition, and may either increase or diminish his period of exclusion. If the delinquent manifested his earnestness by fear and tears and patience, and good works, then, said the council of Nice (c. 12), the bishop may relieve him from passing step by step through his allotted stations. For further illustrations of the exercise of INDULGENCE see Basil, Ep. ad Amphil. cc. 2, 7, 54, 84; Greg. Nyss. Ep. ad Letoi., passim; 4 Conc. Carthag. c. 75; Conc. Andegav. c. 12; Innocent, Ep. i. 7; Leo, Ep. cxxix. 5. The object of this power of dispensation was not to exempt men from penance, but to excite them to perform it. It was natural and equitable that one who shewed earnestness in his repentance should not be debarred from the privileges of the church for so long a time as one who paid only a formal and perfunctory obedience to the letter of the law which had condemned him. And probably for the first five centuries the only means of redeeming penance were zeal and sincerity in the performance of it. After the 6th century there begin to be traces of a more corrupt dealing with the censures of the church. As the life of the penitential system died out penance came to consist more and more in outward acts alone; it lost its original notion of a censure and means of improvement, and came to be regarded solely as a punishment; sin was to be expiated by submission to certain penalties, regardless of the state of mind of the offender. To redeem penance was therefore to substitute one outward form for another. The delinquent was allowed to purchase a remission of lengthy acts of self-denial by undertaking others which were shorter and more laborious, or by voluntarily depriving himself of something valuable to him. The principle being once conceded, redemptions of penance would become general, and would be tolerated more leniently from the circumstance that they brought material profit to the church and her rulers. Moreover, in those parts of the church where the system prevailed, penance consisted almost exclusively of long fasts and abstinences, and it must frequently have happened that owing to sickness, or other circumstances, it would be impracticable to observe them, or from an accumulation of crimes their duration might be so extended that life would not be long enough for their completion. Some dispensing power would then be necessary to assign more expeditious modes of carrying out the sentence. The practice also among the Teutonic tribes of compounding for personal injuries by money payments would readily lead to a similar composition for infringements of the law of the church. Thus the system of the commutation of penance, which is altogether alien from the meaning and object of a spiritual censure, but which has the sanction of honoured names in early English church history, grew up. The power of granting or refusing such redemptions at first no doubt rested entirely with the bishop or priest; afterwards the penitent was allowed to choose for himself, and systematic scales of penitential values were drawn up. It has been customary to assume that the system originated in our own land with archbishop Theodore. Morinus (de Poenit. x. 17), however, had the sagacity to reject as spurious the chapter in his so-called penitential on which the assumption is based. Since the discovery of the true penitential it is clear that redemptions were permitted a century before Theodore's time. Wasserschleben (Die Bussord. pp. 136–140) has published fragmentary collections of Irish canons, all of very early date, and some containing decisions of synods over which St. Patrick presided. [PENITENTIAL BOOKS, p. 1609.] Among these “Canones Hibernenses” is one series which treats entirely “De arreis” (arrhis, pledges). It contains nine different redemptions of the penance of a year. In the preface to the penitential of Theodore is an acknowledgment by the unknown editor of the use in its compilation of a “libellus scotorum,” i.e. an Irish book, and it is highly probable that from these early Irish canons Theodore drew his reference to the practice of commutations. He did not himself originate the system; he found it existing, and gave it his sanction. “Item xii. triduana pro anno pen-sanda Teodorus laudavit. De aegris vero pretium viri vel ancillae pro anno” (Penitent. I. vii. 5). See ibid. I. iii. 3; I. iv. 1. Such a system as that by which a sinner was allowed to purchase himself free from the spiritual penalties attached to his sin was likely to be popular; and in the interval between the publication of the penitential of Theodore and that of Bede it grew with amazing rapidity. The latter treatise concluded with a chapter on commutations under twelve headings, out of which apparently the penitent was at liberty to select the easiest and most expeditious mode of performing his penance. He might choose almsgiving, or stripes, or psalm-singing, with genuflexions, and it is further provided (Baed. Poenitent. x. 8) that if he cannot learn psalms he may pick out some holy man to undertake for a consideration the penalty instead of him. The same system was tolerated by archbishop Egbert. Under the plea of a "consilium misericordiae" his Penitential (xiii. 11, xiv.-xvi.) lays before the delinquent an almost unlimited choice of redemptions. Nor was the corruption confined to these islands. The Frankish penitentials of Cummean (Wassersch. p. 463) is equally lenient in the remission of penance, and gives a long catalogue of the methods by which it can be redeemed. At a later date Regino of Prüm issued a table of commutations of penance, printed by Morinus (x. 16) from an unpublished MS. See also Capitula Herard. c. 26, Conc. Tribur. A.D. 895, c. 56; and illustrations cited by Ducange, s. v. "Poenitentia." At the close of the 9th century the abuse prevailed equally in Italy, Gaul, and Germany (Morin, x. 17), and the councils of the period do not appear to have made any serious efforts to check it. In England the synod of Cloveshoe (A.D. 747), under archbishop Cuthbert, published some strong but ineffectual protests. Alms, it declared (c. 26), were to be given, not for the purpose of diminishing canonical penance, but to appease the Divine wrath; similarly (c. 27), psalms were not to be sung, in order that abstinence and fasting might be omitted; still less might the rich employ their wealth to relieve them from the penalties of their sins. A century and a half later the council of Tribur. (cc. 56-58) attempted to regulate indiscriminate redemption by decreeing that the first year of penance, except for some urgent cause, should be rigidly performed; of the second and third, portions only might be commuted; or on the treatment of the remaining years there was no restriction.

The methods of redemption were various. Twenty-four "biduana," periods of two days' fasting, were equivalent to a year's penance (Baed. Pen. x. 2). Instead of one week of penance, 300 psalms said kneeling, or, if said without bending the knee, 324 (Cummean "de Modis Poenitentiae.") Fifty psalms with genuflections, or seventy without, might compound for one day's abstinence on bread and water (Egbert, Poen. xii. 11). Fifty psalms in winter had the same value as the whole psalter at another season (ibid. xv.). The penitent wishing to say fewer psalms must prostrate himself oftener and say the Miserere (ibid. xvi.), or he may obtain remission by getting a priest to say masses for him. The "Canones Hibernenses" attach other conditions to the saying of psalms; they should be said (c. 3) at the tomb of a saint, or (c. 4) while standing for three days in a church without food, or drink, or sleep. Another method of composition was scourging. Bede (Pen. x. 6) suffers the fourth year of a penalty to be redeemed by 300 lashes on the bare body. Egbert (Pen. xv.) assesses a day's penance at twelve strokes. In the Capitula Herardi (apud Morin. x. 16) the rod was to be applied during vigils. In Bede (x. 1-5) the psalm-singing was to be accompanied by so many "palmatae," which Ducange (s. v.) conjectures to mean not strokes of a rod, but prostrations, and with the palms of the hand extended on the ground. More general and more corrupt than any of the above redemptions was that of a money payment. Theodore (Pen. I. iii. 3) allowed a thief to escape part of his penance on making restitution, or (ibid. I. iv. 1) a murderer in a blood-feud by composition with the relatives of his victim. He also (ibid. I. vii. 5) gave the sanction of his authority to the manumission of slaves in lieu of penance. But he nowhere countenanced the bare and direct purchase of remission. In Bede's compilation the door was thrown open a little wider. In place of the fifth year of a long sentence large almsgiving would suffice, or if a penitent is ignorant of his psalms, he must give a denarius daily to the poor, in addition to fasting (Pen. x. 6). With Egbert redemption by money openly recognized. He who cannot perform his penance for the first year must distribute in alms twenty-six solidi, for the second twenty, &c. (Pen. xiii. 11); if he is a powerful man he must release so many slaves and captives. The Capitula of Regino draw up a regular scale. For seven weeks' penance a rich man must pay twenty solidi, or, if he cannot afford so much, ten, and a poor man three. The money was to be used either for the release of captives, or to be placed on the altar, or for the servants of God, or in alms to the poor. By Conc. Tribur. c. 56, the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday fasts might be redeemed by a denarius, or by the support of three poor people. At a later period the laws of Edgar (A.D. 967) (Howel, Dec. Ecol. Britt. p. 53) mention the building and endowing of churches, making bridges, and repairing the highways, as modes of commuting ecclesiastical censures. To these may be added, of a still later date, pilgrimages and war against the infidel. [G. M.]

REFECTORY. [MONASTERY, p. 1240.]

REGALE. By the right of regale we are to understand the claim on the part of the sovereign of a country to enjoy the incomes of vacant bishoprics, and to present pleno jure to all ecclesiastical places or benefices, except the ordinary parochial cures. And the right of the king to the episcopal income—according to the French lawyers—was not extinguished by the mere appointment of a new bishop, but continued until the newly-appointed bishop had taken the oath of allegiance in due form (Döllinger in Kirchen-Lexicon, s. v.). The full development of this claim belongs to mediæval and modern times; but so much as belongs to our period may be seen under VACANCY; BISHOP, p. 216 f; PRINCES, ALLEGIANCE TO. [C.]

REGENSE CONCILIIUM. [RIEZ.]

REGIAE, another form of "rugae." Mabillon (Mus. Ital. ii. p. cxxxvii.) draws a distinction between the two which is probably without foundation. [E. V.]

REGINA, ST., virgin and martyr, Sept. 7; commemorated at Autun (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Wandalb.; Boll. Acta SS. Sep. iii. 24). [C. H.]

REGIO. In the pagan history of Rome the word means a quarter, district, or ward of the city. In the time of Augustus, the city itself was divided into fourteen such wards.

The term was adopted by Christianity, and was made to serve the purposes of the church. The Ordo Romanus (ap. Ducange) observes that there were seven Regiones in the ecclesiastical division of Rome. But in the time of Gregory the Great there were fourteen Regiones (Morinus de Sacr.

Ord. iii. 8). Each had its regionary deacons, subdeacons, and acolytes. The regions took their turn by a regulated cycle in the pontifical ministrations of Easter week, each region being responsible for a day, and each region had its assigned precedence both in church and in procession.

In the collection of rubrics, taken from the Salzburg Pontifical, and headed de Gradibus Ecclesiae Romanae (Martene, I. viii. xi. Ordo 9), we find that at ordination there was a gathering of the regions—"fit enim conventus populi et congregatio regionum primum ad S. Adrianum."

The regions had officers, who were called patroni regionum (Martene, ibid.) The term existed as early as the time of Clement I.; for Publius Tarquinius, stirred with envy at the increase of the Christians, tried the influence of money with these officers to check its progress. "Vocavit ad se patronos regionum et data eis pecunia monuit ut seditionem excitarent nomini Christiano." (Hist. Clem. I.) The patroni however, in this case, may perhaps have been civil officers. [H. T. A.]

REGIONARIUS. The term is sometimes used absolutely and by itself as the name of an office (Greg. Mag. vii. i. Ep. 5), and sometimes as an epithet with other official titles, notarius, diaconus, subdiaconus, defensores. An example of this may be taken from the second council at Rome (A.D. 745), where the word occurs in this connexion: "Accipiens Theophanius notarius regionarius et sacellarius relegit. . . ." (Actio 1; Labbe, vi. 1557.)

Bona observes that the term is applied to the ostiarii and other ministers who served the pontiff when he was officiating in the several regions. (Rer. Liturg. I. xxv. 18.) He however gives no example of the term Regionarius being applied to bishops. [See BISHOP.] Nor has the present writer been able to find such an application in Martene, Thomassin, Morinus, Hofmann, Du Cange, or other authority on the subject.

The term Regionarius was looked upon as a title of honour. Gregory the Great decreed that as some of the notarii and subdeacons were appointed regionarii, so seven of the most eminent of the defensores should be decorated with the same distinction (honore regionario decorentur, lib. vii. Ep. 17). One of the seven defensores regionarii was assigned to every two of the fourteen regiones of the city.

The following passage is of interest, as shewing the application of the term to the order of subdeacons: "Subdiaconi sunt omnes numero viginti et unus, septem regionarii qui epistolas et lectiones cantant in stationibus: septem Palatini qui idem munus praestant in ecclesia Lateranensi: septem alii qui dicuntur schola cantorum, qui cantant tantummodo quando summus pontifex celebrare consuevit" (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. iii. 8).

The regionary deacons of St. Maria and St. Sylvester were put in charge of the hospitals of pope Stephen III., A.D. 752-757 (Anast. Vit. Pont. p. 165).

A classification of the inferior ministers (acolytes, exorcists, lectors, ostiarii) is made by cardinal Bona into (1) regionarii, who were distributed throughout the regions, and in them severally ministered to the pontiff; (2) stationarii, who performed the same office for him when celebrating in the stations; (3) basilicarii, who served by turns in the Lateran Church; (4) oblationarii, whose duty it was to receive the oblations and bring them to the archdeacon. (Rer. Lit. I. xxv. 18).

When the pope distributed the eucharist, he communicated the regionarii last of all, except his immediate ministers (acolyte, &c.). The order was first those who were in orders; then the aristocracy (magnates); then the ladies (matronae); then the regionarii; and lastly, his acolyte and servers (Martene de Eccl. Rit. i. iv. x. 4). From this passage it seems as if regionarii was applied to persons not in any orders at all; as if it meant, in fact, people of the regiones, or, as we should say, the parishioners. [H. T. A.]

REGULARES. Horizontal rods of wood or metal for the suspension of veils or curtains. They are usually mentioned in connexion with the "rugae," which appear to have been the lattice-work screens and doors separating the presbytery, the confessorio, or the sacrum from the other parts of the church. The "regulares" were often of precious metal, and were decorated with a row of images on the upper part. Stephen IV. (Anastas. § 284) made silver "regularis" above the "rugae," by which access was given to the altar, "ubi imagines in frontispicio constitutae sunt," at St. Peter's, St. Paul's, and St. Andrew's. Hadrian I. (ibid. § 330) set up a "regularis" cased with silver at St. Peter's, and placed upon it portrait-busts ("vultus") of our Lord between the archangels Michael and Gabriel. He also erected above the upper "ruga" in the middle of the presbytery another silver-cased "regularis," supporting similar portrait-busts of the blessed Virgin between St. Andrew and St. John Baptist, all six "vultus" being made of plates of silver-gilt (Mabillon, Mus. Ital. tom. ii. pp. viii. cxxx.). [E. V.]

REGULARS. [MONASTERY.]

REGULUS, bishop and confessor, Mar. 30, depositio commemorated at Senlis (Mart. Usuard.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 816). [C. H.]

REILIG, RELEC, RELIC, RELIG, Irish name for a cemetery. It is probably derived from the Latin reliquiae (e.g. Relic Odhrain, the monastic burying-place in Iona), yet is also applied to the pagan cemeteries like the Relig na Righ at Cruachan (Reeves, St. Adamnan, 203, 204, 283, 417, 452; Petrie, Round Towers, 103-7, 155-6). Todd (St. Patrick, 476) takes the word as equivalent to Reclies, which he defines "a sepulchral church," and Reeves (St. Adamnan, 276, cf. 283) "an abbey-church," as distinguished from the secular cathedral. [J. G.]

RELICS. I. Heathen Precedent.—The law of uncleanness (Num. xix. 11-22) preserved the Jews from any undue veneration of the relics of the dead; and their freedom from this superstition was inherited by the church, founded as it was by men of that nation, and at first largely composed of them. But the semi-converts of the 4th century and downwards brought with them a strong tendency to the worship of human relics and to a belief in their tutelary power.

This had been general among their heathen forefathers, whether Greek or Roman. If we refer to a few examples, the reader will be able to judge for himself in what degree the later practice of Christians sprang from, or was moulded by, heathen precedent. We may instance the reverence paid by Athens to the supposed relics of Oedipus (Vaierius Maximus, Exempl. Mem. v. 3, ext. 3), and of Theseus (Plutarch, Theseus, 36; compare Cimon, 8), by Thebes to those of Linus (Pausanias, Boeotic, 29), and by Alexandria to those of Alexander the Great (Aelian, Var. Hist. xii. 64; Suetonius, Augustus, 18). The bones of Zoroaster were the safeguard of Persia (Chron. Paschale, 67, ed. Dind.), while those of the first Perdiccas secured the kingdom to his descendants, so long as they should be buried by them (Justin, Hist. Philipp. vii. 2). An oracle declared that if the bones of Phalantus reduced to dust were scattered over the forum of Tarentum, the city would never be lost by the Partheniae (Justin, iii. 4). See the Aglaophamus of Lobeck, ii. 280.

The pomp that attended the translation of the relics of a martyr may in like manner be illustrated by the honours shewn to the remains of Demetrius (Plut. Demetr. 53), and Phocion (Id. Phocion, 37).

The heathen practice of delivering orations at the graves of heroes is mentioned by Cyril of Alexandria as a justification of the Christian rites over the remains of the martyrs (Contra Julian. x. 336, ed. Spanh.).

II. The earliest Treatment of Relics in the Church.—The first Christians regarded the bodies of their brethren as worthy of very reverent care, because they had been instruments by which God had wrought ("quibus tanquam organis et vasis ad omnia bona opera usus est Spiritus" (Aug. De Cura pro Mort. 5), and were destined to share in the future bliss and glory of the redeemed soul. It was for this reason far more congenial to Christian feeling to cover the remains of a friend with earth (OBSEQUES, § xv.), and leave them to the natural process of decay, than to dissipate them by fire, or give them to the birds and beasts. The feeling was of course greatly intensified, when one had proved his faith in the resurrection by a death of suffering. Great efforts were therefore often made to obtain the body of a martyr for honourable burial. At first, as we shall see, this was the only motive; but as time advanced, a superstitious value began to be set on the relics of martyrs and other eminent Christians. There is, however, no trace of the error to be found before the conversion of the emperors, under whom multitudes of proselytes entered the church, who had only partially renounced heathenism.

The best illustration of the purer sentiment is found in the earliest records of the martyrs, and especially in those contemporary Acts and Passions which were prepared by the notaries of the great churches for reading in the services on their anniversaries. A careful examination of such documents, as collected by Ruinart (Acta Martyrum, ed. Veron. 1731), clearly proves the complete freedom of the first Christians from the undue veneration of relics of whatever kind. For our purpose these Acta naturally divide themselves into three classes. (1) There are fifty-six documents that make no mention of the burial of the martyr or of any subsequent disposal of his relics. (2) There are thirty-two that mention or allude to the burial only; and (3) there are seventeen which speak of the relics as preserved for veneration or as a means of healing, or both. The first two classes range in subject from A.D. 61 or 62 (Martyrium S. Jacobi primi Hieros. Episc. Ruin. 5) to 365 (Passio S. Bademi in Persia, R. 532), and in authorship from Hegesippus A.D. 170 (R. 5, 6) to SS. Chrysostom and Augustine and Theodoret (R. 446, 496, 524). In the Acta of SS. Fructuosi, &c. (of the 2nd class), who died at Tarragona, A.D. 259, the friends are forbidden to keep any relics. The martyrs had been burnt, and at night the Christians went to the amphitheatre, "with wine wherewith to quench the half-burnt bodies, which done they appropriated, as each could, the ashes of the said martyrs which had been collected." But Fructuosus "appeared to the brethren and warned them that they should restore, without delay, what each had taken of the ashes, and see that they were buried together" (R. 193).

The earliest martyrdom in the third class is that of St. Symphorian at Autun (cir. 180), but the mention of Euphronius the bishop of Autun shews that the document cannot be earlier than about 470 (see Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 15). The next is that of St. Lawrence, A.D. 258; but the chronicler, or rather rhapsodist in this case, is the poet Prudentius (Hymn de Mart. S. L. See line 133 et seq.), who lived a century and a half later (R. 169). St. Eulalia, A.D. 304, is celebrated by the same writer (Hymn de Mart. S. Eul. See line 43; R. 399). Of St. Ferreolus, who died at Vienne 304, the later compiler of his Passion, says, "Sepulcrum sancti corporis ejus veneramur . . . ejus beneficia per civitates sicut expetuntur votis, ita beneficiis frequentibus approbantur" (R. 408). The graves of St. Vitalis and St. Agricola (d. 304) were opened in the presence of St. Ambrose, 393, who fully believed in the wonder-working power of relics. He calls those gathered by him "crucis tropaea, ejus gratiam in operibus agnoscitis" (Exhort. Virgin. 2; R. 410). The fervid panegyrics of Prudentius (Hymn. de SS. xviii. Mm. Caesararug.) are again our authority for the honour paid to the relics of the martyrs of Saragossa, 304, and St. Cassian of Imola, date uncertain (R. 411, 469). Of St. Domnina etc. of about the same date, St. Chrysostom some eighty years after, says, "Let us fall down before their remains; let us embrace their coffins; for the coffins of the martyrs can acquire great virtue" (De Bernice, &c., 7; R. 419). The martyrdom of Cyricus and Julitta (at Tarsus, 305) was written by Theodotus of Iconium more than 250 years later. Of another Julitta, who suffered at Caesarea in Cappadocia some time in the 4th century, St. Basil, about 370, says that the earth where she was buried sent forth a spring of water—"both a safeguard to those in health, and source of pleasure to those who enjoy it soberly, and a comfort to the sick" (Hom. in Mart. Jul. 2; R. 424). The same father says that the ashes of the Forty Martyrs of Sebaste in Armenia, A.D. 320, being thrown into a river, carried a blessing to all the neighbouring coasts, "Like towers closely set, they afford protection against the incursions of our enemies" (Hom. de SS. xl. Min. 8; R. 464; similarly Greg.

Nyss. Hom. i. in xl. Mm. ii. 935). St. Chrysostom again in his Laud. S. Drosidis (at Antioch, date unc.) asserts that the bones of the martyrs both drive away disease and put death to flight. They have "done the latter," he says, "in the time of our forefathers; the former in ours" (§ 4). "Where the bones of the martyrs are buried, the devils fly as from fire and intolerable punishment" (2). Passio S. Genesii (at Arles, date unc.): "The faithful servants of God at that time took care that the guardian power of this one martyr should be a defence to either bank of the river crowned with a double city (the Rhône flowing through it); for leaving the traces of his consecrated blood in the place itself of his blessed passion, they transferred his honoured remains to the other side of the river, that the holy Genesius might be present in both places, there by his blood, here by his body" (R. 474; written by Paulinus, A.D. 393, ad. calc. Epp. Opp. 316). Martyrium S. Juliani (a Cilician, date unc.): "Take one afflicted by a devil and mad, and lead him to the holy tomb, in which are the remains of the martyr, and you will see him quite starting and fleeing away . . . Now, after so long a time, when the body has become dust and ashes, they do not dare to look towards the tomb" (Chrys. Laudat. S. M. Juliani, § 2; R. 476). Encomium in S. M. Phocam (at Sinope, date unc.): "The relics divided among many places keep whole for the thrice blessed martyr the love of his name . . . The Romans worship Phocas no less than Peter and Paul. Whence, as they relate, they have with great pains procured the head of the martyr . . . to honour him, and for their own advantage" (Asterius Amas. A.D. 401, in Combefis. Auct. Gr. i. 493). Epistola Ecclesiae Gothicae de Martyrio S. Sabae (in Gotthia, 372): the remains were left unburied by the murderers, "sed a pui fratribus servatae sunt, easque clarissimus dix Scythiae Julius Soranus, Deum colens, missis viris fide dignis, e loco barbaro in Romaniam transtulit, et gratificari volens patriae suae pretiosum munus, fructum fidei gloriosum, misit in Cappadociam ad vestram religionem, ex voluntate presbyterorum" (R. 529). S. Vigili Tridentini Epistola ad S. Joan. Chrys. de Martyrio SS. Sisinnii, &c. (at Anagnia or Anaunia near Trent, 397) tells us that a nobleman "sanctorum recentium et vapore fumantium reliquias postulavit," which he took or sent to Constantinople (R. 535).

The necessary inference from the foregoing analysis is that the worship of relics, and the belief in them as remedies and a protection against evil, originated in the 4th century. They first appear in writings, none of which are earlier than the year 370; but they prevailed rapidly when they had once taken root. This was perhaps largely owing to the encouragement which they received, as we have seen, from some truly great men, as Ambrose and Augustine among the Latins, and Basil and Chrysostom in the East, who were evidently deceived by certain physical phenomena, the nature of which is ill understood even at the present day.

III. Multifarious Relics of Patriarchs, Prophets, Christ, the Apostles, and other Saints.—The bones of the saints of the Old Testament, long held unclean, became in the 4th century objects of great veneration. E.g. Paula and Eustochium, writing to Marcella in 386, suggest that when she visits the Holy Land they will "pray together in the mausoleum of David, . . . hasten to the tabernacles or memoriae of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, . . . go to Samaria, and together adore the ashes of John the Baptist, Elisha also, and Obadiah" (Epist. Hieron. xlvii. 12). St. Jerome, in 406, tells us that Arcadius translated "the bones of the blessed Samuel from Judaea into Thrace" (C. Vigilant. 5). Among the numberless relics collected with the aid of Charlemagne from all parts by Angilbert of Centule, A.D. 814, were the blood, hairs (also at Corbie, Acta Bened. iv. i. 376), and garments of John the Baptist, bones of his father Zacharias, memorials of Symeon, &c. (Scriptum S. Angilb. 14, 15; Bolland. Feb. iii. 103; or Acta Bened. IV. i. 114). Hair from the beard of Noah was shewn at Corbie in the same century (ibid. 377).

Alleged relics of our Lord were very numerous, and, it is to be feared, all, without exception, spurious. For the history of the cross see Vol. I. pp. 503-506. To the discovery of the cross by Helena, St. Ambrose in 395 adds that of the title written by Pilate, and of the nails, one or more of which she caused to be wrought into a bit for her son's horse (de Obiit. Theodos. 46, 47), a tradition known to St. Jerome (Comm. in Zach. xiv. 20), Cyril Alex. (Comm. in loc. eund.), Theodoret (Hist. Eccl. i. 18), Sozomen (H. E. ii. 1), Rufinus (H. E. i. 7), Gregory of Tours (Mirac. i. 6), and Cassiodorus (Hist. Trip. ii. 18). By the time of Gregory of Tours, 573, the holy spear (rediscovered in 1098, Guibert. Abb. Hist. Hieros. v. 19, vi. 7), the reed, the sponge, the crown of thorns, the seamless coat, and the pillar of scourging had all been supplied to the ignorant credulity of the age (Mirac. i. 6-8). The thorns were still green, or if they withered were daily restored to freshness "by divine power." Twists of bread made with water from the tomb were sent over the world, and healed many. The same virtue was ascribed to plaited thongs that had been wrapped round the pillar (ibid. 7, 8). The holy coat was kept in a chest in a very secret crypt in a basilica at Galathæa, a place mentioned by Gregory only, "quæ arca a devotis atque fidelibus cum summa diligentia adoratur" (8). Twenty-one "holy coats" were afterwards shewn, as at Trèves, Argenteuil, Rome, Bremen, &c. (See Gildemeister und von Sybel, Der heilige Rock zum Trier, und die zwanzig andern heiligen ungenähten Röcke, Düsseldorf, 1845). Angilbert (u.s.) believed that he had acquired parts of the cross, bonds, nails, and sponge, of our Lord's garments and sandals, of the table and bread of the Last Supper. He also possessed water taken from the place of His baptism. At Corbie, in a reliquary called the Prima St. Petri, said to have been given to the monastery by Charlemagne, were His blood and hairs, part of the umbilical cord, of the manger, cross, napkin, table, tomb, clothing, &c. (Acta Bened. iv. i. 375).

The chair of St. James, the first bishop of Jerusalem, was in all probability the only true relic of the apostolic age that was preserved to the 4th century. It is mentioned by Eusebius as treasured at Jerusalem in his time, "a clear proof of the veneration in which holy men were and are held" (H. E. vii. 19).

In the collection of Angilbert (u.s.) were many alleged relics of the blessed Virgin—drops of her milk, some hairs, shreds of her cloak and garment (these all with parts of her veil, &c. also at Corbie, Acta Bened. iv. i. 375), and a part of the manger (praesepe Mariae), which was in the same age said to be at Rome (Notitia Eccles. Urb. Rom. Alcuini, Opp. App. iii. 598). Abundance of her hair (reliquiae tantae capillorum) was said to have been brought from Jerusalem to Spain, and to be preserved at Astorga and Oviedo (Osmundi Epist. ad Idam, Mabill. Vet. Anal. 433, ed. 2). At Corbie were hairs and some of the ointment of Mary Magdalene (Acta Bened. iv. i. 376).

Part of the remains of St. Peter and St. Paul are now "in the Vatican church, another portion in the basilica of St. Paul; but their sacred heads are in the Lateran basilica" (Ruinart ad Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 28). The bodies of SS. Andrew, Luke, and Timothy were at Constantinople (Hieron. C. Vigil. 5). Relics of St. Andrew were also preserved at Neuvy, near Tours (G. T. Mir. i. 31). The chains of St. Paul were early said to be at Rome (Chrysost. Hom. viii. in Ep. ad Eph. 2; Greg. M. Ep. iii. 30, xi. 49). Part of a table belonging to him was in the collection of Angilbert (u.s.). Hairs of St. Paul were sent by pope John, 557, to a bishop of Vienne (Hard. Conc. iii. 342). The chains of St. Peter appeared at Rome much later than those of St. Paul, not in fact till very special claims were made for Rome on his account. If I mistake not, Gregory I. is the first to mention them. He sent to Childbert, in 595, "keys of Peter" (Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 29; see § vi. sub fin.) and some filings from his chains (Epist. v. 6; comp. ii. 33; iii. 3). So in 741 Charles received from Gregory III. the "keys of the venerable sepulchre, with the chains of St. Peter" (Fredegar. Chron. ad an.). The importance of this possession to Rome in that age may be easily understood:

"His solidata fides, his est tibi, Roma, catenis."

Alcuin, Carm. 169.

A nail from the cross of St. Peter was sent by Gregory of Rome to Secundinus, a recluse (Hard. Conc. iii. 503). At Centule (and Corbie, Acta Bened. u.s.) were hairs from the beard of St. Peter, parts of his casula, his sandals and table (Script. Angilb. u.s.); at Corbie parts of his ribs, of his cross, and dust from his tomb (Acta Bened. u.s.). The relics of the other apostles were in similar request, and were generally of the same character.

The relics of St. Stephen the proto-martyr deserve especial mention. In 415 the site of his body and of those of Nicodemus and Gamaliel was, according to one legend, revealed to a priest named Lucian. They were at a place called Caphargamala (i.e. Villa Gamalielis), near Jerusalem (Lucian de Rev. Corp. Steph. 2-3, in Opp. Aug. App. vi. ed. Ben.), to which city that of St. Stephen was removed, except some small joints and the earth into which the flesh was resolved (ibid. 8). Nevertheless another story, translated from the Greek by Anastasius Bibliothecarius in the 9th century, affirms that it was at Jerusalem in the time of the emperor Constantine (died 337) and Cyril of Jerusalem (who, however, were not contemporaries), and was by their joint action removed to Byzantium (de Transl. S. Steph. ibid.). A third document tells us of relics of Stephen brought from Jerusalem to Minorca soon after their discovery, and there working miracles, by which many Jews were converted (Ep. Severi de Conv. Jud. ibid.); while two books de Miraculis S. Stephani, said to be written at the instance of Evodius, bishop of Uzalis, in Africa, the friend of Augustine, record many alleged miracles wrought in that city by relics of St. Stephen sent thither "from the parts of the East" (i. 1). Several miracles, alleged to have been wrought at Uzalis and some neighbouring places by the same relics, were believed by St. Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xxii. 8, §§ 10-21). In the 6th century some blood of St. Stephen is found in the altar of a church at Bordeaux (Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 34). But far more singular relics were some drops of sea-water, preserved by the bishop of that city, which had fallen from his robes when he was seen in a vision after succouring a ship in distress, and some threads of a cloth with which the water had been wiped from the deck (ibid.). Angilbert (u.s.) possessed one of the proto-martyr's ribs, and one of the stones with which he was slain.

Among the numberless miscellaneous relics valued within our period, we may mention bars of the gridiron of St. Lawrence (Angilb. u.s.), the under-pall of St. Radegund, which, dipped in water, gave it the power to heal fevers (Vita, Baud. 32), the straw on which St. Germanus had lain (Vita, Venant. 46), a thread from the shirt of St. Lubin (Vita, Venant. 20), a shoe that fell from the foot of Epipodius when he was led to martyrdom (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. 54), cords from a bed (ibid. 85), &c. Dust from almost any shrine was believed to have healing power. By this means St. Hilary cured leprosy (Vita, ii. 4); St. Rigobert, the ague (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 14); St. Thaumastus, a French bishop, toothache and fever (Greg. Tur. u.s. 53; see also Mir. ii. 45); the woman who had treasured the shoe of St. Epipodius, ague (ib. 54); &c. Earth from Jerusalem was in equal request, and that early in the 5th century. See St. Augustine, de Civ. Dei, xxii.-xxviii. 6; Ep. 52, ad Severin. § 2. So the soil which had drunk the blood of the martyrs under Sapor II., A.D. 375, was "dug up and carried away, and preserved by the Christians as useful to heal the sick" (S. J. Assem. Acta SS. Mm. Or. et Occ. i. 162); and in the West the same thing is told of the earth on which Stratonic and Seleucus had last trodden (ibid. ii. 119), and of sand from the spot on which others had suffered (Ardis Vita, 6). Laurel leaves found in a tomb (Greg. Tur. Glor. Conf. 84), and flowers from a miraculous tree before the tomb of St. Eulalia (Glor. Mart. i. 91) were preserved for the same purpose.

The "holy grail" first appeared when Caesarea was taken by the Crusaders in 1101 (William of Tyre, Hist. Rev. Transm. x. 16), if it be correctly identified with the vessel (of green glass?) found there, but not at first deemed a sacred relic.

Long lists of relics in ancient churches at Rome and elsewhere are printed by Mai, in Script. Vet. Nova Collectio, v. i. 37-52. Perhaps the longest extant, enumerating nearly 400 articles, occurs in the Relatio de Orig. Monast. Windberg. given by Basnage, Thesaur. Monum. III. ii. 214.

IV. Spurious Relics.—St. Augustine, denouncing certain wandering impostors in the habit of monks, says: "Some of them have for sale the members of martyrs, if they were martyrs" (de Op. Monach. xxviii. 36; comp. Isidore de Div. Off. ii. 15). Fraud was, therefore, already practised by the beginning of the 5th century. Gregory I. near the end of the 6th, writing to the Augusta Constantina, declares that some Greek monks had been detected exhuming bones near the church of St. Paul in Rome, who, being closely questioned, "confessed that they had intended to carry those bones to Greece as the relics of saints" (Epist. iii. 30). About 587 an impostor appeared at Tours and Paris, professing to come from Spain with relics of St. Vincent and St. Felix. Having told the story, the historian adds: "Multi enim sunt qui has seductiones exerceutes populum rusticum in errorem ponere non desistant" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 6); and this notwithstanding the stories of divine chastisement which were circulated. For example, one who exhibited for gain a pretended bone of St. Godehard, was seized with delirium and died (Transl. S. God. 46, Acta Bened. VI. ii. 390).

Such frauds were less frequently exposed in the ages that followed, many bishops unhappily thinking that it would be inexpedient to undeceive the people; e.g. a man, who had under various names sold false relics in France, went into Switzerland, and there having, "more solito, collected by night from some vile place the bones of an unknown person, and placed them in a box on a bier, declared that he had been revealed to him by angelic information, and pretended that he was a martyr named Justus." The ignorant were deceived, miracles were said to follow, and at length the body was brought to be placed in a newly-erected church at Sus in the Engadine. Our informant was present at the consecration, and by questioning the man easily detected the imposture. Nevertheless the service proceeded, and the false relics had their part in it (see after, § xiii.). As in later times with the impostures of La Salette, Lourdes, &c. the educated and thoughtful were shocked and scandalized, but the multitude "remained in its error injusti nomen pro Justo venerans" (Glaber Rodolph. Hist. iv. 3).

We must not, however, attribute all false relics to the action of deliberate fraud. The ignorant were always disposed to regard any human remains accidentally discovered as those of a martyr, especially if found in or near a church. An altar had been reared in a certain place in the diocese of Tours on the strength of a popular tradition that a martyr had been buried there. St. Martin, A.D. 375, doubting the fact, "standing on the tomb itself, prayed to God that he would shew who, and of what merit, the person there buried was. Then, turning to the left, he saw standing near him an ill-conditioned, fierce-looking shade. He orders it to declare its name and character. It tells its name, and, touching its crime, confesses that it was a robber" &c. (Sulpic. Sever. Vita B. Mart. 8). Augustine of Canterbury found some persons, probably in France, "worshipping" a body, which they supposed to be that of St. Sixtus. He wrote to Rome, asking Gregory for some genuine relics of the martyr, who, granting his request, gave him this direction: "The relics which you have asked for are to be buried by themselves, that the place in which the aforesaid body lies may be altogether closed up, and the people not suffered to desert the certain and worship the uncertain" (Greg. M. Epist. xii. 31).

V. The Trial of Relics.—Doubtful relics were often put to a deliberate test. We first hear of this in Spain, the council of Saragossa in 592 making a decree that the relics in use where the Arian heresy had prevailed should be "brought by the priests in whose churches they were found, and, being presented to the bishops, should be tried by fire" (can. 2). Actual instances of such ordeal at that period are not, so far as I am aware, on extant record; but we meet with several later on. E.g. Egbert of Trier finding what was supposed to be the body of St. Celsus, "lest any suspicion of the sanctity of the holy relics should arise, during Mass, after the offertory had been sung, threw a joint of the finger of St. Celsus, wrapped in a cloth, into a thurible full of burning coals, which remained unharmed and untouched by the fire through the whole time of the canon" (Annal. Bened. iii. 658, ad an. 979, n. 91). Similarly when a monk brought from Jerusalem to Monte Cassino a piece of linen (more probably cloth of asbestos), alleged to be part of the cloth with which our Lord wiped the feet of the disciples at the Last Supper, it was also put into a censer containing fire. "Mox quidem in ignis colorem conversa post paululum vero amotis carbonibus ad pristinam speciem mirabiliter est reversa" (Leo Marisc. Chron. Cass. ii. 33; Acta Bened. s. vi. i. 101). The relics of St. Rotrudis stood the same test (Chron. Andriensis Monast. in Spicil. Dacher. ii. 78, ed. 2), which was applied also to the bones of king Wistan (Vita Wist. 5, in Boll. June 1; i. 87); and other instances might be given.

Ruinart has printed, from a MS. preserved in Rheims, a form of prayer to be used at the trial of relics (App. ad Opp. Greg. Tur. 1366), which Mabillon has reprinted in App. 2 to the Epist. de Cultu SS. Ignotorum, written by him under the name of Eusebius Romanus. It is also given from two Rheims MSS. by Martene, Ant. Eccl. Rit. iii. 8. We observe, however, that the relics referred to in the prayer are only portions of the saint's dress, "pannus iste, vel filum istud," a circumstance that suggests suspicion. It would require no great adroitness to appear to reproduce a burnt shred of cloth.

VI. Translation of Relics.—For some centuries there was an unwillingness to meddle with the bodies of the saints when once buried, arising at first from a proper feeling, but later on from a superstitious fear. A disciple of Simeon Stylites, desiring a relic of his master, thought he saw the body stir, and desisted in alarm (Antonius in Vita S. Sim. 16). This wholesome shrinking was first forgotten in the East (see the next paragraph of this section), but it remained so long a tradition of the western church that Gregory of Rome could say in 593, "De Graecorum consuetudine, qui ossa levare sanctorum se asserunt, vehementer miramur, et vix credimus" (Epist. iii. 30). He declared, though not quite truly, as we shall see: "In Romanis vel totius Occidentis partibus omnino intolerabile est atque sacrilegum, si sanctorum corpora tangere quisquam fortasse voluerit" (ibid.). Many stories are related of the danger thus incurred. Even down to the latter part of the 6th century (hodieque) there was "so great a fear" of meddling with the tomb of St. Cassian that "no one at all had dared to touch anything belonging to him. If any one did so, he was either seized by a demon or destroyed by a sudden death" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. 43). When the tomb of Agricola or Vitalis was opened by one who "desired to take therefrom some of the sacred ashes," the offender was caught by the stone falling on him, and with difficulty released (ib. 44). A soldier who rescued some relics of St. Andrew from a fire was seized with cramp at the door of the church, whereupon he put the casket round the neck of an unpolluted child, one of his prisoners, and so "arrived safely in his own country" (Id. Mir. i. 30). When the Manichaeans destroyed a fig-tree which had a healing power from growing on the spot where St. Narses had suffered (A.D. 341), they were punished by a plague (Assem. Acta SS. MM. iv. 101). When Constantina begged of Gregory I. some relics of St. Paul, he assured her that "the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul blazed in their churches with miraculous terrors, so great that it was not possible to draw nigh thither even for prayer without great fear." He affirms that when his predecessor wished to change the silver covering over the body of St. Peter, "signum ei non parvi terroris apparuit;" and that when he himself wished to make some improvement about the tomb of St. Paul, the person who ordered the removal of some other bones found near it, "apparentibus quibusdam tristibus signis, subita morte defunctus est;" and again, that when the tomb of St. Lawrence was accidentally opened, all present died within ten days (Epist. iii. 30). Clovis was struck with madness because he attempted to carry off a bone of St. Denys (Gesta Dagoberti, i. 2; in Duchesne, Hist. Franc. Script. i. 589, comp. Gesta Reg. Fr. 44, ibid. 717). See also Vita S. Gudwali, vii. 72, in Bolland. June 6; i. 747; de Ceratio Ep. 5, ib. 709; Illustr. Claud. iv. 44, ib. June 6, i. 678; &c.

Constantine was the first who ventured to move the bodies of saints, contrary to the spirit of the ante-Nicene church:

"Constantino primum sub Caesare factum est."

Paulin. Poem. xix. 321.

To gain for his new city a prestige similar to that conferred on old Rome by the remains of St. Peter and St. Paul, he transferred thither "the holy relics of Andrew, Luke, and Timothy" (Hieron. c. Vigil. 5; Procop. de Aedificiis, i. 4; Theodorus Lector, Hist. Eccles. ii. 61). A later law of Theodosius expressly forbade such translations to the subject: "Humatum corpus nemo ad alterum locum transferat, nemo martyrem distrahat" (Codex, ix. 17, § 7). Gregory I. (as we have seen) denied that it was ever lawful to disturb them. In France, however, the rule had long been relaxed. The council of Epaone, in 517, contented itself with forbidding "the relics of saints to be placed in oratories attached to villas, unless it so happened that the clergy of some parish were near to serve (qui famularentur) the sacred ashes with frequent psalm-singing" (can. 25). Under Charlemagne the old Gallican liberty was restrained, through Roman influence, as we cannot doubt, by the council of Metz, A.D. 813, which decreed that no one should presume to transport the bodies of the saints from place to place without the sanction of the prince or of the bishops, and the licence of the holy synod (can. 51). Hence, generally only keys, BRANDEA, &c. were taken from the tomb of a martyr, even when a relic was required for the consecration of a church. If bodies were removed at all, it was only that they might be buried again in a more fitting place. This is shewn at length by Mabillon in Praef. Act. Bened. saec. ii. n. 42. The instances of Stephen, Gervasius, &c. (see also Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 51, 56, 63; de Glor. Conf. 72, 80) must therefore be regarded as exceptions. See other exceptions in the translations of SS. Marculus, Quintinus, Audoenus, Leodegarius, Etheldrida, and Cuthbert (Acta Bened. from A.D. 558 to 667). At length, however, the tide had turned so completely that credulity was not overtaxed by the story of men struck with blindness because they attempted to hinder even a clandestine translation (De SS. Gratiano et Felice, Boll. June 1, i. 24).

VII. Acquisition of Relics.—One great temptation to the production of false relics was the eagerness with which everything under the name of a relic was purchased. The sale of them was forbidden by Theodosius ("Humatum corpus . . . nemo mercetur, Codex, ix. 17, § 7); but apparently with little effect in the more distant provinces. A story told of an abbat of Bourges in the 6th century implies that it was common in France at that period (Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 90). Q. Radegund procured a multitude of relics from all parts of the world "tam muneribus quam precibus" (Baudonivia, Vita S. Rad. 14). It was even considered a good deed to steal relics, because a proof of devotion: e. g. a German bishop, named Othwin, carried off by night from Pavia the relics of St. Epiphanius and St. Speciosa. He had scruples at first, "presumptionis ducebat," but a German presbyter "divinitus" overruled his objections (Vita Epiph. 3; Pertz, Mon. Alem. vi. 229). A French priest stole some relics of St. Helen from a church at Rome. They performed many miracles on the road to France, and were received with great honour (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. ii. 8). The tomb of St. Benedict had been neglected, and its very site forgotten, but when the passion for relics became strong, a "learned presbyter" went from France to Italy to search for the body. Having with some difficulty found it, he carried it off surreptitiously, together with that of Scholastica, his sister, who had been buried in the same tomb. Miracles occurred at once. The fine linen in which the remains were wrapped became red with blood, and every natural obstacle to the priest's return yielded at once to supernatural power, until they were safely deposited at Fleury (de Transl. Corp. S. Bened. in Gall. in Mabill. Anal. Vet. 211, ed. 2). There are some instances, however, in which the theft is disallowed; but these belong to an earlier period, or the circumstances were different. E. g. Gregory of Tours in the 6th century has a story of relics stolen, with a view to their being sold; but the result marked the disapprobation of Heaven (de Glor. Mart. 90). A bishop of Verdun, present at the opening of the shrine of St. Matthias at Trèves, attempted to steal a relic; but the lid fell suddenly, and he lost the end of his cope, which had been caught by it (Invent. Corp. S. Matthi. i. 4; Boll. Feb. iii. 449). In the old Calendar first published by Bucherius at the entry, “VI. idus Jul. Depos. Silani,” we find the following curious note, “Hunc Silanum Martyrem Novati (Novatiani) furati sunt.”

After the 6th century it was common to send to Rome for relics for the consecration of a new church, if none could be found at hand, and the request was generally answered by the gift of a brandeum, palliolum, or velamen, that had been held over the relics of St. Peter and St. Paul. Forms of letter to accompany such gifts are provided in the Liber Diurnus of the Roman Pontiffs: “Benedictiones de sanctuariis Apostolicis, id est palliola de eorum confessionibus, tradidimus collocanda (in ecclesia)” (v. 12; see tit. 15). Again: “Scias sanctuaria noviter missa. Sanctuaria vero suscepta sua cum reverentia collocabis” (17). A supplement to the Liber Diurnus gives a form in which the pope, intending himself to consecrate a church, demands of a bishop relics of the saint to whom it was to be dedicated: “Levatas reliquias contradere non omittas; ut ad nos . . . quantocius valeant reportari” (Mus. Ital. i. 35).

VIII. Receptacles of Relics.—These were called CAPSA (originally the coffin for the whole body) (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 5), which later was “capsa major” (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. iii. 5); capsula (G. T. u. s. x. 31, § 19; Vita S. Aridii, 29, &c.); capsella (Suggest. Legat. inter Epp. Hormisdæ ad calc. Ep. 65; De Mirac. S. Steph. i. 8 in Ap. vi. ad Opp. S. Aug. ed. Ben.); capis (Translatio S. Mennatis, in Martene et Durand. Ampliss. Collect. vi. 983; Mirac. S. Gibrani, i. 5, Bolland. Maii, vii. 633, &c.); arca (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. x. 15, Mir. i. 8; Conc. Braear. A.D. 675, can. 6, “arca Dei cum reliquiis”), θήκη, theca (Sozom. Hist. Eccl. ix. 2; where = σώπος; Theodoret in Ps. lxxvii. 12; Testam. Perpetui, Turon. Greg. T. Opp. 1318); scrinium (whence shrine, screen), scriniolum, Actus Pontif. Cenoman. 24, in Mabill. Analecta Vet. 300, ed. 2; Chron. Cassin. iii. 57, &c. but I doubt if within our period; chrismarium (Vita Aridii, 6, 35, 36; Greg. Tur. de Mir. S. Mart. iv. 32); sanctuarium, at first the reliquary, but afterwards less properly the relic (Greg. M. Ep. v. 45; Conc. Meld. 845, can. 39; Mus. Ital. ii. 152, &c.); turris (Chron. Cassin. iii. 30), probably because this was a common name of the eucharistic pyx; pixidula (ibid.), &c. Relics were often incased in crosses (Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 11; Testam. Perpet. u. s. &c.). [RELICUARY.]

IX. Relics carried about the Person.—The Council of Braga, 675, condemns the vainglory of some bishops, who in their progress to church on the festivals of martyrs were wont to “put their relics on their necks, . . . as if they were the ark holding the relics, the Levites (deacons) in albes carrying them on litters.” For the future, either the Levites were to carry “the ark of God with the relics,” or the bishop might carry it himself walking in the procession (can. 6). The objection here, however, was that this practice ministered to the pride of the bishop. For it had long been the custom to carry relics about the person, and the practice continued; e. g. the leader of a party of Indian monks (perhaps about A.D. 380) wore a “scrip of hair-cloth, filled with the relics of certain holy fathers” (Joan. Damasc. Vita Barlaam, c. 22). Germanus of Auxerre, A.D. 420, when a blind child was brought to him, “took in his hands the little case (capsulam) with the relics of saints hanging by his side, and, tearing it off his neck, applied it to the eyes of the girl in the sight of all” (Constant. Vita S. Germ. i. 24). Aridius, about 580, wore relics about his own neck (Vita, 29), and hung dust from the tomb of St. Martin in a little case on that of Gregory of Tours (G. T. Hist. Fr. viii. 15; see also de Glor. Mart. i. 84). St. Willehad of Bremen “had a case with holy relics about his neck” (Anschar. in Vita Will. in Acta Bened. s. iii. P. 2, p. 406). St. Gall wore one with relics of the blessed Virgin (Walafr. Strabo in Vita S. Gall. 11). This was, however, probably always so far uncommon that the wearer of relics was supposed thereby to profess peculiar sanctity. Thus, in a particular case, “Capsulari honore, quo reliquias inclusas collo gestabat, cognoverunt Dei esse famulum et cultorem” (Vita S. Amatoris, c. iv. § 25; Boll. May 1, i. 57). [RELICUARY.]

X. Oaths taken over Relics.—This was common at one time both in the East and West. Cyril of Scythopolita relates the story of one who, having denied a trust, was required to take an oath over the relics of Euthymius. His perjury was punished by a scourging in a vision and death (Vita S. Euth. 155). In the West we read of oaths over the tombs or relics of SS. Denys (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 33), Martin (ib. v. 49), Genesius (de Glor. Mart. 74), Maximin (de Glor. Conf. 93), Julian (de Mir. ii. 19, 39), &c. See Car. M. Capit. i. an. 7, 89 n. 62. A law of Childeric, 744 (Capit. Reg. Fr. i. 154), renewed by Charlemagne (Capit. iv. an. 803, c. 10; Capit. R. F. vi. 214), decreed that “every oath be sworn in a church or over relics.”

But the laws of the Franks took cognisance of such oaths more than a century before Childeric. Dagobert in 630 prescribes the ceremonial. When the oath is taken, the accused and his compurgators shall “put their hands on the capsula, and he only whose case is being examined shall say the words, putting his hand on the hands of all the rest, that so may God help him and those relics under the hands which he holds, that he may not incur guilt in the matter for which he is questioned” (Lex Alam. vi. 7, Cap. Reg. Fr. i. 60). Hence, in the laws the accused is said to touch the relics “manu quinta,” “sexta,” &c. according to the number of his compurgators (Baluze, Notæ in Marculfum in Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 924); e. g. among the Formulae collected by Marculfus is an order that one accused of receiving a fugitive slave shall repair on a given day to the royal palace and clear himself, “sua manu septima . . . super capella (= capsella) Domni Martini” (i. 38). Formulae used on these occasions were: “By this holy place and all the divine relics (patrocinia) of the saints who rest here” (Vet. Form. Andegav. 49, in Mabill. Anal. Vet. 396, ed. 2); “By this holy place and the relics of the blessed martyrs” (Greg. T. Hist. Franc. iv. 47).

Egbert of York, A.D. 732, imposed a penance of seven years on those who took a false oath “in a church, or on the gospel, or on the relics of the saints" (de Remed. Pecc. 9; see Rabanus Maurus, Ep. ad Horiban. 18); or bound them, as in another code (Poenitentialia, i. 34), "to fast four winters." By a law of Charlemagne a false oath over relics was to be punished by the loss of a hand, or heavy fine (Capit. 3, an. 813, n. 30). Gregory III., A.D. 731, declares that the penance for perjury "in altare ubi reliquiae habentur" was, according to ancient law, to last seven years. The penalty was the same when one led a person to commit such perjury in ignorance (Judicia, vii.; Hard. Conc. iii. 1872). Stories of divine vengeance were also current, as of sudden blindness or palsy inflicted on the perjurer (Vita Meinwerchi, ix. 63; in Boll. June 5, i. 533).

XI. Relics under the Altar.—It became the custom at a very early period to build altars over the body of martyrs, or close to the place of their passion. [MEMORIA, MARTYRIUM.] The Council of Carthage, 401, ordered that all altars raised "per agros aut vias, tanquam memoriae martyrum" should be destroyed, unless relics of martyrs were really buried there (can. 7). It was natural, therefore, that when the remains of a saint were removed to a church they should be put under the altar. Thus, of the earliest translation on record we read: "Andrew, Timothy, and Luke the evangelist rest [at C. P.] under one altar" (Hodoepor. Willib. di. Basnage, Thes. Mon. Eccl. 114). St. Jerome, addressing Vigilantius, says that the bishop of Rome "offers sacrifice to the Lord over the remains of the dead men Peter and Paul . . . and considers their tombs the altars of Christ (C. Vig. 9). St. Ambrose, 386: "Ille super altare, qui pro omnibus passus est; isti sub altare, qui illius redempti sunt passione" (Epist. 22, ad Sor. 13). Of the relics of some other martyrs the same father says in 393: "Quae nunc sub altarihus reconduntur" (Exhort. Virgin. ii. 10); comp. Paulinus, Poëm. xxvii. 411). The body of St. Vincent was removed not long after his martyrdom from the "little basilica" in which it was first buried and laid "sub sacro altari" in a more important church (Passio S. V. 12, Ruinart, 329; comp. Prud. de Cor. v. 131). Similarly we read of an altar at Merida, "quo sancta membra (Eulaliae) teguntur" (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. i. 91; comp. Prud. u.s. iii. 211). Symeon of Thessalonica explains at length "why the relics of the martyrs are put under the altar" (De Sacro Templo, 116).

XII. Relics in the Altar.—Sometimes the body or other relic of a saint is said to be placed in the altar, i.e. under the slab or mensa, but not in the ground below the base (see Vol. I. pp. 64, 65). Thus, of certain alleged relics of St. Andrew we read: "Collocatis in altari Novicensis ecclesiae" (Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 31). So "in aliis basilicarum altarihus" (Vitae PP. viii. 8). See also de Mir. S. Jul. 40; Mir. i. 52; Vita S. Wilfridi (Eadmer), viii. 66.

XIII. Relics in the Consecration of a Church or Altar.—Relics were sometimes buried at the dedication of a church so early as the latter part of the 4th century. When St. Ambrose dedicated the Church of the Apostles near the Porta Romana at Milan, he translated thither the body of St. Nazarius, certain "relics of the holy apostles having been previously deposited there with the greatest devotion on the part of all"

(Vita Ambr. Paul. auct. 33). When, some time after, he had dedicated the Ambrosian basilica without relics, the people begged him to do as he had done before. Having found relics, he complied with their wish (Ep. 22 ad Marcell. 13). In this and a third instance (Exhort. Virg. ii. 10) the relics are said to have been placed under the altar. Paulinus, A.D. 393, frequently recognizes the rite. His church at Nola, "reliquiis Apostolorum intra apsidem trichoram sub altaria sacratis, non solo beati Felicis honore venerabilis est" (Ep. 32, ad Sev. 12). Of the little church being built at Fundi he says: "Hanc quoque basiliculam de benedictis apostolorum et martyrum reliquiis sacri cineres in nomine Christi . . . consecrabunt" (§ 17). He recommends Severus to obtain relics for the dedication of his church, and sends him verses referring to the rite:

"Divinum veneranda tegunt altaria foedus, Compositis sacra cum cruce martyribus."
(Ibid. § 7.)

Gaudentius of Brescia, A.D. 387, having, when on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, received at Caesarea some relics of the Forty Martyrs from the nieces of St. Basil, their original possessor, employed them many years after with other relics in the dedication of his church. In his sermon on the occasion, which is extant, he says: "Venerabiles Martyrum Quadraginta reliquias populis credentibus hodie proponimus percolendas" (Vet. Briz. Episc. Opusc. p. 341, Brix. 1738). "Habemus ergo et hos xl. et praedictos x. sanctos, ex diversis terrarum partibus congregatos, unde hanc ipsam basilicam eorum meritis dedicatam Concilium Sanctorum nuncupari oportere decernimus" (345). See an instance in Gregory of Tours, Mir. ii. 50.

In the 6th century relics were in France already thought so necessary to the consecration of a church, that in old churches not so dedicated the omission was often supplied, as in the church at Neuvy, "ubi nulla adhuc sanctorum pignora habebantur" (Greg. Tur. Mir. i. 31), and of another at Préigni till then "absque sanctorum pignoribus" (Vitae PP. viii. 11). The same practice prevailed in the East; e.g. when, in the 6th century, a church was dedicated over the tomb of Euthymius, the archbishop "deposited under the altar certain portions of the relics of martyrs" (Euthymii Vita, 122, in Cotel. Monum. Gr. ii. 305). The council of Nicaea, 787, ordered relics to be put in every church that had been consecrated without them, and deposed bishops who should in future so consecrate them (can. 7). The Liber Diurnus of the bishops of Rome in the 8th century provides a form of licence for the removal of relics from a church in ruins to a new one (v. 18). Among the Greeks Symeon of Thessalonica writes a whole chapter to explain "why the relics are carried from an old church to a new" (De S. Templo, 117).

Any relic, however trifling, might be used at consecrations. The most common were BRANDEA or the like. In one case a vessel is mentioned in which water had been turned into balsam (Greg. Tur. de Mir. S. Jul. 40). Shreds of a pall or dress were common (ibid. 34). The ceremony is described at length by Remigius of Auxerre (De Dedic. Eccl. 9), and several orders are extant; as in the Pontifical of Egbert (ed. Surtees Society, 46), the Jumièges Pontifical, also English (Martene, ii. 254), and that of Dunstan (257). See also the Ordo Romanus in Blanchini's collection of documents (Vitæ Pontif. Rom. auct. Anastas. Bibl. Proleg. iii. xlviii.), and later books in Martene, u. s. pp. 267, 270, 274, 290.

At a later period relics were also used at the reconciliation of a church. See the Orders, Martene, u. s. iii. 286; iv. ib.; v. 287. Heathen temples, again, were purified for Christian worship by means of relics. Thus at Antioch one was dedicated by the bones of St. Ignatius (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. i. 16). Gregory I. ordered them to be converted into churches by aspersion with holy water, the erection of an altar, and the deposition of relics (Ep. ad Mellitum in Bede, Hist. i. 30).

The part of the altar, &c., in which they were placed was called the SEPULCRUM, CONFESSIO, or locus (Greg. Tur. Mirac. i. 34). It had an opening for the introduction of brandea, &c., opposite to which was a similar opening in the box inclosing the relics. See Sozom. in Hist. Eccl. ix. 2, and the notes of Vales. in loc.; or Mabillon, Praef. in S. ii. Ord. Ben. obs. 44. These holes are called by the author of the Miracles of St. Stephen "fenestellæ" (De Mir. S. St. i. 12).

Sometimes the entrance of a church was hallowed by the burial in it of relics. A crime committed in the court of the church was aggravated, because "the doorway of it had been consecrated with the relics of saints" (Capit. Lud. Pii, 819, c. 1; Capit. Reg. Franc. iv. 13; Leg. Longob. i. ix. 36; Canones Isaaci Ling. ii. 2). As there is no earlier evidence of this practice, we cannot accept the suggestion of Baronius (Notæ ad Martyrol. Rom. Nov. 18), and Martene (u. s. ii. 13, § 12), that the reverence shewn to the threshold of a church, especially as indicated by the much earlier use of the conventional phrases, limina sanctorum, apostolorum, is to be ascribed to the fact that relics were buried under them.

Relics were also placed in other parts of churches, or their adjuncts, as in the capitals of piers, in the corner-stones of bell-towers (Leo Mars. Chron. Cassin. iii. 30); but especially in baptisteries (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. x. 31, § 19; Vitæ PP. vii. 2). A form of petition for the dedication of a baptistery, "ita ut reliquias in eodem loco sanctorum martyrum Ill. et Ill. desiderem introduci," may be seen with two forms of reply in the Liber Diurnus, v. 19-21.

Forms of public notice announcing the intended deposition of relics on such occasions ("Denuntiatio cum Reliquiæ Scorum Martyrum ponendæ sunt") are extant. See the Ordo Romanus in the Prolegomena to the Vitæ Pont. Rom. of Anastasius Bibliothecarius, ed. Blanch. iii. xlvii.; Ordo R. Bernoldi, Hittorp. De Cath. Eccl. Off. 119, ed. 1610; Ordd. i. ii. in Martene, De Ant. Eccl. Rit. ii. 13 (Missal. Gellon. and Pontif. Egberti).

XIV. Relics on the Altar.—From the 6th century downwards relics before their deposition were commonly set on the altar, as the place of highest honour. Thus, a bishop hearing that some were brought to his church, says, "Let the blessed relics rest on the altar, until in the morning we go forth to meet them" (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 6). Some shreds from the cloak of St. Julian ready to be placed in a church, as yet without relics, were set for the night on the altar (Mirac. ii. 34). It appears also that when pilgrims bearing relics halted at a church, they were so placed till their departure (De Glor. Conf. 39). Compare Baudonivia, Vita S. Radegundis, 14. Relics were not, however, allowed to remain for any time on the altar until the 9th century. It was believed that the miracles of St. Walpurgis ceased, "because her relics were on the altar of the Lord, where only the majesty of the divine mystery ought to be celebrated" (Odo, Collat. ii. 28). St. Berchar appeared to a monk and seriously rebuked him, for having placed his remains on the altar which was "Christi mensa Corporis" (Mirac. S. Berch. v. § 36 in Boll. Oct. 16, vii. 1028). The remains of St. Servatius of Tongres, when exhumed in the time of Charlemagne, were "placed before the altar, because it was not yet held lawful for anything except the sacrifice to be set upon the altar, that being the table of the Lord of hosts" (De Servat. iv. 30; Boll. May 13, ii. 218). The relics of St. Celsus were placed on the altar at Trier, 979 (Annal. Bened. iii. 658); and other examples occur in that age. The practice in fact had been fully established by the end of the preceding century, as appears from a canon of that date: "Nothing is to be set on the altar, except capsæ with the relics of the saints, and the four Gospels" (Conc. Rem. c. 5, in Regino, de Discipl. Eccl. i. 60. Comp. the Admonitiones Synodales, ibid. 503, 505, 508).

XV. Watching before Relics.—This began early, and was common to East and West. Thus St. Ambrose says of the remains of Gervasius and Protasius, "The evening coming on we removed them to the basilica of Fausta. There watch was kept the whole night." The next day they were placed in the new church (Ep. 22, 13). When Gregory of Tours, 573, dedicated his own oratory, he watched the night before in the church in which the relics designed for it lay (De Glor. Conf. 20), and he incidentally mentions the practice (vigilata nocte) elsewhere (ib. 39). A similar vigil was kept before the relics of Tarachus, and when others were placed in the church of the laura of Euthymius (Cyrill. Scyth. Vita Euthym. 122). The rite is recognized in the early pontificals: "Deinde vadunt ad eum locum in quo reliquiae per totam noctem prae-teritam cum vigiliis fuerint" (Pont. Egberti, 44; in Martene, ii. 249; see other orders, ibid. 254, 257, 259, &c.). Vigils before relics were, however, enjoined at other times on priests who had charge of them, "Reliquias sanctorum cum summo studio vigiliarum noctis et diurnis officiis conservet" (Capit. Episcoporum, an. 801, c. 3, in Cap. Reg. Franc. i. 359).

XVI. Relics brought to Councils.—We have many examples of this, beginning near the close of our period. The object was to insure the assistance of the saint thus honoured. In 758 Tassilo, duke of Bayeux, swore fealty to Pepin at the council of Compiègne, over the bodies of several saints (Adonis Chron. ad an. Migne, cxliii. 124). The body of St. Remigius was exposed on an altar in a council of Rheims held in the time of Leo IV. (Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. iii. i. 10). At Charroux, 989, a council was held before the relics of St. Junian (Letaldus, Hist. 2, Acta Bened. iv. p. ii. 434). At a council in Aquitaine in the next century, "multa delata sunt corpora sanctorum atque innumerabiles sanctorum apophoretæ reliquiarum" (Glaber Rodolphus, Hist. iv. 5, in Du Chesne, Script. Franc. Hist. iv. 45). See other examples in Martene.

XVII. Burial near Relics.—At first there was a strong feeling and even a law against burial near the body of a martyr [OBSEQUES, § xvi.], but in the course of time this gave way to the desire to be placed in death under the protection of the saints by such proximity to their remains. Gregory of Nyssa buried his father and mother near some small relics of the Forty Martyrs, that in the resurrection they might be "raised in the company of those allies full of confidence" (Orat. 3 in xl. Mart. App. 214). Maximus of Turin, 442: "It was provided by our ancestors that we should mingle our bodies with the bones of the saints, that the gloom of darkness may fly from us, while Christ gives them light. Resting, therefore [in the cemeteries], with the holy martyrs we escape the darkness of hell, by their merits indeed, yet partners in their sanctity" (Serm. 61). Paulinus (Poëma. xxxv. 607), says that a youth was buried near martyrs:

"Ut de vicino sanctorum sanguine ducat, Quo nostras illo purget in igne animas."

St. Augustine thinks the only advantage of it to be, "ut dum recolunt ubi sint reposita eorum quos diligunt corpora, iisdem sanctis illos tanquam patronis susceptos apud Dominum adiuvandos orando commendent" (De Cur. pro Mort. 4). James the Syrian, in the 5th century, "collected from all parts many prophets, many apostles, as many martyrs as possible (i.e. their relics), and stored them in one coffin (designed for himself), desiring to dwell with the saints and to rise and to enjoy the vision of God in their company" (Theodoret, Relig. Hist. 21). When the grave of St. Udalric was opened, there was found in it "a very large locked chest, full and crammed" with relics (Inventio Corp. S. Udal. § 3, Acta Bened. v. 470). See also the legendary Scriptura de Transl. S. Stephani, 1, Opp. Aug. App. vi.

XVIII. Miracles ascribed to Relics.—Some have already come before us; but it may be well to give examples of different kinds, to shew that there was no evil supposed too powerful for relief by their means. Compare WONDERS.

(1) The Blind receive their Sight, &c.—When the remains of Gervasius and Protasius were found at Milan, A.D. 386, a blind man having "touched the clothing of the martyrs, immediately received sight" (Paulin. in Vita S. Ambros. 14; comp. Ambr. Epist. 22 ad Soror. 17; Aug. De Civ. Dei. xxii. 8, § 2). Some years after this, when the relics of Sisinnius and Alexander were brought to Milan, a stranger professing to be blind touched the chest in which they were, and declared himself healed (Paul. u. s. 52). A blind woman touched her eyes with flowers that had been in contact with the relics of St. Stephen, and "forthwith saw" (Aug. u. s. 10). A blind man was directed by Germanus, A.D. 555, to lie between the altar and some relics of Gervasius, and was healed (Fortunatus, Vita Germ. 56). Of the shrine of St. Denys, Fortunatus says generally that there, "recipit cæcitas visum, debilitas gressum, et obstrictæ aurium januæ recipiunt auditum" (Passio Dion. 3).

(2) The Dead raised.—St. Chrysostom has told us that the bones of the martyrs "put death to flight" (Laud. Dros. 4). Several instances are alleged by St. Augustine. A presbyter at Calauina, in Africa, laid out as dead, revived when a tunic, which had been taken to a memoria containing relics of St. Stephen, was placed on his body (Aug. de Civ. Dei. xxii. 8, § 12). A waggon-wheel went over a child and killed him, his mother took him at once to the same memoria, "and he not only came to life again, but even appeared unhurt" (ibid. 15). Two women also were restored to life on being covered with dresses that had derived virtue from the same memoria (16, 17). A dead boy "anointed with the oil of the said martyr," and an infant laid on the memoria also returned to life (18, 19).

(3) Devils tormented.—This was universally asserted. E. g. Paula at the tombs of Elisha, Obadiah and John the Baptist "cernebat variis daemones rugire cruciatibus, et ante sepulcra sanctorum ululare homines more luporum, vocibus latrare canum, fremere leonum, sibilare serpentum, mugire taurorum" (Hieron. Epist. 108, ad Eust. 13). When a demoniac was brought to the memoria of Gervasius at Hippo, the demon "with a great wail entreated to be spared, and confessed when, where, and how he had entered the youth;" whom thereupon he left (Aug. de Civ. Dei. xxii. 8, § 7). "Persons vexed by the attacks of an unclean spirit, when led to the tomb of St. Denys, "to be tried by the Divine power, were compelled by the command of the saints themselves to declare by name where each of the martyrs had been laid" (Fortun. Passio S. Dion. &c. 3). A demoniac foretold the approach of a ship containing some dust from the tomb of St. Julian. As it came to land, he rushed towards it, and after a brief struggle, was set free (Greg. Tur. de Mirac. ii. 33). When Gregory of Tours took some relics of the same saint to the church of St. Martin in that city, an enervemen, with violent emotion, exclaimed, "Why, Martin, hast thou joined thyself to Julian. Why dost thou call him hither? Thy presence was punishment enough for us. Thou hast called one like thyself to increase our torments" (Id. ibid. 34; see also Vitæ P. P. viii. 11. Compare Ambr. Exhort. Virg. 2; Jerom. c. Vigil. 5; Hilary, c. Constantinum, 8; Alcuin de Pontif. Ebor. Opp. ii. 246, &c.)

(4) General Succour and Protection.—Constantine ordered the relics of St. Andrew and other saints to be taken to Constantinople,

"Ut sua apostolicis muniret moenia laetus Corporibus." (Paulinus, Poem. xix. 335.)

Later writers affirm that he inserted a piece of the true cross in a statue of himself erected in the same city, in the assurance that it would by that means be "kept in safety" (Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 17; Cassiod. H. E. ii. 18). "The church," says Asterius, speaking of relics, "is walled about with the martyrs as a city with brave soldiers. They who are oppressed by the contingencies of human life hasten to the resting-places of the thrice blessed as to an asylum (Hom. in SS. Mart. in Auctar. Combef. i. 185). It was believed that owing to the burial of three martyrs in a fort named Malcan, the Sabaeans could never from that time plunder it or even make their way up to it (Assemani Acta SS.

Mart. Or. et Occ. i. 79). The neighbours of Simeon Stylites lamented the removal of his body to Antioch, because they would thereby lose the protection of his relics (Anton. in Vita S. Sim. 19). The same feeling prevailed in the West. Thus, Wilfrid leaving Rome on two several occasions, supplied himself with relics; and so "cum benedictione sanctorum" (Eddius. Steph. Vita Wilfr. 53), "cum reliquiarum sanctorum quas illic invenit auxilio" (4), reached home in safety. Similarly, the father of Gregory of Tours believed himself to have escaped in many dangers by sea and land through the relics of some unknown saints which he carried with him (G. T. de Glor. Mart. i. 84). Hincmar inclosed in a large shrine "the pledges of many saints as a protection to the whole city of Rheims" (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. iii. 5). The inhabitants of Cusan in Catalonia sought to kill St. Romuald, "ut haberent pro patrocinio terrae vel cadaver exanime" (Petrus Dam. in Vita S. Rom. 13).

XIX. Evils arising from Relic-Worship.—The crowds which they attracted to a church or monastery were a serious interruption to the duties of the place, and a source of great disquiet and misgiving to the more spiritual and earnest minded. The evil was felt so strongly at the Abbey of Moyen-Moutier in the Vosges 707, that the abbat Hidulfus appealed to the departed monk by whose body the miracles were wrought: "Brother Spinulus, on account of the perils incurred by souls, stop the crowds of those who flock hither. Then the miracles ceasing, the concourse also ceased" (Vita Hid. i. in Boll. July 11, iii. 228; at greater length in Vita, iii. c. xv. 234). The monks of Rheims equally deprecated the miracles of St. Gibrian, nor was St. Bernard himself allowed more liberty at Clairvaux (Acta Bened. Praef. i. saec. iii. cx. 36). At Sarlat the monks removed the body of St. Pardulf to a neighbouring church, that they might regain their former peace (ibid.). Stephen of Lüttich adjured St. Wolbodo to "abstain from miracles, through which such trouble came on the brethren by night and day through the sick" (Acta Ben. S. vi. i. 165). At St. Tronc, when the relics of the patron began to work miracles, the abbat Guntram endeavoured to conceal them, remarking that "signs were given to the unbelieving, not to the believing" (Rudolph. in Chron. Trudon. i. Spicil. Dach. ii. 662). They continued under his successor to the grief and annoyance of the elder and more religious monks; for, says the historian, "the further the glorious fame of St. Trudo was carried by the report of pilgrims, the more also did the worldliness of our monks, as displayed in levity of manners and the abuse of a state without discipline, become a subject of reprehension" (Spicil. u. s. 664). "Because many," remarks Ambrosius Autpertus, "seem to have their share of miracles, but in nowise have their names written in heaven, we do not in this age by any means demand miracles in the church, but a perfect life" (Vita SS. Paldonis, &c. 14).

Hospinian de Templis, ii. 7, Genev. 1672; J. Mabillon, Lettre d'un Bénédictin touchant le Discernement des anciennes Reliques, Par. 1700;

RELIGIOUS. The word may designate (1) ordinary Christians; (2) ecclesiastics; (3) monks. In modern usage the term is applied to those who have given themselves to the monastic life, whether they be in holy orders or not. That, however, was not the early use of the word. It appears from the second canon of the tenth council of Toledo (cent. 7) that the word included all ecclesiastics, "from a bishop down to a clerk of the lowest order, or a monk." Akin to this is the fact, that in a canon of a subsequent council of Toledo (A.D. 693) the term secular is applied to such as are not priests "Sacerdotes" (Conc. Tol. xvi. can. 6). But that the term religious, which is the negation of secular, was not anciently restricted to ecclesiastics, may be inferred from the first council of Orleans (cent. 6), where we have the term "profession of religion" applied to other than those in orders.

The earliest writer in which the use of religious is clearly fixed in its technical sense of "professed," is Salvian, a French writer of the 5th century. In the passages of earlier writers which we have examined, it is susceptible of the meaning conveyed by the modern English phrase a religious person. In Salvian, however, the technical meaning appears to be undeniable. "Some of your sons under pretext of religion dissent from religion, and leave the world (seculum) more in garb than in mind" (ad Cathol. Eccl. lib. 3). And again, "Multi enim Religiosi, imò sub specie religionis, vitiis secularibus mancipati. . . ." (id. de Gubern. Dei, lib. 5). The fourth council of Toledo speaks of Religiosi, who are counted neither amongst clerks nor monks. They are "per diversa loca vagi" and are to be restrained by the bishops (can. 53).

It is affirmed by Severinus Binius, in a note upon canon 17 of the council of Gangra, that "the Greeks used to call the life of those whom we call Religiosi by the name of ἄσκησις." That points to a field of Greek phraseology upon the subject much earlier than the corresponding Latin phrases can be traced. Thus we have γυμνασία μοναχική in Isidore of Pelusium; ἄσκησις τῆς εὐσεβείας in St. Basil; ἄσκησις μοναχική apud Theophanem an. 3 Constantii; and other similar expressions. It should, however, be noticed on the authority of Du Fresne (Gloss. Gr. s. v.) who quotes several Greek authorities in support of his position, that the ἄσκηται were "not so much monks, especially in the first ages of Christianity, as any Christians devoting themselves to a stricter life and to holy functions of piety."

It is extremely difficult to say when from meaning devout Christian life, the word religio faded into the sense of monastic profession. Thus the word seems to be hovering between the two senses in the fifth council of Paris: "Quae sibi vestes in habitu religionis in domibus propriis tam a parentibus quam per seipias mutaverint" (can. 13). In such a passage as the following, which is drawn from St. Gregory the Great, the word seems to have no tinge of the monastic meaning. Speaking of the attraction that was exercised upon Roman society by St. Benedict, he says, "Coeperere tunc ad eum Romanæ urbis nobiles et religiosi concurrere, et suosque ei filios omnipotenti Deo nutriendos dare." The children may have been brought up as monks, but the parents could hardly have been so.

In the ninth council of Toledo (cent. 7) religio plainly means the monastic profession: "Parentibus sane filios suos religioni contradere, non amplius quam usque ad decimum ætatis eorum annum licentia poterit esse" (can. 6). By that date the sense seems quite established, as we have again "religionis tonsuram" and "religionis debitam vestem," where it cannot mean "holy orders," because the clause is applied to both sexes ("in utroque sexu").

Yet long after the technical sense of religiosus had made good its footing, the earlier meaning existed along with it, so that in some passages it is difficult to say which of the two meanings is intended. Thus, the sixty-first of the Capitula of Martin of Bracara reads, "Non liceat sacerdotibus vel clericis, sed nec religiosis laicis convivia facere de confertis." Here a good sense would be got either from "devout laymen," or from "professed laymen."

There is a trace of a certain restriction of dress so early as the time of Augustine. He speaks of young men who have wives alleging it to be difficult for them to assume habitum religionis. He replies to their objection, that he is not pleading so much for a change of dress, as for a change of character. Vestimenta religiosa would be of little use without good works and change of heart (S. Aug. Sermo. lxxvii. "Rogo vos, fratres charissimi"). In this and similar passages, however, a restriction of dress may be meant which distinguished Christians from Pagans, rather than one which marked out one particular circle of Christians from the general mass of their fellow-believers. [H. T. A.]

RELIQUARY (Gr θήκη, ἱεροθήκη; Lat. reliquarium, capsa, lipsanoteca, locellus, cinerarium; if of such size as to be attached to a chain worn round the neck, encolpium, or ἐγκόλιον, as to be borne ἐν κόλπῳ, in the bosom; phylacterium, and many other words; if to be carried processionally feretrum; Fr. reliquaire, châsse) a repository for relics. Compare RELICS.

Reliquaries may be divided into two principal classes—those which were not intended to be carried on the person, and those which were.

The first class contains by far the greater number of forms and sizes, both of which varied in accordance with the size and form of the object to be included.

Relics may be divided into three classes:—1st, Entire bodies of martyrs or other venerated persons, or portions of such; 2nd, clothes or other objects which had been used, or had in other ways come into contact with such persons; and 3rdly, oil from lamps which burnt before their tombs, cloths (brandea), which had been placed upon them, and dust which had been swept from the floors of sanctuaries held to be pre-eminently holy.

We accordingly find, either now in existence or in record, reliquaries of the most diverse forms and sizes: boxes, round, rectangular, octagonal, &c.; chests with gable-ended covers (models, in fact, of tombs), models of churches, cases in the forms of heads, arms, or legs, images, tubes of metal, and where a liquid, as oil or blood, was that to be preserved, bottles or flasks of various forms and substances. The materials of which reliquaries were made are not less varied. We find them of gold, silver, bronze, crystal, ivory, wood, bone, agate, sardonyx.

It will, however, be sufficient here to describe a few of the more remarkable examples which come within our period.

The desire to preserve tangible memorials of those who have been dear to us is one so universally felt, that we may well believe that relics were preserved, and, in consequence, reliquaries made, in the earliest ages of Christianity. Perhaps the earliest testimony to the fact that relics were collected is to be found in the Acts of Fructuosus, bishop of Tarragona, martyred A.D. 259 (Ruinart, Acta Sincera, p. 219), which are generally classed among those known as genuine and authentic. In these we are told (p. 221 f.), that after his martyrdom the bishop appeared to his brethren, and admonished those who had taken any of the ashes which remained after the burning of his body to restore them, so that all that remained of him and his fellow-martyrs, Eulogius and Augurius, might be buried in one common grave. The earlier cases relied on by Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. chrétiennes) and other Roman Catholic writers to prove the high antiquity of a cultus of relics, as those of St. Polycarp and St. Ignatius, are rather those where a pious and affectionate desire was felt by the surviving disciples to give honourable burial to the remains of those whom they had venerated while living than those in which a desire was felt to obtain a fragment of a holy body, to be made the object of veneration.

[RELICS.] Ignorant zeal and affectionate feeling, however, concurred in desiring some visible object which should be a memorial of, or at least be in some way connected with, the departed saint; and as in the earlier ages the rulers both of church and of state strenuously opposed the exhumation and dismembering of departed saints, substitutes were found in the cloths (brandea) which were placed on the tombs of such personages, or in portions of oil taken from the lamps which burnt before them. The well-known letter from St. Gregory the Great to the empress Constantina (Epist. lib. iv. ep. 30), in which, replying to her requisition for the head or some other part ("aliud quid de corpore") of St. Paul, he expresses his horror of such an act as exhuming and mutilating such sacred remains, and suggests the sending instead brandea in a "pyxis" ("tantummmodo in pyxide brandeum"), marks a point of time when the more modern system of dividing the remains of saints was coming into practice, but not as yet fully established. This practice would seem to have been introduced earlier in the East than in the West, for Gregory the Great complains (Epist. lib. iv. ep. 30) that certain Greek monks were caught in the act of digging up bones near the church of St. Paul, which they confessed they purposed to convey to Greece as relics of saints.

These details as to the character of what were deemed relics in the earlier ages are needful, as furnishing the reason why we find on ivory boxes, probably originally reliquaries, subjects from the history of our Lord; such are the circular boxes, measuring from about four to five inches in diameter; on fourteen out of fifteen examples of which such subjects as the miracles of Christ, the history of Jonah, the three Hebrew youths in the furnace, all of which, either directly or indirectly, have some reference to our Lord, and consequently to the eucharist, are carved (see Padre Garrucci's Osservazione Ant. vol. xlv. p. 322). These have been usually held to have been used as artophoria or pyxes [PYX] to hold the reserved portion of the eucharist; but the recent discovery of one on which the martyrdom of St. Menas is carved, leaves it open to doubt whether such was their original destination, and whether they may not really have been intended as repositories, either for vessels of oil or for brandea [BRANDEUM]. If such were the case, doubtless those on which acts of our Lord are carved contained such memorials from some of the sacred places of Jerusalem or Bethlehem, as that carved with the martyrdom of St. Menas no doubt contained some similar objects from the shrine near Alexandria, where he was buried.

The earliest in date of these circular boxes is, judging from its excellence of style, that in the museum at Berlin. This is cut from a portion of a very large tusk, measuring about five inches and a half in diameter at the base and five at the top, the height being also about five inches. The subjects carved on it are the intended sacrifice of Isaac, and Christ teaching in the Temple. Our Lord is represented as youthful and beardless, and neither He nor any others have nimbi surrounding their heads. The style is extremely good, not inferior to that of the best sarcophagi with Christian subjects, and the box may be with reason referred to a date as early as the 4th century. The exceptional example of these circular boxes is that figured and described in the Archæologia (vol. xlv. p. 322), upon which are two subjects—one, the martyrdom of St. Menas, an Egyptian who suffered under Maximinus Galerius or Maximianus; the other, the saint in a glorified condition after death, standing before a gateway, which, no doubt, represents the very celebrated sanctuary where he was buried, about nine miles from Alexandria. This box no doubt once contained some relic of the saint from whose shrine, as will be mentioned hereafter, earthen bottles containing oil were sent in large quantities. The box may be confidently ascribed to the earlier part of the 6th century. The circular part, which is all that remains, measures four inches and a half in width and three and a quarter in height.

No finer example of a reliquary dating from before A.D. 800 has been preserved than the casket of carved ivory in the public library at Brescia. It has been taken to pieces, but evidently once formed a box about nine inches in height and breadth, and thirteen in length, the pieces having been united by a mounting, or at least by hinges, and bands of gold or silver. It is covered with carvings representing about thirty-five subjects; the larger and more important, both as regards size and number, being taken from the Gospels, and representing some of the more important miracles and scenes in the history of our Lord. Thus, on the front, the central group represents our Lord teaching in the temple, while on the right, He is shewn as the Shepherd guarding the fold from the wolf, and on the left, with Mary Magdalene in the garden. On one side the principal subject is Christ raising the daughter of Jairus; on the other, restoring sight to the blind man, and raising Lazarus; on the back are the transfiguration, and the story of Ananias and Sapphira; on the lid are Christ in the garden of olives, Christ taken in the garden, and the denial of St. Peter; while above are two subjects—Christ brought before Herod (two persons are, however, shewn, each seated in a curule chair), and Christ brought before Pilate, who is in the act of washing his hands. The lesser subjects, two ranges of which surround the box, are taken partly from the Old Testament, partly from the New: the history of Jonah, scenes from that of Moses, of Susannah, of Jacob, and others, occur. Besides these are two scenes of agapes, or possibly heavenly banquets, and some symbols, as a tower, a lamp, an olive tree, a balance, &c. Above all these is a band of busts in pateras, fifteen in number; the majority are bearded, but some are youthful. In the central point of the front is a youthful head, with hair cut short over the forehead, but falling in long ringlets to the shoulders, which is intended to represent our Lord, the same type of head and hair being preserved through the whole series of subjects in which He appears. None of the figures have a nimbus: the style and execution are throughout good, quite equal to those of the best examples of sarcophagi with Christian subjects; and there can be little doubt but that this most important monument of Christian art ought to be assigned to a period not later than the 4th century. Casts are in the South Kensington Museum, and it has been described at some length in the Catalogue of Fictile Ivories in that collection, p. 34.

Very good examples of reliquaries of the next succeeding centuries are supplied by those discovered in 1871 near or under the high altar of the church of Grado, and figured and described by De Rossi (Boll. di Arch. Crist. 1872, p. 155). Both are boxes of silver, the one circular, the other elliptical. The circular box is four inches in diameter and three in height; it is divided into six compartments by a central tube and five partitions, all formed of thin silver; on the cover is a figure of the Virgin Mary, seated on a throne, and holding the infant Christ. The Virgin holds a cruciform sceptre (scettro crucigero) in her right hand, and a nimbus surrounds her head. An inscription, in two lines, is engraved on the box, and consists of the names of saints as follows:—

SANC. MARIA. SANC. VITVS. SANC. CASSANVS. SANC. PANCRAATIVS. SANC. YPOLITVS. SANC. APOLLINARVS. SANC. MARTINVS.

Within were found eleven small plates of gold, bearing names of saints; a small cylindrical box of gold, which enclosed a very small glass phial; a small golden box, of cubical form, with a Greek cross enamelled on its lid; and a disc of stucco impressed with a cross.

Grado Reliquary. (From De Rossi's 'Bull. Crist. Arch.')

The elliptic box measures five inches and three quarters in length by three and a quarter in width and height. On the cover is, in relief, a gemmed cross, standing on a monticule, with a sheep on either side. The side of the box is encircled by two bands of inscriptions, which run as follows; the upper:—

SANCTVSCANTIVSSANTIANVSSANCTACANTIANILLA
SANTVSQVIRINVSSANTVSLATINV

The lower:—

SLAVENTIVSVIOANNISVSNICEFORVSSANTISRED-
DIDID BOTVM

The first S of the latter inscription should be added to the former, and the lower one read: "Laurentius vs (i.e. vir spectabilis), Joannis vs, Niceforus vs, Santis reddidid botum (i.e. reddiderunt votum)."

Between these inscriptions is a band of eight circles (clypei or pateræ) enclosing busts, and at each end a palm tree. One of the busts, the central on one side, appears to represent our Lord; the hair is long, and the face beardless. Those to the right and left probably represent St. Peter and St. Paul. On the opposite side, in the centre, the bust is that of a young woman richly dressed; the others all represent men, beardless, and with rather short hair. This casket contained another smaller box, of silver, without ornament.

Both caskets were found full of water; and nothing remained of the relics which they doubtless once contained, but some black matter like mud.

Herr Kandler, Conservator of the Monuments at Trieste, is stated to have expressed an opinion that the circular box might date from about A.D. 452, and the elliptical from about A.D. 568;

but these ascriptions of date are perhaps open to doubt.

To the 7th century may be assigned the very remarkable coffer of ivory which formed part of the Meyrick collection. It is eighteen inches in length, eight in breadth, and five and a quarter in height. It is entirely covered with ornament, consisting of bands of foliage enclosing half-length figures of (on the lid in the middle) our Lord; on His right, the Virgin Mary, St. Daria, and St. Julia; on His left, St. John the Baptist, St. Alexander, and St. Crisantus; on the front, SS. Philip, Thomas, John, Peter, Paul, Andrew, Bartholomew, and James; on the back, SS. Stephen the proto-martyr, Mark, Thaddeus, Matthew, James (the Less?), Simon, Matthias, and Luke; on one end, SS. Nereus, Gregory (the pope), and Achilles; on the other, SS. Justus Martyr, and Pancratius. The names are, in all cases, given in inscriptions.

The figures are executed in a very poor and feeble style; the bands of foliage are rather elegant. It greatly resembles, both as regards style and execution, the diptych sent by Gregory the Great to queen Theodelinda, which bears effigies of himself and king David, and was the cover of a responsorium graduale.

It is noteworthy that, while we find in the Liber Pontif. almost innumerable gifts of chalice, patens, and other vessels and articles made by various popes for use in, or decoration of, churches, very few notices occur of reliquaries, and these only commence in the 7th century. The explanation probably is, that at the time when the cultus of relics became more fully established, every Roman church possessed entire bodies of saints, transported thither, in most cases, from their original places of deposit in the catacombs, and the popes naturally took comparatively little account of such lesser relics as were then procurable. The Greeks, as has been shewn above, seem to have been the first to dismember bodies; and it is therefore not surprising that one of the first mentions which we find in the Liber Pontificalis of a portion of a holy body enclosed in a reliquary, is that where we are told that pope Gregory III. (731–752) found in the Lateran the head of St. George in a "capsa," with a label on which was a Greek inscription, testifying to its identity.

Many reliquaries were made at this period, both in the East and in the West, and mention of them frequently occurs in chronicles and other documents, but examples are rare. The art of the period was extremely bad; and when a precious metal was the material, they have probably been broken up. Some may, however, still exist without having been noticed by any one possessed of antiquarian knowledge; for it is not always easy to obtain a sight of all the contents of a church treasury. One fine example, which may very possibly date from the 8th century, though some are disposed to give it an earlier date, is preserved in the treasury of the abbey of St. Maurice, in the Valais; it is about seven inches and a quarter long, two and a half deep, and five and a quarter high; the lower part is rectangular; the upper, or lid, sloped in front and at the back, and gabled at the ends. On the front is a large antique cameo and several precious stones, pearls, sardonyxes, and other stones with antique intaglios, are placed at regular intervals lines of pearls run from one stone to another, and the whole of the compartments thus formed are filled with small pieces of garnet and of green and blue glass, each piece being surrounded by a little partition (cloison) of gold, precisely in the manner in which similar ornament is applied in the brooches frequently found in the Saxon graves in Kent, on the sword of Childeric, and other objects, dating from the 5th to the 8th century. The date at which this sort of work ceased to be made has not been ascertained, but it seems quite possible that it was still in use as late as the 8th century, and the form of this reliquary is rather in favour of a somewhat late than a very early date. The ends are ornamented in a similar manner. The back is covered with a plate of gold, divided into rhomboidal compartments by corded lines; in these compartments are letters engraved on the gold, in most cases one letter in a compartment: the inscription, which reads diagonally, beginning at the right hand corner, runs as follows: "Teudericus Presbiter in honore sci Mauricii fieri jussit. Amen. Nordvalaus et Rihlindis ordenarunt fabricare Undiho et Ello ficerunt."

Reliquary at Monza.
(From Labarte's 'Histoire des Arts Industriels'.)

M. Aubert, who has figured and described this object in his Trésor de l'Abbaye de St. Maurice d'Againe, p. 141, and pl. xi. xii. observes, on this inscription, that the names clearly point to the Merovingian period; and he supposes that it may have been fabricated by a Frank or Burgundian artist, about A.D. 600.

Two remarkable examples should now be mentioned, though their real date has not been very clearly ascertained. One is preserved at Monza, the other in the treasury of the Burg at Vienna, the former being said to contain hair and a tooth of St. John the Baptist; the latter, some earth mixed with the blood of St. Stephen.

The first of these is a box about ten inches high, and eight wide, but of little depth; it is rectangular below, but the upper part is diminished in curved lines, so that only a narrow ridge is left on the top. It is covered with gold, on which are set precious stones, so disposed as to radiate from a centre. The back is covered with a plate of gold, on which are delineated, by the use of a very small punch, our Saviour on the cross, with the Virgin on one side, St. John on the other, and two figures, one piercing his side, and the other offering the sponge of vinegar. Above the arms of the cross are medallions, enclosing busts which represent the sun and moon. The drawing is tolerably correct and good, though the execution, by reason of the process employed, is rather rough.

The reliquary at Vienna is of almost exactly the same form as that just described, but smaller, being only about eight inches high. The front is covered with precious stones; some of the larger ones are disposed in a sort of cruciform arrangement, the others rather irregularly; all are very simply set. The back has lost its primitive covering, but the sides are covered with thin gold plate, divided by circles of pearls into compartments, in which are figures in relief; among these can be distinguished a man fishing with a hook, one mounted on horseback, and an avenging angel armed with a bow and dart, with a legend, "Malis Vidicta." The style of these figures, according to Dr. Bock (Kleinodien des Heil. Römischen Reiches, &c., p. 53, app.), shews a reminiscence of the classical period.

These two reliquaries correspond so nearly in character that they can hardly be far distant in point of date; that of Vienna is probably rather the older of the two. Dr. Bock is disposed to think that this last perhaps dates from a period earlier than the Carolingian; but the style and character of the representation of the Crucifixion on the back of the Monza reliquary seem to approach very closely to those of ivory carvings, and other works of art, which have been clearly proved to date from periods subsequent to 800.

Two similar reliquaries are said to exist, one in the church of St. Willibrord, at Emmerich, the other in that of St. Servatius, at Maestricht.

A very remarkable reliquary of kindred form has been preserved at Sion, in the Valois, the date of which can be accurately fixed, as it bears the name of the donor, Altheus, bishop of Sion about A.D. 780. It is six inches high, six and a half wide, and two inches and two-eighths deep at the base; at three inches from the base it begins to diminish on all four sides, and no doubt was finished at the top by a crest, now lost. It is covered with thin silver; on the front, in the upper part, are the stalk, leaves, and large flower of a plant in relief; in the centre of the flower a medallion, with a half-length figure of a female saint in cloisonné enamel; below are two compartments, in each of which are two half-length figures of saints, also in cloisonné enamel; on the back, on the upper part, are two figures in relief, St. Mary and St. John; below are two plant-like ornaments, perhaps lilies; on the sides are lily-like ornaments on the upper part, and half-length figures of saints below. On the under side is the inscription, "Hanc capsam dicata in honore sce Mariæ Altheus Eps. fieri rogavit." The style both of the enamels and the reliefs is extremely bad—in fact, barbarous. This reliquary has been engraved by Blavignac, Hist. de l'Architecture sacrée, Pl. XI. and Atlas Pl. XXIII.*

The last four examples which have been mentioned have a certain similarity in form, viz. that they have a rectangular lower portion, and a sloping upper portion. This form afterwards became that adopted in all the larger reliquaries, and, indeed, in many of the smaller. It has been variously supposed to have been borrowed from a tomb, a house, or a chapel. The truth would seem to be, that tombs were often made in the form of churches or chapels [see BASILICA], and tombs again served as models for reliquaries, the tomb-like form being a very natural one when the intention was to enshrine bones, or other portions of the bodies of deceased saints. The change to this form from the earlier box or pyx-like form, appears to have in some degree coincided with the increase of the practice of dividing the mortal remains of the departed. A further development of the idea of forming reliquaries in imitation of buildings is to be found in that given by Charles the Bald to the abbey of St. Denis, and which was said to have belonged to his grandfather. It is said to have represented the façade of a building of three stories with arcades in each, embellished with precious stones and fine pearls, and crowned by a magnificent antique cameo, and was estimated to contain nineteen marks of gold, and seven marks weight of stones. It was known by the name of the "Écrin de Charlemagne." An engraving of it has been given by Félibien, in his Histoire de l'Abbaye de St. Denis.

Reliquaries in the form of heads, arms, legs, or other parts of the human frame, made during the middle ages, are frequently to be found in the treasuries of churches, but no example of a date as early as 800 would appear to have been noticed. Perhaps the earliest now existing is that in the treasury of St. Maurice in the Valais containing the head of St. Candidus. This is probably of the 11th century, though Dr. Lübke attributes it to the 9th, and calls it erroneously the head of St. Maurice. It is engraved by Blavignac, Hist. de l'Architecture sacrée, &c., and by Aubert, Trésor de St. Maurice.

A few words must be said on the vessels used to contain liquids which were held in veneration, for these are virtually reliquaries, though perhaps it may be held that the word can scarcely be with propriety applied to them. One class of these consists of the small bottles which have been frequently found imbedded in cement against the tiles or slabs with which the "loculi" of the catacombs near Rome were closed. There has been some difference of opinion as to whether the contents of these bottles was really blood, or whether it was not wine which had been, if not actually consecrated, blessed at the time of the celebration of the eucharist, or at least presented at an agape. Martigny (Dict. des Antiq. chrét., art. Sang des Martyrs) states that in several instances particularized by him analysis has shewn that the contents had actually been blood, and that fragments of sponge and of linen have been found within them. The bottles are usually of glass, sometimes of terra cotta, and are generally globular, with short necks.

Another class is that of the flasks used to contain oil, which contained some admixture of that which burnt in the lamps lit before celebrated shrines. Among the most notable examples remaining are those preserved at Monza, which some suppose to have been sent to Queen Theodelinda by pope Gregory the Great. These AMPULLA are made of lead or pewter, and bear various subjects in low relief: on one is our Lord in glory, enclosed by an oval aureole, which is supported by angels; while below He is shewn standing in the attitude of prayer, with the apostles grouped, six on either side. On another, a cross between two candlesticks (?) is surrounded by heads of the apostles enclosed in circles. On another, an edifice surmounted by a cross occupies the centre, while around are heads of Christ and the apostles. Another has almost the same subjects as that first mentioned, surrounded by the inscription:—

EMMANOYHA MET HMWN ΘΕΩC.

On others is the inscription—

ΕΛΑΙΟΝ ΕΥΛΟΥ ΖΩΗΣ ΤΩΝ ΑΓΙΩΝ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΥ ΤΟΠΩΝ.

These may very probably be of the time of Queen Theodelinda, but they are not those mentioned in the contemporary list on papyrus still preserved at Monza, which refers exclusively to oils from shrines in Rome. These last are, it would seem, those in glass vessels (v. Frisi. Mon. della Chiesa Monzese, p. 66), some of which still preserve labels corresponding with the list. The leaden ampullæ probably contained oil from various holy places in Palestine. [OIL, HOLY, p. 1453.]

Other examples worth notice are the earthen flasks which contained oil from the shrine of St. Menas. [POTTERY, p. 1679.] Many of these have been found—nineteen are in the British Museum; and they have occurred in almost every country which borders on the Mediterranean. They are usually about four inches high, and from two and three-quarters to four inches wide. They usually bear effigies of St. Menas, with his attribute of two camels, and inscriptions, containing either the name of the saint only, or coupling with it the word "eulogia," i.e., blessings. The style of the figures is bad and rude, and they may perhaps be attributed to the 6th and early part of the 7th centuries.

The last-mentioned objects were evidently made for the purposes to which they have been applied; those which remain to be mentioned, on the contrary, are vessels originally intended for other uses. It will suffice to mention two very remarkable examples, which have been preserved in the treasury of the abbey of St. Maurice, in the Valais, from a period probably as early as that embraced in this work. One of these is known as the Vase of St. Martin, the tradition being that St Martin of Tours, visiting Agaunum, filled this vessel with earth from the place of the massacre of the Theban legion, mixed with the blood of the sufferers, which miraculously issued from the ground. It is an antique vase of sardonyx, measuring about four and a half inches in diameter, and about six in height, on which is sculptured in excellent style a subject believed to represent Achilles betraying his sex at the sight of weapons (v. Aubert, Trésor de l'Abbaye de St. Maurice, p. 181, pl. xvi.). This vase has a foot and neck of gold set with precious stones, and plates of garnet in fillets of gold, precisely in the same manner as the reliquary belonging to the same treasury which has been mentioned above.

The other vessel is a ewer of massive gold, nearly a foot in height, adorned with uncut sapphires and large plates of cloisonné enamel, the colours of which are extraordinarily rich and fine. According to tradition, this was sent by Haroun el Rashid to Charles the Great, and by him presented to the abbey. Whatever the value of the tradition may be, the vase may well date from a period sufficiently early to allow of its truth; it is more probably of Byzantine, than of oriental origin. It has, like the last-mentioned vase, been engraved and described by Aubert. This ewer is said to contain blood of the Theban martyrs. Both vessels have their mouths enveloped in some kind of string, and masses of wax, on which are impressions of episcopal seals, the legends of which are undecipherable.

As great an antiquity may no doubt be claimed for the second class of reliquaries, viz., that of those which were intended to be worn on the person, as for the first. Prudentius alludes to the practice of wearing RELICS, which of course implies cases to contain them, in the hymn celebrating Fructuosus and his fellow martyrs, Eulogius and Augurius (Peristeph. vi. v. 131):

"Tum de corporibus sacrae favillae
Et perfusa mero leguntur ossa
Quae raptim sibi quisque vindicabat
Fratrum tantus amor domum referre
Sanctorum cinerum dicata dona
Aut gestare sinu fidele pignus."

Many instances of the practice of wearing a "capsella," or "capsula," with relics, are to be found in succeeding centuries (v. De Rossi, Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1872, p. 17), and several examples have been found which may be confidently referred to the earlier centuries of Christianity. Two of these are given by De Rossi (Bull. 1872, Tav. 11, reliquary. (From De Rossi's 'Bull. di Arch. Crist.')

fig. 1, 3). The one bearing the labarum (see woodcut, p. 611) is of gold, and was found in 1571 in a tomb of the Vatican cemetery. It is not now known to exist, but the design has been preserved by a drawing by Alfano, and it has been published by Bosio. On the reverse was a figure of a dove. De Rossi is of opinion that it contained either a relic or some portion of the Gospel (v. Bull. 1872, p. 12, 1869, p. 63; as regards the practice; Bingham, Orig. Eccles. c. xi. chap. v. sect. 8, and b. xvi. chap. v. sect. 6), "parvula Evangelia," as they were termed: Martigny confidently asserts that this is of the 4th century. It may indeed be so, but all that can be said with certainty as to its date is, that it is not older.

The other example (see woodcut) is no doubt more recent. De Rossi gives it to the 5th century. It was purchased in Rome in 1872, and is made of thin plates of bronze, the space between them being not more than sufficient to contain a piece of parchment or of cloth. The subject on one side is clearly our Lord changing the water into wine, that on the other would seem to represent the martyrdom of St. Vitalis, who was placed in a pit or hole, at a place called ad Palmam, near Ravenna, and then crushed under a heap of stones (v. Bull. 1872, p. 10). The object contained in this encolpium was probably a fragment of cloth, perhaps dipped in the blood of the martyr; or perhaps a morsel of a brandeum which had been placed on his tomb.

Another and frequent form for a pendant reliquary was a cross. The oldest of these (if we can believe the tradition concerning it to be well-founded) now existing, is probably that preserved in the treasury of St. Peter's at Rome, under the name of "Encolpium Constantini Magni" (v. Bock, Kleinodien des Heil. Römischen Reiches, pl. xx. fig. 28, p. 115). Of this, only the cross which occupies the centre can have any pretensions to belong to the period of Constantine, the tablet in which it is enclosed being obviously Byzantine work of the 11th or some later century.

The cross itself has arms of equal length, and measures about one and a half inches in height and width. It contains a cross reputed to be of the real cross of our Lord, the receptacle containing which is surrounded by a border of blue and white enamel. Two very remarkable examples of such pectoral crosses exist in the treasury of the church of Monza. The earlier is that which has always been regarded as that which St. Gregory the Great sent to Queen Theodelinda, in A.D. 603, with a letter (Epp. lib. xiv. ep. 12), in which this passage occurs, "Excellentissimo autem filio nostro Adulouvaldo Regi transmitters phylacteria curavimus, id est crucem cum ligno sanctae crucis Domini et lectionem sancti evangelii theca persica inclusam." An engraving of this will be found under CRUCIFIX, p. 512; and it is only necessary here to say, that it is formed of gold, the figures and inscriptions being in niello, and covered by a piece of rock crystal; it measures three inches in height, by two and a half in breadth. In the interior is said to be a piece or pieces of the true cross. The best representation of this object which has been given, is that in Bock's Kleinodien, &c., app. p. 25. As the inscriptions on this cross are, in Greek, it has generally been assumed that it was of Byzantine origin. But this is hardly probable: Byzantine work of that period would have had a better and rather more classical character. On the other hand, it corresponds very closely in many points with the drawing of the Crucifixion in the famous manuscript Syriac Gospels, in the Medicean library at Florence, dated A.D. 586 [v. woodcut under CRUCIFIX], and it most probably came from Syria, or some adjoining country. Pope Gregory sent to Recared, king of the Visigoths, a cross, very probably of like fashion. It is mentioned in one of his Epistles (Ep. cxxii. lib. ix.) in these terms: "Crucem . . . in qua lignum Dominicæ crucis inest et capilli beati Johannis Baptistæ."

The other cross at Monza containing relics is that called the "Crux Regni," which belonged to Berengarius, king of Italy (ob. 924). It is perhaps beyond the period of this work, but a few words may be admitted, as it serves as an example of crosses of like character which come within it, and indeed may really be earlier in date than its possessor. It is of gold, thickly covered with precious stones, sapphires and others, chiefly cut en cabochon, and measures nearly nine and a half inches in height and breadth; the height is a little greater than the breadth. In the centre is a repository for a relic. Dr. Bock, who has given an engraving of it (pl. xxxiii.) is of opinion that although it has been used as a pectoral cross at coronations, it was originally attached to a votive crown, as were those of Agilulfus and of Reccesvinthus.

At Aix la Chapelle is preserved, within a crucifix of the 12th century, a small cross measuring two inches and three-eighths in height by one and a-half in width. On the upper limb of this is fastened a piece of wood, which, according to a respectable tradition, is a portion of the pectoral cross found on the body of Charles the Great, when his tomb was opened A.D. 1000. It is engraved in Dr. Bock's Der Reliquienschatz des Liebfrauen-Münsters zu Aachen, p. 36.

The cross engraved under ENCOLPION in this work, and by Martigny, is asserted by the latter to have been that of a bishop, and to be the oldest monument of the kind known to exist. De Rossi has given in his Bullettino (May, 1863) a long and careful dissertation on the question of its age, and arrives at the conclusion that it probably belongs to the 5th or 6th century. His reasonings appear well founded, but on one consideration he does not dwell, viz. that it was found in a tomb within the church of S. Lorenzo-fuor-le-Mura, near the repository of the martyr. Pelagius II. (A.D. 572-590) is stated in the Liber Pontif. to have built that portion of the church from its foundations. This is, perhaps, too strongly expressed, but no doubt he executed considerable works there; and as the first pope who was buried in a church was Leo I. in 462, and he only in the vestibule of the sacristy of St. Peter's, we can hardly suppose that any one would have been placed in such proximity to a martyr so venerated as St. Laurence until long after the time of Leo I. It may, therefore, seem probable, that although the cross may be of earlier date, the interment did not take place much before A.D. 600. There is no indication that the wearer had been a bishop, as Martigny asserts. On the sides monograms are engraved, and De Rossi makes several suggestions as to the name they contain, but declines to give a positive opinion. [A. N.]

REQUIEM. The Roman service for the dead has acquired this name from its proper anthem beginning with the words, "Requiem æternam dona eis, Domine" (see 2 Esdr. Vulg. 4 E. ii. 34). The versicle was not put to quite the same use within our period, but it appears as one of several little chapters ("capitula," Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 213; "versuum capitella," Opp. Greg. M. v. 23, ed. 1615) said after the prayers and psalms, "in Agenda Mortuorum, quando Anima egreditur de Corpore" (Mur. u. s.). In this use it is probably ante-Gregorian. In the Gelasian sacramentary only one capitulum is indicated, thus; "Dic Cāp. In memoria æterna" (Mur. u. s. i. 749); but as the offices were then committed to memory, several well-known versicles may be understood under this brief reference. In the later Gregorian antiphony, "Requiem," &c., already appears as the introit of the Mass for the departed (Antiph. Greg. in Pamel. Liturgica, ii. 175). [W. E. S.]

REREDOS (Fr. retable; Span. retablo). It is shewn by Viollet-le-Duc that the altars of the primitive church had no reredos (Dictionnaire raisonné de l'Architecture, vol. ii. p. 34). So long in fact as the bishop's seat was at the back of the altar, it was unlikely that he and the people should have been separated by such a screen. The rise of the reredos dates only from the period when the episcopal seats, and with them the choirs, were established in front of the altars. Towards the end of the 11th century, says the same writer, they had not in the West yet begun to push the altar back against a wall, but they erected upon it a reredos, which was most frequently a movable erection, and was made in metal or in wood. In France none is known earlier than the beginning of the 12th century. France, indeed, was slower to introduce these "parasite ornaments" than other parts of Europe. And Thiers (Dissert. sur les principaux Autels des Eglises) eulogizes the devotion of antiquity, which was content to do without "ces nouvelles inventions." It appears from the pages of Viollet-le-Duc (Dict. rais. art. Autel) that in France the cathedrals were the last to admit the reredos, and the longest preserved the ancient traditions of the altar.

In Spanish it appears that the term retablo was applied to the altar itself. The council of Elvira (A.D. 305) by its thirty-sixth canon enacted that pictures ought not to be in a church. Ferdinand de Mendoza writes a treatise on the canons of this council to Clement VIII. In the third book of it (upon the canon in question) he has the following: "Hinc fit probabile antiquitatem et originem eorum altarium (quæ Hispani Retablos vocant) Hispaniæ deberi, cum tabulis potius quam parietibus episcopi nostri sacras imagines religionis ergo pingi voluisse hoc ipso decreto videantur" (ap. Labbe, i. 1239c, ed. Par. 1671). [H. T. A.]

RESERVATION OF THE EUCHARIST.

Our earliest extra-scriptural account of the celebration of the Lord's Supper says: "The deacons communicate each of those present, and carry away to the absent of the blest bread and wine and water" (Justin Martyr, A.D. 140, Apol. i. 65). This liberty was necessary during the persecutions of that age. From other writers we infer that those to whom the Eucharist was taken at home were not bound to consume it immediately, or all at once, but might reserve a part, or all, for future occasions. In the course of time this liberty was extended, and we find persons present at the celebration themselves taking away and reserving of the sacred elements. Tertullian, at Carthage, 192, advises some who feared to break their fast by communicating, to "take the Lord's body and reserve it," until the fast was over (De Orat. 19). The same writer speaks of a Christian woman as partaking of the sacrament at home, "secretly before all food" (ad Ux. ii. 5). This seems to imply a frequent, perhaps daily, reception of the reserved Eucharist. St. Cyprian, bishop of the same city, A.D. 251, tells the story of a woman who, "attempting to open with unworthy hands her casket in which the holy of the Lord was stored, was deterred by a fire rising out of it" (De Lapsis, 132, ed. Brem.). The murderers of Tharsiscus, a deacon of Rome, 257, found him "carrying about him the sacraments of the Lord's body" (Damasus, Carm. 35; Surius, Aug. 2, Acta Stephani, p. 13). So some Christians in danger at sea have with them "the divine sacrament of the faithful" (Ambr. de Excess. Fratr. i. 43). The sister of Gregory of Nazianzum, praying for restoration to health, mingled with her tears "whatever her hand had treasured of the antitypes of the precious body and blood" (Greg. Naz. Or. viii. 18). St. Jerome, A.D. 398, speaks of a poor bishop as "carrying the Lord's body in a wicker basket, His blood in a vessel of glass" (Epist. 125 ad Rust. § 20); and of some who, deeming themselves for a special reason unfit to go to church, inconsistently communicated in private on the same day, obviously of reserved elements (Ep. 48 ad Pammach. § 15). St. Basil tells us that "at Alexandria and in Egypt the laity for the most part had every one the communion in their own houses" (Ep. 93 ad Caes. Patric.). It was thus that provision was made for the communions of monks, nuns, and hermits: "All those who dwell alone in the desert, where there is no priest, keep the communion at home, and receive it at their own hands" (ibid.). We might gather as much from an instance in Palladius, 401 (Hist. Laus. 61). In 527, a law of Justinian orders the appointment of an approved presbyter or deacon to "carry the holy communion" to monks and nuns (Novell. cxxiii. 36).

Abuse.—Reservation in private houses naturally led to abuse, especially when persecution had ceased. St. Augustine, in 430, mentions a case in which "a poultice was made of the Eucharist" (Cont. Julian. iii. 162). Some heretics pretended to communicate publicly, but took all away with them from one wrong motive or another (Conc. Caesaraug. A.D. 380, can. 3; Conc. Tolet. 400, can. 14). Later, the Eucharist was abused to witchcraft (Caesar. Heisterb. Dial. Mirac. ix. 6, 9; Conc. Later. iv. can. 20, &c.).

Prohibition.—Abuse led to suppression. The earliest prohibition, if it be assigned to the right age, is that of an Armenian canon of the 4th century, which generally forbids presbyters to "take the Eucharist from the church to the houses of laymen, and there impart to them the sacred bread" (Canones Isaaci, in Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. x. 280). The council of Saragossa, 380: "If any one is proved not to have taken the grace of the Eucharist in church after receiving it, let him be anathema for ever" (can. 3). By the council of Toledo (above) it was decreed that for this offence a person should be "expelled as one guilty of sacrilege."

The only certain instance of reservation by a lay person with which I meet after the 5th century, occurs in the Pratum Spirituale (79) of John Moschus, 630. He mentions, however, that the sacrament had been laid up in the house "according to the custom of the country" (Seleucia); from which we should infer that it was at least almost extinct elsewhere. But bishops, priests, and monks continued to reserve. Thus we read of a bishop, Birinus, of Dorchester, who carried the Eucharist wrapped in his pall (Vita, Surius, Dec. 3), and of priests who, as was "then the custom of many, carried it as a safeguard by the way" (Vita Laurentii, 7, Sur. Nov. 14), and of a monk who was able to send it to another at a distance (Joan. Mosch. Pr. Spir. 29). Greek monks (Arcudius de Concord. Eccl. Oc. et Or. iii. 59), and the bishops of Rome (Lorinus, Comm. in Ps. lvii. 2), have retained to modern times the custom of carrying it on a journey.

Various Uses.—The reserved sacrament was used in communions of the PRESANCTIFIED (p. 1696), as a token of inter-communion [EULOGIA, Vol. I. p. 628], as FERMENTUM for other celebrations (I. 668), for the communion of newly ordained priests (669), for deposition in tombs [OBSEQUES, § xix., p. 1434], for the consecration of churches and altars, and for the communion of the sick. The two last-named uses we propose to consider here.

Deposition in Altars.—It was probably in the 7th century that the church of Rome introduced the practice of depositing, at the dedication of a church, portions of the consecrated bread under or in a cavity made in the mensa of the altar. Owing to the lateness of the extant MSS. only one Roman pontifical now known, viz. the Codex Ratoldi, prescribes this rite: "Ponat tres portiones corporis Domini intus et tres incensi" (Sacram. Gregor. Ménard, n. 580; Opp. Greg. M. iii. 436, ed. Ben.). In the Roman books this practice was part of the order of consecration; but when the English borrowed it, they treated it as a separate rite, to be observed after the consecration. Thus the council of Chalchyth, 816, having directed that "all be performed in order as in the service book," adds, "Afterwards, let the Eucharist which has been consecrated by the bishop at the same service be inclosed with other relics in a casket, and kept in the same basilica" (can. 2). On this principle we find the order for the inclosure of the sacrament an addition or appendix to the forms of dedication in the early English pontificals. See that of Egbert of York, 732–766 (p. 46, ed. Surtees Soc.), that formerly preserved at Jumièges, now No. 362 in the public library at Rouen (Mart. u. s. ii. 254), which is assigned to the latter part of the reign of Charlemagne, and the pontifical of St. Dunstan, 961 (ib. 257). The two latter pontificals expressly ascribe this rite to Rome in the heading, "Here begins the Order of the Deposition of the Relics in the holy Roman Church." The council of Chalchythe (u. s.) and St. Dunstan (u. s.) imply an opinion that the Eucharist was more important than the relics generally inclosed with it. The former says: "If he is not able to inclose other relics, yet may this profit more than all, because it is the body of Our Lord Jesus Christ."

Not one of the French orders which prescribe this rite is earlier than the end of the 9th century, to which period belong the pontificals of Rheims, Noyons, and Sens (Mart. ii. 260, 261, 272). It is found in many later down to the 15th century (ib. 243). It was practised also in Germany, as we learn from a Salzburg pontifical of the 11th century (Mart. u. s. 243). For its later history and suppression, see Notitia Eucharistica, 917-918, ed. 2.

For the Sick.—Among the absent to whom, as Justin Martyr tells us, the Eucharist was sent in the 2nd century would be some absent from sickness, but we cannot say when it began to be reserved by the celebrant expressly for their sake. As the primitive church had no office of private celebration for the sick, this was probably done at a very early period. Eusebius, near the beginning of the 4th century, tells us of a dying man who sent for a priest to communicate him, and the Eucharist, which must have been reserved, was taken to him by another (Hist. Eccl. vi. 44). The Armenian canon of the same century permits one exception to the prohibition already quoted, viz. "on account of sickness." When St. Ambrose was dying, 420, a priest, warned of his state, carried the Eucharist to him (Paulinus, in Vit. S. Ambr. 47). Philip-picus, A.D. 597, anticipating a violent death, "sought to receive the body of the Lord." It was in the night, and the danger sudden, so that reservation is necessarily implied (Anast. Biblioth. Hist. Eccl. 83). After this period testimonies to the practice are very frequent. It is expressly ordered by a council of Tours, cited by Regino, that "the sacred oblation be laid up for the viaticum of persons departing this life" (De Discipl. Eccl. i. 70).

Reservation in both Kinds.—We read that in a tumult at Constantinople, A.D. 403, soldiers entered the place "where the holy things were stored up, and the most holy blood of Christ was spilt on the garments of the said soldiers" (Chrysost. Epist. ad Innoc. 3). Travellers by sea had "the body and blood of the Redeemer with them" (Greg. M. A.D. 590, Dial. iii. 36). St. Mary of Egypt, when dying, A.D. 629, received "in a small cup a portion of the undefiled body and precious blood" (Vita, iv. 34, in Bolland. Apr. 2). The same thing is related of SS. Odilia (Mabill. præf. i. in Sæc. Bened. iii.), Chad (Vita, ii. 9, Boll. Mar. 2), and Cuthbert (Bede, Vita S. Cuth. x. 6) in the same century. Bede, 701, orders the sick to be "refreshed with the body and blood" (Regino de Disc. Eccl. i. 119). The words of delivery in every order for the communion of the sick during the 8th and two following centuries recognize the reception, and therefore the reservation, of both kinds: "The body and blood of the Lord be unto thee," &c., and the like (Capit. 2. Theodulf, Baluze, Miscell. ii. 104, ed. 2; Book of Deer, 90; Liber de Arbutnott, pr.

xix., xxii.; Martene, u. s. i. vii. 6, n. 3; Not. Euch. 1022). Even in the 11th century we find in a Salzburg pontifical the express order: "Let the priests communicate him with the body and blood," &c. (Mart. u. s. ord. 15). Yet it would seem that in the 9th century some already neglected to reserve the wine, for the canon of Tours already cited orders the oblation reserved for the sick to be "steeped in the blood of Christ [SPOON, EUCHARISTIC], that the presbyter may be able truthfully to say to the sick, 'The body and blood,'" &c.

The reserved Eucharist is sometimes spoken of simply as "bread" (Tert. ad Ux. ii. 5), or "the body," &c. (Jerome, Ep. 48, ad Pammach. § 15), but we cannot infer from this that the body only was ever reserved at the time, for we find this language used of public as well as private communions, and all acknowledge that the former were invariably in both kinds. With Tertullian (de Orat. 14) and Jerome (u. s.) "reception of the body" is the public reception in church, the equivalent of which, in the Armenian canon before cited, is "drawing near to the bread."

In the Greek church the practice of intinction has kept up the reservation of the blood to this day. The consecrated bread being "broken into little particles [called Margaritæ, or pearls], and sufficiently tinged and moistened in the consecrated wine, they take them out of the chalice, and dry them in a small dish set under a pan of coals, and then put them into a pyx or box to be reserved" (Smith, Greek Church, 162; Leo Allat. de Recent. Gr. Templ. 145). This is done on Maundy Thursday, and the particles so treated serve for the aliturgic days of Lent, and for the sick.

The Renewal of the reserved Eucharist.—Few notices of this occur within our period. The earliest is in a canon of Isaac III., an Armenian catholicus of the 7th century, by which the Eucharist is to be reserved "only from Lord's day to Lord's day, or from sacrifice to sacrifice" (can. 9, Mai, Script. V. N. Coll. x. 301). In the West the canon of Tours, preserved by Regino, 906, says: "Let it always be changed from one third day to another" (u. s.). Later rules vary from a week to a month (Not. Euch. 915).

The Vessel containing the reserved Sacrament.—When this was taken home, during the age of persecution, it was placed in a casket, which St. Cyprian (de Lapsis, 132) calls ARCA. Turris was the common name for the vessel in which the FERMENTUM was kept in churches from the 6th century downwards, at least in France, because "the Lord's sepulchre was cut in the rock into the likeness of a tower" (German. Paris. A.D. 555, Expos. Miss. Brev.). See the alleged will of Remigius, 533, in App. ad Liburg. Gall. 466; Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. i. 85. Venantius Fortunatus has a poem on such a turris (iii. 13). A Benedictio Calicis et Patenæ et Turris occurs in the Besançon sacramentary (Mus. Ital. i. 389). In the 8th century we find this vessel called capsa at Rome (Ord. Rom. i. 8, 10). See CAPSA. Pyxis, afterwards universal, seems to have come into use in the 9th century. "Every presbyter shall have a pyx or vessel worthy of so great a sacrament, in which the Lord's body is to be carefully kept" (Conc. Turon. in Regino, De Discipl. Eccl. i. 70; see also the Articles of Visitation, p. 6, ed. Baluze Admon. Synod. Leon.

iv.; Labb. Conc. viii. 34). Columba was another name. Perpetuus of Tours (471) in his will speaks of a peristerium (the canopy over the columba), and a silver dove for a repository" (App. Opp. Greg. Tur. 1319). See DOVE. Yet another was Chrismale (Missale Francorum in Lit. Gall. 316). See CHRISMAL. A later name, which we find in England, Ireland, and France, was cuppa (Hist. Episc. Autiss. 57, in Martene de Ant. Ecol. Rit. i. v. 3 n. 8; Instructio Decanorum, Synodi Meldensis, in Mart. et Dur. Thesaur. Anecd. iv. 930, &c. See Ducange in v.). Ciborium, originally the name of the vaulted canopy over the altar (see Vol. I. p. 66), was also used in this sense (Chron. Centul. ii. 10, iii. 3, in Dach. Spicil. iv. 467, 480, 487). The Greeks keep the consecrated bread reserved for the sick in a box which they call the ἀρτοφόριον, or bread-holder. "This box, whether of silver or wood, is put up into a silken case, the better to defend what is inclosed from cobwebs, or anything that may defile it, and is hung up usually behind the altar against the wall, with a lamp or two, for the most part, burning before it" (Smith, Greek Church, 162). [W. E. S.]

RESIDENCE (RESIDENTIA PAROCHORUM). There are many proofs, both in the decrees of councils and in imperial edicts, that the evil of non-residence on the part of the parochial clergy had made itself felt from the earliest times as an evil which required to be strictly guarded against. At the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (c. 16), complaint was made that the presbyters and deacons of the region round Thessalonica were habitually attracted by the seductions of the capital city, and induced to take up their abode there for an unreasonable length of time. The council therefore extended to the parochial clergy the decree that had been made about bishops (c. 12), that they should not be absent from their parishes more than three Sundays. The council held in Constantinople, A.D. 692 (Conc. Quinisex. c. 80), prohibited any of the clergy or laity from being absent from their parish church for more than three Sundays, except under plea of necessity. In case of disobedience, the clergy were to be deprived of their preferment, and the laity excommunicated. Justinian (Novell. cxxiii. 9) includes all the clergy in the law which forbade bishops to be absent from their see for more than a year except on imperial business. Gregory the Great (lib. iv., Indict. 12, Ep. 13) commends a sentence of deposition which had been passed upon a presbyter who had been absent from his parish, but adds, that the presbyter asserts that he had duly obtained leave of absence from the bishop, and been unavoidably detained by illness. He therefore directs that a fresh examination should be made into the circumstances of the case. A capitulary of Charles the Great (V. c. 329) complains that bishops, priests, and deacons, from motives of gain or pleasure, were in the habit of travelling to distant parts of the country, leaving their parishes destitute of the means of grace, and neglecting the duties of hospitality, and strictly forbids the practice except in cases of inevitable necessity. The fourth council of Paris, A.D. 829 (c. 29), recites in strong terms the evils caused to country parishes by their clergy being sent from them to transact legal business for their bishops. At a council held at Rome, A.D. 853, Leo IV. complained that a certain Anastasius, a cardinal priest ("presbyter cardinis nostri") had been absent from his church for five years, although repeatedly cited to reside. The sentence of the council was that Anastasius should be deposed.

During Pestilence.—It appears to have been reckoned as shameful for the clergy to desert their posts in time of pestilence, as in time of persecution, such seasons being always regarded as especial calls to more earnest work, and favourable opportunities for making impression on the people. A few examples will suffice.

Cyprian, in his treatise De Mortalitate, written on the occasion of a terrible pestilence, recounts the reasons by which the faithful were to be persuaded to remain in the afflicted cities, adding, that this afforded them a splendid opportunity of returning good for evil, by succouring their persecutors in the hour of their necessity. Gregory Nyssen, in his Life of Gregory Thaumaturgus (p. 958 B. Migne, Patrol.) speaks of his conduct during a pestilence in the city of Neo-caesarea, of the confidence which the sick reposed in his power to drive away the disease by his prayers, and the influence which he gained over the profligate and unbelievers. Eusebius (H. E. vii. 22) gives some fragments of the epistles of Dionysius of Alexandria, in which he speaks of the noble conduct of the Christians of that city during a plague, narrating how they helped in every way, not only their fellow-citizens, but even the heathen, tending the sick, burying the dead, and in many instances, especially in the case of presbyters and deacons, themselves catching the pestilence and dying. This he contrasts with the conduct of the heathen, who avoided all communication with the sick, and cast out their dead into the roads. Gregory the Great (Epist. viii. 41) urges Dominicus, bishop of Carthage, to remain at his post during a pestilence, and not only do all he could to assuage the sufferings it caused, but to make it a time for earnest exhortation while the hearts of men, made tender by fear, were open to receive his exhortations to repentance. That Gregory inculcated such conduct, not only by precept but by example, appears in his Life by John the Deacon. It is there stated (i. 39–43) that he took possession of his see while a fierce pestilence was raging, and encountered the evil with processions and public meetings for prayer; that during one of these meetings eighty people died, but that Gregory never ceased from prayer and supplication till the plague was stayed. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. viii. 2) relates that Salvius, bishop of Alby, in Narbonne, remained at his post when the city was devastated by pestilence, urging the people to repentance and prayer; and again (id. ix. 22) that Theodorus of Marseilles, on a like occasion, remained in the church of St. Victor with the few who were untouched by the pestilence, in earnest prayer for its cessation. The sixteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 693, in the recital of their proceedings, affixed to their decrees (Bruns. Canon i. p. 379) notes that the bishops of Narbonne were prevented from attending by the pestilence then raging in their country. [P. O.]

RESPONSORIA (or psalmi responsorii, or psalmi), a technical name for the psalms or portions of psalms which were said or sung between the lections in the various offices of the church. Speaking of the divine office as arranged according to the Hours in the Breviary, Radulfus said: "Sunt etiam in officio divino brevia responsoria, quae in officio Romano ad parvas horas, ut ad primam, tertiam, sextam, nonam, et completorium dicuntur, et de psalmis sumuntur excepta prima," &c. (De Can. Observ. Liber, Prop. xii.). Minute regulations as to their order and form in the Hours in the 8th century are laid down by Amalarius (de Ord. Antiphon. lib. cc. 71-80). But the term is more frequently used to denote those psalms which are interposed between the lections in the Ordo Missae, and which are represented by the Gradual, Tract, &c. in the modern missal. The title "responsorium" is employed instead of gradual throughout the antiphony of Gregory, as printed in Pamelius (Liturg. ii. 62-176; Gerbert. Liturg. Aleman. i. 308; Hugo a S. Victore, Erudit. Theol. i. 18). It was originally a long passage from Scripture, consisting of a whole psalm or canticle, for which an extract of a few verses was substituted at a very early date. The use of a whole psalm survives in the Armenian and Coptic liturgies (Hammond, C. E. Anc. Lit. pp. 145, 199), and was exemplified in the old Gallican rite by the position of the hymn of Zecharias before the first, and of the song of the three children before the third lection.

1. The title "responsorium" is said to be due to the antiphonal form which these psalms assumed in the mode of singing, and to the form of versicle and response, "vocata hoc nomine quod uno canente chorus consonando respondeat" (Isid. Hisp. de Ecc. Offic. i. 8), "quod alio desinente id alter respondeat" (Rabanus Maur. de Institut. Cleric. i. 33), "quod quoniam alternatim cantatur, unde et nominatur responsorium" (Hugo a S. Victore, Erudit. Theol. i. 18). According to other rituals the term is derived from the responsory answering to the preceding lesson, "quod a capite repetatur" (Alcuin de Div. Offi. ed. Hittorp. p. 69). "Dicuntur enim a respondendo; tristitia namque tristibus et laeta laetis debemus succinere lectionibus" (Rupert de Div. Offic. i. 15). It was mystically interpreted to represent the active life, as the alleluia which followed it represented the contemplative life (Amalar. de Ecc. Offic. i. 35). Other mystical meanings are worked out at great length (ibid. iii. 11-14). The difference between antiphons and responsories lay in the mode of singing. "Inter responsoria et antiphonas hoc differt quod in responsoriis unus dicat versum, in antiphonis autem alternent versibus chori" (Raban. Maur. de Institut. Cleric. i. 33).

2. The date of the introduction of "responsoria" into the liturgy cannot be fixed with accuracy. They were popularly, but without sufficient evidence, said to have been invented by the Italians, as antiphons were invented by the Greeks (Raban. Maur. de Institut. Cleric. lib. 1), a supposition which is perhaps based on the late Latinity of the term by which they are technically known. Allusions to them in the following authors and documents, Eastern and Western, prove their use at various early dates, and justify the placing of their introduction by Amalarius "longo ante tempore," or by Martene, "ab ipso evangelii exordio" (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. ii. 17, interpretante Rufino; Ambros. ad Marcellinam; Augustin. in Praefat. ad Psalmos 46, 99; Chrysost. Hom. 36, in 1 Cor. ad finem.; Sozomen, Hist. Ecc. v. 19; St. Benedicti Regula, c. ix.).

3. The normal portion of the "psalmus responsorius" was between the lections in the breviary offices, and between the Epistle and Gospel in the Liturgy. This was the case in the Roman liturgy passim, in the African (Augustin. Serm. x. de Verb. Apost. tom. v. p. 839; Hom. xxxiii. de Verb. Dom.), in the Gallican (Germani. Paris. Expos. Brevis. § 7); but in the Mozarabic liturgy, where, as in the Gallican, three lections occurred in each missa, the full responsory intervened between the first (lectio prophetica) and the second (apostolus).

4. The psalmus was originally sung by a single cantor, afterwards by several cantors, the response being taken up by the whole choir (Ordo Rom. i. § 10; ii. § 7; Raban. Maur. de Institut. Cleric. ii. 51); but there was some variety of custom on this point. According to the ordinary rule a lector was chosen for this office. "Praecentor psalmi responsorii usitatus ex ordine erat lectorum" (Thomasius, in Praef. ad Rom. Antiphon.). In the Anglo-Saxon church it was sung by a priest (Theodore, Penitent. ii. 11) or a layman (ibid. i. 10). In the Gallican church by a deacon (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 3) or by children, "nisi tantummodo responsorium quod a parvulis canetur" (German. Paris. Expos. Brev. § 7).

5. It was sung on the step from which the epistle had been read (Ordo Rom. ii. 7), whence its more modern and familiar title of Gradual. It was said or sung originally by heart, but at a later period the responsories were collected together in a book called the Responsoriale. The arrangement of its parts differed slightly in Rome and Gaul (Amalar. Prologus de Ordine Antiphon.). It was sometimes prefaced by an announcement of the passage of Scripture from which it was taken (Cassiodorus, cap. ii. Praefat. in Psalm.), and was usually followed by the Gloria Patri, according to the direction of the rule of St. Benedict (for Nocturns) and of the fourth council of Toledo (can. 15), which also alludes to its permitted omission in the case of the penitential psalms (can. 16). The cantor was vested in an alb, as we may gather from the twenty-third canon of the council of Laodicea, which forbids his wearing a stole, and from the eleventh canon of the second council of Bracara, which forbids his wearing ordinary dress. RESURRECTION AND LAST JUDGMENT. It is difficult to say with certainty how far representations of this tremendous subject really belong to early Christian art, that is to say to that period of it which ends with the death of Charles the Great. Though many of the great mosaics after the 6th century represent the Lord in glory, attended by saints, they do not, as at periods nearer the middle ages, set forth His sentence on the wicked or the righteous. That of the Duomo of Torcello is probably the earliest remaining instance on a mural scale. The various sketches of the condemnation of the wicked, and the very numerous hells of the Utrecht Psalter, are no doubt prior to them. The Psalter of Athelstan (late 9th century) has its concourse of saints and glorification of our Lord, which quite anticipates the crowded mediaeval-Gothic Paradises.

Lord Lindsay refers the great judgment mosaic of Torcello to the 12th century, when a reaction or renaissance of Byzantine art took place under the Comneni. Its Inferno has much ghastly imagination in the representation of the sea, Amphitrite in person, giving up her dead, the worms writhing from fleshless skulls, &c. This, with the varieties of torture represented in the smaller compartments, would be almost decisive as to its late date; but Prof. Ruskin and the Marchese Selvatico appear to think it probable that this mosaic, or parts of it, may have been among the decorations of the original island-church of Torcello, built in A.D. 641. (See Appendix to Stones of Venice, vol. ii.) If the mosaics are really 7th century, they are, as far as the present writer knows, unique as to subject and treatment for that time; and their ghastly imagery would seem to indicate a later date. They certainly anticipate the imaginations of Giotto and Orgagna, as the latter influenced the works of Michel Angelo in the Sistine, by his frescoes in the Campo Santo of Pisa. There is a peculiarity noticed by Prof. Ruskin in the Torcellese artist's conception of the everlasting fire, not as a conflagration or fiery prison-house, or personified monster, as in later days, but as a red stream issuing from beneath the throne of God. It is suggested under TORMENT, PLACE OF, that the representation of an actual mouth of hell, so common in the middle ages, may be derived from the tion of the Last Judgment at Mount Sinai; and the one or two at the convent of Mar Saba seem of late date. There are many at Mount Athos, but Mr. H. F. Tozer considers them entirely out of our period. In Messrs. Texier and Pullan's Byzantine Architecture, p. 41, mention is made of several last judgments, none at all early. The subject is said in this work to be entirely Byzantine, and derived from Egypt, to be in fact a repetition of the psychostasis of antiquity. The sculptures in tympana of church porches in the West during the 13th and 14th centuries are very frequently of Byzantine derivation.

A heathen painting of judgment, or presentation of the soul after death to the lower powers, has been found in the catacomb of St. Prætextatus. (See Perret, i. 73.) "Diespiter" and "Mercurius Nuntius" are named in it, as also Alcestis. See also the "Inductio Vibies" in the Gnostic catacomb (Parker, Appendix to Catacombs, p. 174; Perret, vol. i. No. 73), which certainly represents the presentation of the dead Vivia to some assembled divinities. [R. J. T.]

RESURRECTION OF OUR LORD. See CRUCIFIX. This subject forms part of several of the early crucifixions. There seems to have been a feeling on the part of scribes or their patrons that the true impression of the event of the Lord's death could only be given in one view with His victory over death. The annexed woodcut (No. 1) is a striking representation of the Resurrection from the Rabula MS. in the Laurentine Library at Florence. As subjects drawn from the passion of our Lord are very rare in early Christian art, it is not very surprising that His resurrection does not occur often. The following examples, given by Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile, vol. ii. ppl. 92, 93, 94, will amount to a tolerable list.

In sculpture, a well-known Lateran sarcophagus of the 4th century gives the monogram, inscribed in the circle of a victor's wreath of bay or olive, and elevated on a large cross, which forms its upright P. Two soldiers resting on their shields are placed beneath its arms.

No. 1. Resurrection, MS. of Rabul. (From Assemani's Catalogus Bibliothecae Laurentianae.)

roaring mouth or passage from the infernal regions described in the vision in Plato's Republic, bk. x.; but its not being found in this mosaic may render the connexion less plausible.

The present writer remembers no representa-

Martigny mentions a lamp figured by Giorgi, de Monogrammate Christi, p. 10, of nearly the same device, with the addition of a tablet with the motto of the Labarum, EN TOVHTO NIKAI; also a marble tomb at Nîmes, and a sarcophagus at Soissons (Le Blant, Inscr. de la Gaule, p. 304). Rohault de Fleury speaks of a fragment of a similar sarcophagus in the Vatican, which bears the upright monogram, ornamented, and without the cross. See also Aringhi, i. 311, a drawing from a Vatican sarcophagus which belonged to a private palace in his day.

No. 2. Symbolic Resurrection, Sarcophagus in the Lateran.

The 6th century ivory of the Vatican, Rohault de Fleury, ii. pl. 92, represents the soldiers resting on their shields as supporters, with two of the Maries above them. The sepulchre is a square building, surmounted by a Lombard cupola and supported by two pillars. On one of its doors (the other is omitted in the carving—as broken), there seems to be a bas-relief of the Raising of Lazarus, treated as in the catacombs. In pl. 94 he gives two 8th century ivories, now at Munich; one of the three Maries, the other of St. Mary Magdalene alone, greeted in both cases by the angel of the resurrection. They are attached to an 11th century evangeliary, but he thinks they may probably be of the time of Charles the Great.

In mosaic, the church of S. Apollinare nella Città at Ravenna, is the only example we know of (R. de Fleury, pl. 93, 6th century). In this example the sepulchre is a regular Greek circular temple, a peristyle, with architrave and flat dome roof. The broken door leans across the entrance. An angel sits on the left, with nimbus and wings, white robe and wand. He addresses two women, the first of them clad in a violet tunic and brown robe.

Besides these, Martigny mentions two tombs containing this subject; one belonging to the crypt of St. Maximin (Momun. de Ste. Madeleine), another is from the sarcophagus of St. Celsus at Milan, (Bugati, Mem. di S. Celso, p. 242, tav. 1). He gives a woodcut of it. One is pointing to the napkin or grave-clothes, in the condition observed by St. Peter and St. John (John xx. 5, 6); the other sees the angel. On the right of the sepulchre—which is circular, has a round arched doorway, and obtusely gabled roof—the Lord appears to St. Thomas and another saint.

Finally, there is a resurrection on one of the reliquaries sent by St. Gregory the Great to Theodelinda of Lombardy (Mozzoni, Tav. di Stor. Eccl. vii. 97). St. Mary Magdalene prostrates herself before the Lord; two trees and a fountain represent the garden; and on one of St. Gregory's phials or oil vessels, sent at the same time, and now at Monza, there is an angel with two Maries. See CRUCIFIX, p. 516, vol. i.; and a medallion published by Münter, Symbolism, part i. tab. 1, No. 4; with the word ANACTAGIC. The chief Christian symbolisms of the Resurrection are the universally-occurring figures of Jonah, and the less frequent one of Samson with the gates of Gaza (Buonarroti, Vetri, tav. 1, fig. 1). The Raising of Lazarus will be found s. v.; but the peacock and the ark of Noah can hardly be considered (as by De Fleury) as symbolisms specially directed to this subject. [R. J. T.]

REVENUES. [PROPERTY.]

REVERIANUS, June 1, bishop; commemorated at Autun (Mart. Usuard; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 40). [C. H.]

REVERSION (Regressus). Instances of securing the right of reversion to a bishopric are not unfrequent in the history of the early church, sometimes by desire of the people, at other times apparently by the will of the ruling bishop, but always under peculiar circumstances.

Eusebius (H. E. vi. 11) speaks of Alexander being appointed coadjutor to the aged Narcissus, bishop of Jerusalem, evidently with the right of succession, and H. E. vii. 32 says that Theotecnus, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, ordained a certain Anatolius to the episcopate with the intention of making him his assistant and successor.

Socrates (H. E. v. 5) says that in order to heal a schism that existed in the church of Antioch (A.D. 379) in consequence of there being two bishops, Meletius and Paulinus, exercising their functions at the same time in the see, the people assembled those of the clergy who were considered worthy to be entrusted with the bishopric, and bound them by an oath that whenever either of the two bishops should die, the survivor should be permitted to retain undisputed possession of the see (compare Theodoret, H. E. v. 3, with note by Vales.); and H. E. vii. 46 relates how Paul, the Noratian bishop of Constantinople, when on his death-bed, was not only permitted, but requested by his presbyters to select his own successor.

Sozomen (H. E. ii. 20) says that Maximus, who had been ordained bishop of Diospolis by Macarius, bishop of Jerusalem, was appointed by the people coadjutor and successor to Macarius himself, and in due time succeeded to the see.

But these instances run contrary to the general intention of the church as expressed in the decrees of councils. Thus the Apostolic Canons (c. 75) forbid a bishop to ordain any of his relations, giving as a reason that the principle of hereditary succession ought not to be introduced into the church, οὐ γὰρ τὴν τοῦ θεοῦ ἐκκλησίαν ὑπὸ κληρονόμουσιν ὀφείλει τιθέναι. The council of Antioch, A.D. 341 (c. 23), expressly forbids any bishop to constitute (καθιστᾶν) any one as his successor, and provides that such appointment, if made, shall be void. The fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633 (c. 19), numbers among the clergy disqualified for bishoprics those who have been appointed by their predecessors in the see: and the fifth council of Paris (c. 2) forbids any bishop during his lifetime to appoint a successor unless under certain conditions. See COADJUTOR BISHOP, p. 398. [P. O.]

REVOCATUS, March 7, commemorated at Tuburbum (Mart. Usuard.); apparently the one mentioned in Mart. Hieron. Feb. 5. [C. H.]

RHEIMS, alleged Council of (Remense Concilium). A.D. 625. First mentioned in the history of the church of Rheims by Flodoard, one of its canons, in the 10th century. According to him, it was summoned by Sonnatius, bishop of Rheims, attended by forty or more bishops, and passed twenty-five canons, in which allusion is made more than once to the synod of Paris, A.D. 615. Nor is their general tone dissimilar. But, according to Burchard and others, it passed twenty-two more, which he omits, all confessedly the work of the 8th and 9th centuries. And these (coupled with the twenty-one statutes of Sonnatius, as they are called, which are no less apocryphal), must discredit everything else reported of his episcopate, for which no earlier authentic proof can be had (Mansi, x. 593-604). [E. S. Ff.]

RHENO. We learn from Isidore (Etym. xix. 23. 4) that rheno is the name of a garment covering the shoulders and chest, and reaching down to the waist, specially intended for protection against the rain. According to Sallust (Isidore, l. c.) it was worn by the Germans. The derivation is uncertain. We can hardly agree with Isidore, that it is to be found in Rhenus, the river Rhine, because of the use of the garment in the adjacent country. Another theory connects it with the name of the reindeer, from whose skin it may have been made. It is perhaps more likely that it is to be connected with ῥῆν, so that it would merely mean a sheepskin. See Ducange's Glossarium, s. v. [R. S.]

RICHARIUS, Ap. 26, presbyter and confessor; commemorated at Centula (St. Riquier) (Mart. Usuard., Notker.; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. iii. 441); Oct. 9 (Mart. Hieron.). [C. H.]

RIEZ (in Provence), COUNCIL OF (Regense, or Reginense Concilium), A.D. 439. Caused by the uncanonical act of two bishops in consecrating to the see of Embrun without any reference to their metropolitan or their colleagues. It was attended by twelve bishops, of whom Hilary, bishop of Arles, in whose jurisdiction Embrun then lay, subscribed first. Its eight canons are partly directed against the offenders, and partly to prevent any similar offences in future (Mansi, v. 1189-1200). [E. S. Ff.]

RIGAE. [RUGAE.]

RIMAS or RIMNAS, Jan. 20, martyr with Innas and Pinna, disciples of St. Andrew the apostle (Bas. Menol. ii. 124; Cal. Byzant.). [C. H.]

RIMINI, COUNCIL OF, A.D. 359 (ARIMINENSE CONCILIUM). Two councils, of which the first, that at Rimini, was entirely composed of Western prelates, and an Eastern assembling at Seleucia, the capital of Isauria, were convoked about the same time. There were more than four hundred present, of whom but eighty were Arians. The Nicene faith was accordingly received, all later formulas rejected, and four or five Arian bishops condemned. Ten deputies were sent with these decisions to Constantius. But meanwhile the Acaicians proceeding to Constantinople gained over the emperor, and sent the last creed of Sirmium to Rimini to be received there. At first the council steadily refused compliance, whereupon Ursacius and Valens, two of the condemned bishops, hurried off to Nicaea, overtook and duped the deputies that had been sent from Rimini, and then returning thither themselves with count Taurus, who had orders to do whatever they told him, revolutionized the council, forced it at a subsequent meeting to subscribe to this creed, and adopt Arianism. "Ingenuit totus orbis, et Arianum se esse miratus est," says St. Jerome, who summarizes its proceedings (Adv. Lucif. c. 17-19. Compare the documents in Mansi, iii. 293-316, and the discussion on them in Hefele, ii. 251-361, Eng. Tr.). [E. S. Ff.]

RINGS. The finger-ring used as a signet goes as far back as very early Egyptian times. It has continued to be used for the same purpose in all ages down to the present day, but in process of time has come to be employed for other purposes also. Rings may indicate official rank or the espoused or married state, or may be used as ornaments, or pressed into the service of devotion. Wealthy Christians in the times of the apostles wore gold rings (James ii. 2). The Ante-nicene and Post-nicene fathers alike find it necessary to declare against the prodigality of Christians in wearing rings and gems. (See Tertull. de Hab. Mulier. c. 5; Apol. c. 6; Clem. Alex. Paed. lib. iii. c. 11; Cyprian de Hab. Virg. c. 14; Basil, Homil. ad Divit. c. 4; Hieron. Epist. ad Laet. c. 5). One of the earliest notices of a finger-ring in Church history occurs in the Acts of the Martyrs Perpetua and Felicitas (circa 202 A.D.), where we read that the martyr Saturus drew a ring from off the finger (ansulam de digito petiit) of Pudens, a soldier, who witnessed his sufferings, and returned it to him covered with his own blood (c. 6).

Christian Rings of Metal set with Gems.

A large number of Christian rings were made to be worn on the finger, more rarely on the thumb, and of these many bore engraved stones, which have come down to us in greater numbers than the rings themselves. The devices on such stones are described under GEMS. The few examples which have survived having but very rarely any peculiarly Christian features, need not be dwelt upon at length; three very fine ones have been just alluded to under GEMS (pp. 713 b, and 722 b, note); one now in the British Museum, of massive gold of hexagonal form, is supposed to be of the early part of the third century, diameter about 1.5 inches (figured in Perret, Catacombes, vol. iv. pl. xvi. n. 4); the second (p. 722, a), perhaps a little later, is in the possession of Monseigneur de Bonald, Cardinal Archbishop of Lyons, also of massive gold, circular, increasing in thickness towards the bezel, where it is foliated; the rest is irregularly but elegantly corded at intervals, so that it bears some resemblance to a succession of pearls (diameter 1.4 inches): the bezel, from which the gem has fallen out, of an oblong quadrangle.

gular form (longer side 0.9), has on its two larger sides VIVAS IN DEO | AS BOLI, followed by a palm branch (GEMS, p. 722, figured in Le Blant, Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, pl. 2, n. 6; Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneau, ed. 2). The third, which is likewise of gold, bearing figures of doves embossed on the shoulders, is set with a garnet on which a female sitting between two crosses is engraved; it is of later Roman work. (GEMS, p. 716, b.)

The following gold rings remain to be mentioned, with the types of their gems or pastes, when present. A gold ring with slender flat uniform hoop of circular form with circular bezel, raised and scalloped at the margin, which is surrounded by a beaded line, holds a pale blue niccolo (a truncated cone) on which is represented a dolphin (regarded as a fish and so taken as a symbol of Christ, see De Rossi, Bull. 1870, pp. 49-73): the stone is inscribed VIVAS NOCTOHAMVS (the nominative for the vocative); diameter of ring 1 inch; of chaton 0.8; of surface of gem 0.3. This curious ring, supposed to be of the third century, is described and beautifully figured (nat. size) by Prof. A. Salinas, Real Museo di Palermo, p. 59, tav. A, n. 7, and by M. de Rossi, Bull. u. s. tav. iv. n. 13 (enlarged). Probably found in Sicily.

A beautiful gold finger-ring, with the hoop flat and widening towards the bezel, was found in 1857 among the ruins of the Roman houses in Tusculum, and came into the possession of the Princess Aldobrandini. It is set with a lapis lazuli bearing an anchor and a palm-tree; the symbols of hope and of final victory. These symbols occur separately on several gems (see GEMS, pp. 714 and 716); but have, hitherto, been found in conjunction only on this one gem. Not very fine work, but neither again at all rude: De Rossi is persuaded from various considerations that it is earlier than the fourth century (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1872, p. 119, tav. vii. n. 3).

A massive plain gold ring in the British Museum has an onyx intaglio bearing the chrisma, the P being crossed with the third stroke (P). Fortnum, Arch. Journ. xxvi. (1860), p. 142.

Another very massive plain gold ring of ordinary subcircular form, bears a paste in imitation of niccolo, upon which is engraved the chrisma, the P being crossed with the X and also with a horizontal line through the intersection (P): diameter of ring 0.9 by 0.8 inch: that of the suborbicular chaton 0.7 inch:

height of socket of bezel 0.2 inch; said to have been found in England (British Museum).

In the Castellani collection (now in the British Museum), No. 5 of Mr. Fortnum's catalogue, is a very fine example of a gold ring bearing the chrisma; it is an octagonal hoop swelling to the shoulders and surmounted by the monogram of the ordinary form composed of cloisons of gold, from which the stones or pastes or enamels which they once held have now fallen out.

The three preceding rings are probably of the 4th or 5th century.

For the ring of Bishop Arnulphus, see below under Episcopal Ring.

Other settings of early Christian gems are in bronze; one enclosing the Good Shepherd on a jasper (GEMS, p. 712) in the possession of Mr. Fortnum, and figured by him, of octagonal form, is by his kind permission here reproduced. Nor is this the only bronze example. See Catalogue of the Uzielli Coll. p. 66, n. 277, Lond. 1861. (Christie and Manson.) To these, others doubtless might be added.

Rings were also occasionally set in ancient times, as now, with gems on which no subject is engraved. Some of these were, in the middle ages, the badges of bishops (see under Episcopal Ring below), but whether we have any of them now remaining belonging to earlier times appears to be uncertain. In all likelihood Christians in every age may have worn such, but independently of any religious significance.

There is an office for the consecration of cardinals which mentions the delivery of the ring, Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. 8, § xi. Ord. xiv. It is probable that their rings also bore a stone without any device. In 1875, when Pope Pius IX. installed several cardinals, he presented each of them with a gold ring set with a sapphire (Jones, Finger-ring Lore, p. 216). This stone appears to have been generally used for the purpose, as in the case of bishops (Jones, u. s.).

The Ordo Romanus (p. 143, Hitt.; see Curtius, Synt. p. 411) and various mediaeval offices (Maskell, Mon. Rit. vol. ii. p. 319) mention the delivery of rings to nuns at their consecration. What these were we know not, but it may be surmised that they bore plain stones.

Forms of Christian Rings made wholly of Metal, and bearing Devices.

The various forms of these rings (as Mr. Fortnum observes) do not appear to differ from the general fashion of the rings of their day,* in the world Christian and Pagan, and, so far as the figures in his and in the present paper are concerned, may be classified nearly in his own words as follows (Arch. Journ. vol. xxvi. pp. 138, 139). The numbers attached refer to the rings in his own collection, and described by himself.

* In the Dactyliotheca of Gorlaeus, may be seen figures of upwards of 200 rings, one or two of which (184, 211) are certainly, and a few others (210, 205-209 from the catacombs) probably Christian.

A large part of the others which are not figured, would probably fall under the same heads.

A. The circular hoop of convex metal swelling to the shoulders and flattened into an oval or angular chaton. Such are Nos. 8, 24 and 25, in Mr. Fortnum's collection figured below.

B. Rings formed of two, three, or more hoops springing from one, widening to the bezel,^b and generally having beaded wire or chainwork between each hoop. This form, as the last, occurs also at an earlier period. Nos. 1, 27, 28 (Fortnum) are examples of this form.

C. Octagonal. A flat hoop of metal formed into an octagon; sometimes oval and swelling to the bezel, which has a raised table of metal; a form, as Mr. Fortnum thinks, peculiar to the 3rd and 4th centuries. No. 6 (figured above) is of the same form, but bears a gem.

D. A peculiar form, greatly varying, and, again, in the opinion of the same gentleman, only occurring during the Lower Empire; sometimes of the largest size, and of great weight of metal. The bezel is more or less raised, and the shoulders diverge in straight lines at a greater or less angle from the bezel to the side, from whence the hoop is completed by a semi-circle or semi-hexagon. These rings are sometimes of extreme width. No. 11 and 12 (Fortnum) are of this class.

E. A simple hoop, generally of convex metal, more or less swelling to the shoulders, and having a circular (but little raised) bezel with flat table, on which the device is engraved; Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, and 33 (Fortnum) are of this abundant form. Nos. 26 and 30 (Fortnum) are varieties with a square bezel.

F. The simple hoop has a high, trumpet-shaped bezel, formed as an inverted cone of greater or less height, and sometimes octagonal laterally. Such are Nos. 20 and 22 (Fortnum). Cardinal de Bonald's ring (figured above) with raised quadrangular bezel and No. 29 (Fortnum) are variations from this type.

This form, he says, and also D, are peculiar to the period of decadence, and occasionally occur of grotesque proportions and development, the tower-like head rising sometimes to more than half an inch in height.

To the above classes of Mr. Fortnum the following must be added for the French rings of the Merovingian period, figured below after Le Blant.

G. A simple hoop, slightly swelling towards the shoulders, where it is sometimes corded; bearing a large oval or subcircular tabular chaton (not raised): the extremities of the hoop next the chaton each bear bosses varying in number, resembling pearls; and the chaton sometimes bears a border in imitation of smaller pearls. See under Cross below for two examples.

^b Bezel is used here and in the following pages as synonymous with chaton, so as to include the whole ornamental surrounding, if any, together with the metal face or table. If the latter word were kept for the metallic face only, and bezel for its surroundings, it would be a gain. Scudo (Lat. scutum) is unambiguous.

The preceding remarks on the forms of Christian rings refer only to such as bear devices. Rings to which keys are attached, or which have the bezel in the form of a shoe (both figured below from Mr. Fortnum) are likewise not included in the above classes.

Christian Rings of various Materials, not bearing Devices, nor set with Gems.

Plain rings in abundance, with or without a bezel, both in various metals and in ivory, have been found in the Roman catacombs and in Frankish, German, and Saxon graves, and above all in the tomb of Maria, wife of the emperor Honorius, where 150 rings of different kinds were found in 1544, now dispersed and lost to knowledge (TOMBS); and likewise in many other localities, where Christians have been buried, and sometimes even upon the finger of the skeleton. Some ivory rings, too small or too large to be worn on the fingers, have been found attached to the outside of sepulchral niches in the catacombs, even four or five on the same tomb, probably for the purposes of identification. One with plain cylindrical hoop, another ribbon-shaped in the oblique markings outside are figured by Perret (u. s. pl. viii. Nos. 5 and 8). Rings of ostrich bone (de struthionum ossibus ansulae in digitis) were sometimes worn as superstitious charms, and are condemned by St. Augustine accordingly (De Doctr. Christ. lib. ii. c. 20). On these various rings see Martigny, Anneaux des prem. Chrét. pp. 13-15, and his references: also Fortnum in Arch. Journ. vol. xxviii. pp. 267, 268, 284.

Materials of Christian Rings.

On the subject of material Mr. Fortnum observes that, "as a rule, early Christian rings of gold are rare. This might be expected, as the use of rich and numerous ornaments was not in accordance with the teaching of the early church." Notwithstanding this, however, a fair number of gold rings do occur. "The rule also of wearing one ring only, as a signet, instead of one on nearly every joint, as was mostly the fashion among the Pagans, would account for the comparative rarity of rings with early Christian symbols." (Arch. Journ. vol. xxvi. p. 139.)

Authentic early Christian rings in silver are perhaps even still more rare. A few are mentioned below. The most common material is, without doubt, bronze. A few of iron still survive, but, as might be expected, in a more or less damaged condition: two from Mr. Fortnum's collection are figured (Nos. 22 and 25). The writer has seen but one in lead, and that a miserable production in all respects, whose Christianity also is not entirely above suspicion (Waterton collection: see under Cross below).

It is but very rarely that the entire ring is made of a gem. A green jasper with uniform flattened hoop and oval flat bezel, bearing a boat, a bird (cock?), and palm-branch, as well as a cornelian of similar form bearing a dove and branch, have been already mentioned under GEMS, p. 715. Mr. Fortnum's figure (No. 2) of the former is now subjoined.

A few rings in bone or ivory, in addition to those mentioned above, are described below.

Authorities for the following Enumeration of Christian Rings.

The general enumeration of Christian rings which follows has been derived partly from the writers on the Catacombs, Aringhi, Boldetti, and Perret, also from the more critical works of MM. Martigny, Hübner, Le Blant, Salinas, De Rossi, and above all from the notices by Mr. Fortnum of those which are contained in various public collections, and in his own;^c viz. in the Vatican Museum of Christian Antiquities, in the Museum at Naples, in the Castellani collection now in the British Museum, and in the Waterton collection which is now for the most part contained in the South Kensington Museum (Arch. Journ. xxviii. 1871, pp. 278–283). His own collection is described partly in vol. xxvi. (1869), pp. 137–147, and partly in vol. xxviii. pp. 268–277, and the later additions to it, pp. 284–291. The references to the numbers are as he gives them, and the descriptions of the gems in these collections are nearly in his own words.^d Several other rings mentioned by him, whether in his own or in other collections, are also omitted, as possessing either no Christian characteristics or very doubtful ones. The same remark must be made of some of those figured by Perret and others.

Principal Types of Christian Rings.

Clement of Alexandria enumerates the fish, the anchor, the ship, the dove, the lyre, and the fisherman as fitting objects to be employed on Christian seals. All these occur on gems and pastes (see GEMS, GLASS), and all except the lyre and the fisherman are also found upon rings of metal or of bone. These shall now be mentioned first; some remarks on the significance of the symbols may be seen under GEMS, and in Mr. Fortnum's two papers mentioned above. The arrangement of the other types is substantially that which has been followed in GEMS.

1. ORDINARY FINGER-RINGS.

(1.) Fish.—This type, so frequently found in gems, is found also on various metal rings. One of the earlier and more important examples has been recently described and figured by De Rossi.

^c Those only are here given which bear some probable outward sign of their Christianity. Thus the ring found in Rome reading XPΩMATI may have belonged to a Christian whose name was Chromatius, this being known to be a Christian family name there, but as there is nothing Christian about the ring itself, it is omitted. See Fortnum, Arch. Journ. vol. xxvi. p. 141.

^d Those in the British Museum, in the Waterton collection in the South Kensington Museum, and in Mr. Fortnum's collection, have been in most cases examined by the writer, and he has occasionally added remarks upon them. He desires to express his thanks to Mr. Franks, Mr. R. Soden Smith, and to Mr. Fortnum for facilities kindly given to inspect them.

It is a plain uniform hoop of gold, the breadth rather more than $\frac{1}{2}$ inch, diameter about 1 inch, in which a rude slender fish is depicted in white enamel placed between the second and third letters of OYΘX (for IXΘVC retrograde). Found near Rome; in the collection of Count Stroganoff. Referred to the third rather than the fourth century by M. de Rossi, who thinks that the sublinear form of the fish itself stands for the missing I (De Rossi, Bull. Arch. Crist. 1873, pp. 76, 77, tav. iv. n. 6).

In the Naples Museum is contained a gold ring of simple form engraved with a fish. (No. 2 in Fortnum's enumeration.) A fine gold ring which seems to be more correctly referred by M. de Rossi to the 4th century (Bull. Arch. Crist. 1870, p. 63), than to the Merovingian period to which it has been assigned by M. Le Blant (Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, tom. ii. p. 427, n. 608, with figure), was found in 1851 beside the Roman road at Montbazin, near Montpellier, now preserved in the Museum of the Archæological Society of that place, has a small fish, with a very forked tail, engraved upon the square elevated chaton; the hoop is slightly angular, swelling towards the shoulders with two cords, each terminating in a snake's head. The fabric appears to be Roman, and not Merovingian. In the Castellani collection (No. 9) is a bronze ring of coarse work, the bezel engraved with one large fish between three smaller ones. Mr. Fortnum has a bronze ring of coarse work, the circular hoop of which is surmounted by a flat circular bezel, on which is engraved (very incorrectly) an ear of corn between two fishes, which he regards as an "emblem of the bread of life, and of those who live in faith upon it" (No. 17).

(Fortnum, No. 17.)

(2.) Anchor.—The following are considered to be Christian by Mr. Fortnum: a gold ring, its flat band swelling towards the bezel, on which is a raised oval engraved with a simply formed anchor, Castellani collection, No. 1; now in the British Museum. (The genuineness of this ring seems somewhat doubtful: the work is rude.) A ring of duplex form, also of gold, engraved with an anchor and a palm (Naples Museum, No. 1). Bronze ring with circular bezel, on which an anchor and a ship are engraved (Vatican Museum, No. 2). Boldetti (Cimit. p. 502, No. 26) figures a ring with two bezels, on one of which is an anchor, on another a ship. (Reproduced in Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneaux.) The following bronze rings have two anchors in conjunction: two are in Mr. Fortnum's collection. One (No. 13) is "formed as a circle of half-round metal, swelling on the shoulders, and having a circular raised chaton, on which is engraved a double fluked anchor, crossed by one of a single fluke and surrounded by a bearded border. From the catacombs at Rome." Another with the same types, less well preserved, obtained in London from a dealer, is in the possession of the writer. Mr. Fortnum notes that this emblem was in use previous to A.D. 312. Another (No. 21) has the face of the bezel.

(Fortnum, No. 13.)

similarly engraved, but the socket is inversely truncato-conical (nearly as No. 20), the cone being encircled by three projecting mouldings. Probably of the 4th century. Obtained in London; place of finding unknown.

(3.) Ship.—Mr. Fortnum has a bronze ring with plain wire hoop (No. 14), on the circular chaton of which is rudely engraved a ship without sails; X and P (for XPICTOC) are engraved on either side of the mast. Obtained in Rome. The following in the Castellani Collection are also of bronze. One with corded hoop and circular bezel, engraved with a ship propelled with oars, the mast and yard of which form a cross (No. 6). Another of similar form, and of similar device; but the mast supports the reversed chrisma enclosed in a circle. (No. 7.) In the Waterton collection was formerly "a massive bronze signet ring, with ship in full sail, having the sacred monogram on the sail, while round it are the names STEPÆNVS HELENÆ." Fortnum in Arch. Journ. vol. xxviii. (1871), pp. 274, 282.)

[See also Anchor and Cross.]

(4.) Dove.—This type occurs by itself, and also in various combinations. A massive bronze ring found in Rome, with scalloped bezel, bears on its face simply a dove (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 502, n. 27). "A heavy bronze signet ring with massive hoop and projecting bezel, upon which is the figure of a dove; the hoop is modelled as a wreath, having the bezel as a central ornament," is in the Waterton collection, No. 3. (No. 605 in S. Kens. Mus. Inv.) In the Vatican Museum (No. 15) is a "bronze ring with large oblong square bezel," engraved with the chrisma and the dove standing on an olive-branch; beneath, a star or perhaps double cross. See Cross. A nearly similar ring is engraved and described by Aringhi, Roma Subt. t. ii. p. 708, reproduced by De Corte, Synt. p. 121. In Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 11) is a bronze ring of coarse work and hexagonal form externally, circular internally; the shoulders are "splayed from the chaton to the centre of either side." On the raised circular chaton "two doves and a fish" (rather three doves) are engraved. A gold ring found at Talavera de la Reina in Spain has a hexagonal bezel, bearing two birds, probably doves, on its face. "Intra hexagonum ab utraque parte avis est; in circuitu antice inscriptione EMANVEL, postice RECCAREDO (sic)," the word Reccaredo being followed by a cross of four dots, evidently of the Visigothic period, possibly belonging to king Recaredo (585–601 A.D.). A ring (metal not named) found at Cordova in 1768, now in the public library of Madrid, bears a bird (dove?) on the chaton around which is inscribed A (Aurelii) VINCENTI (Hübner, Inscr. Hisp. Christ. Nos. 206, 207).

(Fortnum, No. 11.)

The above-named ring in the Vatican Museum is the most important, but not the only bronze example therein contained which is engraved with a dove. See under No. 18 of that collection. (Fortnum.)

See also below under Human Figures.

(5.) Palm.—The palm-branch occurs without doubt on Christian rings, but when alone it is not easy to be sure that the work is Christian. There are several gold rings in the Naples Museum, one of duplex form (No. 4), with a palm on each bezel, also a heavy plain gold ring, in the Castellani collection, round, with flattened bezel, coarsely engraved with the palm (No. 4), which is counted by Mr. Fortnum to be Christian, though with expression of doubt. A gold ring, half an inch in diameter, with thin flat hoop, and the bezel no wider, in which a palm-branch of poor Roman work in the Waterton collection (No. 467 Inv. S. Kensington Mus.) may probably be Christian. (See GEMS, Vol. I, p. 716.) There are other rings in Mr. Fortnum's collection (Nos. 8, 9 (both gold) and 12 (bronze), all from Rome), about which he now feels less confidence as respects their Christianity than formerly (Arch. Journ. vol. xxviii. p. 276). The former, found in a child's tomb, seems of the 3rd or 4th century; it is small, of a common form, viz., a simple hoop flattened out on the bezel. In the writer's opinion it is probably Christian; the palm, the symbol of victory, is less likely to be given to a pagan than to a Christian child by its parents. So very possibly is also No. 12, with bezel raised on four stages, and palm-branches on the shoulders, which seems rather later, perhaps about the beginning of the 5th century, when paganism was dying out and monograms were coming into fashion on rings and seals. (This monogram may be EVE and stand for Evenus or some other proper name, doubtless that of the owner.) But a less doubtful example is a bronze ring, also in Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 16), on the bezel of which is engraved a palm-branch and a monogram, having also palms in panels on the hoop. See Acclamations below. Other bronze rings in the Vatican Museum, of less importance (Nos. 18–25), are engraved with the palm. It should be added that a silver ring with a palm-branch, which may be Christian, exists in the British Museum (Fortnum, u. s. vol. xxviii. p. 276). This material is but rarely employed for Christian rings. There is however another ring of the same metal in Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 28) of duplex form with united pointed bezels, on one of which is engraved the name of the possessor FAVSTVS, and on the other a palm-branch. Weight, 4 dwt.

(Fortnum, No. 8.)

(Fortnum, No. 28.)

4 gr. Discovered in 1865 at Porto, near the Tiber's mouth, in the ruins of a house believed to be that of Pammachius, the friend of St. Jerome, among many other objects the greater part of which were adorned with Christian symbols. The excavations were made by Prince Torlonia, who presented most of the objects found there to the Christian museum of the Vatican.

But it is only when the palm is combined with Christian adjuncts upon rings that we can securely affirm them to be Christian.

There is a bronze hoop-ring in the Vatican collection (No. 14) engraved with a branch of palm, a cross potent (⊥), and the word VIVAS. It occurs also in connexion with the chrisma, or more rarely with the anchor. See Chrisma and Anchor.

(6.) Cross.—This subject occurs under several different forms, and is either alone or in connexion with others. It was engraved as early as the fourth century on the iron ring of St. Macrina, which contained a piece of the true (?) cross; see below at the end of § 18.

(A.) Not accompanied by Inscriptions or Monograms.

A bronze ring gilt with high inversely conical-truncate bezel (cf. No. 20 and 21 of Fortnum) is in the Vatican Museum (No. 17) engraved with a Maltese cross. (See also below, under Lamb.) A cross potent (i.e. having each limb formed as a T) in connexion with a palm, has been mentioned under Palm. (See also under Saints.)

The Greek cross is found on many rings under (B): also by itself on a very rude ring of lead in the Waterton collection (No. 1 being No. 607, 71 Inv. S. Kens. Mus.), supposed to be of the Roman period.

A Greek cross, crossed by another in form of St. Andrew's cross or the letter X, so as to resemble a star of eight points, is found upon the circular bezel of a coarse bronze ring in the Castellani collection (No. 11). (See also under Dove.) A similar figure occurs on a foot-shaped ring mentioned below.

The Latin cross, having the lowest limb longest, occurs on a ring supposed to be a marriage ring, mentioned below.

(B.) Accompanied by Names or Monograms.

Of this class of rings we have the following Gaulish examples. A gold ring of the Merovingian type; on the bezel is a Greek cross at the head of the owner's name, BERTEILDIS retrograde (so that it would read naturally in a wax impression) and in the centre a monogram similar to one on a coin of Childeric II. (670–691) struck at Marseilles, and perhaps reading MAR for Marsilia (the low Latin form for Massilia). Probably found at Laon. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 678 A. pl. 91, n. 547.) A similar gold ring with similar cross prefixed to ABBONESO (retrograde); in the centre of the bezel is a rude head to the left. The diameter of the subcircular bezel of this and the foregoing is about half an inch. Found in Deuxième Aquitaine. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 575 A. pl. 79, n. 476.) A similar gold ring, with corded hoop, and somewhat larger pearled bezel, has a similar cross prefixed to RACNETHRAMNUS (retrograde): in the centre a rude Merovingian head as before, but accompanied by six pellets. Found at Blois in the sands of the Loire; now in the Bibliothèque Impériale (Nationale). (Le Blant, u. s. n. 164, pl. 22, n. 137.) A silver ring also of the Merovingian type, is supposed by M. Le Blant to be of the 7th century, having St. Andrew's cross (X) prefixed to WABVETVS, the last letter occupying the centre of the circular chaton. Found in the ancient cemetery of Haulchin (Hainaut), in Deuxième Belgique. Preserved in the Museum at Brussels. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 321, D. pl. 35, n. 216.) A bronze ring of this type, found in a sarcophagus at Allonnes (in Troisième Lyonnaise), has a cross approaching in form to the Maltese prefixed to LAVNOBERSA (not retrograde); within the centre of the circular minutely beaded chaton is a monogram enclosed in a circle; it is like the head of a trident, with two pellets above the cross-bar and two others below, possibly reading ET or TE. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 669 A. pl. 90, n. 535.) But the most interesting, because the most perplexing ring of this class, is a fine gold ring of Merovingian type with corded hoop, found buried at a slight depth near Airvault, in Deuxième Aquitaine, now in the possession of M. Benjamin Fillon.

On the chaton is a small Greek cross, and above it an almost inextricable monogram which has been read RADEGONDIS, but which may equally well be read into several other names as Andregondis, Gondegardis, &c. The Abbé Auber regards it as the ring of the famous Rhadegonde, Queen of France, and afterwards foundress of the monastery of the Holy Cross at Poitiers, about the middle of the 6th century. But this is at any rate very uncertain, not to say improbable. Her body, resting at Poitiers, is said to have been taken up by the Huguenots in 1562, and her ring to have fallen into the possession of a soldier, on whose finger it was found seven years afterwards upon the field of battle. Unless this be the ring, it seems to be unknown where it is now. (Le Blant, u. s. n. 575 B, who has many observations worthy to be read, pl. 75, n. 452; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Aug. 13.) A silver ring found at Hohberg, near Soleure in Switzerland, with broad angular hoop, has on the rectangular chatons (forming one of its sides), a monogram which apparently reads VERANI accompanied by a Latin cross. (Id. n. 362 A. pl. 42, n. 247.) Other rings, also found in Switzerland, bear monograms on the chaton, and may probably be Christian, but they bear no Christian symbols. (Id. Nos. 364, 365, pl. 42, 249, 250.)

(Le Blant.)

Examples occur also in Italy and elsewhere. In the Castellani collection (No. 2) is a heavy duplex ring of gold, found at Orvieto; on the oval bezel of one of the united hoops is incised the name BLITHIA, and on the other a cross potent of a proper name, probably of the same name, as Mr. Fortnum is inclined to suppose. In the Vatican Museum (No. 7-10) are three bronze hoop-rings, each engraved with a cross potent and with an inscription which Mr. Fortnum could not decipher; probably they were owners' names, and possibly expressed in monograms. In the British Museum is a silver ring on whose oval chaton (half an inch by about a quarter of an inch) is a cross pommé (i.e. having a globule at the extremity of each of the limbs, which are united in a Latin cross), followed by EVCE, below which is a B and an I above, probably for EVCEBIOY. The shoulders of the hoop are slightly foliated, as Roman rings often are.

Mr. Fortnum purchased in Constantinople a gold ring of excellent Byzantine work (No. 24), probably of the 5th or 6th century. It is a circular convex hoop widening to the shoulders, and flattened to form an oval bezel, on which is engraved a monogram between two Greek crosses. The Waterton collection (S. Kens. Mus. Inv. No. 621) has a somewhat later example of Byzantine work. A gold ring the hoop of which is nielloed on the outside with a Latin cross, and the proper name of its possessor, BARINOTA (i.e. probably Vari notarii); the bezel is formed of a gold solidus of Constantine Pogonatus (668-688), and the ring also may very well be of the 7th century.

In the Royal Museum of Palermo (Salinas, Real. Mus. di Pal. p. 57, tav. A. n. 12) is a plain oval massive gold ring with small flat bezel, on which is engraved a Latin cross and below it, in four lines, ΕΥΦΥΜΗΟΥ ΥΠΤ, apparently for Εὐφύμιον ὑπάτου. It is doubtless, as Salinas observes, of a base epoch, but may well be within our limits. The Hypati (virii consulares) and Notarii (secretaries) were high officers of the Byzantine court.

(7.) Chrisma or Monogram of Christ or Initial Letters of Christ.—The common form of this

(✠), and also the form having the P reversed (✠), sometimes occurs by itself as on bronze rings found in Rome. See Vatican collection (Nos. 15-25); Fortnum collection (Nos. 18, 19).^e See also Boldetti, Cimit. p. 502, tav. 3, Nos. 29 and 31. It occurs likewise in other metals. For the Castellani ring with cloisons of gold, see above. A ring of massive silver, or rather mixed metal, in the collection of Lady Londesborough (No. 183 of Mr. Crofton Croker's catalogue) bears on its ovato-acuminate bezel the ordinary form of the chrisma. (Fortnum, u. s. p. 283; figured in Jones's Finger-ring Lore, p. 47.)

(Fortnum, No. 19.)

The separate letters P and X occur on a bronze ring in the Vatican collection (No. 5). The chrisma is also frequently found along with the Alpha and Omega. In Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 10) the chrisma occurs between those letters on a bronze ring, which is a "circular hoop of convex metal, swelling to the scudo, which is of lozenge shape," upon which the letters are engraved; "the shoulders are ornamented with lozenge-shaped panelling." From Rome, of the 4th or 5th century. (Arch. Journ. vol. xxvii. p. 143; vol. xxviii. p. 273.) Also on another bronze ring from Rome, in the Vatican collection (No. 16), as well as on a bone or ivory ring, having an oval bezel, in the same collection (No. 26).

The same combination is found on a bronze ring, whose figure is given, brought to Mr. Fortnum from Rome (No. 30); the loop of the P is reversed, and a sheep is standing on either side of the base of the monogram, the limbs of which are slightly wedge-shaped. The hoop, swelling to the shoulders, ornamented with palm-branches, is incised, traces of niello apparently remaining in the incisions, as well as in the incised types of the square chaton; these indicate that the ring was not intended for sealing.

(Fortnum, No. 30.)

The palm branch is placed on either side of the chrisma on more than one massive bronze ring found in the Catacombs of Rome (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 502, Nos. 30 and 33). The chrisma is also found, though very rarely, with a date expressed by the name of the reigning emperor. There is an ivory ring, recently found at Lyons, of large size, on the circular bezel of which a chrisma with long stem and open loop is surrounded by VICTORE AVG. (he was associated as emperor in Gaul with Maximus, his father, A.D. 383-388). In the possession of Canon Martigny, who figures it (Dict. des Ant. chrét. ed. 2, s. v. Anneau).

The chrisma whose stem ends in a star is found on a bronze ring in the Vatican Museum (No. 11), placed between two stars, a word of six letters (illegible) being underneath. The chrisma is also found in combination with Alpha and Omega, and with a Ship, with Human Figures, and with Acclamations (see under those headings). Mr. Fortnum remarks that this symbol alone or in combination is found more frequently on Christian rings than any other, but it cannot be considered as one of the earlier symbols.

The initials also of Jesus Christ (I X), or the first two letters of Christ (X P), occur alone or in combination with some other symbol. Mr. Fortnum has a gold triplex ring, found in Rome, and probably of the 3rd or 4th century (No. 1). The three hoops spring from one, and widen towards the bezel, between which a beaded wire nearly fills the open space, and is formed upon the bezel into X crossed by the I. The same form occurs on GEMS (p. 722), and appears to be of very early date, according to some before A.D. 312. (Fortnum, u. s. vol. xxviii. p. 269.)

The P X or X P, being the two first letters of ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ likewise occur; P X alone on a bronze ring in the Vatican Museum (No. 5), and X P in conjunction with a ship. See Ship.

Mr. Fortnum figures a (so-called) legionary ring (No. 23, repeated in Jones's Finger-ring Lore, p. 47) on which we have the letters X I I X preceded and followed by an M apparently; also the letters I X P, at some distance from these, which he interprets as "Christian," i.e. as the initials of Jesus Christ. It is rather to be suspected, however, that it is a numerical indication of some sort; whether P has any connexion with the principes or pilani or praetoria cohors, or be something altogether different, is not very easy to say. Perhaps an inspection of other legionary rings might help in the interpretation.

(8.) Alpha and Omega. This most ancient conjunction of Christian symbols occurs on a bronze ring, the hoop widening towards the bezel of which the margin is fluted; Catacombs of Rome (Boldetti, Cimit. p. 502, tav. 3, n. 32; repeated by Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneaux). The letters are more frequently accompanied by the Christa (see Christa).

(9.) Abrasax. This famous word, also written Abrasax, is said to have been the invention of Basilides, a Christian gnostic, but is very rarely found on any monuments where the Christianity is certain. We have, however, the following: "A large ivory ring, found at Arles," says Mr. King, "bears the monogram of Christ, between α and ω, as it appears on the coins of the Gallic princes of the 4th century, Magnentius and Decentius, but accompanied by the title ABPACAZ, a sufficient proof of the identity of the two personages in the estimation of its owner." (Antique Gems, p. 358.) He informs the writer that it was formerly in the Mertens-Schaffhausen collection.

(10.) The Lamb.—This occurs as the symbol of the Saviour and of the Church; it is sometimes in a manifestly Christian connexion; sometimes more doubtfully so. A silver ring with octagonal bezel, diameter 1 inch, engraved with the Agnus Dei. The lamb looks back at a cross, of which the upper part only is visible; seemingly of late work, but probably not too late for this work (Waterton's collection, No. 602, Inv. Kens. Mus., where it is called Roman early Christian, not mentioned by Fortnum). See also above under Alpha and Omega (Fortnum, No. 30), where the lambs or sheep at the foot of the chrisma signify the Church. There is a bronze signet ring in the Waterton collection (No. 4 being No. 604 Inv. Kens. Mus.), having the hoop formed as a wreath of palms, with oval bezel for the central ornament, bearing a lamb incised thereon. Above and in front of the lamb are two rude branches; Roman work but poor, considered both in the inventory and by Mr. Fortnum to be Christian.

(12.) Saints and Human Figures (busts or full length) with Christian Emblems.—Under this section those rings which have heads only are not included. Most of the following seem to be representations of saints. In the Waterton collection (No. 6, Inv. No. 606) is a massive bronze ring, 1·2 inches in diameter, of rude work, perhaps Byzantine: the hoop is surmounted by a flat circular bezel, on which is engraved an orante with subcircular nimbus, a palm branch on either side; on the opposite side of the hoop is a smaller "tabular sigillum" engraved with a Greek cross.^f In the same collection (Inv. No. 619) is a bronze ring, whose hoop does not swell towards the curved circular bezel: upon this is engraved in very poor style a rude bust of a saint, with an oval nimbus round the head. The labels announce it to be Byzantine work of about the 6th century. Diameter 0·9 inch. Another and rather smaller ring in the same collection (Inv. 608) of gold, with slender hoop not swelling at the shoulders, has the circular bezel engraved with the bust of a saint, with oval nimbus. On either side the head are the letters M A (for Maria?). The style resembles the last; but the ring is probably at least as late as the 6th century; perhaps even too late for the present work. Mr. Fortnum has a bronze ring (No. 26), "a simple hoop, holding a square tabular chaton," on which is engraved a draped male figure with subcircular nimbus standing before a cross potent, which springs from what seems to be a cup with bosses, such as occur of glass in the catacombs. "Possibly Byzantine

(Fortnum, No. 26.)

^f Mr. Fortnum mentions in the same place that the British Museum has a remarkable gold ring of analogous form, on one face of which are three interlaced triangles, and on the other intertwined circular lines leaving the form of a cross in the centre. These lines and others on work of the 6th or 7th century; obtained in Athens." In the same collection is an iron ring (No. 22), of which metal very few rings have survived in tolerable condition; on the flat raised octagonal bezel are engraved two figures, very probably intended, as Mr. Fortnum suggests, for SS. Peter and Paul (PETER AND PAUL, and MEDALS), the chrisma between their heads, while on the eight sides of the inversely truncato-conical socket or stem of bezel are engraved eight figures imperfectly preserved, probably saints. Perhaps of the 4th or 5th century (Mr. Fortnum assigns no date). Obtained in London, but probably of Italian work. The same collection in fine contains a bronze ring (No. 15), with rounded hoop slightly swelling ing to the shoulders, bearing a plain circular bezel, on which is engraved a female draped quite to the feet, having the chrisma (with loop reversed) on each side of the head, and a bird, probably a dove, on either side of her feet. Possibly an emblem of the church feeding her Jew and Gentile children. Found in the catacombs, probably that of St. Calixtus, and presented by Padre Garrucci to Mr. Fortnum: they assign it to the 4th century.

There are a few others of this class which seem rather too late for the present work. One in the Waterton collection (Inv. No. 629), gold with full-faced bust on the circular bezel, with a Greek cross and legend AVFRET, seemingly Anglo-Saxon work: it bears some resemblance to the unique aureus of Bishop Wulfred in the British Museum.

(13.) Imperial Personages in connexion with Christianity.—As in the analogous case of gems, these occur but rarely on rings. There is, however, a most important example in the Museum at Palermo, which has been well, though not fully, described and illustrated by Salinas and Ugdulena; and reproduced by a beautiful figure in gold and colours. It is, as the former observes, a veritable prodigy for the minuteness of the work in niello with which it is ornamented. The date and principal subject appear to be satisfactorily made out: viz., the espousals and coronation of the emperor Heraclius and his wife Eudocia (A.D. 610). It was found at Syracuse, along with coins of Constans II., the grandson of Eudocia, the hoop are in niello. It is to be feared that this curious ring falls below our period; the simple triangle, however, occurs on various early monuments as an emblem of the Trinity. See TRIANGLE; TRINITY. Prebendary Walcott, however, observes that three interlacing triangles do occur in the 9th century (Sacred Arch. p. 254).

who transported the seat of empire thither, and died there in 668. The gold hoop is slender and octagonal, and bears upon seven of its flat sides as many scriptural subjects. Salinas interprets only the first and last. They appear to be as follows:—(1.) The Annunciation. The Virgin in dark dress holds a basket (calathus) and . . . ?; the angel on the right in white (silver). (2.) The Salutation. Mary, as before, and Elizabeth, in a paler dress, kiss each other; they stand between two Greek crosses supported by a white (silver) pedestal. (3.) The Infant Saviour at Bethlehem. A cave? (darkish): the Infant stretched out above: the Virgin on the left; heads of two oxen (?) in the distance. (4.) Adoration of the Magi. Virgin, with circular nimbus, seated, bearing the Infant on her lap, on the left: the three Magi in truncated caps (like modern cylindrical hats, not Phrygian caps as on MEDALS), advance towards her. (5.) The Baptism. The Baptist, with nimbus, places his hands over the head of Jesus, with nimbus (?), who stands in the Jordan up to the middle; on the opposite bank two figures, apparently angels (mostly in silver). (6.) Uncertain, perhaps Jesus brought before Pilate. A figure with helmet and cuirass (?), is on the left; a figure with nimbus in the centre; another figure, not fully draped, on the left. (7.) The Visit to the Sepulchre. A subcylindrical structure with dome, on the summit of which is a cross; two female figures on the left, one in dark, one in pale dress: opposite on the other side of the tomb an angel in white (silver). The length occupied by these seven subjects is about three and a half inches; the breadth rather more than a quarter of an inch. The bezel is elevated about a quarter of an inch above the hoop; the socket is keeled, bearing on the upper part the following barbarously spelt legend, to which a Greek cross is prefixed: ΟC ΩΠΛΟΝ ΕΥΔΟΚΙΑC ΕCΤΕΦΑΝΟCΑC ΗΜΑC, nearly as Ps. v. 12 (LXX) where we have ὡς ἡπλῶ εὐδοκίας ἐστεφάνωσας ἡμᾶς. There is every likelihood that the Empress Eudocia is here enigmatically described; who, together with her husband Heraclius, are represented in white (silver) on the subcircular chaton, whose diameter is nearly half an inch; a dark figure with subcircular nimbus standing between them, which is doubtless intended for the Saviour, who occupies a similar position on coins of Romanus IV. and his wife Eudocia (1067–1070), described and figured by Sabatier, Mon. Byz. vol. ii. p. 169, pl. 1. n. 11. The espousal and coronation of Heraclius took place on the same day, so that this ring may be considered to commemorate both events (Salinas, u. s. pp. 57–59, tav. A. No. 1).

(14.) Acclamations sometimes accompanied by Names and Portraits of the Owners.—Several rings of bronze are engraved with the inscription VIVAS or IN DEO VIVAS, either at length (with slight variations) or in monogram, the chrisma being

§ The writer must confess to having had a misgiving that this is the Eudocia of the ring; the nimbus of the Saviour, however, is different in the two cases; on the ring it seems to be simply subcircular; on the coin it is cruciform. The circumstances of the finding point strongly to Eudocia, wife of Heraclius.

sometimes added. One, in Mr. Fortnum's collection, finely preserved, found in one of the catacombs in the Via Appia at Rome, bears the chrisma and COSME VIVAS on the circular face of an inversely conical bezel (No. 20). Another in the Vatican has a square

bezel inscribed

VIVAS
IN DEO

(No. 6). A similar one in the Waterton collection (No. 31). Another with ribbon hoop, with sessile square bezel and retrograde legend, mentioned by De Rossi as belonging to Sig. Castellani, has

VIVAI
IN DEO

(Bull.

Arch. Crist. 1874, pp. 76-79, tav. ii., where the two following will also be found). The same inscription, but with DIO, on a similar ring, found at Chiusi: VIVAI is considered by De Rossi to stand for vivat. A label found near Modena has the face^b inscribed with the same words in different order

IN DEO
VIVAS

A more interesting ring of octangular form in the Museum of the University of Perugia, reads round the right sides as follows:

* | SP | ES | IN | DE | OV | IV | AS. Spes, in Deo vivas, where Spes appears to be a proper name, as it certainly is in some other inscriptions. Mr. Fortnum has other bronze octagonal flat-banded rings (Nos. 3, 4) reading DONATE BIBAS (i.e. vivas) IN DEO, and V. I. V. I. N. D. E. O., both from Rome; probably of the 4th century. Mr. Fortnum has also a bronze ring with flat circular bezel and circular hoop, which is decorated with palm branches in lozenge-shaped panels; the monogram, deeply cut on the bezel, is rendered by the Chev. de Rossi, Deus-Dona vivas in Deo; Deus-dona, like Deusdedit, &c., being a proper name (that of the owner) and still surviving in the French Dieu-donné, as Mr. Fortnum observes. Good work of the 4th century, found in Rome. The device on this ring (No. 16) figured above, and on another in the same collection (No. 20) described above, is reversed, as the rings are intended for signets.

There are also a few of gold bearing the same acclamation, the most important of these being found in 1860 near Masignano, in the archdeaconry of Fermo in central Italy in a tomb made of large slabs of stone, containing some bones of the deceased and fragments of gold. This splendid ring is of gold of duplex form, the united bezels being acutely ovate. On one is engraved the name FILINANDA (the two last letters each in a line by itself), and on the other are two lines VIVAS IN DEO followed by a star. Six beads meet the juncture of the

bezels on each side; the hoop (rounded externally, plane internally) diminishes in width from the bezel. Weight, five and a-half pennyweights. Probably of the latter part of the 3rd or of the beginning of the 4th century. Formerly in the possession of Don Antonio Donati, late librarian of the college of the Sapienza at Rome, now in the collection of Mr. Fortnum (No. 27). See also Palm, where the inscription is simply VIVAS. A gold ring found at Caetobriga (Troye ?) in Lusitania, in the cabinet of the king of Portugal, of octagonal form, has on seven of the sides AL | OI | OS | AE | VI | VA | SIN, the eighth side being a monogram probably intended for κρῖα (hardly for Christo) Hübner, Inscr. Hisp. Christ. n. 204. A gold ring found at Silchester about 1780 has the hoop formed into ten squares, in one of which is a rude head inscribed VENVS, and in the other SENECEIANE VIVAS, followed by IINDE for In Deo; a pagan ring Christianized, see GEMS, p. 714. b. (Archæologia, vol. viii. (1787), p. 449; Hübner, Inscr. Brit. p. 234, n. 1305.)¹ Other acclamations are more rarely met with. On the circular-oval bezel of a bronze ring in the Vatican (No. 12) are inscribed two words separated by a transverse line, which Mr. Soden Smith suggests may be read Κριε Σωτηρ. The Abbé Cochet has published a bronze ring, reading IN DI | NVMI NE A, seemingly for In Dei nomine. Amen (Le Blant, Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, tom. ii. p. 73). On an angular (semi-hexagonal) silver ring, with broad ribbon-hoop, we have on one side the name of the owner Leubacius in two lines

opposite a monogram with an I on each side of it, which has been supposed to read In nomine Dei (Le Blant, u. s. p. 561, n. 672 A, pl. 90, n. 538). A brass ring, found in Egypt, now preserved in the museum at Leyden, bears an inscription in two lines, ΕΙCΘ Ρ ΕΟC (εἰς θεός). The chrisma certifies the Christianity of the ring, which is doubtless of tolerably early date (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. Graec. n. 9059).

(15.) With Legends containing Profession of Faith by the Owners.—A Roman gold thumb ring supposed by Hübner to be of the Christian period, found in 1823 near Castor in Norfolk, bears the legend CONSTANI (sic) FIDES, apparently for Constanti fides (Archæol. vol. xxiii. (1831) p. 366, and vol. xxi. p. 547, with figure; Hübner, Inscr. Brit. n. 1301, who observes, "Similia etiam alibi reperta sunt"). The legend seems clearly intended to shew that its possessor was a Christian. This fact which is more fully expressed on the gold Saxon ring, now to be

3 inches long, seems to have been intended for the bezel of a ring.

¹ Two gold rings have been found in England, which Hübner and others regard as Christian or as "ævi Christiani;" one in Suffolk, reading ΟΛΥΜΠΕΙ ΖΗCΑΙC (figured in Jones's Finger-ring Lore, p. 256), another found at Corbridge of beautiful pierced work, the letters being cut à jour, reading AEMILIA ZESES (described and figured in Arch. Journ. vii. p. 192; but see Mr. Fortnum's remarks on its age in vol. xxvi. p. 148). For these and other rings found in England which may probably be Christian, but which do not give clear signs of their Christianity, see Hübner, Inscr. Brit. p. 234.

^b It is called 'sigillo in bronzo,' and though about described, whose workmanship, to judge from the figure, bears considerable resemblance to the coins of Offa, and may therefore probably be of or about the 8th century. The ring is of considerable thickness, the hoop being composed of beautiful chain or rather plait-work which encloses an oval-headed bezel nearly 1 inch by three-quarters, in the centre of which is a small bust with jewelled head-band or diadem, the collar being similarly ornamented; around it in letters evidently of early date, NOMEN EHLLA FID IN XPO (Fides in Christo). Found in a meadow at Bosington, Hants. Now in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. (Journ. Archaeol. Assoc. vol. i. (1846) p. 341 (with fig.); Jones's Finger-ring Lore, p. 63 (same fig.).

To the above distinctly Christian subjects is to be added one taken from the Old Testament, which, however, was regarded as a typical representation of the great sacrifice of the death of Jesus Christ and of his resurrection following thereon.

(16.) Sacrifice of Abraham.—This subject, though found on various other works of Christian antiquity, is so rare upon metal rings that only a single example seems hitherto to have occurred. In Mr. Fortnum's collection (No. 29) is a bronze ring with highly projecting bezel of square form; the hoop is a simple circle of angular projection externally. On the square face the subject is deeply engraved. In the centre is Abraham, holding a knife with point upwards in his right hand, and the head of Isaac, who kneels before the altar of piled wood, with his left. He seems suddenly to have caught sight of the ram, which stands below a tree. Between Abraham's head and the knife appears an uncertain object, which Mr. Fortnum with great probability explains to be the angel, but which Padre Garrucci suggests may be rays of light, symbol of the Divine voice restraining Abraham, and which the Chev. de Rossi thinks may be the volume of the prophetic Scriptures tied with a ribbon proclaiming to all generations that Abraham should be blessed in his posterity; but these explanations seem less probable.

Apart from these had better be described two other forms of rings: one in the shape of a foot the other of the common circular form, but in combination with a key.

(17.) Foot-shaped Rings.—The bezel sometimes assumes the form of the sole of the foot, or rather of the shoe; and the rings of this form appear to have been in most cases, if not all, used as signet-rings to indicate the possession of the things so sealed. Bronze rings of this form have been found in the Roman catacombs, either bearing the name of the owner. e.g. a massive ring, labelled IVSTVS accompanied by a star or double cross (Curt. Synt. de Ant. p. 398, from Aringhi, R. S. ii. 698), or having the chrisma with horizontal stroke at the top, and two pellets above and below, as one in the Kircherian Museum (Perret, u. s. pl. xi. n. 6), or as a larger one in the same Museum which reads SPES IN DEO (retrograde). (Perret, u. s. pl. xi. n. 5.)^j See also De Rossi (Bull. di Arch. Crist. 1874, p. 77, tav. ii. n. 5) for a fine similar example from Capena; and one in Mommsen, Inscr. Reg. Neap. n. 6310, § 290, now at Naples (apparently not retrograde). There is a foot-shaped ring in the Vatican Museum (No. 25); also another in the same Museum (No. 13), engraved with SAVIV, i.e. vivas (reversed), evidently intended for stamping. Mr. Fortnum has one "the bezel of which surmounts the swelling shoulders of a hoop of half-round wire, and is shaped as the sole of a shoe upon which is coarsely incised IN DEO with a continuous border-line of punctuations" (No. 31). He thinks that "this ring could hardly have been used for stamping or sealing, as the lettering reads rightly on the ring and would of course be inverted in the impression."

Mr. Fortnum observes that this is a form of ring previously and contemporaneously used by pagans, and that similar rings bearing names and words that cannot be assumed as Christian^k are preserved in the Castellani, the Waterton, British Museum, and other collections.

The form of the foot is in allusion to the ancient adage of the jurists, "Quicquid pes tuus calcaverit tuum erit," on which Paul de Castro (lib. i. De acq. vel amitt. poss.) writes: "Nota quod pedes sunt instrumentum aptum ad acquirendam possessionem naturalem;" see Pellicia, de Eccl. Polit. tom. iii. p. 227, quoted by Martigny, Annales des prem. Chrét. p. 38, also Dict. s. v. Anneaux. It is, however, just possible that such rings of this form as were not intended for sealing or stamping may have been symbolical of walking with God (IN DEO), and having attained the end of the pilgrimage in safety, as among the pagans votive images of feet expressed a safe return from a journey. See Martigny, Dict. s. v. Plantes de Pied.

(18.) Rings with Key attached.—This class of rings is by no means exclusively Christian; several without any emblems, and one having rudder between two ears of corn on the onyx chaton (see pp. 34, 35), are figured by Licetus (de Anulis Ant.) in the plate at the beginning of his work. (Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.) They have been called by him and others anuli ad claves (u. s. c. xxix.), but whether this expression occurs in any ancient authors the writer cannot say. Some of these found in Holland as Lipsius observes, are of iron, and must, therefore, have been worn by slaves or common soldiers. (Excurs. B. ad Tac. Ann. ii.) Others, however, have been found in the catacombs, some of which Boldetti figures. (Cimit. p. 506, Nos. 36, 37.) Most of these have no Christian symbols; but Mr. Fortnum possesses a bronze finger-ring with a key attached, of which a figure is given. "It is a simple hoop, the bezel of which is slightly raised and flattened, and from the side of which projects a small neck, attaching a circular table flattened towards the ring. This is pierced with a cross which is surrounded with a circular depression or bordering." The key opened the lock by lifting a latch. The cross he regards as a Christian emblem: but this can hardly be looked upon as certain. Obtained in Rome, and regarded by its possessor "as perhaps of the 4th century." (No. 32.) In the Vatican Museum is a similar ring, believed to have been found in the Catacombs. (No. 1.) Speaking of this kind of ring, Possidius (Vit. Aug. c. 24, in fine operum ejus), says that St. Augustine never wore them himself. "Domus ecclesiae curam omnemque substantiam ad vices clericis delegabat et credebatur. Nunquam clavem, nunquam anulum in manu habens, sed ab eisdem domus praepositis cuncta et accepta et erogata notabantur." His signet ring (with profile portrait) mentioned below, he most probably did wear. Gregory the Great (see the references in Boldetti, Cimit. p. 507) gave golden key-rings of this kind, which had touched the body of St. Peter, or in which a filing of his chain was inlaid, to princes as a species of relic, accompanied by his benediction. A beautiful gold key-ring, found near Bologna, may very possibly have been one of these. (Fortnum in Arch. Journ. vol. xxxiii. pp. 110-112 with fig.) Rings had indeed been already used as reliquaries.

^j In the Vatican Museum there is a stamp, formed as the sole of a shoe, of larger size than the rings of that form, which has the same legend, with letters reversed and incised. Fortnum in Arch. Journ. xxviii. (1871) p. 280. It may have been made for a ring.

^k The large bronze ring engraved FORTYNTVS accompanied by an ivy leaf, figured by Boldetti (Cimit. p. 306 n. 38), and by Perret and Martigny after him, is in all likelihood Christian, having been found in the catacombs, but, like several others of the same class, has been omitted here.

Before this time Macrina, the sister of St. Gregory of Nyssa, had obtained a piece of the true cross, lately discovered by Helena, and had it inclosed beneath the bezel of an iron ring, on which a cross was also engraved: she wore it next her heart. (Greg. Nyss. in Vita Maecr. in Migne, Patrol. Gr. vol. xli. p. 990.)

Another fine gold key-ring, with wards formed of nine Greek crosses, reading ACCIPE DVLCIS on the chaton, and MVLTI ANNIS on the hoop, may have been meant for a new year's gift. (Arch. Journ. vol. xxix. p. 305.)

2. ROYAL RINGS.

It is certain that official rings were in use from an early period among the Christian sovereigns of France. There were signet rings entrusted to the keeping of a high official, who in Merovingian times was called Referendarius, sometimes an ecclesiastic. Thus Sigebert the Second, king of Austasia (638-670), appointed St. Bonitus, bishop of Clermont, his referendarius, "anulo ex manu regis accepto" (Vita S. Boniti, 15 Jan.). Audoenus or Dado was the referendarius of Dagobert the Great, father of the above-named Sigebert, so called, as Aimé tells (Eccl. Hist. iv. 14), "quod ad eum omnes publicae deferrentur conscriptiones, ipseque eas annulo regis sive sigillo ab eo sibi commissio muniiret seu formaret." Audoenus was at this time probably a layman, but he became archbishop of Rouen in 640. [See SEALS.]¹

3. EPISCOPAL RINGS IN GENERAL; ALSO RINGS OF INVESTITURE AND THE RING OF THE FISHERMAN.

That bishops, in common with other Christians, possessed rings in very early times, is easy to prove; but when the ring was first employed as a badge of their office it is more difficult to say. The earliest example now known of the possession of a ring by a bishop is probably that of Caius, bishop of Rome, 283-296. When his tomb was opened in the year 1622 there were found therein three coins of Diocletian, in whose reign he suffered martyrdom, and also his ring ("sanctissimi pontificis anulus adinventus est"), see Aringhi, Rom. Subt. lib. iv. c. 48, vol. ii. p. 426; Boldetti, Cimit. pp. 102, 103. It does not appear what has become of it. Eusebius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 310, is said to have borne the monogram of Christ on one side of the seal of his ring and that of his own name on the other. (Du Saussay, Panopl. Episc. p. 215.) In the Kensington Museum a ring (No. 7442 amongst the Waterton collection) is thus described:—"Ring, silver gilt. An episcopal ring, fluted shank, from which rises a long stem and collet, set with an antique paste. Third or fourth century. Found in Lombardy. Diameter 1½ inch by ¾. Given by Sir James Hudson, K.C.B." It does not appear why the ring is even regarded as Christian, much less as episcopal. Possibly the circumstances of the discovery might throw light on this matter. The pale ground of paste is inlaid with eight red and blue triangular tessellae, also apparently of paste: they are not quite united, but resemble a star of eight rays.

¹ It does not appear that kings received rings at their coronation till after the time of Charlemagne. Nothing is said of the ring in the earliest coronation service known, that of Egbert, archbishop of York (732-767). See Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. ii. c. 10, Ordo i. But in Ordo iv. ad benedicendum regem Francorum, a form is given for the delivery of the ring. This is described as Ex MS. codice Ratoldi abbatis Corbeiensis; who may perhaps be the same as a writer of that name mentioned by Fabricius, supposed to be of the 10th century (Bibl. Med. et Inf. Latin.). It runs thus: "Accipe anulum signaculum videlicet sanctae fidei, soliditatem regni, augmentum potentiae per quae scias triumphali potentia hostes repellere, haereses destruere, subditos coadunare, et catholicas fidei perseverantibus connecti. Per &c." The earliest French king who received episcopal coronation at all was Pepin, according to Martene; but we do not find that either he or Charlemagne received a ring thereat. The earliest (real or pretended) example of an English king receiving a ring at his consecration known to the writer is given in a Vita et Passio S. Edmundi Regis, printed in the Appendix to Batteley's Antiq. S. Edmundi Burgi, p. 119 sqq. where it is recorded of Offa, king of the East Angles (rather of the East Saxons), that he designated in 855 Edmund as his successor, "jussitque ut anulum suum sibi deferrent, quem acceperit ab episcopo in regni Estanglorum promotione." But the whole story seems to be apocryphal. See Butler, Lives of the Saints, Nov. 20.

St. Augustine had a signet-ring (anulus), "qui exprimit faciem hominis attentantis in latus," meaning apparently a head seen in profile. [GEMS, p. 719.] A letter of Clovis is addressed to the Gallican bishops, circa A.D. 511, in which he promises to recognise their letters as authentic, provided they were signed with their ring ("vestro anulo signatas"). (Greg. Turon. Op. Append. p. 1327, ed. Bened.; col. 1158, ed. Migne, Patrol. t. lxxi.). The seals probably bore their names or monograms.

About the same time Avitus bishop of Vienne writes to his brother, Apollinaris bishop of Valentia, how he would wish his signet-ring to be made. The ring was to be of iron, not massive, formed of two dolphins, with their heads on the side opposite to the bezel, and their forked tails meeting each other around a double seal turning on two pivots; on one face, which was to be electrum (pale gold), his own name was to be engraved in monogram ("latitabunda"); on the other side, a bright green stone ("vernans lapillus"), his name was to be written in full ("publica"). Such at least appears to be the meaning of his directions, which are given as he says "paullo hilarius," but which might have been better described as "paullo obscurius."^m Such monograms had become fashionable about this time, both in metal and in stone, on seals or on coins; and the passage of Symmachus, relating to the intricacy of his own monogram on his seal is sufficiently well known (lib. ii., epist. 12). Arnulphus, bishop of Metz, in A.D. 614, took for his seal a milk-white cornelian, bearing a fish with its head above the basket in which it is contained, on either side of which is a smaller fish, which was set in his (gold?) ring, a plain hoop widening towards the bezel, first figured in Martigny, Dict. s.v. Anneau episcopal (2nd ed.). It is now preserved in the cathedral at Metz. [GEMS, p. 714.] Ebrésgilaus, bishop of Meaux in 660, wore in his ring an intaglio representing St. Paul the hermit (ibid. p. 719, b). Agilbert, bishop of Paris (666-680), was buried with a very large ring (thumb-ring?) set with an opaque figure, on which was represented St. Jerome beating his breast before a crucifix (ibid. p. 718).ⁿ The ring of Leodegar, bishop of Autun about A.D. 685, is mentioned by Du Saussay as existing in 1636 in the Royal Monastery of St. Victor in Paris. Unfortunately the Martyrologium Gallicanum which mentions it under his day (Oct. 2), as being in the monastery aforesaid, says nothing of its material or style, but only of its miraculous qualities: "cujus in aquam immersione miracula fere perennia eduntur; nam oculorum infirmitate laborantes consecratae aquae ipsius perfusione recuperant passim sanitatem."^o

^m The text of this most difficult passage is:—"Signatorum igitur, quod pietas vestra non tam promittere quam offerre dignata est, in hunc modum fieri volo. Anulo ferreo et admodum tenui, velut concurrentibus in se delphinulis concludendo, sigilli duplicis forma geminis cardinulis inseratur. Quae ut libuerit vicissim, seu latitabunda, seu publica, obtutibus intuentium alterna vernantis lapilli vel electri pallentis fronte mutetur. Nec tamen talis electri, quale nuper, ut egomet hausi, in sancto ac sincerissimo impollutae manus nitore sordabat cui corruptam potius quam confectam, auri nondum fornace decocti crediderim inesse mixturam; vel illam certe, quam nuperrime rex Getarum (he is explained to be Alaricus, a Clodoveo prostratus), secuturæ praesagam ruinae, monetis publicis adulterium firmantem mandaverat. Sed sit ejusmodi color, quem aequaliter ac modeste, ruborem ab auro, ab argento candorem, pretiositatem ab utroque, a caeteris rapientem fulgorem, artificiosa siquidem medioxima viroris commendat amoenitas. Si quaeras quid insculpendum sigillo; signum monogrammatice mei per gyrum scripti nominis legatur indicio. Medium porro annuli, ab ea parte qua volae clausae vicinabitur, delphinoorum quorum superius capita descripsimus, caudae tenebunt. Quibus lapisculus ob hoc ipsum quaesitus, oblongus scilicet et acutis capitibus formatus, indetur. Ecce habes quoddam tantummodo speculum dogmatis exsequendi. Nec tamen amplitudinem elegantiae tuae sic ad memoratum exemplar coacto (leg. coarctato?), quasi liberum non sit addere quod videtur." Aviti Viennensis Epist. lxxviii. Apollinari episcopo (Migne, Patrol. Lat. t. lix. pp. 280, 281). M. Le Blant (Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, tom. ii. p. 50) has ventured upon a translation or paraphrase, adding reference to Sirmond and Canciani, and mentioning a Merovingian ring on which the name Aster is engraved in monogram and also in full.

In our own country also rings have been found in the tomb of Birinus, bishop of Dorchester, who died 640 ("inventus quoque [in sepulchro] est anulus," Vit. S. Birini, incerto auctore in Surius de Vitis Sanctorum, Dec. 3, vol. vi. p. 220, Venet. 1681), and in that of St. John of Beverley who died in 721, when he was translated into a new shrine, circa A.D. 1037 (Dugdale, Hist. of Coll. Ch. of Beverley, p. 55 in Appendix to Hist. of St. Paul's Cathedral; R. C. Neville, Lecture on Antiq. of Finger-rings, p. 15, Saffr. Walden, 1856; Waterton in Arch. Journ. vol. xx. (1863), p. 225.^p ⁿ Du Saussay (Panopl. Episc. p. 1830) describes the setting thus:—"Encausto anulus in superiori parte circuli decoratur, eminetque e medio ejus vasculum falcatis quasi unguiculis evectum, quibus ipsa gemma stringitur; adeoque exquisito artificio fabricatum opus est, utrix elegantiori forma confectum aliud proferri possit."

^o De Corte, Syntagm. de Anulis, pp. 168-78 has various notices of miraculous rings. Many will agree with him when he writes: "Et quis singular salutarium annulorum virtutes caelitus adeptas in numerum coeget nisi lectori suo tadium parere gestiat? Abstineo igitur si unicum insuper . . . recensero."

^p There is a very early Saxon ring which may perhaps be the ring of Alhstan, bishop of Sherborne A.D. 824-867. If so it is just too late for this work, but the attribution is uncertain, the name being a common one. It reads ALHSTAN having a cross prefixed, on four round sides of a ring alternating with four lozenge-shaped sides on which fabulous animals are depicted. It is of gold and nielloed. It is now in the S. Kensington Museum, formerly in the Waterton collection. Figured in Arch. Journ. vol. xx. p. 226, the same figure being used for Jones's Finger-ring Lore, p. 62. It had been previously described and figured by the Rev. Dr. Pegge in Archaeologia, vol. iv. p. 47. Perhaps it should be added that when the tomb of bishop Cuthbert (died 686) was opened in 1537, a "massive gold ring, set with a sapphire en cabochon, was found on one of his fingers." But although the authentication of its discovery is undoubted, it is considered to be certain that it could never have been worn by St. Cuthbert, being apparently not older than the 14th century. Mr. Waterton thinks that it had probably belonged to one of the bishops of Durham, and had been placed where it was found on some occasion when the shrine was opened. He observes that it has been figured in the Archaeol. Aeliana, vol. ii. (N. S.), p. 66, and is now preserved in St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw, near Durham,

It cannot be concluded from these literary notices that episcopal rings were of an ecclesiastical character properly so called, or different in any way from those which might have been used by persons who were not ecclesiastics. Nor does there appear to be any clear proof that such rings existed at all until the latter half of the 6th century.¹ From about that time forwards bishops at their consecration received a staff (baculus) and also a ring, symbolical of their office as bridegrooms of the church (anulus), and also as a mark of honour; but whether these were in all cases capable of being used as signet rings or not, it is difficult if not impossible to decide, from the imperfect nature of the evidence. In later times they certainly could not be so used. The earliest ecclesiastical writer who makes mention of such a ring seems to be St. Isidore of Seville,² who was bishop of that see from A.D. 595-633. In his second book of Ecclesiastical Offices, sup-

Arch. Journ. xx. 237, where much more information may be seen; see also A. Butler, Lives of the Saints, March 20. The stone bears no device, in conformity with the injunction of pope Innocent III. in 1194: "Anulus (episcopi) ex auro puro solide confectus palam habeat cum gemma in qua nihil sculpti esse debet" (Merati, ed. Gavanti, p. 1341). Duranti makes a similar remark (de Rit. Eccl. ii. 9, § 37). Accordingly many episcopal rings of the 13th century "were of very rude fashion . . . ; the stone set just as it was found, merely having the surface polished, and the shape of the bezel was adapted to the gem." Waterton, u. s. p. 227.

² The Abbé (now Canon) Martigny, both in his Anneaux chez les premiers Chrétiens (pp. 44-46), and in both the editions of his Dict. des Antiq. chrét. (s. v. Anneau épiscopal) has laboured to prove that St. Optatus, an African father of the latter part of the 4th century, distinctly mentions the episcopal ring, as belonging to the bishop's office. He so interprets the words of his first book, c. 10 (p. 37, ed. Albasp.) where he says that heretics have not the keys, which St. Peter alone received, nor the ring whereby it is written that the fountain is sealed (nec anulum quo legitur fons esse signatus). This passage has much perplexed the commentators, as may be seen in the various notes in the editions of Albaspinaeus p. 118, and of Migne (Patrol. t. xi. p. 902). But there is little doubt that Meric Casaubon has rightly judged that there is an allusion here to Cant. iv. 12, "A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed." If so the ring is no more a material ring than the keys; the passage is rather to be understood mystically of the gifts of the church (de dotibus ecclesiae) of which the episcopate is the custodian. Others, as Sarnelli (quoted by Martigny), understand Optatus to allude to the custom of sealing up the baptismal fonts with the bishop's seal in Lent (see below). "Mais de telles difficultés s'évanouissent devant cet autre texte du même docteur et du même livre: Le pontife porte l'anneau, afin qu'il connaisse qu'il est l'époux de son église, et que pour elle, à l'exemple du Christ, il sacrifie sa vie, s'il le faut" (Dict. u. s.). In his special work on Christian rings he quotes the original at length, understanding the last words to refer to the discipline of the secret: "Pontifex ergo anulum portat ut se sponsum ecclesiae agnoscat, et pro illa animam, si necesse fuerit, ponat; mysteria Scripturae à perditis sigillet, secreta ecclesiae resignet." But no such passage occurs anywhere in Optatus, nor any passage at all like it. It is found verbatim in Honorius Augustodunensis, a writer of the posed to have been written about A.D. 610, he says: "Datur (episcopo dum consecratur) et anulus propter signum pontificalis honoris vel signaculum secretorum" (c. 5). The last words might appear to imply that this was a signet-ring.³ David, bishop of Benevento in the time of Charlemagne, concludes a mandate as follows: "anulo sanctae nostrae ecclesiae firmavimus roborandum" (quoted from Ughelli in Mab. de re Dipl. ii. xv.), from which it would appear probable that the bishop's official ring went with the see. And upon the whole it seems most natural to conclude with Mr. Waterton that most if not all the episcopal rings earlier than the 11th century were also used as signets (Arch. Journ. vol. xx. p. 225). They would not only be employed for sealing a letter or an official document, of which instances have been given: but they were also used to seal up a box containing relics, when an altar was consecrated and the box placed thereon. (See Baronius s. a. 627 for the seal on the box containing, as it was supposed, the wood of the true cross, which was found unbroken, when Syroes, son of Chosroes, king of Persia, restored this relic to the Christians.) In some churches of Gaul and Spain the not uncommon but far from universal prohibition to baptise in Lent was enforced in the 7th century by the application of the bishop's seal (anulus, signaculum) to the gates of the baptistery, from the beginning of Lent till Easter, when baptisms were often celebrated in great numbers (Concil. Tolet. xvii. (694), De reg. fid. c. ii.; Sarnelli, Di varie Sorte di Anelli, Lett. Eccles. t. iii. p. 84, referred to in Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneaux; Bingham, Ant. xi. 6, § 7, xxi. i. § 12).⁴

There are also other allusions to the official episcopal ring in the early part of the 7th century, which seem to carry it somewhat further back than themselves, probably into the preceding century. A letter of pope Boniface IV. read in the council of Rome (A.D. 610) says that "monachus nequaquam anulo pontificali subarrarentur," i.e. be elevated (as Augustine and Martin had been) to the episcopal rank, if the monastic life was an utter disqualification for the office (Coleti, Concil. t. vi. p. 1356). In the twenty-eighth canon of the fourth council of Toledo, held under the presidency of Isidore of Seville, A.D. 633) we read that "if a bishop, presbyter, or deacon be unjustly deposed, and in a subsequent synod be found innocent, he cannot be what he had previously been, unless he receive again the rank which he had lost from the hand of a bishop before the altar. If he have been a bishop, he must receive the stole (orarium), ring, and staff . . . and so the other minor orders are to receive, with a view to their restoration, what at the time of ordination they originally received. (Bruns, Canon. Apost. et Concil. Vet. vol. i. p. 231. Marriott's rendering is here followed, Vest. Christ. p. 75.) From these passages it is plain that before they were written bishops received a ring at their ordination. We have several ancient ordination services in which the delivery of the ring to the bishop is mentioned; and of these one, if not more, is probably somewhat earlier than the 7th century. The sacramentary of Gregory the Great, circa A.D. 590, as it stands in Muratori's edition, gives the following formula: Ad anulum digito imponendum. Accipe anulum fidei, scilicet signaculum, quatenus sponsam Dei, videlicet sanctam ecclesiam, intemerata fide ornatus illibate custodias. (Sacramentarium Gregorianum de Officio Episcopi, in Muratori, Liturg. Rom. Vet. t. ii. p. 442, Venet. 1748.) But in the edition of Angelo Rocca (quoted by Du Saussaye, Panopl. Episcop. p. 181) we read: "memor sponsonis et desponsationis ecclesiasticae, ut dilectionis Domini Dei tui, in die qua asecutus es hunc honorem cave ne obliviscaris illius. Accipe ergo anulum discretionis et honoris, fidei signum, ut quae signanda sint signes, et quae aperienda sunt prodas, quae liganda sunt liges, quae solvenda sunt solvas: utque credentibus per fidem baptismatis, lapsis autem sed poenitentibus per mysterium reconciliationis januas regni caelestis aperias; cunctis vero de thesauro Dominico, nova et vetera proferas, ut ad aeternam salutem omnibus consulas gratia Domini nostri Jesu Christi, cui cum Patre et Spiritu Sancto est honor et gloria in saecula saeculorum. Amen." This last appears to be a later form or adaptation of the sacramentary which gave rise to the Ordo Romanus,^u where a portion of the same words occurs (Martigny, Anneaux chez les prem. Chrét. p. 41). From these flowed a variety of formulae, one of the earliest being found in the pontifical of Ecgbert, Archbishop of York (732-766), where we read, "Cum anulus datur haec oratio dicitur: Accipe anulum pontificalis honoris, ut sis fidei integritate munitus. Pontif. Egberti Eboracensis Episcopi in Mart. de Ant. Eccl. Rit. lib. i. c. viii. art. xi. Ordo ii. We have also repetitions or variations thereof in several early mediaeval services for ordination, which in all cases appear, and in some instances are declared, to be derived from the Ordo Romanus. (See Martene de Ant. Rit. Eccl. lib. i. c. viii. art. xi.; Ordo iii., Ordo v., Ordo viii., Ordo ix., &c., Bassan. 1788.) Of the age of these rituals it is not easy to speak; but inasmuch as the manuscript of more than one of them is as early as the 10th or 11th century, it is not improbable that some of them may be as early as the time of Charlemagne. (See Waterton in Arch. Journ. xx. 1863, pp. 229, 230.) In the Missa Pontificalis (Ordo xviii.) of Illyricus, which he thought to have been in use in the West about the time of Gregory the Great, occurs this prayer: "Ad anulum; circumda Domine digitos meos virtute et decora sacrificacione." (Gerbert, Vet. Liturg. Alamain.

12th century, in his Gemma animae, lib. i. c. 216 (Migne, Patrol. t. clxxii. p. 609; Marriott, Vest. Christ. pp. 139-140).

³ This inference however is made less certain by the allegorical expressions which follow. "Nam multa sunt quae carnalium minusque intelligentium sensibus occultantes sacerdotes quasi sub signaculo abscondunt, ne indignis quibusque sacramenta Dei aperiantur."

tom. i. pp. 76, 255, 256, s. l. 1776. See also Martene, u. s. lib. i. c. iv. Art. xii. Ordo iv.) It is impossible to conjecture from these liturgical forms the material of the ring, and whether the ring had a gem or not, and if it had, whether the stone bore any device or not. These matters may for some time have been left indefinite; afterwards, as is well known, they were all definitely fixed. The Ordo Romanus and general usage in the Roman church afterwards places the ring on the fourth finger of the bishop's right hand. "Anulos ipsos non in sinistra poni oportet," says pope Gregory IV. (elected to the papal throne in 827), "nullius venae cordialis habita ratione, quae gentilitatem capere videretur; sed omnino in dextra tanquam digniore, qua sacrae benedictiones impenduntur; maxime quia ipsi pontifices, dum sacrificant, non nimium exercitas manus habent; et sic ipsorum tam summorum quam ceterorum pontificum consecrationibus dexteræ signanter anulum imponitur" (De Cultu Pontificum, quoted in Martigny, Anneaux, &c. p. 40).

The earlier stages (if any) through which the episcopal ring, with its concomitant staff, passed before it was placed on the hands of the bishop-elect by the consecrating prelate, appear to be unknown before the time of Charlemagne. Perhaps it was not received at all before consecration.

A few words must now be said upon the history of episcopal investiture by the ring, the source of such deadly feuds between the popes and emperors in the 11th and 12th centuries.

The Ring of Investiture.—In the reign of Charlemagne commenced, according to the common story, the investiture by the ring and staff, an act of the civil power which entitled the bishop-elect to the possession of the temporalities of his see.^v This privilege (among others with which we are not now concerned) was granted to him by pope Hadrian I. in gratitude for the services which Charles has rendered to the Holy See by expelling the Lombards from Italy. This fact is distinctly asserted not only by two of the best historians of the 12th century, Sigebert (Chron. s. a. mexi.; see also Grat. Dist. lxxiii. c. 22, quoted in INVESTITURE), and by William of Malmesbury (Gest. Reg. Angl. lib. ii. § 202, p. 348, ed. Hardy), who puts the declaration to that effect, with express mention of the anulus et baculus, into the mouth of pope Gregory VI., but also by a bull of pope Leo VIII.

^v Such is the conclusion of Kirchmann (de Anulis, c. 20, p. 211, Slesv. 1657), who has carefully investigated the subject. "Verum age, dicamus etiam," are his words, "de usu anulorum in episcoporum investituris; cuius moris ante Caroli M. tempora nullum reperio apud scriptores vestigium." De Corte accepts his conclusion, and indeed his very words. (Curtius, Syntagma de Anulis, pp. 372, 373, Antv. 1706.) So does also Mr. O. Morgan in Archaeologia, vol. xxxvi. p. 395. Kirchmann quotes several writers later than those mentioned in the text, who agree in the view that investitures originated in the time of Charlemagne. Mosheim, Ch. Hist. cent. xi. part ii. c. 2, § 15 (note), says, "What king or emperor first introduced this custom of appointing prelates by delivery of staff and ring is very uncertain." Adam of Bremen ascribes it to Louis le Débonnaire, the son of Charlemagne (814-840); Humbert to Otho the Great (936-973), to which latter view Mosheim is much inclined. Both writers are of the 11th century.

^u Probably a compilation of the 8th century. See Ordo. A critical edition of these early liturgical compositions, which differ much in different MSS., would be a great boon. See Palmer, Orig. Liturg. § vi. (Liturgy of Rome).

(963-965), written only about a century and a half after the death of Charlemagne, when Otho the Great, his patron, was on the throne. "Ad exemplum B. Hadriani apostolicæ sedis antistitis, qui domino Carolo victoriosissimo regi Francorum et Longobardorum patriciatus dignitatem ac ordinationem apostolicæ sedis et investituram episcoporum concessit, ego quoque Leo episcopus servus servorum Dei . . . concedimus atque largimur Othoni primo regi Teutonicorum," &c. (Grat. Decr. P. i. c. In Synodo Distinct. lxiii., whence Kirchmann de Anulis, pp. 212, 213; but the text is a little different in Pertz, Mon. Germ. Leg. tom. ii. B. p. 166 q. v.) It is only fair to say that attempts have been made recently to throw doubts on the genuineness of this bull. Dr. Pertz thinks that the document "seems to betray a later origin," but that the emperors at the time "really had the power here described" (Robertson, Hist. Christ. Church, book v. ch. v.). But the bull of a pope, reckoned by the ultra-Roman party as an anti-pope, offers no very tempting subject for a forger in the interest of the see of Rome.

Notwithstanding these and other respectable authorities, some distinguished writers have lately called in question the whole story as having been fabricated in the interest of Rome, and as being unknown in the age of Charlemagne.* The reader must of course form his own conclusion on this obscure matter, which could not properly have been passed over in the present article.

It must be added, in concluding this division of the subject, that the episcopal ring is unknown to the Greek and Oriental churches.

The Fisherman's Ring.—The ring of the fisherman, now made of gold, and having a representation of St. Peter in a boat fishing, with the name of the reigning pope around it, which (says Mr. Waterton) "may be called the papal ring of investiture, being placed on the newly elected pope's finger by the Cardinal Camerlengo immediately after a successful counting of votes has been arrived at by the conclave," belongs, as it would seem, to rather a late mediæval period. It has been stated, indeed, by Rebuffus, quoted by Longi de Anulis, p. 93) and by Bongratia, quoted by Heineccius (de Sigillis, p. 28), that St. Peter himself made use of this ring; but who believes this, asks Heineccius, but Bongratia and the like of him? Mabillon (de Re Dipl. lib. ii. c. 14, § 11) did not know of any evidence that this ring was employed before the 13th century. Mr. Waterton, in his valuable memoir "On the Ring of the Fisherman" (Archæologia, vol. xi. p. 138, 1856), believes that the first mention of it occurs in a letter of Pope Clement IV. to his nephew Peter Grossi, in 1265, in which he says "Saluta matrem et fratres; non scribimus tibi neque familiaribus nostris sub bulla, sed sub Piscatoris sigillo, quo Romani pontifices in suis secretis utuntur" (Masson, in Vita).^{*} Hence," he says, "it may be inferred that the popes had already, and for some time past, used this device as a seal, but only for their private letters. Martin V. elected in 1417, issued three briefs, all sub anulo Piscatoris, in the year 1426. For further information on this matter down to our own times, see Waterton (u. s. pp. 138-142); and O. Morgan (u. s. p. 398).

4. ESPOUSAL AND MARRIAGE RINGS.

The early Christians employed the ring in espousals, but seemingly not, as now, in the solemnity of marriage itself. "This was an innocent ceremony," says Bingham, who refers to Selden, Uxor Hebr. lib. ii. c. 14 and c. 25, "used by the Romans before the times of Christianity, and in some measure admitted by the Jews, whence it was adopted among the Christian rites of espousal without any opposition or contradiction" (Antiq. of Christian Church, book xxii. c. 3, § 5). Tertullian speaks of its use among the heathen as harmless, at which Christians could take no offence, and might therefore be present at the ceremonial of espousals as well as at some others. But it would rather seem from his language that it had not yet been adopted by the Christians of Carthage: "eas (solemnitates) mundas esse opinor per semetipsas: quia neque vestitus virilis, neque anulus (sponsalium sc.; see the words preceding), aut conjunctio maritalis de alicujus idoli honore descendit" (De Idolol. c. 16). He commends the ancient Romans for teaching women modesty and sobriety, to whom no other wearing of gold was permitted save on the finger, on which the "anulus pronubus" had been placed (Apol. c. 6). The espousal ring, however, was not always of gold, nor did it always bear a device. "Etiam nunc sponsæ anulus ferreus mittitur, isque in gemma" (Plin. N. H. xxxiii. 1). Yet pagan rings sometimes bore joined hands as a device (Pignor. Epist. 19); such were also common in Italy in the 16th century, and called una fede, but became obsolete shortly afterwards. "Id genus anulorum vulgo nuncupatum est fides," says Licetus de Anulis, p. 48: but he mentions no such Christian rings before the time of pope Nicolas I. It is evident, however, from the words of Clement of Alexandria that Christian women, while they were bound to keep the wearing of gold within reasonable limits, were permitted, or rather enjoined, to wear one gold ring, as a seal upon their husband's goods, seeing that upon them the care and safe keeping of the house devolved. This also proves that the wife's ring bore a device. The use of a ring as a signet for safety is the only one of which this father approves; all other rings, he says, are to be eschewed (Pæd. lib. iii. c. xi. p. 243 and p. 246, Sylb.). Whether this ring had been given her as "anulus pronubus" does not clearly appear. But it would seem probable that the ring of espousals was employed in Christian rites in the time of St. Agnes, who suffered martyrdom soon after the beginning of the persecution of Diocletian,

* See Robertson, Hist. Chr. Church, book iv. c. vi. (in fine), and INVESTITURE in this Dictionary. The alleged silence of the Caroline Capitularies, it has been said, "seems conclusive" against it. The silence, however, of Alcuin, Amalarius, and Rabanus Maurus has been similarly urged, according to Martigny, as throwing doubt on the existence of the episcopal ring in the 9th century, which has been clearly shewn to have been in use for some time earlier. (See Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneau episcopal.)

* This is the earliest passage quoted by Mabillon for its use (u. s.); and from him it is doubtless derived by Mr. Waterton. See also Heineccius, u. s. p. 148.

A.D. 303. When solicited in marriage by a noble youth, she replied that she was already pre-occupied by another lover (i.e. Jesus Christ), "qui . . . anulo fidei suae subarrhavit me, longe te nobilior et genere et dignitate" (Pseudo-Ambros. Epist. 1). The same thing is rendered more evident still from the expressions of St. Peter Chrysologus (made bishop of Ravenna in 433), who, alluding to the father's putting a ring on the finger of the returning prodigal, not only calls it "anulum honoris . . . insigne Spiritus pignus, signaculum fidei" (these and like expressions occur also in other writers, see De Corte, Synt. p. 79), but "arrham coelestium nuptiarum" (Serm. v.). Asterius, bishop of Amasia in Pontus, who flourished about the year 400, makes direct allusions to the pre-nuptial ceremonies among Christians, and although he does not directly mention the ring, there is little doubt that it was employed, in accordance with Roman usage, when the dowry was agreed upon. "Wilt thou make void (he asks) the agreements (ἐν τῷ γάμῳ) which thou settdest down with a view to marriage . . . I mean the dowry which was there covenanted (τῆς προικὸς τῆς συγγραφείσης ἐνταῦθα)?" (Aster. Homil. in Matth. xix. 3, ed. Combef. p. 81 D, Paris, 1648). We have an actual example of the giving of the espousal ring recorded by Gregory of Tours, in a work written between 590 and 595, referring to somewhat earlier times than his own. Speaking of St. Leobardus (who afterwards retired to a monastery) he says: "Denique dato sponsae anulo, porrigit osculum, praebebat calceamentum, celebrat sponsalium diem fastum" (Vit. Patr. c. 20). Yet it is not easy to name any author earlier than Isidore of Seville, who succeeded to the archbishopric of that place in 595, from whom we can obtain a distinct attestation that the ring was regularly used in Christian espousals. "The ring (says he) is given by the espouser to the espoused (à sponso sponsae) either for a sign of mutual fidelity or still more to join their hearts by this pledge; and therefore the ring is placed on the fourth finger because a certain vein, it is said (see Aul. Gell. Noct. Att. x. 10), flows thence to the heart" (Isid. Hisp. de Eccles. Off. ii. 20). During the whole period with which we are concerned the ring seems to have been used in espousals only, and never in the actual marriage ceremony itself. For pope Nicolas I., writing so late as 860 in reply to the Bulgarians, says: "We will try to shew you the usage, which the holy Roman church received anciently, and which the church holds up to this time in unions of this kind. . . . After the espousals, which are the promised covenants of future marriage, made by mutual consent . . . and after the espouser has engaged to himself by a pledge (arrhis) his espoused by decorating her finger with a ring of fidelity . . . both are led shortly afterwards or at some convenient time to the performance of the marriage covenant. And first they are placed in the church, bringing offerings which they ought to offer to God by the hands of his priest, and then they receive the benediction and the heavenly veil" (Nicol. I. Respons. ad Consult. Bulg. c. 3; in Coleti, Concil. t. ix. pp. 1535, 6).

† Riddle (Christ. Ant. p. 714 note) says that Calvoer (Litulae Eccl.) traces the origin of the marriage ring to

Examples of Espousal or Marriage Rings.—The following rings bear every appearance of having served matrimonial purposes. In Spon's Recherches curieuses d'Antiquité, Lyon, 1683, the Dixième Dissertation is a letter from de Peiresc to Holstenius in 1619. De Peiresc bought at Arles a gold ring, weighing about an ounce, recently disinterred, on which was engraved a face of rather rude execution with the inscription around: " + TECLA SEGELLA, le tout dans une plaque d'or environnée de quelques enrichissements de feuillages et godrons; dans le vuide desquels est écrit + TECLA VIVAT DEO CVM MARITO SEO (sic); à l'opposite du cercle de cette bague, on y voit un petit ovale avec les lettres dedans RA'VE" (p. 169).

Peiresc observes that the cross and the diction shew the ring to be Christian: SEO for SVO he notes as a not uncommon form in the 4th and 5th centuries; and more common still in later ones. He regards it as an anulus pronubus. He does not explain SEGELLA: and proposes very doubtfully arra genialis as the explanation of RA'VE. The former may possibly be for Teclae (i.e. Theclae ?) sigillum. Other rings have been found in France which appear to be Christian and to have been used in espousals; e.g. a gold ring, duplex, hoop-wire of light fabric swelling towards the united oval bezels, which have a line of beads from them on either side: one of them bears the name BAVB▼LFVS, the last three letters written in a line above; the other has HARCIVBA, the last letter written above. It is regarded as a Christian marriage ring by M. Le Blant who figures it (Inscr. chrét. de la Gaule, n. 337, pl. 36, n. 221), and by Canon Martigny (Annuaire chez les prem. Chrét. p. 12). There is, however, the 10th century. He supposes it to have been introduced in imitation of the ring worn by bishops. Martene de Ant. Eccl. Rit. (lib. i. c. ix. art. 5) gives several ordines for marriage. The ring is not mentioned in the earliest (Ordo i.) the Missale Gelasianum, printed from a MS. of the end of the 8th or beginning of the 9th century; it occurs, however, in a Missale Redonense (Ordo ii.), printed from a MS. about 200 years later, where we have Benedictio super anulum in these words: Creator et conservator humani generis, dator aeternae salutis, omnipotens Deus, tu permitte Spiritum Sanctum Paraclitum super hunc anulum. Per, &c. Also in another form (idem Ordo) thus: Benedic, Domine, anulum istum, ut in ejus figura pudicitiam custodiant. Per, &c. We likewise find the ring, which is sometimes said to be a silver and sometimes a gold ring, in almost all the marriage services taken from still later MSS. (Ordo iii. iv. vi. vii. viiii. ix. x. xi. xii. &c.). There are two rings mentioned in the Euchologia of the Greeks; the priest gives a gold ring to the bridegroom and a silver ring to the bride with various ceremonies and a long prayer afterwards (Ordo xvi.) See also Pellicia, De Eccl. Pol. vi. 1, 3. It is needless to do more than allude to the assertion or tradition that Joseph gave the Virgin Mary first an espousal ring and afterwards a marriage ring (Martene, l. c.). J. B. Lauri published in 1622 a work entitled De Anulo pronubo Deiparae Virginis, and from this work is derived the account given in Dr. John Patrick's Reflections upon the Devotions of the Roman Church, pp. 45-60, Lond. 1686 (ed. 2 without his name); see also G. Longi de anulis, p. 7, Lugd. Bat. 1672. This ring, of a well-known type of later Roman times, is preserved at Perugia. There is, however, another which passes under the same name in the church of St. Anne at Rome (Du Saussay, Panopl. episc. p. 192). See Martigny, Dict. s. v. Anneauz, and Fortnum in Academy, vol. x. p. 505 (1876).

no external sign of its Christianity, but it is very similar in structure to Fortnum, No. 27, which is certainly Christian. Probably rather of the 4th century than of the Merovingian age, to which M. Le Blant refers it: said to have been found at Vitry-le-François, now in the Cabinet des Médailles. Another gold ring, also considered to be Christian, is figured and described by Le Blant (u. s. n. 669 B, pl. 90, Nos. 534, 536). It was found near Mulsane, and is of late work; two sides of its raised oblong chaton are inscribed with the names DROMACI | VS BETTA in niello, while on the face are engraved a man and a woman standing; the flattened wire-like hoop is corded at intervals. Probably too late to be Pagan.* But Mr. Fortnum possesses a gold ring (No. 33), undoubtedly Christian, which he regards as matrimonial, of Byzantine character, like the coins of the 5th century. The hoop, flat inside, angular externally, bears a circular button-like bezel, on the face of which a male and female bust are opposed, above them there is a Latin cross, the limbs being slightly wedge-shaped. Weight 3½ dwts. Obtained from Athens. Another similar, but finer example, octagonal, with decorated panels, is given in Arch. Journ. (vol. xxi. p. 311). See Arch. Journ. (vol. vii. p. 191), for a Roman ring found in Durham with similar types, but without any Christian emblem. There are in fine certain gems, set in rings, bearing an anchor from whose arms hang two fishes (GEMS, p. 714, b; see also Gori, Dactyl. ii. n. 564, ed. Gronov.) and Canon Martigny, who has received and figured an example bought from Alexandria (Dict. s. v. Anneaux, 2nd ed.) regards these "anneaux et pierres annulaires" as "bagues nuptiales." They appear to be of the 4th and 5th centuries. His speculation, if uncertain, is at least ingenious.

(The following are the principal works on rings in general, in all which Christian rings are mentioned incidentally. RITUALE. This word is commonly applied to the collection of ritual directions for the various offices drawn up, in accordance with the directions of the council of Trent, by pope Paul V. in 1614. It has sometimes been supposed that the "Libellus officialis" of iv. Tolet. c. 26, was a ritual book, but this does not seem probable. [OFFICIALIS LIBER; ORDO.] [C.]

ROGATION DAYS. The procession on the three days before Ascension Day was instituted by Mamertus, bishop of Vienne in Dauphiné, A.D. 452, when that city was greatly injured by earthquakes, and the royal palace destroyed by lightning. It became an annual observance, and other bishops, moved by the visible blessing which attended it, followed the example of Vienne (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 34; Avit. Hom. de Rogat.; Migne, Patr. Lat. lix. 201; Sidonius, Epist. v. 14). Whether his procession was really earlier than the Roman rite of April 25 [PROCESSIONS], it is impossible to decide. Mamertus, at all events, instituted "orandi modum, edendi seriem, erogandi hilarem dispensationem" (Greg. Tur.), which suited the temper of his countrymen, and became a widely spread and enduring observance. In 511 it was enforced by the council of Orleans: "Ab omnibus ecclesiis placuit celebrari" (can. 27). In England the council of Cloveshoo, 747, orders the observance of these rogation days, "secundum morem priorum nostrorum" (can. 16). The council of Mayence in 813 made the following decree, which can hardly refer to any other rogations than those before Holy Thursday: "It hath seemed good to us that the greater litany be observed by all Christians on three days, as we find in our reading to have been done, and as our holy fathers instituted, not on horseback, nor in costly garments, but with bare feet, and in sack-cloth and ashes, unless sickness shall hinder" (can. 33; comp. Sidonius, Ep. v. 7, "Incedunt . . . castorinati ad laetania"). Herard, 858: "De diebus rogationum, ut reverenter ac studiosè absque turpibus jocis et verbis celebrentur" (Capit. 94). These rogations were not received at Rome until the time of Leo III. (A.D. 795), who ordered that on the Monday "the pontiff, with all the clergy and all the people, should go forth from the church of the Mother of God, and proceed to the manger at the Church of the Saviour, which is called the Constantinian, with hymns and spiritual songs;" on Tuesday from St. Sabina to St. Paul, and Wednesday from the Church of Jerusalem to St. Lawrence without the walls (Liber Pontif. n. 98).

Gregory of Tours, as above cited, does not tell us that the "orandi modus" instituted by Mamertus included a procession, but we learn that it did from an incidental notice of the rogation days by the same author in Hist. Franc. ix. 6: "In these days the public rogations were celebrated, which are wont to be performed before the holy day of the Lord's Ascension. But it came to pass that while Raguemodus, the bishop (of Paris) was in procession with his people, and perambulating the holy places," &c. So Fortunatus in his Life of Germanus, who died in 576, some thirty years before his biographer, telling the story of a blind woman, "not able to go with the people at the time of the Litanies," says that "hearing the choir of the psalm-singers she implores the help of the lord Germanus with tears." After a vision she recovers her sight; and when the day dawns she "goes forth to mass with the people in the procession" (c. 33).

The Luxeuil lectionary gives proper lessons for these days at matins, terce, sext, and none (Lit. Gall. 149). One prophecy and three gospels are also appointed, "in letanias legenda," in the sacramentary of Besançon (Mus. Ital. i. 334). "Collectiones in rogationibus per diversa loca sanctorum," i.e. to be said at the several churches or shrines at which the procession stopped, occur in the Gothico-Gallican Missal (Lit. Gall. 266), and the Missale Gallicanum Vetus (376). The former also gives proper missae for each day (263-266); the latter part of a missa, headed "Incipit missa in Rogationibus" (377), which breaks off in the middle of the contestation. The heading implies that there was only one. There is only one in the Besançon rite (Mus. Ital. i. 335). Several early sermons preached on these occasions are extant, viz. two by Caesarius of Arles, A.D. 502 (De Letania, I. ii. in Append. ad Opp. Augustin. SS. 173, 174, ed. Ben.), one by an unknown bishop (ibid. Serm. 135), two entire by Avitus of Vienne, A.D. 490 (Opp. Av. 291, 296, Migne, lix.), and several fragments by the same author (303, 306, 310, 319, 322, &c.). ROME, COUNCILS OF. Some preliminary remarks on these councils are necessary, from the prominent, yet constantly changing, position occupied by the see of Rome, from early times downwards, in the affairs of the church. First, whether from design or accident, their records have been about the worst preserved of any, the only voucher for the earliest being the Lib. Synodicus or Synodicon, by a Greek writer with Latin sympathies, in the 9th century, which, even if it can be trusted, is full of mistakes; and but incidental references in St. Cyprian, Eusebius, Rufinus, St. Jerome, or St. Augustine for the next early. Was it that their proceedings were so trivial, or of so little interest to the world in general, as to be not worth recording? or was it that they witnessed to a state of things which a later age may have wished forgotten? Secondly—whether from design or accident—there have been more synods alleged to have been held at Rome confessedly or probably spurious, than in all the rest of the world put together, their characteristic being that they have been forged in the papal interest directly, which is also the characteristic of a good many more fabled to have been held elsewhere. It may suffice to instance the three Roman synods under pope Silvester, as they are called (Mansi, ii. 551-4, 615-34, and 1081-4) of the first kind; the alleged canons and synodical letter of the genuine (ibid. 469-77), with the canons of the spurious (called 1 and 2 in the Pseudo-Isid. collection, where they may all be read and compared; Migne's Patrol. cxxx. 375-382) councils of Arles, all three betraying their late origin, of the second. How so patent a forgery can have deceived the learned so long is a marvel. The acts of the pretended council of Sinuessa (Mansi, i. 1249-60), damaging as they may seem to pope Marcellinus personally, were conceived in the interests of his see. Centuries upon centuries have to elapse before we come upon a really genuine Roman synod, with tolerably full details from Roman archives. One thing they all testify to beyond doubt, whether true or false, viz. that according to the tradition of those days the bishop of Rome could decide nothing of importance without a synod, any more than his brother bishops. Let us now inquire into their composition. This we shall find varied with the actual extent of jurisdiction of their presiding bishop. It was at one time commensurate with that of the city praefect, and was limited to the suburban churches; at another, it extended over the ten provinces of central and south Italy governed by the city vicar, but went no further, which was its position about the time of the Nicene council and for some time later [see that Art.]. Every now and then, indeed, it had a wider appearance; but this is at once seen to have been exceptional. All the earliest Roman synods are stated, in the Lib. Synodicus before-named, to have been synods of from 10 to 15 bishops, to which the "Concilium quindecim finitimorum episcoporum," in a rescript of Gratian and Valentinian to the then city vicar, may point (Mansi, iii. 629; comp. the letter of the Roman council immediately preceding, p. 624). Then, for a considerable period, their numbers increased, but seldom exceeded 70, which is about the number of sees stated in the old Vatican MS. printed by Baronius (A.D. 1057, n. 19-23; comp. De Marca, Concord. Sac. et Imp. i. 3, 12) to be dependent on Rome as their metropole; and also the number usually fixed upon for mythic synods. Every now and then higher numbers are reported, as has been said; and bishops outside those limits are found to have been present, but present exceptionally. There were three bishops, for instance, from France, named by Constantine, present at the synod which pope Miltiades or Melchiades, and Merocles (not Mark, see S. Opt. de Schism. Don. i. 23), bishop of Milan, held at his instance (Mansi, ii. 433-40). There was a large gathering under pope Damasus, A.D. 372, when Auxentius, bishop of Milan, was deposed. Its synodical letter, accordingly, runs in the names of Damasus and Valerian; the latter being bishop of Aquileia (ibid. iii. 455). The Sardican fathers had before this requested pope Julius to transmit their decisions to "the bishops of Italy, Sicily, and Sardinia" (ibid. 40). And he himself tells the Orientals that he speaks in the name of the Italian, and all the bishops of the "regions" (as the Latin has it) in which his see lay, as well as his own (ibid. ii. 1219). In both passages it is, of course, possible that the bishops of the seven provinces of north Italy may be included; but if so, this was exceptional, as the bishops of Aquileia, Milan, and Ravenna were still independent centres in those provinces, and proud of their independence. Nevertheless, in process of time not only they, but France, Spain, Great Britain, and Germany threw themselves one after another into the arms of the encroaching power, or else had to submit, till metropolitan boundaries, by widening their circle, became patriarchal, and synods, from being Roman or Italian, European (De Marca, ibid. c. vi. 4, and c. vii. 3-8, but with some corrections). We may now pass to the synods themselves.

Passing over three synods of the 2nd century reported in a work of no credit (Hefele, i. 83, Eng. tr.), we may start with the first given in Mansi from the Libellus Synodicus:—

1. A.D. 140, described as of twelve bishops under pope Telesphorus, when Theodotus the tanner was condemned. This is, however, a misstatement, for he was really condemned by pope Victor, A.D. 194-8, as Mansi points out (i. 662).

2. A.D. 165, of ten bishops under pope Anicetus and St. Polycarp, against those who kept Easter with the Jews (ibid. 686).

3. A.D. 197, under pope Victor; on the question of keeping Easter also (ibid. 725). There is a passing reference to this, indeed, in Euseb. E. H. v. 23; and perhaps 24 too.

4. Another, of fourteen bishops, under the same; condemning Theodotus, Ebion, and Artemon (ibid. 728).

5. Another under the same, condemning the errors of Sabellius and Noetus (ibid.), but which had not then arisen. Hence Mansi transfers it to the pontificate of Sixtus II., A.D. 258 (ibid. 1002).

6. A.D. 237, under pope Fabian, condemning Origen. For this, Rufinus and St. Jerome, besides Eusebius (H. E. vi. 36), are quoted; but their expressions are vague (ibid. 787).

7. A.D. 250, during a vacancy; being inferred from St. Cyprian, Ep. 31 (ibid. 805).

8. A.D. 251, under pope Cornelius, respecting the lapsed; inferred from St. Cyprian, Ep. lii. (ibid. 866), and at which Novatian was condemned. Some make two councils of this, but Mansi seems right (ibid. note) in considering it one and the same. True, the Lib. Synodicus says that it was attended by eighteen bishops (ibid. 871); on the other hand, Eusebius (E. H. vi. 43) expressly states there were sixty bishops present, and presbyters and deacons in still greater abundance. He states further, that at the end of the letter of Cornelius to Fabius of Antioch, now unfortunately lost, from which he was then quoting, the number of bishops attending it, with their names and sees, was set down. This agrees perfectly with what St. Cyprian says of it, and accounts for St. Jerome calling it an Italian council. But then St. Jerome speaks of a Roman synod as well (Mansi, ibid. 867-8). Probably, therefore, the Roman synod, composed of eighteen bishops, was joined by forty-two more from other parts of Italy before it separated. Cave begins his list (Hist. Lit. i. 157) with this synod, and it is certainly the most numerous and the best authenticated, as yet, of any synod of Rome.

9. A.D. 257, under pope Stephen; when the Africans, who had decided on re-baptizing heretics, were excommunicated (ibid. 931).

10. A.D. 260, under pope Dionysius; inferred from what St. Athanasius (de Sent. Dionys. § 13) says about his namesake of Alexandria being accused to him of Sabellianism (ibid. 1015).

11. A.D. 313, by order of the emperor Constantine, whose letter to Miltiades (or Melchiades), bishop of Rome, and Merocles, as we shall see presently, giving his reasons for it, is extant in Greek and Latin. Its Latin heading, according to one version, is "Constant. Aug. Melchiadi episcopo Romano hierarchae;" in another, for "hierarchae," we read "et Marco sanctissimo," taken evidently from the Lib. Synodicus. In Euseb. (E. H. x. 5), it is Μιλτιάδῃ ἐπισκόπῳ Ῥωμαίων καὶ Μάρκῳ, where the true reading is unquestionably Μερόκλει, for the reason supplied by Optatus. He tells them—using the plural number—that Caecilian is to set sail for Rome, with ten bishops from among his foes, and ten from among his friends. Further, that three bishops of France—Reticus, Maternus, and Marinus—have orders to be there likewise, to assist them in hearing their case, as the law directs. The Donatists, we learn from St. Optatus, had petitioned that their case might be tried by bishops selected from France. St. Optatus continues, "So there were judges given them in the persons of Maternus of Cologne, Reticus of Autun, and Marinus of Arles. These three bishops came from France, with fifteen more from Italy. They met in the house of Fausta, at the Lateran, in the fourth consulship of Constantine, and the third of Licinius, on Friday, Oct. 2; when there were present—Miltiades bishop of Rome, Reticus and Maternus and Marinus from France, and Merocles from Milan, Florian from Cesena, Zoticus from Kintzen, Stennius from Rimini, Felix from Florence, Gaudentius from Pisa, Constantius from Faenza, Proterius from Capua, Theophilus from Benevento, Sabinus from Terracina, Secundus from Praeneste, Felix from Cisterna, Maximus from Ostia, Evandrus from Urbino, Donatian from Cales. Before these nineteen bishops, when they had taken their seats, was the cause of Donatus and Caecilian laid. These sentences were given against Donatus by each: 'That he had confessed to having re-baptized, to having imposed hands on lapsed bishops, which is not the wont of the church.' Witnesses produced by Donatus having confessed that they had nothing to say against Caecilian, he was pronounced innocent by the sentences of all the above-named, not excepting even Miltiades, whose sentence, delivered in these words, closed the trial. 'Whereas it has appeared that Caecilian is not accused, on their own shewing, by those who came with Donatus, nor has been convicted on any count by Donatus himself, I am of opinion he fully deserves to be retained in the communion of his church, and in his own proper grade.' Yet, notwithstanding his own condemnation by so many voices, and the acquittal of his rival by a tribunal so grave," continues the bishop of Milevis, "Donatus appealed from these bishops" (De Schism. D. i. 23). Finally, that this led to the summoning of the council of Arles by Constantine two years later, we learn from himself (Euseb. ibid. Ep. ad Chrest.; comp. St. Aug. Ep. 43 and 88, ed. Ben.).

These details deserve to be recorded at length for their decisive character, and the unimpeachable testimony on which they rest. We learn from them (1) that it was Merocles, bishop of Milan, to whom Constantine wrote jointly with Miltiades; (2) that this synod was due to their joint action, under orders from him, which accounts for bishops from north as well as central Italy being there; (3) that if bishops from Africa and France were present, it was because they had been sent thither by him; (4) that each of the bishops present delivered his sentence; and if proceedings are said to have been closed on the bishop of Rome delivering his last of all, like St. James at Jerusalem—the council being held in his see—it is also true that Donatus appealed, and was allowed to appeal, from his sentence. Vales. (de Schism. Don. c. 7) confirms this, instead of disproving it by his quotations; but the authorities are best seen in Galland. (Bibl. Vet. Pat. v. 461–675); and in none of them is there the least countenance for the statement in Mansi (ii. 434), that Constantine appointed judges, "eâ lege, ut citra scitum, consensum, et auctoritatem Romani Pontificis constituti iudices nihil definiant;" or for Hefele's (i. 179) that "the decision of this synod was proclaimed by its president the bishop of Rome, and communicated to the emperor."

The three spurious synods under pope Silvester are omitted here; but the acts attributed to them may be studied, as curiosities, in Mansi (ii. 551–4, 600–618, and 1081–4). The earliest references to them being in the reign of Charlemagne, they could not have been forged much, if at all, earlier.

12. A.D. 342, commonly called the third under Julius. But the first and second, given by Mansi (ii. 1269 and 1351), are fictitious. At this, St. Athanasius, having been heard in his defence by fifty or more bishops with pope Julius at their head, was, with Marcellus and other exiled bishops, admitted to communion. The letter of Julius, written at the request of the council to announce this to the Easterns, is extant in Greek and Latin (Mansi, ibid. 1359; comp. St. Athan. Apol. c. Arian. §§ 20–36, and Sozom. iii. 8; and Vales. Observ. in Soc. et Soz. i. 4, 5).

13. A.D. 349, when Ursacius and Valens embraced the communion of St. Athanasius, and were themselves admitted to communion by Julius, having satisfied the council of Milan, two years before, of their faith and sincerity (Mansi, iii. 163–70).

14. A.D. 352, under Liberius, on becoming pope; when he declared for or against St. Athanasius. The common account that he declared for him is mainly based on his letter to the emperor Constantius, extant in the 5th fragment of St. Hilary, and admitted on all hands to have been written A.D. 354. But if the letter ascribed to him in the preceding fragment is genuine and rightly placed, he renounced his communion some time before. Then, in that case, the reference contained in it to a letter written by those he was then addressing to his predecessor, Julius, and not to himself, would point manifestly to its having been written soon after his accession; and this, again, would explain its apparent inconsistency with the other. For if there was a difference of two years between them in those exciting days, there was abundance of time for all the further correspondence mentioned in his letter to the emperor to have taken place, and also for Liberius to have changed his mind again and again in the interval. Lastly, from the character of the comments appended to this letter of the 4th fragment, we can hardly doubt its having been placed there by St. Hilary; and if so, cadit questio, Liberius must have signalled his accession, as well as his restoration, by condemning St. Athanasius. Mansi (iii. 208 and 229) shrinks from committing himself on either side.

15. A.D. 358, on the restoration of Liberius, if at all, the account given of it by Baluze being inconsistent with all we know of Felix and his retirement from other sources. (1) St. Athanasius, it is well known, likens his ordination to the deeds of Antichrist (Hist. ad Monach. 775). (2) It is admitted on all hands that, at the time of his appointment, Acacius of Caesarea was his friend; and that, whether orthodox or not, himself, he held communion with those who were not (Soc. ii. 37; Soz. iv. 11; Theodor. ii. 17). (3) It is nowhere stated that he was ejected by Constantius. He remained there by all accounts, on the contrary, till the return of Liberius, when, Socrates says, he was turned out of the church, in spite of the emperor, by the people (ib.); Theodoret and Philostorgius, that he removed elsewhere (ib. and iv. 3); Sozomen, that he shortly died (iv. 15). In short, the story reported by Baluze (Mansi, iii. 290) finds its best pendant in the story reported by Mansi farther on (ibid. 339–44).

16. A.D. 364, occasioned by the arrival of deputies from various Macedonian synods, professing the Nicene faith; when the synodical letter of Liberius and the Western bishops, extolling the Nicene faith and their adherence to it, preserved by Socrates (iv. 12), was penned in reply. There is no mention, however, in either document of St. Athanasius (Mansi, iii. 377–80). The letter addressed by Liberius to the bishops of Italy, with theirs to the Illyrians, wrongly supposed by Pagi to have emanated from a Roman synod under Damasus (ad Baron. A.D. 369, n. 5), would seem from expressions in this synodical to have been sent earlier (St. Hilar. Fragm. xii. ed. Ben., with the note).

17. A.D. 366, called the first under Damasus, who was elected this year; and in it with 28 bishops is said to have condemned Valens and Ursacius, and if the biographer of Eusebius, the presbyter who withstood Liberius, is to be believed, Liberius also (Mansi, iii. 447). *

18. A.D. 367 (al. 369), called the second under Damasus; who was, according to his biographer, acquitted in it by 44 bishops of a charge of adultery brought against him by two deacons, Concordius and Callistus, his accusers being condemned.

19. A.D. 372 (al. 369), or the third under Damasus; in which Auxentius, bishop of Milan, was deposed. As Mansi points out, the synods of Antioch and Rome, with their dates, are much confused about this time (iii. 463-8). This, he thinks with Pagi, took place A.D. 372. It was attended by 90 bishops from Italy and France, as Theodoret (ii. 22), or by bishops of many nations, as Sozomen says (vi. 23). But according to the letter of Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian, to be mentioned presently, two synods really met on this occasion, one in Rome and the other in France. Thus, the probability would be that the bishops present from France were deputies from their own synod. Again, its synodical letter, addressed to the bishops of Illyria, runs in the name, not of Damasus alone, but of Valerian as well; the latter being bishop of Aquileia. Further, the person sent with this same letter to the Easterns was a deacon, not of the church of Rome, but of Milan, and the title given to it in the copy which is thus addressed, "Exemplum synodi habitae Romae episcoporum xciii. ex rescripto imperiali" (ap. Luc. Holsten. Coll. Rom. p. 165), suggests its having been conveyed by the emperor, like that of A.D. 313. It was in every way, therefore, more of an Italian than of a Roman council; yet not more so than the gravity of the case would explain, the accused being no less a personage than the bishop of Milan. The subject also to which its synodical letter is devoted is the consubstantiality of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as affirmed by the Nicene fathers. Attention had been forcibly directed to this subject, in the well-known letter of the Alexandrian synod under St. Athanasius, ten years before; but it was revived now, as Sozomen says, with special reference to the Holy Ghost (vi. 22). The letter of this council, addressed, in the first instance, to the bishops of Illyria, was conveyed to them by Elpidius, and elicited an energetic appeal on their part to the Eastern bishops, to which the rescript already noticed, running in the name of the three emperors, lent additional force (both misplaced in Mansi, iii. 385-92). But the same letter was also carried into the East direct from Rome by the Milanese deacon Sabinus, as has been said. And there, Mansi thinks, a synod at Antioch under Meletius replied to it at once; but Antioch was tight in the grasp of Valens at that moment, and for the next six years, as has been shewn elsewhere (CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS OF, 4), and Meletius in exile, so that no synod under Meletius was then possible. Yet for all that, the mission of Sabinus was even then, probably, not lost upon Antioch; but, on the contrary, seems to have just helped to decide the movement, which resulted in the additions, afterwards accepted at Constantinople, to the Nicene creed (ibid.).

20. A.D. 374, or the fourth under Damasus; at which, says Mansi (iii. 467), Lucius, the rival of Peter, bishop of Alexandria (Soc. iv. 21-2), was condemned.

21. A.D. 378-9 (al. 373-5), or the fifth under Damasus; attended also by Peter of Alexandria, when Apollinarianism was condemned (Mansi, iii. 477). The circular of Damasus announcing this is given by Theodoret (v. 10; comp. Sozom. vi. 25). There was another, and vastly more dogmatic as well as important, letter addressed by him to Paulinus of Antioch (Pagi thinks at a council distinct from this—Mansi, ibid. 501-4) about the same time; perhaps owing to the continued banishment of Meletius, in which we are told particularly by Sozomen (vi. 7 and vii. 3) Paulinus was not involved; though Theodoret, in inserting it, says Paulinus was himself then at Thessalonica (v. 11). But whether he was or was not there, this letter found its way to Antioch at last, where it was accepted in full council by Meletius and 146 bishops, A.D. 379-80, on his return from exile; and is, in all probability, "the Western tome" classed with the rulings of that council in the fifth Constantinopolitan canon (misplaced by Mansi, iii. 461-2, but restored afterwards, 511-12). Meletius and his colleagues, in their answer to it, evidently refer to the mission of Sabinus at the commencement of his exile, A.D. 372 (ibid.). Lastly, the curious letter purporting to have been addressed by a Roman council to the emperors Gratian and Valentinian, without any mention of Valens, on the subject of the continued intrigues of Ursinus and his party, may have emanated also from this council (ibid. 624, with the imperial rescript, 627).

22. A.D. 381, the sixth under Damasus, and subsequently to the Aquileian council of that year, as Mansi says (ibid. 633); when the invitation to the Eastern bishops, mentioned by them in their synodical of the year following, was despatched [CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCILS OF, (4) p. 436].

23. A.D. 383, or the seventh and last under Damasus; at which the synodical letter of the Easterns just mentioned was received, and the faith of the council of Constantinople confirmed, and at which deputies from the East assisted (Mansi, ibid. 639-42).

24. A.D. 386, under pope Siricius (comp. Synod of Telepte); when nine canons were passed, says Pagi (ibid. 678), there being a synodical letter extant, as from that pope, to the bishops of Africa, containing nine canons, and dated "Rome in a council of 80 bishops, Jan. 6 (sub die octavâ, Idus Januarii, post), after the consulship of Arcadius and Bauto" (ibid. 669-71). But this, and several other expressions contained in it, and in more than one of its canons, go far to establish its fictitious character; so that its ninth canon (on clerical continence), instead of having dictated the second canon of the council of Carthage, A.D. 390 (ib. 692), as Mansi thinks (ib. 687), may rather have been borrowed from it or made to suit it. [See arts. COUNCIL OF SARDICA and COUNCIL OF TELEPTE.]

25. A.D. 390, when Siricius with his clergy condemned Jovinian and his followers, as he says himself (Mansi, ibid. 563-4; comp. 687).

26. A.D. 400, when pope Anastasius addressed the letter to the African bishops, mentioned in canon 65 of their code (ibid. 1019; comp. 770).

27. A.D. 417, under pope Zosimus, on his accession, in the church of St. Clement, as he tells us himself in his letter to the African bishops, recommending to their favourable consideration the profession which Celestius the Pelagian had then submitted to his (Mansi, iv. 350 and 371).

28. A.D. 418, if at all; at which, according to Mansi, pope Zosimus issued his encyclic, called "Tractatoria" by Mercator, condemning Celestius and Pelagius (ibid. p. 375).

29. A.D. 430, under pope Celestine; on receipt of letters from Nestorius respecting some Pelagian bishops who had come to Constantinople, complaining that they had been deprived of their sees. But his own orthodoxy being impeached in communications arriving about the same time from St. Cyril, his opinions were scrutinised and condemned; and he himself was threatened with excommunication by the pope, unless he retracted his errors within ten days of receiving this sentence, which was to be communicated simultaneously to St. Cyril (Mansi, ibid. pp. 545-52 and 1021-36).

30. A.D. 431, under the same; on receipt of the summons of the emperors Theodosius Junior and Valentinian III. to the council of Ephesus convened by them, when bishops Arcadius and Projectus and a presbyter named Philip were sent thither to represent the pope. In the paper of instructions they received from him, they are told to look to St. Cyril for guidance, and to follow his lead. But of his representing the pope conjointly with them there is not a word (Mansi, ibid. pp. 555-6). In the communications that passed between themselves on the subject the pope certainly delegated his own full powers to St. Cyril (ibid. p. 1301); but this was exceptional, no such delegation ever occurring before or since, and it is explained, probably, by the accused having been bishop of new Rome (comp. EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF).

31. A.D. 433, under pope Sixtus III., "le 31 juillet, pour l'anniversaire de son ordination," say the authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates: "Il y eut la nouvelle de la paix entre St. Cyrille et les Orientaux." Thus much, indeed, we learn from his own letters to John of Antioch and St. Cyril (ap. Baron. A.D. 433, n. 13 and 18). But how comes it that nothing further is added of a synod of this same year? whose acts, said to have been collected by Sixtus himself, fill seventeen columns in Mansi (v. 1161-78), but whose true character Pagi describes as follows:—"Acta synodi Romanæ de causâ Sixti III. Pontificis Romani stupro accusati . . . falsâ consulum notâ consignantur, et anachronismis scatent . . . ejusdem farinae sunt acta de synodali accusatione et expurgatione Polychronis episcopi Hierosolymitani, quæ sub pontificatu Sixti III. Romæ dicuntur habita. . . Refertur quidem accusatio et purgatio Sixti III. in libro Anastasii, sed cum in eo aliaæ fabulae recentitur, utraque historia suspectae fidei haberi debet" (ad Baron. ibid. n. 31).

32. A.D. 444, under pope Leo I., who gives more than one account of it himself, against the Manichees. (Mansi, vi. 459.)

33. A.D. 445, under the same, at which Celidonius, bishop of Besançon, was restored, and St. Hilary, metropolitan of Arles, who had deposed him, deprived of all jurisdiction over the province of Vienne for the future. A special edict was obtained subsequently by the pope from Valentinian III., confirming this sentence. (Mansi, ib. p. 463; comp. v. 1243-54.)

34. A.D. 447, under the same, at which it was ordained, with reference to some complaints which had reached him from Sicily, that no bishop should alienate the goods of his church in future without the full consent of his clergy. (Mansi, ib. p. 493; comp. v. 1313-16.)

35. A.D. 449, under the same, at which the acts of the robber-council of Ephesus, as it was called (Latrocinium), were rejected. (Mansi, ib. p. 509.)

36. A.D. 450, when the same pope besought Valentinian III., then present in Rome, to write to Theodosius Junior, and get a general council convened, at which the late proceedings of the robber-council might be reversed. (Mansi, ib. p. 511.) This, in all probability, was the council to which the Liber Synodicus refers, though Mansi thinks otherwise (ib.).

37. A.D. 451, at which, probably, the synodical letter of the Chalcedon was received, informing the pope of all that had been done there (the date assigned to it is Nov. 1; see Mansi, vi. 145). That he confirmed or accepted it all is a pure fiction of the Liber Synodicus (Mansi, vi. 869-72), flatly contradicted by his persistent opposition to the 28th canon; and it is even doubtful whether the second form of the creed (that of Constantinople), authorised there, was ever regarded by him with the same favour as the first (that of Nicaea). Mansi considers two canons were passed here to which the pope refers, as having been discussed at a late synod, in one of his many letters; but it is by no means clear when that letter was written, or to whom (ib. comp. vi. 385-92). The authors of L'Art de vérifier les Dates make the year of the synod to which he refers A.D. 458.

38. A.D. 465, under pope Hilary, to consider a dutiful address from the metropolitan and bishops of Tarragona, relative to two bishops of that province; one whom they wanted to ordain, and the other to depose. No doubt the thing most intended to be gathered from their proceedings was the glorification of their metropolitan and of the pope. But neither the submissive tone of their letters, nor the shouts of applause that interrupted them, as they were read out; nor yet the shouts of applause with which the five canons proposed by the pope for regulating their case were received; nor, again, the character of the five canons which he grounded on them in his reply,—make for anything half so much, as against the genuineness of this synod, which was evidently concocted to serve a purpose; nor can its standing first of the papal decrees, added to the collection of Dionysius Exiguus by a later hand, be considered much of a presumption in its favour. (Migne, Patrol. lxvii. 315-20, where all the documents are given in succession, which they are not in Mansi, vii. 959-68; and then 924-29.)

39. A.D. 478, under pope Simplicius, when Timothy (the Weasel) of Alexandria, Peter (the Fuller) of Antioch, and others were condemned. Inferred by Pagi from the words of Felix III. his successor. (Mansi, vii. 1017-22.)

40. A.D. 483, under Felix III., at which a letter of remonstrance was sent to the emperor

Zeno for taking heretics under his protection and ill-treating the orthodox; and a citation to Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, for similar conduct to appear at Rome. (Ib. pp. 1105-10.)

41. A.D. 484, under the same, at which bishops Vitalis and Misenus, who had been sent to Constantinople with the despatches of the previous synod, and inveigled by Acacius on their arrival there, were excommunicated and deposed, and Acacius himself condemned. A synodical letter, giving an account of what had been done, was addressed, in the name of the synod, to the orthodox presbyters and archimandrites of Constantinople; but it must have been written by the pope himself. Forty-three bishops are stated at the end to have subscribed to it; but, if so, where were the rest of the sixty-seven or seventy-seven bishops who are stated to have met on this occasion? (Ib. pp. 1137-42.) Probably, the letter, as it stands now, is both mutilated and interpolated, and should be assigned with Pagi to the next synod.

42. A.D. 485, under the same: Peter the Fuller having been restored at Antioch, and Calendio driven out by the emperor Zeno at the instigation of Acacius, who was thereupon condemned a second time, and with him Peter the Fuller also, and Peter Mongus, who had been forced upon Alexandria. (Ib. pp. 1165-70.)

43. A.D. 487, or, as Mansi thinks, 488; under the same, to consider the case of the Africans who had lapsed under persecution. Six resolutions were passed, and are contained in the encyclic of Felix III. (Ib. pp. 1171-74, and 1056-59) of that date.

44. A.D. 494 (al. 496), under pope Gelasius, and attended by seventy bishops, whence the well-known decree, de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis, as it is called in some MSS., attributing it to him (e.g. the catalogue made, A.D. 831, for the abbey of St. Requier, in Dach. Spicel. ii. 31, ed. Baluze), is said to have issued; being in others attributed to pope Damasus, a predecessor, or Hormisdas, a successor of Gelasius. But by Pearson (Vind. Ign. c. 4), and Cave (Hist. Lit. s. v. Gelasius), it has been pronounced spurious, and doubted by Beveridge (Cod. can. Eccl. prim. c. 9). Yet the strongest arguments against its genuineness have not been so fully developed as they might have been. (1) Its upholders are not agreed in what year or under what pope it was held, as Pagi confesses (ad Baron. A.D. 494, n. 19). (2) It is not included among the decrees of Gelasius by Dionysius Exiguus, who only just missed seeing him, and expresses great personal veneration for him in his preface (ap. Migne, Patrol. lxvii. 231). (3) Neither is it included in the later appendix to his collection, which ends with Gregory II., or A.D. 731, and supplements the decrees of three popes, anterior to Gelasius, that are not found in Dionysius. (4) Neither is it placed in any MSS. among the decrees of Gelasius, but always either last of all, or in a distant corner by itself. (5) Neither is it quoted or mentioned by any writer before Charlemagne, who disputes the sanction given in it to the acts of pope Sylvester with the pope of his own day, Adrian I. (Lib. Carol. ii. 13; ap. Migne, Patrol. xeviii. 1078; comp. art. SECOND NICENE CREED). (6) MSS. are divided on some points of importance, as to what it contains, e.g. whether its list of apocryphal works included the Apostolical Canons, or not. As far back as the 9th century, there were men who denied this, Dionysius having included them in his collection, and popes cited them approvingly before and since. Nevertheless, they are found in some MSS. on that list still. (Beveridge, as above.) Another point is, whether among its general councils, that of Constantinople was included or not. In most MSS. it is left out, but it is included in some. To this conflict of MSS. Mansi considered at first he need make no reference; but in his Supplement he admits his readers to full view (viii. 151-72). (7) The omissions and commissions of its acknowledged contents alone should have condemned it long since. It classes writings under three heads: i. Biblical; ii. Patristic; iii. Apocryphal. Under the first head, as Cave says: "Autor decreti se S. Hieronymum in omnibus sequi profutur. . . . Jam verò Hieronymo in definiendo S. Scripturæ librorum canone e diametro repugnat." The second head opens with a declaration (taken in substance from the third decretal of Anacletus, and the preface to the Nicene Council, in the Pseudo-Isidorian collection) on the prerogatives of the sees of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, and the precedence belonging to each, making no mention of Constantinople among sees, nor, according to most MSS., of the council of Constantinople among general councils, on which it descants next. After them, a list of the fathers follows, whose works are to be received; and from this, to say nothing of other subsequent omissions, the apostolical fathers, one and all, are left out, though midway in it we read: "Item actus beati Silvestri, apostolicæ sedis præsulis; licet ejus qui conscripsit nomen ignoretur;" and this is preceded and followed by other documents of the same stamp. Finally, the third head of apocryphal and rejected works includes the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, the works of Tertullian, Lactantius, Africanus, St. Clement of Alexandria, Victorinus, and others—names which speak for themselves. To give pope Gelasius his due, we may fairly say, that if only the letters assigned to him in the Dionysian collection are genuine, this decree could not have been, by any possibility, dictated or penned by him. All the evidence of his connexion with it is comprised in the twofold circumstance, that most MSS. containing it have his name prefixed to it; and all the last name figuring in it, that of Acacius of Constantinople. But Acacius died three years before Gelasius became pope, and was only condemned by him as having been condemned, and never absolved, by his predecessors. Perhaps those turgid expressions of pope Hormisdas on which Pagi relies, may have suggested its composition, to somebody who could find no work of that kind extant, but thought there should be. (Mansi, viii. 145-76, part of which has been anticipated.)

45. A.D. 495, under the same, when Misenus, one of the two bishops who had been sent to Constantinople by Felix III., and been excommunicated for misconduct there, is said to have been absolved (Mansi, viii. 177-86). This, again, has no place given to it among the genuine decrees or letters of Gelasius, even in Mansi; neither is it found in the Pseudo-Isidorian collection. As far as form is concerned, it is an exact counterpart of the reputed synod under pope Hilary, A.D. 465, described above.

46-51. A.D. 499-505, under pope Symmachus. There are no less than six synods attributed in Mansi to this pope; but their dates, number, and acts are both hopelessly confused and variously assigned. Not one of them is given by Dionysius Exiguus, who might have witnessed them all; only the first three are given in the appendix to his collection; for the remainder our sole voucher is the Pseudo-Isidore. Theodore, the reader, a Greek and contemporary, mentions but one, viz. the second; the author of the Lives of the Popes but two, viz. the second and the fourth. To understand them properly, we must recall the facts. Laurence, one deacon, was consecrated pope on the same day by his party, that Symmachus, another deacon, was by his; and Theodoric the Arian as well as Gothic king, resident at Ravenna, was invoked by each more than once to decide between them, so that of turbulent gatherings on both sides there was probably no lack; and Symmachus gaining the day, embellished accounts would be written of his subsequently, to enhance their importance and to swell their number. There is a strong family likeness between them all and the last under Gelasius, in point of form. In Mansi they stand as follows:—

(1) A.D. 499, when five canons respecting papal elections are said to have been decreed, amid repeated plaudits (viii. 229-38).

(2) A.D. 501, at which Theodore, says Theodoric, Anastasius says Symmachus, constituted his rival Laurence bishop of Nuceria (ib. 245-9).

(3) A.D. 502, at which a late edict of king Odoacer, approved by pope Simplicius, ordaining that no episcopal elections should be held in future without concurrence of the civil magistrate, and that all alienations of church property by the bishop of the diocese should be void, was annulled (ib. 261-72).

(4) A.D. 503, called, from a door in the church of St. Peter of that name, palmaris; and occasioned by a reaction in favour of Laurence; when 115 bishops declared Symmachus innocent of the crimes laid to his charge, and condemned Peter, bishop of Altino, whom Theodoric had appointed arbitrator in the renewed schism, together with Laurence himself. Ennodius, bishop of Ticino, drew up a lengthened apology for the acts of this synod, which is still extant (ib. 271-94; and for the rest, 247-62).

(5) A.D. 504, confirming the acts of the previous synod, and commending the apology for it by Ennodius in high terms (ib. 295-303).

(6) A.D. 505, at which all who had possessed themselves of any goods belonging to the church, were to be anathematised unless they restored them (ib. 309-16).

52. A.D. 518, under pope Hormisdas; for ending the schism between the churches of Rome and Constantinople, which began with Felix III. and Acacius, and had lasted thirty-five years (Mansi, ib. p. 579). The negotiations and terms at last agreed upon may be read among the letters of pope Hormisdas (ib. pp. 434-52).

53-55. All said to have been held A.D. 531, under pope Boniface II., yet there is a suspicious character about them all. (1) No decrees of this pope are given in the appendix to Dionysius Exiguus; and but one by the Pseudo-Isidore, which proves its own spuriousness (Mansi, ib. pp. 731-35). (2) The sole authority for the first and second of these synods is Anastasius, or whoever wrote the Life of this pope; and the reason given for them is, that at the first he constituted a deacon named Vigilius his successor; at the second he annulled his own act, as contrary to the canons (comp. the alleged letter of pope Silverius on the subject; Mansi, ix. 6, and another alleged synod under Boniface III. below). (3) For the third, which was only brought to light in modern times, there is no authority whatever, apart from the MS. containing it, any more than there is for a synod of Constantinople, which is there said to have led to it. The heading given it in Mansi, which was made for it by the discoverer of the MS. as he owns himself—Lucas Holstenius, prefect of the Vatican—and explains fully the interest attached by him to its discovery, runs as follows:—“Concilium Romanum III., quo lecti sunt libelli a Stephano Larissae metropolitano transmissi, atque prolatae e scrinio sedis apostolicae complures epistolae, quibus constat, quamvis in toto mundo sedes apostolica ecclesiarum sibi jure vindicti principatum, specialem tamen in ecclesias Illyrici gubernationem sibi vindicare” (ib. pp. 739-84). Not one of the papal epistles given in it occurs in Dionysius Exiguus; and the first in his collection to bear them out is one addressed to Anastasius, bishop of Thessalonica, by Leo I. (Migne, Patrol. lxvii. 291-6), whose letters come last here.

56. A.D. 534, under pope John II., where the proposition—“Unus e Trinitate passus est in carne”—was approved, notwithstanding its previous rejection by pope Hormisdas, and the opposition made to it by the monks called acoemeti by the Greeks. (Mansi, ib. p. 815.)

57. A.D. 589, under pope Pelagius II., unless the genuineness of his letter, in which he speaks of it, is to be given up. But the only reason for questioning it is the interesting information it contains, about the prefaces then used in his church. Particulars of them having been asked of him by the German and French bishops, he says, after consultation with his synod, in reply: “Invenimus has novem praeftiones in sacro catalogo tantummodo recipiendas, quas longa retro veritas in Romanâ ecclesiâ hactenus servavit:” viz. one for the first Sunday after Easter—no doubt, that of Easter repeated; one for the Ascension; one for Pentecost; one for Christmas; one for the Transfiguration; one for festivals of the Apostles; one for holy Trinity; one for holy Cross; and one for Lent. The grounds on which Pagi and Bona would discredit this statement are far from conclusive. (Mansi, ix. 1021.)

58-61. Four synods appear to have met under pope Gregory I.; at least Mansi gives four.

(1) A.D. 590, at the request of the emperor Maurice, to end the schism that had ensued on the condemnation of the three chapters at the fifth council. (Mansi, x. 453.)

(2) A.D. 595, to hear a complaint made by John, presbyter of Chalcedon, against John, bishop of Constantinople, who had condemned him for heresy; he was pronounced innocent. (Ib. pp. 475-8.)

(3) A.D. 601, when a decree was passed interdicting episcopal interference with monasteries. It is signed by twenty-one bishops, fourteen presbyters, and four deacons. (Ib. pp. 485-90.)

(4) A.D. 601, when Andrew, a Greek monk, was condemned; and Probus, abbat of a monastery built and dedicated to St. Andrew by the reigning pope, received permission to make a will. (Ib. p. 489.)

62. A.D. 606, said to have been attended by seventy-two bishops, thirty-four presbyters, all the deacons and minor orders, under pope Boniface III., when a decree was made that no steps for the appointment of a successor in the see of Rome should ever in future be taken, till the previous pope had been buried three days. There is only the same authority for this synod that there was for two similar synods under Boniface II., which see (Mansi, x. 501).

63. A.D. 610, under pope Boniface IV., at which Mellitus, bishop of London, was accidentally present, and from which he returned with its decrees, as well as letters to king Ethelbert and archbishop Laurence, as we learn from Bede. But the genuineness of all now extant, purporting to be such, has been questioned on solid grounds by the learned editors of Spelman and Wilkins (Councils and Documents, iii. 62-9; comp. Mansi, x. 503-8).

64. A.D. 640, under pope Severinus, when the Ecthesis of the emperor Heraclius was condemned, as appears from a profession in the Liber Diurnus of the popes, where this pope is mentioned by name. (Mansi, ib. 679.)

65. A.D. 641, under pope John IV., at which the Monothelite heresy was condemned. (Ib. pp. 697-700.)

66. A.D. 648, under pope Theodore, when Pyrrhus, patriarch of Constantinople, was condemned as a relapsed Monothelite. (Mansi, x. 783-4.)

67. A.D. 667, under pope Vitalian, when John, bishop of Lappa in Crete, who had been deposed by Paul, his metropolitan, was restored. (Ib. xi. 101; comp. p. 16.)

68-70. A.D. 679-80, under pope Agatho. Three such are distinguished by Mr. Haddan and Professor Stubbs (Councils and Documents, iii. 131-41), the first of which consisted of seventeen bishops and thirty-five presbyters, and discussed questions relating to the English church, but without reference to Wilfrid; at the second, which consisted of fifty bishops and presbyters, the restoration of Wilfrid to his see was decreed, subject to its division among bishops of his own choice; at the third, which consisted of 125 bishops, and was held, in preparation for the sixth general council, against the Monothelites, Wilfrid took part as bishop of York, and signed on behalf of the British, Scottish, and Irish churches. The account of these councils in Mansi needs revising (xi. 179-88).

71. A.D. 685, under pope John V., but Anastasius alone records it; when the consecration of a bishop in Sardinia was annulled, as having taken place without leave from the pope. (Mansi, xi. 1092.)

72. A.D. 704, under pope John VI., at which Wilfrid was accused and acquitted a second time

The pieces relating to it are best seen in the new edition of Spelman and Wilkins (Councils and Documents, iii. 256-64; comp. Mansi, xii. 165-8).

73. A.D. 706, under pope John VII.—at least so says Anastasius—on receipt of a communication from the emperor Justinian II., requesting a decision on the quini-sex or Trullan canons, which this pope was too timid to give, and, according to his biographer, died soon after declining. Mansi makes no distinction between this synod and the previous one; but in that year Justinian had not been restored, nor John VII. become pope. (Ib.)

74. A.D. 710, if at all, for Mansi doubts it; the only document on record attributed to it being a speech of Benedict, archbishop of Milan, complaining of an uncanonical invasion of his metropolitan rights by pope Constantine. (Mansi, xii. 219-24.)

75-77. Three synods, according to Mansi, met under pope Gregory II.

(1) A.D. 721, when seventeen canons against illicit marriages and consulting of wizards were passed under anathema, and subscribed by twenty-three bishops, including the pope, fourteen presbyters, and four deacons. (Ib. pp. 261-8.)

(2) A.D. 724, when Corbinianus, bishop of Freisingen, who had petitioned the pope to be allowed to resign his see, was ordered to return to it. (Ib. pp. 267-8.)

3. A.D. 726, where the destruction of images ordered by the emperor Leo III., surnamed the Isaurian, was resisted and condemned (ib. pp. 268-70). The two letters of Gregory to this monarch best explain his own attitude (ib. pp. 959-82).

78, 79. Two synods under pope Gregory III. are given in Mansi, and this time not from Anastasius alone, his account being confirmed by two marble tablets in the Vatican crypts inscribed with their acts, though in a defaced state. The first of these sat in judgment, A.D. 731, on a presbyter named Gregory, who had been sent to Constantinople with an expostulatory letter from the pope to the emperor, which he had failed to deliver. At the request of the synod he was pardoned, and sent back with it. At the second, attended by ninety-three bishops and a large concourse, lay and clerical, a constitution was published, setting forth what had been the immemorial custom of the church hitherto respecting images, and excommunicating all who contravened it. A fresh remonstrance was despatched to the emperor, but with no better success. (Mansi, xii. 297-300.)

80, 81. Two synods under pope Zachariah are likewise given by Mansi. The first is dated the third year of the usurper Artabasdu, and the thirty-second of Luitprand the Lombard king (A.D. 743), both indicating the dawn of a new style. It passed fifteen creditable canons on discipline, but the subscriptions to it are not trustworthy (ib. 381-90; but a mistake runs here through the pagination). At the second, A.D. 745, two priests named Adalbert and Clement, having been condemned for heresy by St. Boniface in France, were deposed and anathematised. The proceedings against them are spread over three sessions, and the subscriptions to it include seven bishops, besides the pope, and seventeen presbyters. (Ib. pp. 373-82; it should be, 393-402.)

82. A.D. 753, under pope Stephen II., but it is marked doubtful by Mansi, and deals only with grants to monasteries (Mansi, xii. 567-70). Another, which he sees less reason to doubt, relating to a quarrel between Sergius, archbishop of Ravenna, and, according to Mansi, this pope, is placed by him four years later (ib. p. 655).

83. A.D. 761, under pope Paul I., granting privileges and exemptions to certain monasteries and churches built by him, as appears by his letter. (Ib. p. 660; comp. p. 646.)

84. A.D. 769, said to have been held at the Lateran, under pope Stephen III., when judgment was given against the late occupant of his see, Constantine, and the old traditions of the church respecting images upheld. Mansi makes much of what he considers the recovered acts of this council. The authors of L'Art de vérif. les Dates observe pithily: "La date en est singulière." It runs as follows: "In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti; regnante unâ et eadem sancta Trinitate . . . mense Aprili, die 12^{mo}, indictione 7^{ma};" and the acts which follow are commensurate (ib. pp. 703-22). Another, also said to have been held at the Lateran under pope Adrian I., A.D. 774 (which Mansi feels he has no option but to pronounce spurious, yet, "ne quid desit ad plenam de re conciliari notitiam," prints at full length), has this heading—epitomised from Siebert—"in quâ Carolo Magno jus datum fertur a pontifice, ut pontificem ipsum Romanum et episcopos eligeret et investituram concederet." This and the "Sicilian monarchy" of a later pope may deserve comparison (ib. pp. 883-8). Another, A.D. 792, under the same, is reported by Mansi, when Felix, bishop of Urgel, the Adoptionist, abjured his heresy; but it is nowhere said that he did this in a synod, as Frobenius points out (Diss. de Haer. Elip. et Fel. § 22; ap. Migne, Patrol. c. 1, 312; comp. Mansi, xiii. 857).

85. A.D. 794, under the same, confirming the condemnation of Elipandus and Felix at the council of Frankfurt. (Mansi, ib. p. 859; Froben. ib. § 39.)

86. A.D. 799, under pope Leo III., when a tract of Felix against Alcuin was condemned. (Mansi, ib. pp. 1029-32; Froben. ib. § 43.)

A new era was opened in church and state, as well for the West as for Rome, by the next synod, A.D. 800, when Charlemagne was solemnly crowned emperor on Christmas Day, in the church of St. Peter, by the reigning pope; but our limits forbid any further details of this synod. (Mansi, ib. pp. 1041-8.) [E. S. Ff.]

ROMULUS (1), Feb. 17; commemorated at Concordia (Mart. Usuard.); at Aquileia (Mart. Hieron.).

(2) Mar. 24; commemorated in Mauretania (Mart. Usuard.; Hieron., Notker.). [C. H.]

RONANUS, June 1, 6th century; commemorated in Armorica (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 83). [C. H.]

ROOD. There seems no satisfactory evidence that what is commonly understood by a rood, that is, a cross fixed aloft upon a beam or gallery in the middle of a church, is to be found within the period embraced in this work. It is, indeed, affirmed by Pugin (Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornaments) that these crosses between the nave and choir of large churches, or the nave and chancel of small ones, are of great antiquity. The same is affirmed by the abbé Migne. But it will be found upon comparison that he has simply translated Pugin's remarks, and therefore cannot be accepted as independent authority.

The current statements on the subject may be conveniently taken from Migne (Encycl. Théolog.). It is affirmed by him that Georgius Codinus, one of the Byzantine historians of the 15th century, describes an ancient cross over a screen in the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople. He says that it was of gold, enriched with precious stones, and furnished with chandeliers. Migne quotes this writer in proof of the assertion that such crosses are "d'une haute antiquité," and assigns him, probably by a typographical error, to the 5th century, whereas he was really of the 15th century. But what is more serious, he gives no reference, and the present writer has been unable to verify the quotation. Yet it may be said with confidence that in his work Περὶ τῆς οἰκοδομῆς τοῦ ναοῦ τῆς ἁγίας Σοφίας, Codinus certainly describes no such cross. The only cross which he there describes is the cross of the ciborium—a cross, it may be added, which corresponds with the one described above, both in its being of gold and in its adornment with jewels.

But all these quotations, whether in English or French works, are ultimately traceable to the great work of Goar (In Ord. Sacri Ministerii Notae, p. 19), who says, "Illum [sc. ambonem] qui in magnâ fuit ecclesiâ describit MS. Regium Codini verbis vulgaribus, τὸν δὲ ἄμβωνα μὲ [sc.] τὴν σωλεῖαν ἐποίησεν μὲ σαρδονύχων et infra, ἐποίησε τὴν προῦλλαν εἰς τ. ἄμβωνα μετὰ μαργαριτῶν [sc., without accent] καὶ λυχνιτῶν. ὁ δὲ σταυρὸς τοῦ ἄμβωνος ἴστα λίτρας ρ', εἶχε δὲ κατὰ στυχνὰ λυχνιτάρια, καὶ μαργαριτάρια ἀπὸ δότα· ἀντὶ δὲ στήθεός τοῦ ἄμβωνος εἶχεεν ἄνωθεν ὀλόχρυσα πετάσια." If this passage is correct, and if the information of Codinus, a comparatively late author, is to be relied upon, this citation obviously concludes the whole question.

But one or two observations must be advanced upon it. Goar quotes from a MS. copy of Codinus, without saying from which of his works the quotation is taken; but the passage is not to be found in the printed edition of Codinus, de S. Sophia, which is where it would naturally be expected (Corpus Scriptorum Historiæ Byzantinæ, Bonnae, 1849). There is, indeed (p. 142), a description of the ambo, which in some degree resembles the citation of Goar, but there is no account of a cross upon it (the cross described in that page is the cross of the ciborium), nor is there any notice of a variant in the reading amongst the critical notes of Meursius and Lambecius.

It may of course be some other work of Codinus, which Goar quotes; but the present writer has attempted in vain to find anything like it in any of the works of Codinus in the printed collection above referred to.

It may be added that there is no mention of the cross in the metrical description of the ambo of St. Sophia, which is given by Paul the Silentiary, though Ducange, in his commentary upon it, says that Codinus adds a mention of the cross.

The classical work on the subject of rood-lofts is somewhat rare. (Thiers, Dissertations ecclésiastiques, Paris, 1688.) The only passage which this writer quotes is that from Goar, to which accordingly it seems that all the statements of the subsequent writers are to be traced.

The earliest notice of a crucifix set up in the middle of a church is sometimes said to be the account of the silver figure which pope Leo III. (A.D. 795) set up in the middle of St. Peter's at Rome. The account is thus given by Anastasius: "Ipse autem a Deo protectus venerabilis et almificus pontifex fecit in basilicâ beati Petri Apostoli nutritoris sui, in medio basilicæ crucifixum ex argento purissimo, pensan. libras septuaginta et duas." (Vitæ Pontif. Leo III. § 384, p. 1222, ed. Migne.) There is, however, nothing in the account given by Anastasius which leads to the conclusion that this crucifix was a rood in the sense that it was raised aloft upon a beam or gallery.

These two examples—the alleged description of Codinus and the remark of Anastasius—are the only two facts that are adduced to support the "great antiquity" of the rood. But it thus appears that neither of them is altogether free from taint; and the present writer has not succeeded in finding any evidence which would prove indisputably that ancient churches within our period had either cross or crucifix raised aloft upon a beam or gallery.

Migne states that every screen between nave and choir was anciently surmounted by a rich cross, but without image of our Saviour; that such screens existed both in Greek and Latin churches; that down to a comparatively modern epoch churches were never constructed without them, either in France, Germany, or Flanders; and that every church in England had a rood-screen down to the reign of Edward (VI.), when these crosses were destroyed by Act of Parliament. In all this, however, he is but adopting, and, in some respects, misunderstanding and spoiling, the previous remarks of Pugin.

Pugin (and after him Migne) observes that the cross over the screen was often suspended from the upper arcade of the church by three chains, which were often of very rich construction. But neither in this branch of the subject is there anything which brings it within the period traversed in this work.

There is abundant evidence that a gallery corresponding to the rood-loft or jubé existed in the early church. (See Prudentius, "Hymn of St. Hippolytus;" Gregory of Tours, who describes the jubé of the church of St. Cyprian; and pope Martin I., who had the canons of the Lateran council read from the rood-loft of that church.) Viollet-le-Duc, however, takes it for certain that the ambons of both Greek and Latin church up to the 14th century were not at all like what we understand by a rood-loft or jubé (Dictionnaire raisonné de l'Architecture, s. v. "Jubé"). But whatever may have been the precise form of the structures in question, there seems to be no satisfactory evidence that in the early centuries they were surmounted by a rood. Indeed, the earliest example which Viollet-le-Duc is able to adduce of a cross or crucifix placed above a trabes is one in the museum of Cluny, which dates from the 12th century.

ROSARY (capellina, paternoster, preculæ, psalterium), a device for numbering prayers. The early Eastern, and probably pre-Christian, custom might suggest a great antiquity. "The Kurân enjoins prayers five times a day, and good Muslims are very particular in going through certain prescribed forms morning, noon, and evening. It cannot, therefore, be matter of wonder that the use of rosaries (called tasbih, 'praise,' and furnished with tassels called shamsa) is common among Indian Mohammedans. In all probability they were common among Hindus and Buddhists long before the Christian era" (Prof. Monier Williams in the Athenæum, Feb. 9, 1878). A rosary is called in Sanscrit Japa-mâtâ, "muttering chaplet," and sometimes smarani, "remembrance" (ibid.). Nevertheless, the rosary of the church of Rome is comparatively modern. Pius V., in a bull (1596), ascribes to St. Dominic the invention of "the rosary or psalter of the blessed Virgin," and this has been understood of the string of beads so called; but he seems rather to be speaking, under that name, of the method of devotion invented by St. Dominic (150 Ave Marias and 15 Paternosters). The beads are, however, described by Polydore Vergil 1499; but we should infer from his silence that they were not yet called a "rosary." "Est modus orandi postremo inventus per calculos ('globulos precatórios,' Transl. S. Norberti, xvii. 149, in Bolland. June, i. 911) ut ita dicam, ligneos, quos vulgus modo preculas, modo paternostros appellat." These he describes as pierced and threaded, ten smaller calculi for the Ave Marias being throughout followed by one larger for the paternoster, to the number of fifty-five altogether (De Invent. Rer. v. 9). The invention of this instrument he assigns to Peter the Hermit, who flourished in 1090. The number of beads may be due to Peter, but earlier in the same century we meet with a similar contrivance. Godiva, who, with her husband Leofric, founded the monastery of Coventry in 1040, possessed "circulum gemmarum quem filo insuerat, ut singularum contactu singulas orationes incipiens numerum non pratermitteret" (Guilielm. Malmesb. Script. post Bedam, 165, ed. 1596). The council of Cealchythe, A.D. 816, directs that on the death of a bishop "septem beltidum paternoster pro eo cantetur" (can. 10). This has been understood of a rosary for counting prayers; but Car. Macri (Hierolexicon, in v.) suggests that "beldides = vueltas" (Span. rounds, or returns), and the Bollandists accept his explanation (De S. Dominico, Aug. i. 432, 433). Another error ascribes the invention of rosaries to Bede, who died in 735; but apparently this is only a conjecture built upon his name (Boll. u. s.). Within our period, indeed, I meet with but one instance of a contrivance at all similar. Paul of Pherna, an Egyptian ascetic of the 4th century, "having prescribed him by rule 300 prayers, collected as many pebbles, which he kept in his bosom, and threw out one by one at every prayer" (Hist. Laus. Pallad. 23; Sozom. Hist. Eccl. v. 29; Cassiod. Hist. Tripart. viii. 1).

The origin and history of the "rosary" in both senses of the word are discussed at length in Acta Sanctorum, Bolland. de S. Domin. Conf. 19-21, Aug. 4, i. 422-437. See also Mabill. Praef. in V. Saec. Bened. 125-128; and Conr. Schultingius, Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica, II. i. 64, Colon. Agripp. 1599. The latter (I. ii. 205) gives a list of earlier writers on the subject.

ROUND TOWERS. The round towers of Ireland have a character and literature of their own, and the many questions regarding them are still unsettled, though the ascription of the towers to Christian times and purposes now appears to be the more generally accepted. There are upwards of a hundred known to antiquaries, and of these about twenty are perfect. Two in Scotland, of which one (Breachin) is perfect and the other (Abernethy) a ruin, together with that attached to the gable of the old church at Egilshay in Orkney, are the only examples outside the ancient Scotia. All are built upon the same general plan, with little variety of detail: the complete tower at Devenish, in Lough Erne, may be accepted as the type. (See woodcut.)

(i.) The tower is a hollow circular column, from fifty to one hundred and fifty feet high, usually capped by a short pointed roof of stone. From the base, which is frequently of cyclopean masonry, and measures from forty to sixty feet in circumference, the tower is externally of ashlar or spawled rubble work, and tapers upwards towards the summit. Occasionally, as at Ardmore, it is belted with stringcourses, which are, however, entirely ornamental, and not connected with the internal floors. The wall is pierced for a single door, which is never constructed on the level of the ground, but from eight to fifteen feet above, and for windows, which are unfixed in position and number; the jambs of both the door and the windows always incline inwards towards the top. At a very short distance from the conical roof there are usually four, but sometimes more or fewer, windows, and all the windows in the tower have round, pointed, or square heads, but never a built arch.

Internally the tower is divided into stories, in number according to the height. The lowest is usually filled up with mould or masonry to or near the door-sill; the rest, usually on joisted floors and about twelve feet high, occupy the whole interior to the top. The rooms or stories could have been but dimly lighted, there being but one small window to each.

(ii.) For what purpose could towers of this kind have been built, and that in such numbers? This has been answered by many suggestions; e.g. that they were the temples of a primeval religion among the Cuthites (Keane, O'Brien), the pyreia of Phœnician, Persian, or other Eastern nations (Vallancey), bell-towers (Lynch), sepulchral monuments (Windele), Danish forts (Walsh, Molyneux, Ledwich), eremitic pillars (Harris), anchoret or penitential cells (Smyth), bell-towers, secondarily monastic strongholds (Petrie). There can be no doubt but that in the Irish Annals (as in the present day) the common name of the tower is Cloitheach, literally bell-house, and in some of them up to the present time the bells are hung. Yet the whole structure denotes a place of temporary refuge and defence in cases of sudden attack. In this view there is a propriety in both the general outline and the several details: the tall, compact, round pillar, with strong, often enlarged, base of solid building, or of great thickness in the wall, and with the door small and several yards above the foundation; the smooth external facing of stone, and the storied accommodation within; the small windows for ventilation and, at the top, also for observation, and the strongly-defended doorway. Into such a house of defence, which is always found among or near ecclesiastical buildings, or their known site, the monks could easily retreat for safety to themselves and the valuable goods of the church till the enemy had left, or other succour had come to the inmates' relief. The whole building is such as bespeaks a stern but passive resistance, and when the cloitheach was burned it was only the inner flooring that was destroyed. Its use as a bell-tower appears to be secondary, though some in later times may have been specially built for a Campanile, as they may also have been for other purposes.

(iii.) As to the age to which they belong, we may lay aside the ante-Christian views of Cuthite civilisation, of Eastern fire-worship and phallic symbolism, of Druidical rites, and celestial observations: so far as we can see, they were wholly unfitted for these purposes. They belong to the Christian period, and their erection is more or less traceable from the 6th (Reeves, St. Adamnan, 215, 216 n.) to the 13th century, especially from the 10th to the 12th. There appears to be no reason for our tracing either the work or the design to the Danes, who have given no proof of having possessed either elsewhere in northern Europe, although their ravages in Ireland may account for such means being so long retained for defence and safety. The clue seems all but lost to the origin of such erections. It may be that they are the remains of a British architecture which was banished from Britain by the entrance of the Saxons, and Petrie (Round Towers, 367) notices their resemblance to "the most ancient military towers subsequent to Roman times found in the British isles." Waring (Stone Monuments, &c.) would trace them to types still met with in Sardinia and Southern Europe. As originally built, or as subsequently renewed, they uniformly preserve the same general features, and are singularly unlike the oldest round tower on the Continent—that at St. Apollinare ad Classem, Ravenna, belonging to the 6th century. They are sufficiently accounted for as at first an Irish development which suited the monastic position in the midst of turbulent tribes and piratical invaders, and were persevered in, after their special need was past, as sacred and time-honoured forms of ecclesiastical architecture, possibly also of monastic precedence. The examples in Scotland are no doubt owing to the close connexion between the Christianity of new and ancient Scotia, yet, strange to say, the towers there are not in the country of the Scots proper, but in that of the Picts. Compare TOWERS.

RUBRIC. Literally, a direction or remark written in red letters. The word is borrowed from the phraseology of old Roman law-books, in which the titles, remarks, and sometimes leading decisions were written in red ink.

"Perlege rubras

Majorum leges."—Juv. Sat. xiv. 191.

"Dicant cur condita sit lex Bis sex in tabulis, et cur rubrica minetur."

Prud. contra Sym. ii. 460.

In the same way the regulations for the manner of performing the sacred offices of the church were called rubrics, and were commonly written in red characters to make them easily distinguishable from the text of the office itself. Anciently these rubrics were collected together, and only written in books compiled for that purpose, and known under various titles—Directory, Ceremonial (q. v.), Ritual, Ordo (q. v.). The oldest MSS. missals and early service-books are either entirely or almost destitute of rubrics. The Sacramentary of Leo (483) contains no rubrics. The first book of the Gelasian Sacramentary (494) contains sixty-seven, some of them very short; the second book has none; the third book has nine. The Gregorian Sacramentary, omitting those portions which are confessedly of a much later date, has twenty-six. Of the ancient offices printed in the second volume of Mabillon's Museum Italicum, a Gothic Missal of the 9th century has seven rubrics; a Frankish Missal of the 6th century has eight, the Canon having no rubrics at all; an uncial Gallican Missal, of uncertain antiquity, has six; a Gallican Sacramentary of the 7th century has eleven. The Stowe Missal (Irish, 9th cent.) has two rubrics in the vernacular.

Burcard, Master of the Ceremonies under Innocent VIII. and Alexander VI., at the close of the 15th century, was the first person who published together the order and the ceremonial directions of the Mass, in a Pontifical printed at Rome, 1485, and in a Sacerdotale published a few years later under Leo X. The obvious convenience of such a course outweighed the scruples which were felt in certain quarters about publishing before the laity, directions which it was only necessary for the clergy to know. Such books therefore multiplied rapidly; but it is beyond the scope of this work to trace their various editions, together with the changes and modifications which the Rubrics have from time to time passed through. RUGAE, a word of frequent occurrence in the Ordo Romanus, as well as in the Lives of the Popes under the name of Anastasius, as to the meaning of which there has been some considerable difference of opinion. Caesar Bulinger, looking at the supposed etymology of the word and not at the passages in which it is found, defined "rugae" to be streaks in marble or metal, or pipes or furrows ("canaliculos et sulcos") like wrinkles, or wrinkled and streaked plates of precious metals. Ducange, with an equal neglect of the actual use of the word, strangely connects it with the French rue, and explains it as the sacred path before the presbytery, "via in aede sacra ante presbyterium," by which the pope enters when about to celebrate Mass (Descr. Aed. Sophian. no. 73; Gloss. sub voc.). Mabillon, by a comparison of the places where the word occurs (Mus. Ital. tom. ii.; Comment. in Ord. Rom. pp. xxi. cxxxv.), has clearly demonstrated that by "rugae" are meant the metal "cancelli" or screens of the more sacred parts of a church, with their doors and gratings, and sometimes the lattice-work doors alone. In the larger and more sumptuous churches they were often made of silver or even of gold. The presbytery at St. Peter's was fenced in with silver "rugae," and the "confessio" with "rugae" of gold (Anastas. Steph. IV. § 284; Leo III. § 363). Sergius II. set up six pairs of aurichalcum (ibid. § 492). There were greater and lesser "rugae." Leo III. erected twelve "rugae majores" before the "secretarium" at St. Peter's (ibid. § 382). The larger were of very considerable weight. Those of silver placed by Paschal I. before the vestibule of the altar weighed 78 lbs. (ibid. § 447); those erected by the same pope at St. Maria in Domnica 60 lbs.; and by Leo III. at St. Andrew's 80 lbs. (ibid. § 368). The smaller ones were called "rugulae." The "rugulae," the "confessio" at St. Mary Major's set up by Paschal I., were of pure gold (ibid. § 447); those of Leo IV. at the entrance of the presbytery and "confessio" at St. Peter's, with the "cancelli," of silver: "rugulas de argento fusiles cum cancellis" (ibid. § 546). According to Mabillon, "rugulae" also signified the grated or latticed window-openings of the "confessio,"—"fenestellae," or "catractae,"—by which the sacred tomb might be seen, and handkerchiefs or napkins [BRANDEA] pushed through to touch it [TRANSENNA].

The entrance of the "rugae" was kept by acolytes ("acolythi qui rugam conservant," Ord. Roman.). At ordinations the person to be ordained deacon stood "ante rugas altaris" (ibid. viii. 3), and when ordained priest was taken outside the "rugae," "foras ruga saltaris" (ibid. 4).

(Mabillon, u. s. p. cxxxvii. p. 85.) On Ash-Wednesday the pope's chamberlain left the chancel and passed through the "rugae" to distribute the ashes, and on Candlemas Day the pope went to them to distribute the tapers. On Palm Sunday the branches and leaves were thrown to the people through the apertures, "per foramina rugarum" (Mabillon, u. s. p. cxxxvii.; Ciampini, c. xiv. de Azymo). [E. V.]

SABALLUM, SABHALL, SAUL, SAVAL (ZABULLUM), Irish name for a church of peculiar orientation, usually north and south. It originated in the tradition (as presented in an ancient Life of St. Patrick quoted by Ussher, Brit. Eccl. Ant. c. 17, Works vi. 406, and in the Lives of the same prelate published by Colgan, Tr. Thaum. pp. 23, 72, 124), that the barn of Dichu, his first disciple in Down, was the model of his first church, built in the field with which Dichu presented him, or perhaps was the church itself. It gave its name to the parish of Saul, co. Down, and, standing north and south, was adopted as the eponymus of all churches which deviated to a marked extent from the usual Eastern orientation. SABBATH. It will be the object of this article to give a brief sketch of the views taken in the earlier ages of Christianity of the Sabbath of the Jewish law, and of the degree and character of observance which has been attached to it in different ages and different branches of the Christian church—in fact, to take up the subject very much where it is left by the article SABBATH in the Dictionary of the Bible.

In relation to modern ideas, ascribing a sabbatical character to the Lord's Day, it is only necessary to refer here very briefly to what has been more fully shewn elsewhere, that the notion of a formal substitution by apostolic authority of the Lord's Day for the Jewish Sabbath, and the transference to it, perhaps in a spiritualized form, of the sabbatical obligation established by the promulgation of the Fourth Commandment, has no basis whatever, either in Holy Scripture or in Christian antiquity.

The Sabbath is invariably regarded as representative of the rigid Law, which has passed away; the Lord's Day of the freedom of the Gospel, which remains for ever. The ideas symbolized by the two days are constantly distinguished, not unfrequently contrasted. It is true that the Lord's Day, becoming the great weekly festival of Christianity, assumed something like the place of the Sabbath in the Jewish system, and demanded for its higher purposes of worship, joy, and thanksgiving, some measure of that rest from work so emphatically characteristic of the Sabbath. But the idea afterwards embodied in the title of the "Christian Sabbath," and carried out in ordinances of Judaic rigour, was, so far as we can see, entirely unknown in the early centuries of Christianity.

For the proofs of this assertion see LORD'S DAY. In the present article the reference is throughout to the true Sabbath (or Saturday) as distinguished from the Lord's Day; and to the extent of its survival in the observance of the Christian church.

(I.) It is of course clear from the New Testament that—as from the nature of the case we might have expected—the obligation to observe the Sabbath according to the Jewish law was never in any sense binding on Christians as Christians. St. Paul's words are absolutely decisive (Col. ii. 16, 17), "Let no man judge you in meat or in drink; or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days: which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ." These words, written to the Colossians, in reference to the strange half-Gnostic (and perhaps Essenic) development which was the last form of Judaism, are, indeed, simply a clearer and more definite enforcement of the rebuke of the observation of "days and months and times and years," addressed to the earlier Pharisaic Judaism of Galatia (Gal. iv. 10).

How they were understood in the early church (in opposition to such Judaism as that of Cerinthus, who is expressly declared to have enforced the observation of the Sabbath) is shewn by the celebrated antithesis, μηκέτι σαββαρίζοντες ἀλλὰ κατὰ κυριακὴν ζῶντες ("no longer keeping the Sabbath, but living in the spirit of the Lord's Day"), in Ignatius (ad Magn. ix.).¹ If there was no transference of the sabbatical obligation to the Lord's Day—which, perhaps, might have been not unnatural, provided that Our Lord's teaching as to its nature was taken as a guide—much less could the Jewish Sabbath, as such, be considered as having any claim on the universal observance of Christians. St. Augustine's remarks on this matter may be taken as a fair type of the general teaching of the early church. He expressly distinguishes the Fourth Commandment from the rest, as being observed figuratively or in idea, not literally or in formal rule. For the Christian he recognises two kinds of sabbatical rest: first, a rest from the "old works" in this life; next, an eternal rest in heaven—the σαββατισμός which, according to the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. iv. 9), "remaineth for the people of God."^a See Augustine, de Genesi ad Litteram, book iv. (vol. iii. 208), and Epist. ad Januarium (vol. ii. 203). The Sabbath, whatever may be decided on the controversy as to the existence of a patriarchal Sabbath, had become part and parcel of the Jewish law. Like circumcision and distinctions of meats, it had served its purpose as typical and preparatory. Now it had passed away.

(II.) But while the Jewish Sabbath could form no part of Christianity as such, yet, like other parts of the Mosaic law, it would endure in the actual practice of the Jewish Christians; in accordance with the apostolic principle, "Is any man called being circumcised? let him not become uncircumcised" (1 Cor. vii. 18), and the apostolic practice of St. Paul in his own case (Acts xix. 18, xxi. 24) and in the case of Timothy (Acts xvi. 3). We can hardly doubt that in the earliest days of the church the Christians, just as they were "daily in the Temple," so also kept the Sabbath with their Jewish brethren; while at the same time "they broke the bread at home," and, in this most solemn way as in others, kept the Lord's Day among their fellow-Christians. So long as Jewish Christianity lasted as a distinct phase, co-existing rather than coincident with the Christianity of the Gentiles, it would indeed view the Sabbath obligation under the light of Our Lord's teaching, in the spirit as distinguished from the letter, and with the limitations and mitigations which He assigned to it. But still it would preserve substantially the old sabbatical observance; while, at the same time, the new and greater sacredness of the peculiarly Christian ordinance of the Lord's Day would, in the first instance, coexist with it, and afterwards in all probability throw it into the shade. Now after no long period of existence Jewish Christianity, as such, gradually died out, especially after the fall of Jerusalem, destroying with the Temple the system of Judaic observance; when even the church of the holy city itself became in great degree a Gentile church, and a growing antagonism established itself between Judaism and Christianity. Henceforward, so far as sabbatical observance retained its strict Judaic form, and imposed itself as of universal obligation, it would be looked upon with suspicion. The Ebionites are spoken of by Eusebius (Ecc. Hist. iii. 27) as being half Jewish in the observance of the Sabbath, while they were half Christian in the observance of the Lord's Day. The council of Laodicea (A.D. 363) anathematizes as Judaizers "those who abstain from labour on the Sabbath," bidding them "honour rather the Lord's Day, and, if possible, abstain from labour on it as Christians" (οὐ δεῖ Χριστιανούς Ἰουδαΐζειν καὶ ἐν τῷ σαββάτῳ σχολάζειν . . . τὴν δὲ κυριακὴν προτιμώντας εἰ γε δύναιντο σχολάζειν ὡς Χριστιανοί). The enactment is important, not only in its attachment of the obligation of rest to the Lord's Day, but as shewing a formal antagonism to strict observance of the Sabbath as a day of rest, on the ground of its essentially Judaistic significance. Whatever the Sabbath was in the church, it was to be something wholly unlike this. Much in the same spirit the Pseudo-Ignatius (ad Magn. 9) distinguishes between the Jewish and Christian idea of sabbatical observance. "Let us not keep the Sabbath day after the Jewish manner, rejoicing in idleness, . . . but spiritually, rejoicing in the meditation of the law, not in the rest of the body, admiring the workmanship of God;" and moreover infers that the keeping of the Sabbath was a preparation for the greater sacredness of "the Lord's Day, the day of the Resurrection, the royal festival, the highest of all days" (μετὰ δὲ τὸ σαββατίσαι ἑορταγέτω πᾶς φιλόχριστος τὴν κυριακὴν, τὴν ἀναστάσιμον, τὴν βασιλίδαν, τὴν ὑπέραν τῶν πασῶν ἡμερῶν). But while the formal sabbatical obligation was thus repudiated, as purely Judaistic, we find that in the Eastern church a distinct observance of the Sabbath remained, and remained so far in accordance with the old Jewish idea that (with one notable exception) it was always a festal observance.

^a It is hardly necessary to refer to the extraordinary interpretation, noticed in the article SABBATH in the Dictionary of the Bible, which, against the whole context (as, indeed, against the whole tone of New Testament teaching), actually transforms this passage into an authority for quasi-sabbatical observance, as a law of the Christian church.

This is brought out most strikingly in the Apostolical Constitutions, in which the Sabbath and the Lord's Day are treated almost as co-ordinate. Thus (in ii. 59, 1) Christians are exhorted "on the Sabbath Day, and the day of the Lord's Resurrection, the Lord's Day, to gather together with special earnestness, sending up praise to God, Who made all things by Jesus Christ, and Who sent Him to us, and delivered Him to suffer, and raised Him from the dead." The different consecrations of the two days are still more clearly marked in vii. 23, 2: "Keep the Sabbath and the Lord's Day as feasts; for the one is the memorial of the Creation, the other of the Resurrection" (τὸ μὲν δημιουργίας ἐστὶν ὑπόμνημα, ἡ δὲ ἀναστάσεως). In vii. 36, 1, 2, there is an elaborate and beautiful prayer, bringing out the sacredness of the Sabbath: "O Almighty Lord, who didst create the world through Christ, and didst ordain the Sabbath as a memorial of creation, because in it Thou didst rest from Thy work . . . Thou, O Lord, didst bring our fathers out of Egypt . . . and didst give them the Law or Decalogue, spoken with Thy voice and written with Thy hand. . . Thou didst command them to keep the Sabbath, not giving in this an excuse for idleness, but an occasion for godliness" (οὐ πρόφασιν ἀργίας διδούς, ἀλλ' ἀφορμὴν εὐσεβείας). . . . "For the Sabbath is the rest from creation, the completion of the world, the seeking out of Law, the praise of thanksgiving to God for all that He gave to men." The same passage goes on to speak also of the peculiar and yet higher consecration of the Lord's Day. In viii. 33, 1, we have a command (in the names of St. Peter and St. Paul): "Let the servants work five days; on the Sabbath and the Lord's Day let them be free from labour in the church, with a view to the teaching of godliness." Whatever opinion we may form as to the genuineness and authority of these Constitutions (on which see APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS), it is at least clear that they represent to a very considerable extent the traditions of the Eastern church in the 3rd and 4th centuries. Thus the very Council of Laodicea, so sternly condemnatory of Judaizing sabbatarianism, yet in its forty-ninth and fifty-first canons marks out "the Sabbath and the Lord's Day" as days to be observed festally even during the fast of Lent. Everywhere the festal observance is very strikingly marked, and we note that the consecration of the Sabbath by the rest of the Creator is brought home to Christians by a constant reference to the creation as having been wrought "through Jesus Christ." From a canon (No. 16) of the Council of Laodicea, and from a passage in Socrates' Ecclesiastical History (vi. 8), it appears that on the Sabbath as well as the Lord's Day there were solemn assemblies for worship; and Gregory of Nyssa, upbraiding those who neglected the Sabbath assembly, asks, "With what face wilt thou dare to behold the Lord's Day, if thou hast despised the Sabbath?" "for" (he adds) "they are sister days." Accordingly in the Apostolical Canons (Canon 66) it is laid down, that "if any cleric be found fasting on the Lord's Day or the Sabbath, except the one (Easter Eve) alone, let him be deposed; if any laic, let him be excommunicated." The prohibition of this canon is illustrated by the extravagant declaration of the Pseudo-Ignatius, that "if any one fasts on the Lord's Day or the Sabbath, he is a murderer of Christ" (Χριστοκτόνος ἐστί). We may notice that this canon is appealed to in the "Trullan" (or "Quinisextine") Council, held at Constantinople in A.D. 685, in opposition to a custom at Rome of fasting on the Sabbaths in Lent, and it is decreed that over the Roman church also it should "most firmly prevail" (ἀπαρσάλειται κρατεῖν). From a well-known passage in Epiphanius (adv. Haer. Book I. Tom. III. vol. i. p. 304), we may conjecture that a special emphasis was given to the festal observance of the Sabbath by opposition to the heresy of Marcion, who is said to have bidden his followers fast on the Sabbath to signify their "repudiation of the God of the Jews" (ἐνὰ μὴ τὸ καθῆκον τοῦ Θεοῦ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἐργάζεσθαι). But, however this may be, it is clear that a reverence was paid in the Eastern church to the Sabbath festival, only second, though of course markedly second, to the higher sacredness of the Lord's Day.

Nor was this festal observance confined to the Eastern church. The practice of fasting on the Sabbath in the Roman church is noticed by Tertullian, and condemned on the ground that only on the Great Sabbath should men fast (De Jejuniis, c. xiv.); but he seems to indicate that the practice was not invariable, and that it arose from a continuation of the Friday's fast ("cur jejuniis paraseven dicamus? quoniam vos etiam Sabbatum, si quando continuatis—nunquam nisi in pascha jejundandum, secundum rationem alibi redditam"). The Montanists (he says) excepted both the Sabbath and the Lord's Day from their solemn fast weeks (c. xv.), in this respect distinctly following the ancient Eastern usage. In another place, speaking of our Lord's defence of His disciples for plucking and eating the ears of corn on the Sabbath, he declares that "He remembered the privilege—of exemption from fasting—assigned to the Sabbath from the beginning;" alludes to the double gift of manna on the Friday to preserve the Sabbath from the necessity of fasting; and finally declares, with characteristic vehemence, that "it would have destroyed the Sabbath, and even the Creator Himself, if He had commanded His disciples to fast, against the declaration of Scripture and the will of the Creator" (Adv. Marc. Book iv. c. 12). It is true that he is throughout speaking of Jewish observance; but such language would hardly have been used without qualification, had he not held strong opinions as to the continuance of this festal character of the Sabbath. This conflict of usage continued long in the Western church: for from the well-known Epistle of St. Augustine to Casulanus, we find that the sabbatical fast was observed in his time only in the church of Rome, and a few other Western churches, the majority of Western churches in this point still agreeing with the East. Even at Milan, in the days of St. Ambrose, the Eastern usage prevailed; and when St. Augustine, at the request of his mother Monica, put the question of the method of observance of the day as a case of conscience to St. Ambrose, he treated it simply as a matter of the ordinance of this or that church, and added, that while he never fasted on the Sabbath day in Milan, he did fast if he was at Rome. So entirely was this principle carried out, that, even in Africa in St. Augustine's time, some churches fasted on the Sabbath while others feasted. (See Epist. to Casulanus, vol. ii. pp. 101-121, Ben. ed. Paris 1836; and for a similar statement of the variety of practice and of the intrinsic indifference of the question at issue, compare Epist. to St. Jerome, sect. 14, vol. ii. p. 291.)

(III.) The origin of the fasting observance was probably to be traced (as Tertullian hints) to a continuation of the fast of the Friday. Victorinus (A.D. 270-303) confirms Tertullian's statement on this point with a significant addition. Speaking of the Saturday, he says (De Fabrica Mundi), "Hoc die solemus superponere: idcirco ut die dominico cum gratiarum actione ad panem exeamus . . . ne quid cum Judeis Sabbatum observare videamur" (see Probst, sect. 54, p. 261). As this festal observance of the Sabbath was natural in the Christian church, wherever Jewish influence had at any time induced a survival of the old Jewish feast, so, on the other hand, where no such associations had power, and where the Saturday was regarded either from a purely Christian point of view, or in antagonism to Jewish practice, the contrary observance of it as a fast might very naturally arise. The Lord's Day was the great Christian festival; the Saturday would be treated, in continuity with the Friday, as a vigil of preparation, and to such vigils fasting was appropriate. But there was a far more powerful reason for this fasting usage in the special hallowing of what was called the "Great Sabbath"—i.e. the Easter Eve. Even in the Eastern church, where the Sabbath was observed festally, this was regarded as a strict fast, in some sense the most solemn fast of the year. Thus in the Apostolical Constitutions we are told, that whereas other Sabbaths were festal, so marking the rest from Creation, this is to be a fast, because on it "the Creator was still beneath the earth" (v. 15, 1); and that as a fast it is to be regarded as of stricter obligation than Good Friday itself. "The Friday and the Sabbath keep as an absolute fast, so far as strength allows; . . . but if anyone is unable to keep the two days continuously, let him at any rate keep the Sabbath. For in a certain place the Lord, speaking of Himself, says, 'When the bridegroom shall have been taken from them, then shall they fast in those days'" (v. 18, 2). The nature of the observation of this sacred fast day is emphatically described: "From evening till cock-crow gather together in the church and watch, praying with all supplication to God in your night-long vigil, reading the law, the prophets, and the psalms, till the crowing of the cocks; and then, having baptized your catechumens, and read the gospel in fear and trembling, and spoken to the people the things concerning salvation, cease from your mourning and pray God that Israel may be converted, and find a place for repentance and remission of their ungodliness." In the Eastern church, indeed, this usage was confined to Easter Eve; but in the church of Rome, and some other churches of the East and West, just as all Fridays in the year took the colour of their observance from Good Friday, so all the Sabbaths of the year might reasonably be kept as fasts, in imitation of the fast of the Great Sabbath of Easter Eve.

To this natural inference would be added also the effect of antagonism to Jewish observance as such. We find that both in the East and the West, the Jewish Sabbath was, or was thought to be, kept as a day of violent excess; from which was derived the common phrase of the luxus Sabbatarius, and (as some think) even the use of the word "Sabbat" for the unholy revelry of witches and evil spirits. Bingham (Book xx. c. ii. 4) quotes passages to this effect from St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, and others. St. Chrysostom (Hom. i. de Lazaro) declares that the Jews used their release from secular work not "for spiritual things, sobriety and modesty, and the hearing the word of God," but in serving their bellies and drunkenness, gorging, and revelry (γαστριζόμενοι, μεθύνοντες, διαρρηγνύμενοι, τρυφῶντες). St. Augustine (Ps. xci. sect. 2, vol. iv. p. 1403) similarly accuses the Jews of "keeping the Sabbath with a mere bodily rest, lazy, dissolute, luxurious." "Our rest" (he adds) "is for evil works, theirs for good works. It is better to plough than to dance. . . . Many rest in body, and are turbulent in soul. . . . That which is hymned in the Psalm is the condition of the Christian in the Sabbath of the heart, in the rest, the tranquillity, the serenity of conscience." Such Sabbaths were (as Theodoret and Cyril of Alexandria insist in commenting upon Amos vi. 3) the σάββατα ψευδῆ of the prophets, against which every Christian man should protest. What would be more natural than that such a protest should be made by the sobriety and mournfulness of a fast?

We gather from the Epistle of St. Augustine to Casulanus, quoted above, that in his days the Roman church, with characteristic imperiousness and intolerance, urged the Sabbath fast in marked antagonism to all Jewish observance, as a matter of absolute obligation; insisting that they who neglect it "are still in the flesh, and cannot please God; . . . lovers of their belly, preferring Judaism to the church, and becoming children of the bondwoman." "If" (says the champion of their cause) "the Jew by keeping the Sabbath denies the Lord's Day, how shall a Christian keep the Sabbath? Either let us be Christians and keep the Lord's Day, or let us be Jews and keep the Sabbath." St. Augustine, indignantly rejecting this imperious intolerance, and laying down the principle of simple accordance on this matter to the custom of each church, has a curious passage on "the Great Sabbath" and its effect on the general observance of the Sabbaths of the year. "On that day" (he says) "the flesh of Christ rested in the grave, as God rested on that day from all the works of His creation. Hence arose that variety . . . that some, as especially the peoples of the East, on account of His rest prefer to relax the fast; others, like the Roman church and some other churches of the West, on account of the humiliation of the death of the Lord," and (as he adds below) "the grief of the disciples," "prefer to fast" (sect. 31). But looking at the question in the abstract, without recognising any survival of the old Jewish feast, it would certainly seem that the Roman practice might be better supported in argument; and when to its reasonableness was added the effect of a strong anti-Judaic feeling, and the influence of the Roman church, which was soon to become far greater and more imperious than in St. Augustine's time, it is not surprising that it should have prevailed over the more ancient practice.

At a later period we find Gregory the Great laying it down with authority, that to "cause the Sabbath to be kept from work" is a mark of Judaizing and a "sign of Antichrist;" and we note that in his whole treatment of a tendency to sabbatize the Lord's Day (see LORD'S DAY, p. 1051), he seems to ignore altogether any special celebration of the Saturday as a Sabbath, whether as fast or festival. This silence is probably significant of a change passing over Western usage altogether: for, so far as we can judge, the special observance of the Sabbath there gradually died out. The fasting observance having prevailed against the festal, was itself naturally overshadowed by the Friday fast. At present, while all Fridays in the year (except Christmas Day) are fasts, there is no trace of the Saturday fast, except in the vigils of Easter Day and Whitsun Day, and the Saturdays of the Ember weeks.

In the Eastern church the festal observance remained far longer, and, indeed, is distinctly traceable at the present day. The canonists Zonaras, Balsamon, and Aristenus, representing the tradition of the 12th century, all speak of the Apostolic Canon as still observed and binding. We have a consultation of Nicolaus of Constantinople, about the same time, as to the question of standing in prayer on the Sabbath, as well as the Lord's Day; and his answer is that "to bend the knee on the Sabbath is not forbidden by the canon; but that men generally (οἱ πολλοί), because they do not follow the practice of fasting on the Sabbath, refrain also from bending the knee." Of this significant Eastern usage we have again a slight trace in the West in the Montanist body. Tertullian (de Oratione, c. 18) speaks of a variety of usage introduced by a very few who on the Sabbath abstain from kneeling ("per pauculos quosdam, qui Sabbato abstinent genuibus"). The practice, however, he disapproves; he would have it given up, or so retained as to avoid offence; for the abstinence from kneeling (he thinks) properly belongs only to the Lord's Day. It never seems to have taken any hold in the West; but in the East it is still preserved in the present practice of the Greek, though not of the Russian church. It is also held that Saturday is so entirely a day of joy that it is unfit for fasting (excepting always the Great Sabbath), and accordingly, if a vigil chance to fall upon it, it is transposed to the Friday. Even on Easter Eve, though it is a strict fast, yet the black of Lent is changed to the white of Easter in all church vestments and furniture. It is curious also that in later times a new and specially festal consecration was given to the Sabbath in the Eastern church, by considering the Great Sabbath of Easter Eve as the day of our Lord's triumph in Hades, giving rest to the spirits in prison, and accordingly looking on all Sabbaths in the year as especially days of commemoration of those who rest in the Lord. Still here also the greater festal sacredness of the Lord's Day has rightly overshadowed it; and in present thought and usage there is nothing like the quasi co-ordination of the days, which we have seen in the Apostolical Constitutions.^b

Thus the Sabbath, placed between the two great days of distinctively Christian observance, may be considered as parting with its observance as fast and festival to the one and the other.

In the later ages of the Western church, as we have seen (see LORD'S DAY), a distinctly sabbatical observance gathered round the Lord's Day itself,—partly by natural attraction to the great day of worship and rest, partly by enactments civil and ecclesiastical, ultimately by a formal transference to it of the obligation of the Fourth Commandment. But it is notable that when the Lord's Day was thus considered to be "the Christian Sabbath," it began to be observed with a certain austerity and rigour, differing entirely from the festal character of the Sabbath of the Jews. We are almost tempted to trace in this change a survival of the ancient Western usage, which observed the true Sabbath as a fast.

Special Ritual of the Sabbath. (1) Lessons.—During the first ritual period proper eucharistic lessons were provided for Sundays, and a few feasts and fasts only, as in the body of the old Gallican Lectionary. At the end of this, however, are two sets of prophecies, epistles, and gospels for choice on the week days; or there may have been three or four, for the MS. breaks off here (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 172). The next step, in the Roman books at least, was to appoint proper lessons for the Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays in Lent and the Ember weeks. See the Capitula Lectionum Evangelii, not later than the beginning of the 5th century, in the ^b For information on this subject I have to thank the Rev. Archimandrite Myriantheus, the chief priest of the Greek church in London.

Thesaurus Anecdotorum of Martene and Durand (v. 66). There was, however, it would seem, an ebb as well as flow, for the later Comes Hieronymi in its earlier form (Pamelius, Liturgica, ii. 1-61) gives (out of Lent) Saturday lessons only for the Ember weeks (13, 34, 49, 58), and that before Pentecost (31), though it provides for Wednesdays and Thursdays throughout the year, and for every day in Lent. Later on lessons were assigned to the Saturdays after the Epiphany and a few others (Kalendarium Romanum, ed. J. Fronto, Paris, 1652, and in Epist. et Diss. 139-144, Veron. 1733). The Saturday lessons have been ascribed to Innocent I., apparently on no better ground than is the Sabbath fast at Rome (Anastas. Biblioth. in Vitae Pont. Labbe, Conc. ii. 1243), viz. that Pseudo-Innocent, as we must call him, in the Epistle to Decentius (§ 4) insists on the observance of the latter rite, with which the lessons were associated.

(2) Ordinations.—Leo I. in 459 desired that all ordinations should take place "post diem Sabbati ejusque noctis quae in prima Sabbati lucescit," that all might be fasting (see (1) above), "quod ejusdem observantiae erit, si mane ipso dominico die, continuato Sabbati jejunio, celebretur" (Epist. 81 ad Dioc. Alex. 1). Gelasius, 494, fixed them "quarti mensis jejunio, septimi, et decimi, sed et etiam quadragesimalis initii, ac mediana quadragesimae die, Sabbati jejunio circa vespem" (Ep. 9 ad Luc. et Brut. Episc. 11; comp. Gregor. II. Ep. 4 ad Thuring.; Conc. Rom. A.D. 743, can. 11). It was owing to the prolongation of the ceremony, so that the actual ordination took place on Sunday morning, according to Leo's hint, that no proper office was provided for the Sunday after an Ember week. SABBATIUS (1), July 4. [SEBASTIA.]

(2) Sept. 19, martyr at Antioch with Trophimus and Dorymedon in the reign of Probus (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

SABBATUM. (1) Sabbatum in Albis, the Saturday in Easter week, on which day the neophytes laid aside their white dress (Sacramentarium Gregorianum in Pamel. Liturgica, ii. 278; Miss. Ambros. ibid. i. 363; Pseudo-Alcuin, de Div. Off. 18; &c.).

(2) Sabbatum Duodecim Lectionum, in XII. Lectiones, in XII. Lectionibus.—The Saturdays of the ember weeks were so called from the twelve lessons read in the office or mass of those days ("haud enim duo haec dividebantur;" Fronto, note in Kalend. Rom. in Ep. et Diss. 175, Veron. 1733). That twelve were actually read can hardly be doubted, and it was in all probability for the sake of the candidates for orders, as twelve were read "secundum Romanos" for the sake of the catechumens on Easter eve (Honorius Augustod. Gemma Animae, iii. 108; iv. 117; Comes Hieronymi in Baluz. Capit. Reg. Franc. ii. 1324 (the copy in Pamel. Liturg. ii. 23, and the Sacram. Gelus. Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 43, give only eleven); Sacr. Greg. Mur. ii. 147 &c.), but it was soon reduced to six (Sacr. Gel. i. nn. 19, 6; Greg. u. s. 53, 94, 122, 136), or to five (Comes Hier. Baluz. cc. 111, 179, 222; comp. the number of the prayers in Gelas. i. nn. 83, 85). The retention of the old name after this change perplexed the early ritualists, some of whom said that each of the six lessons which they found in their books had been read twice, once in Greek and once in Latin (Amalarius, de Eccl. Off. ii. 1; Pseudo-Alc. de Div. Off. 26; Gemma, u. s. iii. 154, &c.), others that the psalms said with them were counted as lessons (Raban. Maur. de Instit. Cleri. ii. 24). An Ordo Romanus for the use of Salzburg, belonging to the 11th century, orders twelve lessons to be said on these days in a church [COLLECT, i. p. 403], in which the people were to assemble before they went to Mass. This appears to Martene (de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. viii. 5, § 9) to account for the name; but it is impossible that so many early ritualists should have missed this explanation if the materials for it had existed in their day, and we must rather regard the Salzburg rite as local, probably not older than the 11th century. At first there were only three ember seasons (Capitulare Lect. Evang. in Martene, Thesaur. Anecd. v. 78, 79, 81, 82; Sacram. Gelas. i. 82; Conc. Clovesh. A.D. 747, can. 18), but when the Jejunium Primis Mensis was added, the new ember Saturday received the name common to the rest (Sacram. Gelas. i. 19; Greg. Murat. ii. 33), though probably twelve lessons had ceased to be read on any of them. There is no trace of such a rite in the Gallican Sacramentaries, nor in the Mozarabic Missal.

(3) Sabbatum Sanctum.—The common name for Easter eve in the Latin church (Sacram. Greg. in Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. ii. 65; in Cod. Elig. Opp. Greg. iii. 70, ed. Ben., &c.). See EASTER EVE, p. 595.

(4) Sabbatum Requiei Dominici Corporis.—A Gallican name for Easter eve (Missale Gallicanum Vetus, in Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. ii. 730).

(5) Sabbatum in Traditione Symboli.—The day before Palm Sunday. It was so called at Milan because the solemn delivery of the creed to the catechumens took place on it (Ambr. Miss. in Pamelii Liturgica, i. 326). Some ritualists have supposed that this was not the original custom of Milan, because St. Ambrose (Epist. 20, ad Marcellinum, § 4), speaks of a "traditio symboli" on Palm Sunday. His words, however, do not afford sufficient ground for the inference. He says, "Sequenti die, erat autem Dominica, post lectiones atque tractatum, dimissis catechumenis, symbolum aliquibus competentibus in baptisteriis tradebam basilicae." He would not have said "to some competentes," if he referred to the great mass of those who received the creed at this season. They were probably some who from one cause or another had not been present on the previous day. [W. E. S.]

SACKCLOTH (saccus, cilicium). 1. We find the rough HAIRCLOTH [p. 756]—generally of camel's hair—which was used in the East for sacks and tents, worn as a sign of mourning, humiliation, and penitence by Syrians (1 Kings xx. 32) and Ninevites (Jonah iii. 5), as well as by Israelites. Among the latter, sackcloth was an almost invariable accompaniment of mourning (2 Sam. iii. 31; 1 Kings xxi. 27; 2 Kings xix. 1, &c.). It was of a dark colour, as we see in Apocal. vi. 12: "The sun became black as sackcloth of hair (ὡς σάκκος τρίχινος)," and was probably associated with mourning from its sad appearance, as well as its roughness and inconvenience, for it does not appear to have been by any means invariably, or even commonly, worn next the skin.

2. Tertullian (de Poenit. c. 9), treating of penitence, does not speak of wearing sackcloth, but of lying on sackcloth (sacco) and ashes; and similarly Cyprian (de Lapsis, c. 35, p. 262, Hartel) speaks of the lapsed proving their penitence by grovelling on sackcloth (cilicium), dust, and ashes. "Sackcloth and ashes" became the signs of a penitent. Ambrose (ad Virg. Lapsam, c. 8) would have the penitent's whole body emaciated with fasting, sprinkled with ashes, and covered with sackcloth; and Pachomius (Reg. art. 121) desires one who has been convicted of theft to appear in sackcloth and ashes at every assembly for prayer.

3. In the course of time, probably from the 3rd century, it became usual with ascetics of remarkable rigour to wear a hair-shirt next the skin for the purpose of producing discomfort. Such men as Anthony the hermit, Hilarion, and other patriarchs of monasticism are said to have worn the hair-shirt constantly (Athanasius, Vita S. Ant. c. 59; Hieron. Vita S. Hilarii, c. 38).

4. The eighty original monks of St. Martin are said (Sulpicius Severus, Vita S. Mart. c. 7) to have worn, for the most part, clothes of camel's hair. It does not appear, however, that the rough vestment of the monks was worn next the skin. Ascetics in the East very commonly wore cloth of camel's hair—after the example of some of the prophets, and perhaps of John the Baptist—as their ordinary clothing. Compare MAFORS, MELOTES.

5. When Martin of Tours was on his death-bed he would not permit his disciples to put anything between his body and the sackcloth on which he lay; on sackcloth and ashes he held that a Christian should die (Sulp. Sever. Epist. 3, de obitu S. Martini). So Anthony and Hilarion died wrapped in their haircloth, and Paula, according to Jerome, died on the slip of sackcloth (ciliciola) on the hard ground, which had served for her bed during life (Hieron. Epist. 108, ad Eustoch. p. 706, ed. Vallarsi). In the Middle Ages the practice became common. Peter the Venerable (de Mirac. i. 4) speaks of dying on sackcloth and ashes as a custom of Christians, and especially of monks (O. Zöckler, Geschichte der Askese, p. 82 ff.). [C.]

SACRAMENTARY. The Western books of offices were first called Libri Sacramentorum; but after the 8th century Sacramentarium is more frequent; though at Milan, so late as 1024, we find the treasurer of the chapter perplexed when asked for an "Ambrosian sacramentary" (Epist. Martini ad Paul. et Gebert. in Mus. Ital. i. 96). Either name was appropriate, because the book contained, not the Eucharistic prayers only, but also the prayers, benedictions, and prefaces used at the performance of every sacramental rite, as baptism, confirmation, ordination, the blessing of nuns, widows, oil, salt, water, the dedication of churches, &c.

We do not know when or by whom such a volume was first compiled. For a period of uncertain duration and varying in different churches the public prayers and other formularies were committed to memory. [ORDO, § 1.] A trace of this practice is still found in the Gallican sacramentaries, which merely indicate the words of consecration by the first words, as "Qui pridie quam pat." or the like (Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 192, 195, 198, 202, &c.), or omit them altogether (ibid. 227, 230). In the West attempts were made to enforce the rule, even below our period. "Orationes quoque missarum et praelectiones et canonem bene intelligent presbyteri; et si non, saltem distincte et memoriter proferre valeant." This occurs in one of those episcopal addresses which were read at visitations from the 9th century downwards (Admon. Synod. in App. ad Reginonis Libr. de Disc. Eccl. 504, ed. Baluz. Comp. Inquisitio 82, ibid. p. 15). Bishops even inquired if the parish priest "had by heart" the exorcisms and benedictions of salt and water (Inquis. 90, u. s. 17), if he could repeat the Psalms from memory (Ib. 84, p. 16), and the Athanasian Creed (Ib. 85; see also Admon. Synod. 504; Nova, 506; Noviss. 509; Ahyto Basil. Capit. 4; Hinemar, Capit. an. 852, cc. 3, 4; Walter of Orleans, Capit. 21).

It is evident that when this rule was in full force, a complete sacramentary would not be needed for public use in church. If the memory required assistance, a small book (libellus) containing the prayers for the season, or the occasion, would be more convenient, and such were used. See Gregor. Turon. Hist. Franc. ii. 22; Vitae Patrum, xvi. 2. Another thing worthy of note is that, even when all the offices were thus collected into one volume, it would at first consist of prayers only, because those who compiled it, or procured its compilation, for their own use, required no directions for familiar practices. Hence the older MSS. contain the fewer rubrics. The so-called Leonian or Veronese Sacramentary, assigned by Morinus to about 488, contains no directions whatever, only a few brief headings to the missae, the several members of which are (except in one single instance, Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. i. 410), undistinguished by the proper titles, Super Oblata, Praefatio, &c. which occur passim in the Gelasian and Gregorian. The growth of a sacramentary in this respect deserves further illustration. E. g. the "Leonian" has a prayer to be said at the blessing of fruits on Ascension Day (ibid. 313); but there is no hint of its purpose except in the words of the prayer itself. In the Gelasian we find the rubric, "Inde vero modicum ante expletum canonem benedictis fruges novas" (Murat. u. s. 508; Thomasius, Libri III. Sacram. 100). Again, the Leonian (318) supposes baptisms on Whitsun Eve, but gives no directions about them; in the Gelasian the officiant is guided by several rubrics of some length (Murat. u. s. 592-596; Thomas.

102-108). Compare with the same view the earlier copies of the Gregorian Sacramentary, as that of Pamelius (Liturgica, ii. 296, 7), the Vatican or Othobonian (Murat. ii.) with the Codex Eligianus from which Ménard (Sacram. Liber a Greg. M. compos. Paris, 1642), and the Benedictiones after him (Opp. S. Greg. iii.) have printed; or the ancient Gallican books (Murat. u. s. ii.; Mabill. Liturg. Gall. u. s. Thomasius, u. s. &c.), with the kindred Mozarabic, which was in common use three or four centuries later. Two obvious sources of these accretions may be indicated. In the 8th century every priest was required to draw up and present to the bishop for approbation his own code of ritual (Capit. Karolm. A.D. 742). Such notes when approved, would naturally be entered in his book of prayers, and become a rule to his successors also. About the same time was compiled the Ordo Romanus for the guidance of the bishops of Rome, and of the suburbicarian dioceses. This soon became, as we infer from the commentaries on it by the German Amalarius, an authority with other bishops and priests, and many of its ceremonial directions were copied into the sacramentaries with more or less literal exactness. To give an example. In a direction of the Codex Elig. respecting the baptisms of Easter Eve we have (Greg. Opp. iii. 73, ed. Ben.), "Sunt (Ord. Rom. I. 44, Mus. Ital. ii. 27; Ordo Scrutinii, ib. 83; Or. Rom. Bernoldi in Hittorp. de Off. Cath. Eccl. 75, ed. 1568; sint) parati qui eos suscepturi sunt cum linteis in manibus eorum et accipiant (Ordd. u. s. accipiant) ipsos a presbyteris (Ordo R. I. a presbyteris, vel diaconibus; Ordo Ser. a pontifice vel diaconibus; Bern. a pontifice, presbyteris, vel diaconibus), qui eos baptizant." The Ordo frequently refers to the Sacramentary for the prayers to which its directions apply. E. g. "Dicat orationes solemnes sicut in Sacramentorum (Libro, supplied by Bernold, u. s. 49, 66) continetur" (O. R. in Mus. Ital. ii. 19, 32 bis; see also pp. 21, 25, 31). When this order is copied in the Eligian codex, the mention of the sacramentary itself is properly omitted (Greg. Opp. iii. 62); but in one passage (69) a similar reference is inadvertently retained — "ordine quo in Sacramentario." We find again that the episcopal addresses and inquiries already mentioned contain many directions which at a later period appear in the sacramentaries, as e. g. with reference to the mixed cup (Inquis. 64, Regin. 13), the disposal of the remainder of the elements (65), the eucharistic vestments (Leo IV. de Cura Past. Labbe, Conc. viii. 36; Admon. Syn. u. s. 503), &c.

The Roman Sacramentaries.—See LITURGY, p. 1032 ff. We may mention here that some critics, judging from internal evidence, think many of the prayers in the "Leonian" or Veronese Sacramentary not later than Sylvester and Julius I. (Morinus de Sacram. Poenit. ix. 30, R. 2; Gerbert. Vet. Lit. Alem. Praef. xv.-xviii.), or than Sixtus III. and Felix II. (Murat. Diss. iv. i. 41); while others, also judging from style and matter, see much in all the Roman books that belongs to Leo I. (Thomas. Praef. in Libr. iii. Sacram. p. 3; Quesnel, not. in Leonis Serm. xvi.; Murat. Diss. i. 20). No ancient author ascribes to Leo the compilation of a sacramentary, but there are traditions preserved by later writers, which shew that he was believed to have enlarged at least the missal part of the Roman Liber Sacramentorum. Thus Anastasius Bibl. Vitae Pontif. in some copies (Labbe, Conc. iii. 1291; Bolland, Apr. 11, ii. 21); Gemma Animae, i. 90; Rupert. de Div. Off. ii. 21, &c. Assemani inclines to the opinion of Orsi, "qui purum putumque Gelasianum Sacramentarium in Veronensi codice contineri censuit" (Cod. Liturg. vi. P. 3, p. ix.); though he admits that "multae orationes Leonis sapiunt stylum et forte aetatem," and "in hoc sacramentario, velut in aeternum quoddam illatas, contineri preces liturgicas Romanae ecclesiae quae prioribus saeculis fuere praescriptae" (viii.).

Our earliest authority for assigning such a work to Gelasius is Gennadius of Marseilles. "Scripsit et tractatus diversarum Scripturarum et sacramentorum" (De Vir. Illustr. 94). Walafrid who is later: "Tam a se quam ab aliis compositas preces dicitur ordinasse" (De Reb. Eccl. 22). The sacramentary ascribed to him is, unlike any other, in three books; (1) Ordo Anni Circuli; (2) Natalitia Sanctorum; (3) Orationes et Preces cum Canone. It was this recension which Gregory I. undertook to simplify; "Gelasianum Codicem de Missarum solemnitatibus multa subtrahens, pauca convertens, nonnulla adiciens, pro exponendis evangelicis lectionibus in unus libri volumine coarctavit" (Joan. Diac. Vita Greg. ii. 17. Comp. Wal. Strab. u. s.) All the extant copies, however different in other respects, consist of a single book.

The Gelasian and Gregorian books were for some centuries in use at the same time; and were even combined. In the library of Centule in 831, beside three Gregorian and nineteen Gelasian missals, there was "Missalis Gregorianus et Gelasianus modernis temporibus ab Albino (Alcuino) ordinatus" (Chron. Centul. 3, in Dacher. Spicil. ii. 311, ed. 2). Another collection ascribed to Alcuin (to which Micrologus [c. 60] probably refers) is printed by Pamelius (Rituale SS. Patrum II.) with a second by Grimoldus. On these, and on a third by Rodradus, see Gerbert. Vet. Lit. Alem. Disq. II. i. 21. Yet more remarkable than the twofold sacramentary ascribed to Alcuin is a volume "olim S. Gallense, nunc Turicense, saec. circ. X. ad triplicem ritum Gelasianum, Gregorianum, et Ambrosianum concinnatum," which has been printed by Gerbert (Monum. Lit. Alem. P. I.).

The Milanese Sacramentary.—The predominance of Rome did not suffice to commend her offices even to the rest of Italy itself. Paulinus of Nola, for example, "fecit et sacramentarium et hymnarium" (Gennad. Vir. Ill. 48); but that of Milan, from its real or supposed connexion with St. Ambrose, acquired an authority which has given an enduring vitality to the proper use of that church. In 1024 two canons of Ratisbon ask the treasurer of Milan for the "sacramentarium Ambrosii," "cum solis orationibus et praefationibus Ambrosianis" (Paul et Geb. ad Mart. Epp. i. iii. Mus. Ital. i. 95, 97). Two centuries earlier Walafrid Strabo says, "Ambrosius . . . tam missae quam caeterorum dispositionem officiorum suae ecclesiae et aliis Liguribus ordinavit" (De Reb. Eccl. 22). It is not improbable that St. Ambrose did re-arrange the materials left by his predecessors, among whom tradition placed St. Barnabas, not only as the founder of his church, but as the author of a "Missae Ordo" also (Vicecomes, de Rit. Miss. ii. 12). At the instance of a Roman council, by which the pope Hadrian also declared himself constrained, Charlemagne attempted to destroy all the Ambrosian rites which Gregory had respected, "Ambrosianum mysterium videns esse factum divino magisterio" (Landulphus Sen. Mediolan. Hist. ii. 4, 10, in Murat. Script. Rer. Ital. iv. 72); but the pope moved by the remonstrances of a French bishop, Eugenius, reassembled the council, which was induced by the latter to reconsider its decree, and the Milanese Sacramentary was restored (ib. 12). The Ambrosian rite in the threefold use published by Gerbert (see above) gives the benediction of ashes (p. 48), of olive branches on Palm Sunday (at Milan, "Dom. in Ramis Olivarum" (64), of the oils (75), the order of baptism (88), &c.; and the two last-named rites, with the benediction of the new fire, have a place in the "Missae Ambrosianae," almost a new missal, of Pamelius (Liturg. i. 340, 344, 348-351).

The Gallican Sacramentaries.—These were various, and it would seem that several authors contributed in one way or another to their formation. "Liber hymnorum et alius mysteriorum" (= sacramentorum) are ascribed by Jerome (de Script. Eccl. 100) to Hilary of Poitiers, A.D. 354. Salvian of Marseilles, 440, composed many "homilias sacramentorum," i.e. prefaces in the Gallican sense [PREFACE] (Gennad. u. s. 67). Musaeus also of Marseilles, 460, at the request of his bishop "composit sacramentorum egregium et non parvum volumen per membra quidem pro opportunitate officiorum et temporum, pro lectionum textu, psalmodumque serie et cantatione discretum, sed supplicandi Deo et contestandi beneficiorum ejus soliditate sui consentaneum" (the Gallican preface or contestation, Gennad. 79). Again, Sidonius, bishop of Auvergne, 472, composed a book of masses (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 22). Chilperic I., A.D. 561, wrote masses, but was unable to impose them on the church (ibid. vi. in fine). The Gallican sacramentaries were suppressed by Pepin and Charlemagne [LITURGY, 51]. The Roman sacramentary which the latter obtained from Hadrian (Epist. Adr. ad Car. M. in Opp. Greg. M. iii. 618, ed. Ben.), as a standard for his empire is identified by Lambecius with a codex at Vienna entitled, "Liber Sacramentorum de circulo anni expositus a Sto. Gregorio Papa Romano," &c. (Biblioth. Caesar. ii. 5, p. 14). The Gallican "Missals" mentioned in LITURGY, § 54, were true sacramentaries; e.g. even in their present state they contain the order for baptism (Miss. Goth. in Murat. u. s. ii. 589; Miss. Gall. Vet. 708-720, 736-742), ordination (Miss. Franc. 661-671), benediction of persons (Miss. Fr. 673, 5; Miss. Gall. V. 701), of things (M. Goth. 582; M. Fr. 675, 7, &c.; M. G. V. 732). The Sacramentarium Gallicanum [LITURGY, § 54 (f)], besides the rites of baptism (Mur. 828-835, 847-852) and benediction 845, 953-961), gives the lessons for every Mass.

The Mozarabic.—See LITURGY, §§ 46-49. The Council of Toledo, 633, ordered that throughout Spain and Gallia Narbonensis (also under the Goths) the same mode of celebrating masses and other offices should be observed (can. 2). As Isidore of Seville was then living, and the Hispano-Gothic missal is by its title ascribed to him ("a sancto Isidoro ordinatum"), we infer probably that the redaction was committed to him by the council (Baron. Annal. ad an. 633, n. 70). Among the materials before him were doubtless some supplied by his own brother Leander, of whom he says, "In ecclesiasticis officiis idem non parvo elaboravit studio. . . . In sacrificiis quoque, laudibus atque psalmis multa dulcissime composuit" (De Script. Eccles. 28). A later contributor was Hildefonse of Toledo, the author "missarum, hymnorum atque sermonum." So Julian of Toledo, 680 (App. ad Ildef. de Script. Eccl. in Biblioth. Eccl. J. A. Fabricii, 66). Of Julian himself we also read, "Librum missarum de toto circulo anni in quatuor partes divisum, in quibus aliquas vetustatis incuria vitiatas ac semiplenas emendavit ac complevit, aliquas vero, ex toto composuit" (ibid.) The Mozarabic missal, which was in use till the 12th century, retains few traces of the special character of a Liber Sacramentorum. But such are the "blessing of the flowers or branches" on Palm Sunday (Leslie, 148), of the new fire, &c. (174), and a brief notice of baptism on Easter Eve (189).

The African Rites.—See LITURGY, §§ 38-42. Tradition has preserved the name of only one composer or compiler, Voconius, bishop of Castellana in Mauritania, in A.D. 460, to whom is ascribed "Sacramentorum egregium volumen" (Gennad. u. s. 78). [W. E. S.]

SACRAMENTS. There was within our period no tendency to restrict the application of the word sacramentum to Christian rites, much less to any fixed number of rites. Only, when used of a religious observance at all, it meant that some sacred meaning lay under a visible sign: "Sacramentum est in aliqua celebratione, cum res gesta ita fit, ut aliquid significare intelligatur quod sancte accipiendum est" (Isid. Hisp. Origin., vi. 19).

Being a purely Latin word, sacramentum could have no ecclesiastical use in the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic ages, during which the language of the church was exclusively Greek (Milman, Latin Christianity, I. 1, vol. i. p. 27). After that period it came into common use from the current Latin versions of the New Testament, in which it was frequently employed as an equivalent to the Greek μυστήριον, mystery. Thus, in the version most common before the Vulgate, which we shall denote by S. (Sabatier, Bibl. Sacr. Lat. Vers. Ant. Rem. 1743), in Rom. xvi. 25, we have "revelatione sacramenti." Quoting 1 Cor. ii. 7, St. Hilary (De Trin. x. 1076) reads "in sacramento." For other examples see 1 Cor. xiii. 2 ("omnia sacramenta"), as cited by St. Augustine (Tract. vi. in S. Joh. Ev. § 21, vii. § 3; ix. § 8, &c.); Eph. i. 9, iii. 3, 4, 9 in S. and the Vulgate; Eph. vi. 19 in S.; Col. i. 26 in St. Hilary (Comm. in Ps. 138, 518); Cor. i. 27 in V.; 1 Tim. iii. 9, 16 in S. and V.; Rev. i. 20 in S. V.; x. 7, xvii. 5 in S.; xvii. 7 in S. V.

Hence, whatever could in any sense be called a mystery, was with the Latin Christians a "sacramentum." Revealed truths, and even pious opinions, are "mysteriorum sacramenta" (Isid. Hisp. de Scrip. Eccl. 27), the nature of the Godhead is "sacramentum Trinitatis"

(Idem, C. Judaeos, i. 4, § 6). We have also "sacramentum incarnationis" (Leo M. Serm. xxiv. 4; Euseb. Mediol. Epist. Hard. Conc. i. 1781; comp. Missale Gall. Vet. in Mab. Lit. Gall. 347; Ambr. de Bened. Patriarch. xi. 48, in some MSS.), "s. Dominicæ passionis et resurrectionis" (Leo, Serm. lxi. 1; comp. liii. 4, liv. 3), "s. salutis nostræ" (Ib. lvii. 5), "s. Scripturarum" (lxii. 1; De Vocat. Gent. [auct. inc.] 21), "s. Paschale" (liii. 5); and so the feast of the Nativity is "sacramenti solemnitas" (Cassian, Collat. x. 2). The touching of the catechumen with spittle [EARS, p. 586] was a "sacrament" (Rabanus Maurus, de Instit. Cleri, i. 27). So was the salt given to catechumens: e.g. the Council of Carthage 397 (followed in Capit. Reg. Franc. vii. 263 and Addit. iv. 63, 76) ordered that at Eastertide no "sacrament" should be ministered to the catechumens "nisi solitum sal" (can. 5). Comp. Theodulf (u. s. 5): "Salem in Sacramento recipiunt." [SALT, § 3.] Again, the creed taught to catechumens is "sacramentum religionis" (Expos. Symboli in Sacram. Gall. (of Besançon), Mus. Ital. i. 312); comp. Missale Gall. Vet. in Liturg. Gall. Mabill. 339, 347), "in quo quidem pauca sunt verba sed omnia continentur sacramenta" (Raban. M. de Instit. Cleri, ii. 56). When one is baptized, "sub Trinitatis tingitur sacramento" (Isid. Hisp. de Offic. Eccl. ii. 25); while of the HONEY AND MILK given after baptism, John the Deacon says, "baptizatis . . . hoc genus sacramenti offertur" (Epist. ad Senar. 12). Baptism itself is "sacramentum aquæ" (Hildefonsus de Cognit. Bapt. ii. 28; Ambros. Expos. Ev. Luc. x. 48, &c.), and "s. regenerationis" (Willibald, Vita S. Bonif. vii. 19); confirmation was "sacramentum olei" (ib. 26; comp. Aug. Serm. 227; "oleum est Spiritus Sancti sacramentum, or "chrismatis" (Isid. Orig. vi. 19; Rabanus de Universo, v. 16; Conc. Arel. vi. can. 18), or "unctionis" (Origenis Hom. v. in Levit. Vers. Lat. Vers. Lat. § 2; Aug. in Ep. S. Joan. c. 2, Tract. iii. 12). St. Augustine thus speaks of all the rites of the catechumenate: "Omnia sacramenta quæ acta sunt et aguntur in vobis per ministerium servorum Dei, exorcismi, orationibus, canticis spiritualibus, insufflationibus, cilicio, inclinatione cervicis, humilitate pedum," &c. (De Symbolo, Serm. ii. 1, § 1); while Hildefonse includes all these, the baptism itself, the confirmation and first communion under the same term: "Praemissis . . . sacramentis expletis" (u. s. i. 139; comp. Magnus Senonensis, de Myst. Bapt. in Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. I. i. 18; Caesarius Arel. Serm. de Dedic. Eccl. 4; Miss. Gall. Vet. in Mabill. Lit. Gall. 362). So Walter of Orleans speaks of the "sacramenta" of catechumens, of the sick, and of the dead (Capitula 20). The Eucharist was called "sacramentum altaris" (Aug. Serm. 59, § 6, De Civ. Dei, x. 6), or "sacramenta altaris" (Id. Serm. 226), "mensæ Dominicæ s." (Id. Serm. 127), "s. panis" Hildef. u. s. 27), "eucharistiae s." (Tertull. de Cor. Mil. 3), "s. Dominici corporis et sanguinis" (Gaudent. Serm. 2; comp. Aug. Ep. 98. § 9), "s. carnis et sanguinis" (Hilar. de Trin. viii. 17), &c. St. Augustine has "sacramentum exorcismi" (Serm. 227; comp. the Gelasian exorcism of oil, "Fiat hæc unctio . . . sacramentis purificata;" Murat. u. s. i. 559), and terms the sign of the cross a sacrament also (Enarr. in Ps. cxli. 4, § 9; comp.

Leo M. Serm. liii. 3; Ambros. Expos. Ps. 118, xiii. 6).

Many other "sacraments" might be enumerated, if it were necessary; but ancient usage will be sufficiently illustrated, if we mention one other application of the word. By "sacramentum" was commonly understood an oath, especially a military oath (e.g. Codex Theodos. vi. 168). Hence there was naturally sometimes an allusion under this word to the obligation which a Christian takes on himself as a soldier of Christ. Thus Leo (Serm. xxi. 5): "Si coelestis militiae sacramenta servaveris, non dubites in castris triumphalibus Regis aeterni pro victoria coronandum." Compare Tertullian, Ad Martyres, 3; Adv. Gentes, 2, prope init. [W. E. S.]

SACRARIUM. (1) A Christian church, or consecrated building generally; e.g. "confugit ad ritus Christiani sacrarium" (Ammian. Marcellin. lib. xxvi.). Cf. Sidonius Apollinaris, lib. viii. ep. 4; Salvian, lib. iiii.

(2) More properly the most sacred part of the church, the place of the altar and "confessio"; in the Greek church τὸ ἅγιον, τὸ ἱερατεῖον, from which the laity were excluded. The thirty-first canon of the first council of Braga ordains "ingredi sacrarium ad communicandum non liceat laicis nisi tantum clericis;" and the third canon of the council of Vaison speaks of the minister, "cujus officium est sacrarium disponere et sacramenta suscipere." Here the offerings of the people were received. The ninety-third canon of the fourth council of Carthage forbids the reception of the oblations of brothers at variance either in the sacrarium or treasury, "oblaciones dissidentium fratrum neque in sacrario neque in gazophylacio recipiantur."

(3) The sacristy, or vestry. "Sacrarium dicitur quia ibi sacra reponuntur et servantur" (Walafrid Strabo, de Reb. Eccl. c. 6). This use of the word was inherited from pagan terminology. Ulpian (Dig. lib. i. tit. 8, leg. 9) defines "sacrarium" as "proprie locus in quo sacra res ponuntur et servantur; quod etiam in aede privata esse potest." Servius (ad Aen. xii. 199) similarly says, "sacrarium proprie locus est in templo in quo sacra reponuntur, sicut donarium est in quo ponuntur oblata." We learn from Festus (in Secespitum) that the holy things were exhibited in the "sacraria" behind a metal lattice work, as afterwards through the "transennae" of the "confessio": "sacraria in templis repagulo seu reticulo aeneo olim siepiabantur; in quo tubi relinquebantur per quos sacra manibus tangere licebat." We find it used repeatedly in this sense in the Ordo Romanus, e.g. "processionem coram episcopo acturus a custode ecclesiae in sacrario ornamenta praebenda sunt;" and in Anastasius: e.g. a portion of the true cross is recorded to have been found by pope Sergius "in sacrario beati Petri apostoli," § 162. [E. V.]

SACRIFICATI. The name applied to those Christians who in times of persecution took part in a heathen sacrifice. They were not strictly apostates, but to escape confiscation of goods, or torture or death, they performed a distinct act of idolatry. The act was generally made to consist in sharing either in the actual sacrifice or in the sacrificial feast, that is, they openly "eat things offered to idols," and so in the language of Cyprian (Ep. xx. 1) they defiled both their hands and life with sacrilegious contact. Cyprian regarded such connivance with idolatry as a far more grievous lapse than that of which the LIBELLATICI were guilty; at the same time he drew a broad distinction between the degrees of guilt among the sacrificati themselves. "We should not," he says (Ep. lv. 10), "put on a par one who forthwith and willingly sprang forward to the dreadful sacrifice, and one who, having struggled and long resisted, came by compulsion to this fatal work; one who betrayed both himself and all his, and one who of himself approaching to the danger, protected wife and children and his whole house by exposing himself to peril; one who compelled inmates or friends to the deed, and one who sheltered under his own roof very many brethren who withdrew to banishment." The testimony which he gives in other epistles of the conduct of multitudes of Christians in Africa in the Decian persecution goes far to justify the severity of the church towards those who sacrificed. Men did not wait (Cyp. de Lapsis, c. 6) to be summoned to the trial, they went spontaneously, they mutually encouraged one another to submit, they took their children with them, they even entreated, when the magistrate postponed the ordeal on the approach of night, that their downfall might not be delayed. "Why bring an offering, wretched man," he continues, "why present a victim for slaughter? You are yourself an offering for the altar, you are yourself come as a victim; you have slaughtered there your own salvation, your hope; your faith was burnt in those funeral flames."

The penalties of sacrificing varied with the circumstances of the guilt. If the lapses was compelled to make an offering, yet did it in a festive robe and with a glad countenance, then the council of Ancyra (c. 4) decrees that he was to do penance six years; if in a mourning robe and with a sad heart, then the penance was reduced (c. 5) to four years; if he did not actually partake of the sacrificial victim, it was further reduced to three. Should the sacrifice be repeated a second or third time, the penalty (c. 8) was seven years' exclusion, and should a Christian compel or entice others to succumb, he was to be excommunicated for ten years (c. 9). The Council of Nice further decreed (c. 11) that if a Christian sacrificed when there was no danger and not from compulsion, he was to be under censure for twelve years; a sentence cited and made more severe by 1 Conc. Valentin. c. 3, but modified by 2 Conc. Arelat. c. 10. The Conc. Eliber. (c. 1) decided that one who after baptism and of full age participated in the worship of an idol temple, was guilty of a crime for which reconciliation was to be given "nec (nisi?) in fine." With the close of the persecutions the crime to a great extent passed away. [G. M.]

SACRIFICE. This term was applied by early Christian writers to any act or offering of devotion. St. Jerome calls private prayers at night "an evening sacrifice" (Ep. vii. ad Laetam). St. Hilary uses "sacrificium" of the performance of the corporal works of mercy (in Ps. cxl.). St. Augustine says that the whole congregation of saints form the Christian sacrifice (de Civ. Dei, x. 6) in words which are suggestive of the oblation in the first Postcom. Collect in the Anglican Liturgy. The incense offered at the Benedictio Cerei on Easter Eve is called a "vespertinum sacrificium" (Sacram. Gregor.). The offering of bread and wine by Melchizedek is described in the Gelasian Sacramentary as "a holy sacrifice, a spotless victim." These words "sanctum sacrificium immaculatam hostiam" are said by Wal. Strabo to have been added to the canon by Leo I. (de Reb. Eccles. c. 22). They are difficult to explain, but all that ingenuity can advance in their favour is put together by Le Brun (Explication, &c., tom. i. p. 500; Hoppe, L. A., Die Epiklesis, p. 119).

But by far the most common use of the term "sacrificium," together with such wholly or partially equivalent terms as θυσία, προσφορά, ἀναφορά, hostia, oblato, is to denote the Holy Eucharist. The sacrificial character of that rite has been based on the use by our Lord at its institution of the words ποιῶ and ἀνάμνησις; but it does not fall within the scope of this article to enter into the merits of the controversy which has been raised in mediæval and recent rather than in primitive times over the exact significance of those terms.

The reader is referred to Smith's Dict. of the Bible for the theory and history of Jewish sacrifices. They all foreshadowed the sacrifice of Christ on Calvary, since which time St. Augustine says that "in lieu of all these sacrifices and oblations Christ's body is offered and ministered to the partakers" (de Civ. Dei, xvii. 20), that "the mysteries of the Jews were succeeded by the sacrifice which He afterwards willed to be celebrated in the church in the stead of them all, because by all of them He was prefigured." (De Bapt. cont. Don. iii. 27; adv. Leg. i. 37; c. Faust. xx. 13, 21; Enar. in Psalm. xxxix. 12; Euseb. Demonstr. Evang. ii. 10; Apost. Const. vi. 23; Leo I. Serm. lviii. de Pass. § 7; Theodoret in Heb. xiii. 10; Cyril, adv. Nest. iv. 5.) The same and other writers frequently dwell on the offering of Melchizedek as prefiguring the eucharistic sacrifice (Aug. de Civ. Dei, xvi. 22, xvii. 17, xviii. 35; c. Adv. Leg. i. 38, 39; Cyprian, Ep. 63, § 4; Clement of Alex. Strom. iv. § 25; Euseb. Dem. Ev. v. 3; Jerome, Ep. ad Marcellin., &c.). Other writers, especially St. Chrysostom, dwell on the identity of the eucharistic sacrifice with that which Christ offered (Hom. 2, in 2 ad Tim. Hom. 50 in Matt. vii.; Hom. 17 in Heb. ix. 38, in eos qui Pascha jejuntant iii. § 4, &c.).

We append a list of the various sacrificial titles applied to the Eucharist in early documents Eastern and Western.

The sacrifice, sacrificium (Ambros. in Ps. 38, Sacram. Leon and frequent.), θυσία (Lit. S. Jas. Hammond, edit. pp. 25, 39, &c.; Apost. Const. ii. 57). The holy sacrifice, sacrificium unde dispensatur victima sancta (Aug. Conf. ix. 13), ἡ ἱερὰ θυσία, Chrys. (Hom. de Bapt. Chr. tom. ii. p. 375). The new sacrifice, novum sacrificium (Bede, in Hom. S. Pentecost. bk. vii. p. 59, edit. 1563). The Lord's sacrifice, sacrificium Dominium (Cyprian, Ep. lxi. 9). The awful sacrifice, ἡ φρικτὴ θυσία (Chrys. Hom. iii. § 4, in Philipp.; De S. Pentecost. Hom. i. p. 493, &c.). The pure sacrifice, sacrificium purum (Iren. iv. 17, 5; v. 25, 4). The inexhaustible sacrifice, ἡ ἀνάλωτος θυσία (Chrys. Ep. ad Hebr. Hom. xvii.

3). The daily sacrifice, sacrificium quotidianum (Sacr. Leon. Mens. Jul. xlv. iv. Conc. Tolet. can. 5, Greg. Mag. Dial. iv. 58, &c.), θυσία καθημερινή (Chrys. iii. Hom. in Eph. iii. 4). The daily sacrifice of the church (Aug. de Civ. Dei, x. 20). The perpetual sacrifice, sacrificium perenne (Miss. Goth. edit. Mab. p. 297). The sacrifice of salvation, sacrificium salutis (Wal. Strabo, Vit. S. Galli, i. 19). The sacrifice of Christians, sacrificium Christianorum (Aug. c. Faust. xx. 18). The sacrifice of Christ, sacrificium Christi (Cyprian, de Unit. Eccles. c. 17). The sacrifice of Christ's Body, sacrificium corporis Christi (Fulgentius, Epist. xiv.; Resp. ad Quaest. 5, Ferrand. Aug. Ep. ad Honorat.). The sacrifice of bread and wine, sacrificium panis et vini (Fulgentius de Fide ad Petr. § 60). The sacrifice of praise, sacrificium laudis (Sacr. Gel. Miss. Goth. edit. Mab. p. 191; Aug. c. Adv. Leg. i. 39, &c.), θυσία αἰνέσεως (Lit. of S. Jas. Gk. in Orat. Veli). The sacrifice of thanksgiving, sacrificium gratiarum actionis (Ethiop. Lit.). The unbloody sacrifice, ἀναιμακτος θυσία (Euseb. de Vit. Const. iv. 45; Athenag. Leg. pro Christo, § 13, &c. frequent.). The most pure and unbloody sacrifice; καθαρωτάτη καὶ ἀναιμακτος θυσία (Greg. Naz. Orat. v. c. Jul. xxix.). The reasonable and unbloody and mystical sacrifice, θυσία λογικὴ καὶ ἀναιμακτος καὶ μυστικὴ (Apost. Constitt. vi. 23). The tremendous and unbloody sacrifice, ἡ φοβερὰ καὶ ἀναιμακτός θυσία (Lit. S. Jas. in Orat. Veli). The spiritual sacrifice, sacrificium spirituale (Stowe Missal. Syr. Lit. of S. Jas.), ἡ πνευματικὴ θυσία (Apost. Constitt. viii. 46; Cyril. Jer. Orat. xxiii. Mystag. v. 8). The intellectual sacrifice, λογικὴ θυσία (Euseb. Dem. Evang. i. 10). So Christ is said to be intellectually sacrificed (νοητῶς), Cyril. Alex. in Zeph. iii. 8, 10. The true and full sacrifice, sacrificium verum et plenum (Cyprian, Ep. lxi.). The holy and most awful sacrifice, ἅγια καὶ φρικωδεστάτη θυσία (Cyril. Jer. v. Myst. Cat. 9). The honouring and saving sacrifice, honorificentiae et sacrificii salutaris obsequium (Fulgentius, ad Monim. ii. 2-5). The most true and single sacrifice of the new law, verissimum et singulare sacrificium novae legis (Aug. Lib. de Spiritu, xi.). The oblation of the church, ecclesiae sacrificium (Fulgent. ad Monim. lib. ii. c. vi.); Ecclesiae oblatio (Iren. iv. 18, 1). The oblation of the Body and Blood of Christ, oblatio corporis et sanguinis Christi (Fulgent. Respons. ad Quaest. 5, Ferrand. Epist. xiv.). The reasonable offering, ἡ λογικὴ λατρεία (Anaph. of St. Basil), oblatio rationalis (Ethiop. Lit.). The tremendous and life-giving offering, προσφορά φρικτὴ καὶ σωτήριος (Chrys. in eos qui Pasch. jejunt. iii. § 4).

It would be impossible to present the reader with a complete catena of the passages in early liturgies, councils, and writings in which the eucharistic sacrifice is mentioned. The following list of sacrificial phrases from the earliest western sacramentary will afford an idea of the extent to which the thought and language of the early church were saturated with the conception of sacrifice. The same phrases, with many variations and additions, abound in all early service books, Roman, Gallican, and Mozarabic. The writings of Eastern saints and the Eastern liturgies abound equally in the use of θυσία and προσφορά, with many cognate and compound phrases.

In the sacramentary of Leo—"Divinum sacrificium (Mense Aprili, xii.); sacrificium placationis et laudis (ib. xiii.); laudis tuæ domine hostias immolamus (Mens. April. xiv. Jul. xli.); hostia placationis et laudis; spiritualis hostia quæ miro ineffabilique mysterio et immolatur semper et eadem semper offertur (Muratori, de Reb. Lit. 198); sacrificium singulare quod majestati tuæ et semper redditur et debetur (Mens. Jul.), Prec. Diurn. xxxv. xxxviii.; hostias tibi domine deferimus immolandas (ib.); hostias tibi, domine, suppliciter immolamus (ib.); sacrificium nostrum (in Natal. Dom. iii.; see the whole of this collect.); suscipe domine sacrificium ejus te voluisti dignanter immolatione placari (ad Jejun. xmi. Mensis); oblationis obsequium quod offerimus (Mense Apr. xvii.); sacrificium celebramus quod nobis debet esse perpetuum (ib. xxvi.); hanc oblationem quam tibi offerimus placatus accipias (in Pentecost.); hostias altaribus tuis placationis imponimus (in Natal. SS. Johan. et Pauli, v.); oblatio nostræ servitutis (in Natal. SS. Joh. et Pauli, vii., iv. Id. Aug. v.); sacrificium (in Natal. Pet. et Pauli, xvi. frequent.); hostias nostræ devotionis (Mense Jul. iii.); sacrificium gloriosum (Mense Jul. iii.); oblatio sacrandæ (Mense Jul. xv.); sacrificium tibi domine celebrandum placatus intende (Mense Jul. xix.); tuæ plebis oblatio (Mense Jul. xxiii.), or populi tuæ, or familiæ tuæ (ib. xxxiii.); sacrificium quotidianum (Mens. Jul. xli.); sacratæ plebis oblatio (viii. Id. Aug. vii.); sacrificium laudis (iv. Id. Aug. v. canon Gelas. frequent.); sacrificium salutæ (Id. Aug. iv. Natal. Epis. xix.); sacrificium nostræ servitutis (xvi. Kal. Oct. iii.); hostias laudis (Prid. Kal. Oct. i.; Mens. Sep. xii. &c. frequent.); sacrificium nomini tuo dicatum (Mensis Sep. i.); sacrificii præsentis oblatio (Super Defunctos, ii.); sacrificium ejus te voluisti dignanter immolatione placari (in Jejun. Mens. xmi. ii.)."

The following are among the various titles applied to the Eucharist in the ancient Celtic church of Great Britain and Ireland:

Hostia; (Syn. Hibernens. ii. 21) oblatio; (Reg. Columbani, c. iv.) ὁφρρηνη; (Senchus Mor. i. 126, ii. 344) ῥαφρηφαιε; (Book of Deer) sacrificium; (Gildas, Praefat. de Poeniten. §§ 6, 7, 8; Hibernens. xli. 4; Reg. S. Colum. cxii.) sacrificale mysterium; (Cuminus, Vit. S. Colum. p. 29.) "To celebrate the Holy Eucharist was expressed by—"Offerre (Gildas, Praef. de Poenit. xxiv.; Hibernens. xviii. 6); sacra offerre (Gildas, ib. xxiii.); offerre sacrificium (Liber Davidis, can. xii.); Patricii, Confessio, xiv.); sacra oblationis mysteria ministrare (Adamnan, Vit. S. Colum. i. 40); sacram oblationem consecrare (ib. iii. 17); immolare hostiam (Secundini Hymnus, Irish Hymnary, p. 17.)"

The word "sacrificium" was used equally for that which was offered to God, and for that which was given to and received by the communicant. St. Gall told his scholar Magnoadus, "My master Columbanus is accustomed to offer unto the Lord the sacrifice of salvation in brazen vessels" (Wal. Strabo, Vit. S. Galli, i. 19). The twelfth canon of the synod of St. Patrick runs thus; "He who deserveth not to receive the sacrifice in his life, how can it benefit him after his death?" (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, ii. 2, 335). St. Patrick said to the newly-baptized virgin daughters of Laoghaire, "Ye cannot see the face of Christ except ye taste of death, and except ye receive the sacrifice." And they answered, "Give us the sacrifice that we may behold the Son our Spouse," and they received the Eucharist of God, and they slept in death (Book of Armagh, fol. 12a). The two words communion and sacrifice are frequently used together in one phrase in the Leabhar Breac. "Thereafter Patrick sent forth his spirit, and he received communion and sacrifice from bishop Tassach's hand" (fol. 29 b; see also fol. 65 a, 66 a).

The use of the word "sacrificium" for Eucharist is frequent in the service books and ecclesiastical documents of the Anglo-Saxon church. This is natural in a church which accepted through its founder the Roman liturgy in the shape of the Gregorian Sacramentary, modified by the introduction of several Gallican and perhaps of a few Celtic features. Illustrations might be drawn from almost any page of the Anglo-Saxon missals or other service books (Surtees, Soc. vol. lxi. p. ix.), and from the regulations concerning the Eucharist laid down in the penitentials of Theodore, cap. xii. (7th century); of Bede, cap. viii. (8th century); of Egbert, cap. xii. (8th century), &c. (Linga, J. J. Anglo-Saxon Church, edit. 1858, vol. i. p. 265).

SACRIFICIUM. The anthem commonly called the offertory ("quod in honore sacrificiorum canitur;" see Isidore, de Eccl. Off. i. 14) was so called among the Goths of Spain, as by Isidore of Seville, A.D. 595 (Epist. ad Leudefr. § 5).

Sacrificium is the invariable heading of the offertories in the Mozarabic Missal. Ex. (the offertory for Easter): "Sacrificium. Ecce Agnus (John i. 29). V. Dicunt qui (Ps. cvi. 1-3). P. Qui tollit. V. Gloria et honor Patri. P. Qui tollit peccatum." [W. E. S.]

SACRILEGE. Amongst the acts which are specifically classed as sacrilege, we may enumerate—

(α) The act of one who "acceptam a sacerdote Eucharistiam non sumpserit" (Conc. Tolet. i. cap. 14).

(β) The seizure of sacred or ecclesiastical property (Conc. Vas. ii. c. 4, A.D. 529, citing St. Jerome's letter to Nepotianus). In this category we find the seizure of the goods of a bishop at his death by the clergy (Conc. Chalced. can. 22), especially the plunder of the palace and the licence that prevailed through the whole of Rome and its suburbs on the death of the supreme pontiffs (Ravennat. sub Joan. iv. c. 11, ob. A.D. 685). Akin to this is the removal of anything from the episcopal residence during the vacancy of the see (Conc. Ilerd. can. 16, A.D. 524). [VACANCY.]

At a later period we find traces of the seizure of the goods of deceased presbyters or clerics.

(γ) A bishop's delivering over a monastery to spoliation (Conc. Hispal. ii. c. 10, A.D. 619).

(δ) The sale of any of the vessels of the church on the part of a presbyter or deacon (Capitula Martini Brac. c. 17, cent. 6).

St. Ambrose melted the sacramental plate at Milan to redeem some captives, and the Arians branded that as sacrilege. But St. Ambrose justified himself, arguing that it is better to have preserved the vessels of living men than lifeless vessels. A similar thing was done by St. Augustine, by Acacius, bishop of Amida, by St. Cyril at Jerusalem, and by Deogratias of Carthage. Bingham shews that in the Code of Justinian a special provision was made for selling the church plate in these exceptional cases. A similar provision in the canon law was made by the council of Rheims (Can. 22).

(e) Offences against the person and rights of the sovereign (Cod. Theod. lib. 6, tit. 5). See PRINCES, ALLEGIANCE TO.

(f) Plundering the graves of the dead. (Cod. Theod. ix. 17 says that this act was always esteemed "proximum sacrilegio.")

(g) Impeding a clergyman in the performance of his office by imposing upon him other duties (Cod. Theod. 16, 2).

(h) Allied to this is the disturbance of divine service and affronting its ministers (Cod. Theod. 16, 2).

(i) Bingham quotes the words of pope Gelasius in proof of the position that the abstaining from the cup in Holy Communion is sacrilege: "... quidam sumpta tantummodo corporis sacri portione a calice sacri cruoris abstinent ... divisio unius ejusdemque mysterii sine grandi sacrilegio non potest provenire."

(k) The name of sacrilege is given even to a neglect of ignorant or careless teachers in preaching the word of God to the people: "qui divinae legis sanctitatem aut nesciendo confundunt aut negligendo violant et offendunt sacrilegium committunt" (Cod. Theod. ap. Bingham, xvi. 6, 27).

There are many acts which are classed as sacrilege by the canonists without being actually called by that name in conciliar decrees; for example:—

(1) Wrapping a corpse in the altar-pall (palla altaris). (Clem. Ep. ii.)

(2) A deacon using the same as a covering for his shoulders (ibid.).

(3) The act of one who "ad sepulcra martyrum adjungit corpora praecipitatorum insanorum."

(4) Not consuming the Eucharist in church (Caesar. c. 3).

(5) Giving the Eucharist to the dead.

(6) Offering anything but bread and the cup with mingled wine and water.

(7) A layman undertaking publicly to teach the word of God (Trull. c. 64).

(8) Destroying or mutilating books of Scripture, or delivering them to booksellers or perfumers (unguentarii) to be destroyed (Trull. c. 68).

(9) Profanation of churches by traffic (Trull. c. 76); or introducing cattle (Trull. c. 88); or impropriety (Trull. c. 97).

(10) Giving or receiving the Communion (communione) in any vessel (Trull. c. 101).

(11) Drawing figures of the cross upon the ground, thus causing the emblem of our salvation to be trodden upon (Trull. c. 73).

(12) Offering improper bread for consecration in the Eucharist (Conc. Tolet. c. 6, A.D. 693).

(13) Misuse of the sacred chrism for medicinal or other purposes (Conc. Arelat. iv. cap. 18, A.D. 813).

(14) The act of the traditores in delivering up the Scriptures and sacred vessels to heathen authorities for destruction.

(15) A cleric of any rank consulting augurs, soothsayers, fortune-tellers, or magicians (Conc. Tol. iv. c. 28).

With regard to the punishment enacted against sacrilege, it appears from the 16th canon of the council of Lerida (Ilerd.) already quoted that conviction was followed by "prolixius anathema." The guilty were disqualified for accusation ("nullatenus ad accusationem sunt admittendi," Eutychiean Epist. 2).

The mode of inflicting the punishment is described at length in the 24th canon of the second council of Tours (A.D. 567). The occasion was the seizure of church property. The offender was to be admonished by the presbyter of the church that had suffered. If he would not make restitution, he was to be addressed as a son in letters by all the brethren. But if he was finally recalcitrant after a third admonition, abbats and presbyters assembled to pronounce the solemn anathema. The clergy were shut in choir, Christ being their helper. The 109th Psalm (Vulg. 108) was said to the murderer of the poor, that "upon him might come the curse that came upon Judas." The effect of the denunciation is declared to be that he should die not only excommunicate, but anathematized, and should be smitten with the sword of heaven. [MALEDICTION.]

The fourth council of Toledo speaks of the sacrilege of grave-robbing as having been punishable by death under the public laws, and enacts, accordingly, that a cleric who is guilty of the crime be deposed from his orders, and do three years' penance (c. 45). In the excerpts of archbishop Egbert (quoting Jerome) sacrilegious persons are ranked with murderers. The infliction of punishment (presumably capital punishment) is there pronounced to be not "effusio sanguinis." Elsewhere they are catalogued with "heretics, suspected, excommunicated, felons, thieves, resorters to fortune-tellers and wizards" (Eutychiean Epist. 2, ap. Antonii Augustini Juris Pontif. Epitome, Lib. 34, tit. ix. pars ii. cap. 8).

Legend, as usual, is not backward in depicting the horrors of sacrilege. See, for instance, Gregory of Tours de Gloria Martyrum, cap. 17; de Miraculis S. Martini, lib. 1. [H. T. A.]

SACRISTA, SACRISTANUS. The minister to whom the care of the sacred vessels, vestments, and furniture was committed. "Sacrorum custos; idem qui Thesaurarius" (Durand. Rational. lib. ii. c. 1, n. 14). [SCEUOPHYLAX.] [E. V.]

SACRISTY. [DIACONICUM; SCEUOPHYLACIUM; SECRETARIUM.]

SADOC, Feb. 20, bishop, martyr in Persia under Sapor (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

SADOTH, Oct. 19, martyr in Persia under Sapor (Basil. Menol.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.). [C. H.]

SAGAR, Oct. 6, bishop of Laodicea, reputed disciple of St. Paul (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Notker.). [C. H.]

SAGUM. This word is properly applied to a cloak worn by the inferior ranks of the Roman soldiery. We gather from Isidore that it was of Gallican origin and rectangular in form (Etymol. xix. 24. 13). With its military use we have no concern here, but it is necessary to remark that in the 8th century we find several prohibitions against the use of the sagum by clerics. Thus a council held in A.D. 742 under the presidency of Boniface, either at Ratisbon or Augsburg, orders that "priests and deacons shall not wear saga like laymen, but casulae" (can. 7; Labbe, vi. 1535). The rules of this council were confirmed by a capitulary put forth by Charlemagne at Liptinae in the following year (Baluzius, Capit. Reg. Franc. i. 149). Again, in a letter of Boniface to Cuthbert (A.D. 745), we find a reference to his prohibition to the "servants of God" of the use of saga or weapons. In the Theodosian Code, sagum is the name applied to the cloak or outer covering used by those who looked after the horses used for public conveyance. These are not to be taken away or torn by those employing the horses (lib. viii. tit. 5, ll. 37, 48, 50; and see Gothofredus's note). For further references see DuCange's Glossarium, s. v. [R. S.]

† SAINTES, COUNCIL OF (SANTONENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 562, when Heraclius, a presbyter, was nominated to that see in lieu of Emerius, appointed to it uncanonically by king Clotaire I. But the bishops were fined for this act by Chérebent, the son of Clotaire, and Emerius was maintained in his office. (Mansi, ix. 783-786.) [E. S. Ff.]

SAINTS (Sancti, ἅγιοι). (1) The people of God, as holy by election and profession, have been so called under both dispensations (Deut. xxx. 3; Ps. l. 5; cxlix. 1, 5, 9; &c., and N. T. Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 2; Eph. i. 1, iv. 12; Col. i. 2; Jude 3; &c.). This scriptural use of the word was common for more than three centuries after Christ. With Constantine the visible church is ὁ ἁγίων σύλλογος, the assembly of the saints (Tit. Orat. ad SS. Coetum). In several passages in which St. Chrysostom speaks of the intercession of "the saints," the context shews that he means our living brethren (Hom. 44 in Gen. § 2; Hom. 5 in Matth. Ev. § 4; Hom. 5 in Ep. 2, ad Eph. § 1). "Grex sanctorum" is the church in the language of Victor Vitensis (de Persec. Afric. 5). Caesarius of Arles, referring to the precept (St. James v. 16), "Confess your faults one to another," says that "Scripture advises us to confess our sins, not only to God, but also to the saints and those who fear God" (Serm. lvi. § 7).

But several conventional restrictions of the meaning of this term were at the same time growing up. Thus it was sometimes limited to those who lived up to their holy profession, the true saints in the visible kingdom of saints; as when some persons, condemned by the council of Milevi, A.D. 416 (cans. 7, 8), attempted to explain away the use of the petition, "Forgive us our trespasses," by "the saints." Again it sometimes meant those who were especially devoted to holy offices or to a holy life, as the clergy and monks and nuns. Thus Cyril of Jerusalem calls a certain rite in baptism "the insufflations of the saints" (Catech. Myst. ii. 3). Salvian, complaining of the oppressions of his day; "Viduarum et pupillorum viscera devorantur, et cum his ferme sanctorum omnium" (de Gubern. Dei, 5). In the East again the writers of holy Scripture were especially so called. See examples in the Festal Epistles of St. Athanasius, pp. 14, 20, 25, 39 (Engl. Tr. Oxf.). St. Basil of Caesarea asks, "Which of the saints has left in writing the words of invocation at the consecration of the bread of Eucharist and the wine of blessing? For we are not content with those things which the apostle or the gospel has mentioned, but we say other things" (de Spir. Sanct. 27, § 66).

(2) Saints in the Calendar.—The use of the title "saint" to denote a "martyr designatus" (Tertull. Ad Mart. 1) or "vindicatus" (Optatus, de Schism. Donat. i. 16), or a confessor raised to the same rank, is not earlier than the 5th century. [Compare CALENDAR; MARTYROLOGY.] We find it, however, in a Roman table of gospels, "Capitula Lectionum Evangelii ann. circ. ad missam," which Martene thinks not later than the beginning of that period, almost every name being preceded by the title "sanctus" (Martene and Durand, Thesaur. v. 66). Another calendar of the 5th century is headed, "Hic continentur dies natalicio-rum martyrum et depositiones episcoporum, quos ecclesia Carthagenis anniversaria celebrant" (sic) (Analecta Vet. Mab. 163, ed. 2, Ruinart, u. s. 693). Here the title of saint is given to nearly all; but the custom does not seem to have been quite familiar to the compiler; for the first six in the list are without it; though four of them are described as martyrs. The rest, above 80 in number, with three apparently accidental exceptions, are all called saints. The calendar of Polemeus Silvius, or rather P. Annaeus Silvius, was written for the year 448. Beside heathen festivals, birthdays of emperors, &c., prognostications of weather, and some of the greater Christian festivals, it notes "Natalis S. Vincentii Martyris, Deposito sancti Petri et Pauli, Natalis S. Laurentii Martiris, Natalis S. Hippoliti Mart., Natalis S. Stephani Mart." (Boll. u. s. 176; Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. v. i. 54). Certain Fasti Consulares, which end at the year 493, contain memoranda of nine martyrdoms, and of the translation of SS. Andrew and Luke to C. P.; but in only two instances (St. Laurence, St. Euphemia) is the title of saint employed (Boll. u. s. 186). A fragment of a Gothic calendar found in the library at Milan names six martyrs, but styles none of them saints. It was compiled before 553, but when does not appear. It is therefore uncertain whether the omission is a mark of great antiquity or a peculiarity of the Gothic church (Mai, u. s. 66). In the Calendarium Romanum of the 8th century, printed by J. Fronto (Epist. et Dissert. 133, Veron. 1733), the title is scrupulously prefixed to every name; as it is also to those found on a marble calendar of the ninth given by Mai (u. s. 58).

(3) Commemoration in the Liturgy.—The one privilege accorded at the earliest period to the recognised saints of any church, was annual mention in its liturgy. Thus St. Cyprian, speaking of two martyrs, says, "As ye remember, we always offer sacrifices for them, whenever we celebrate the passion and days of martyrs by a yearly commemoration" (Epist. 34, ad Cler. ed. Ben.). [NATALE.] He ordered the deaths of persons under persecution to be notified to him, that they might be thus commemorated (Epist. 37). It was in fact a part of the bishop's duty to control the services of the church in this as well as other respects. Even at the later period, when martyrs became objects of worship, it was the bishop who exercised the right of admission or exclusion: "De . . . sanctis noviter inventis, nisi episcopo probante, minime venerentur" (Capit. Car. Mag. A.D. 805, c. 17; comp. Conc. Francof. 794, can. 42; Capit. Reg. Franc. v. 257; vi. 283). Before long persons not martyrs, but sufferers for the truth and eminent for holiness (see the earlier limitations in Hermas Pastor, i. vis. 3, § 1; iii. Simil. § 28; relaxed in Cyprian Epist. 37 ad Cler.), received the same honour under the title of confessors. One such, viz. Sylvester, but only one, appears in the Roman calendar of the beginning of the 5th century, printed by Martene (Thesaurus Anecd. v. 66). At length such commemoration, whether annual or by request more frequent, became an object of ambition, and was purchased by gifts or bequests. E.g., a matron named Theodilana in the 6th century (Mabill. Anal. Vet. 160, ed. 2) made a donation, and Remigius of Rheims (Labb. Biblioth. MSS. i. 806), and Bertram of Mans (Mab. u. s. 257) made bequests to churches on condition that their names should be "inscribed in the book of life (the diptychs) and recited on every festival."

The names of the Virgin, apostles, and other chief saints were recited from the diptychs with the rest, in some churches even down to the 8th century (Salig. de Dipt. Vet. iii. 34, Halae Magdeb. 1731); but a distinction was felt to be desirable even before that period, and in the West the more eminent names had for some time occupied a permanent place in the liturgy itself. Hence within our period there were prayers for the blessed Virgin and others by name, certainly in most of, presumptively in all the liturgies, except the Clementine, which was modelled on the earlier rite, and the Nestorian of Theodore and Nestorius which were derived from the primitive liturgies of Mopsuestia and Constantinople. At first these intercessions were said by the priest at the altar, and after the consecration (Notitia Eucharistica, 421, ed. 2); but after a while, obviously for the sake of greater distinction, they were generally removed to an earlier part of the service. A surviving witness to the earlier arrangement is found in the Armenian liturgy: "The Priest: We pray that the mother of God, the holy Virgin Mary, John the Baptist, the first confessor and archdeacon St. Stephen, and all saints, be commemorated in this holy liturgy. Choir. Remember them, O Lord, and have mercy upon them" (Neale's Introd. to Hist. of East. Church, 594). Other names follow. In the original text of St. James after the consecration God is simply besought to remember all the orthodox "from righteous Abel unto this day," but the later adds, "that we may find mercy and peace with all the saints, . . . especially our most holy . . . lady," &c. (Assemani Codex Liturg. iv. P. 2, 45). The Sicilian St. James, not only commemorates the Blessed Virgin, archangels, the baptists, the apostles, prophets and martyrs in general terms, and St. Stephen and James by name (ibid. 68) before the consecration, but also prays for "the memory, pardon, and repose" of all the archbishops of Jerusalem after

James, naming some of them (76). After the consecration (p. 86) it commemorates a great number of the saints of Scripture, and many martyrs and others by name, "not that we are worthy to commemorate their blessedness, but that they, standing before Thy dread and awful throne, O Lord, may remember our piteous state."

In the West the Roman use commemorates by name (in the Communicantes) the Blessed Virgin, eleven of the twelve apostles, St. Paul (associated with St. Peter), Linus, Cletus, Clement, Xystus, Cornelius, Cyprian, Lawrence, Chrysogonus, John and Paul, Cosmas and Damian; to which the local churches added names at will (Martene, de Ant. Rit. Ecol. i. iv. 8, n. 16). This was before the consecration. After, it prays for part and lot with "the holy Apostles and martyrs John, Stephen, Matthias (omitted before), Barnabas, Ignatius," and ten others. In both formularies it avoids prayer for them. The Mozarabic now merely commemorates (before the consecration) the B. V. the apostles, &c.; but still "offers on behalf of the spirits of those at rest, of Hilary, Athanasius, Martin, Ambrose, Augustine, Fulgentius," &c.—In all sixty-five names are mentioned (Leslie, Missale Mozar. 4, 225).

When the system of Missae was formed in the West the several collects composed for a saint's day mentioned him by name. The reference to him was various; but in one of them at least a prayer was offered for his repose. Such prayers, however, were so contrary to the feeling of the early mediaeval church that only two examples have come down to us in the sacramentaries of Rome; viz. the secretae in the Missae for St. Leo and St. Gregory. Until altered, not long before the time of Innocent III., A.D. 1198 (Decr. Const. iii. 130, in Opp. ii. 764, Colon. 1575), they began thus, "Grant unto us, O Lord, that this oblation may profit the soul of Thy servant" (Sacram. Gregor. in Murat. Lit. Rom. Vet. ii. 25, 102).

It was an early rule that no saint's day should be kept in Lent (Conc. Laodic. can. 51; Conc. Tolet. A.D. 656, cap. 1), and none are set down for that season in the earliest Roman table of gospels (Martene, Thesaur. v. 66), nor could there have been any in the old Gallican lectionary found at Luxeuil (Lit. Gall. 124).

Litanies of the Saints.—Originally the ectenes of the Greek and Oriental churches seem to have contained no reference to the departed (Notitia Eucharistica, 422). Now they have a commemoration of the Virgin and other saints introduced somewhat awkwardly (Goar, Euchol. Graec. 66, 74; Renaudot, Lit. Orient. i. 9, 139, 149, 506, 514; Raulin, Liturg. Malab. 298).

Nor were they commemorated, except very generally, in any of the corresponding Western forms, the Missal litanies, as said in the Missa Catechumenorum (in the Ambrosian rite immediately after the ingressa [INTROIT]) from a very early period. In the Missal litany preserved at Fulda (Bona, Rer. Liturg. i. 4, n. 3), the only allusion to the saints is in the clause "Sanctorum Apostolorum et Martyrum memores sumus, ut orantibus eis pro nobis veniam mereamur." There is no reference to them whatever in the two litanies retained in the Ambrosian Missal (Pamelius, Liturgica, i. 328, 331), or in the Mozarabic and Gallican PRECES, the last form of the eucharistic litany in Spain and France. But when litanies disappeared from the liturgy, they were still used in PROCESSIONS, and in the visitation of the sick. As so used, however, we find them enlarged by direct invocations to saints; as "Sancta Maria, ora pro nobis," &c.—Above 150 are thus addressed by name in an old litany of English use ascribed to the 8th century, printed by Mabillon (Anal. Vet. 168). Another of the same character, and also English of the 9th century, is given by Mr. Proctor (Hist. of B. C. P. 230) from a MS. (H. i. 23) in the Cambridge University Library. An Anglo-Saxon litany printed by Mai (Script. Vet. Nova Coll. v. i. 66) from a MS. of Bury St. Edmund's, now in the Vatican, contains thirty names, all purely national; except that of St. Helena. One of Gallican use, and of the age of Charlemagne (Mabill. Anal. 171), gives about 200 names, among which we find those of Oriel, Raguel, Tobiel, which Zachary, in a council held at Rome in 745 (act. 3), declared to be "the names not of angels, but of devils" (Labb. Conc. vi. 1561). Later litanies of this kind may be seen in Bona u. s. App. (Codex Chisian.), and Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. vii. 4, (ordo 6 (above 280 names), ordd. 11, 13, 15, 17, 25).—See litanies as used at the dedication of a church [PROCESSION, ii. B. 15] in the Ordo Romanus, Bernoldi (in Hittorp. Eccl. Off. 108, ed. 1); and Martene (de Ant. Eccl. Rit. ii. 13, ord. 4). They contain each about fifty names. For similar litanies sung at the coronation of an emperor, see Mart. u. s. ii. 9, ord. 5 (at Milan), and ii. 23, ord. 9 (at Rome) in ed. 2; at that of a king of France, ii. 10, ord. 7 (58 names). SALARIA or SALARIUM. A saltcellar, generally of some precious metal, for holding the salt used in consecrating holy water, or in the sacrament of baptism, was a usual piece of church furniture towards the end of our period. Floardardus (Hist. S. Remig. lib. ii. c. 5) mentions "cochlearia duodecim et salarium argenteum." Bernard. Mon. (in Ord. Cluniac. part i. c. 27) speaks of the "salaria" of the refectory, into which what remained over of the salt, when the holy water was consecrated, was put. At a later period, among the church furniture of York Minster (Mon. Angl. iii. 171), was a silver saltcellar, gilt inside, "pro sale in dominicis diebus benedicendo." [E. V.]

SALT, THE RITUAL USE OF I. Put into Holy Water.—See HOLY WATER, § iv. Prayers for the exorcism and benediction of the salt before it was mixed with the water may be seen in the Sacramentary of Gelasius (Murat. Liturg. Rom. Vet. i. 739-741) in that of Gregory (Murat. u. s. ii. 225; Opp. S. Greg. iii. 233, ed. Ben.), in the Romanizing rite of Besançon found by Mabillon at Bobio (Mus. Ital. i. 386), &c. Holy water was often made expressly to be sprinkled in the house of the sick, and then, as at other times, was "aspersa sale." See Ordines vi. 16, in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. i. vii. 4. The origin of the custom is not known, but it is possibly connected with a heathen practice, described by Balsamon as having been observed annually at Constantinople even in Christian times, of sprinkling every house with water from the sea (Comment. in Conc. Trull. can. 65).

II. At the Dedication of a Church.—On such occasions blessed water mixed with ashes was used, and salt was added here also. It was supposed to represent divine truth; while the water was a symbol of the people; the ashes, of the sacrifice of the Lamb of God. With this mixture the bishop signed the corners of the altar, and sprinkled various parts of the church. What remained was poured out at the foot of the altar (Remigius Autiss. de Dedic. Eccl. 4-6). There are no examples earlier than the 8th century. See Martene, u. s. ii. 13; viz. the Gellone Missal Ord. 1; Egbert's Pontifical, Ord. 2; or Surtees Society, vol. xxvii. p. 34; the Anglican Pontifical found at Jumièges, 3; Ordo Romanus Bernoldi in Hittorp. de Off. Cath. Eccles. 112, Col. 1568; &c. The same rite appears in the Gregorian Sacramentary (Murat. u. s. ii. 474; Opp. S. Greg. iii. 147, ed. Ben.), but not in the earlier Gelasian (Murat. u. s. i. 609).

III. Salt given to Catechumens.—This was a purely Latin rite, though some have supposed Origen to refer to it when commenting on Ezekiel xvi. 4 (Hom. in Ez. vi.). As no other Greek or Oriental writer even appears to allude to it, and the ritual books of their churches do not prescribe it, we must suppose that Origen is speaking figuratively, like the prophet whom he paraphrases. See a similar passage in Ambrose, Expos. in Luc. Ev. x. 48; comp. Mark ix. 50, Luke xiv. 34, Col. iv. 6. It was, however, general, if not universal, among the Latins after the 3rd century. Thus we find the council of Carthage in 397, decreeing that "throughout the most solemn days of Easter no sacrament should be given to the catechumens, except the accustomed salt" (can. 5). St. Augustine also, in Roman Africa, says of himself: "Adhuc puer . . . signabar jam signo crucis, et condiebar ejus sale" (Confess. i. 11, § 17). The Gelasian Sacramentary has a "Benedictio Salis dandi catechumenis," in which, after exorcising the salt, the bishop proceeds: "Proinde rogamus Te . . . ut hæc creatura salis in nomine Trinitatis efficiatur salutare sacramentum." This is followed by a "Benedictio post Salem datum" (Murat. u. s. i. 534; Codices Sacrament. Thomas. 49; Romæ, 1689). All this is preserved in the Gregorian books. See Murat. u. s. ii. 60, and other examples in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. I. i. 6, Ord. 3. The rite is not found in the old Gallican books (Thomasius, u. s.; Liturg. Gall. Mabill.; Sacram. Gall. Vet. in Mus. Ital. i.; Murat. u. s. ii.), but is recognised by the Romanizing bishops of the empire, whom Charlemagne consulted on the subject of baptism, as Leidrad. Lugd. (De Baptismo, 1), Magnus Senon. (in Martene, u. s. art. 17), Theodulf of Orleans (Epist. ad Jomm. 5), &c. In Spain Hildephonse of Toledo (A.D. 657) had only heard of the rite as local: "Catechumenis in nonnullis locis, ut refertur, sales accipiunt. . . . Usquequaque non probatur" (De Cognit. Bapt. i. 26). It is, however, acknowledged by Isidore of Seville (De Offic. ii. 20): "Exorcisantur, deinde salem accipiant." In the 9th century it was still known that this rite was not apostolic: "Alii addiderunt in baptismatis sacramento exorcismos, alii consecrationem fontis, alii sales, vel salivae infusionem" (Walafr. Strabo, de Rebus Eccl. 26).

The salt was given at every SCRUTINIUM (Ordo Scrut. 1, 8, in Mus. Ital. ii. 77, 81), and was regarded as a symbol of that divine wisdom with which the catechumen was gradually imbued during his preparation for baptism. So Smaragdus (Epist. de Sabb. Pentec.), Isidore (De Offic. ii. 20), Magnus Senon. (u. s.), Rabanus Maurus (De Instit. Cleri. i. 27), and many others. This signification was also recognised in the formula used at the ministration, "Accipe, ill., sal sapientiae, propitius in vitam aeternam" (Ordo Scrutini, 1; comp. Sacram. Gelas. Murat. i. 534; Greg. ibid. ii. 60).

IV. Given to Penitents.—In the 8th century we find in France canons, founded on that of Carthage respecting catechumens, which order salt to be given to penitents also: "Quae forma etiam a publicis poenitentibus omnino sequenda est" (Addito, 4, ad Capit. Reg. Fr. c. 63; comp. Cap. R. Fr. vii. 263).

V. In the Eucharistic Bread.—The Greeks from an early period attached importance to the presence of salt in the bread. It was the mind, they said, as the leaven was the soul of the oblate, and an azyme without them was dead (Pseudo-Damasc. De Azymis, § 1, Opp. Joann. Damasc. i. 649; comp. Mich. Cerularius ap. Humbert, Adv. Graec. Calumn. 2, and Nomocanon Graec. 426). The Armenians (Isaac Cathol. Invect. Sec. adv. Armen. xii. 8; Renuntiatio Armen. in notis Cotel. ad Constit. Apost. v. 12), the Nestorians (Martene, u. s. I. iii. 8; Le Brun, Dissert. xi. 9), and Syro-Jacobites (Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. ii. 183), are equally zealous for the custom). SAMARITAN WOMAN. This subject is not very frequently represented in Christian art. Martigny mentions four examples from the catacombs; two bas-reliefs and two frescoes. In all of them our Lord is represented standing, and not sitting, as might have been expected from John iv. 5. In the first of two sculptures, from Maffei's Verona illustr. part. iii. p. 54 (see woodcut), the well is represented as a narrow pit, with a stone curb or margin like the mouth of a large jar, and supplied with a wheel, rope, and pulley; which appears to have been occasionally used at all times in the East (WELL, Smith's Dict. of the Bible), though the woman's words, οὐτε ἀντλημα ἔχεις, καὶ τὸ φρέαρ ἐστὶ βαθύ, would seem to imply that there was no such convenience. But it is represented in the MS. of Rabula, where the woman is somewhat ecclesiastically vested. The figures of our Lord and the woman stand on each side of the opening, as if the words "Give me to drink" had just been uttered. She wears a tunic and pallium, which Tertullian (de Pallio, c. 1) says was a dress proper for men, and St. Jerome (Ep. vi. ad Demetrium) attributed to women of low rank. Her hair is displayed, or only bound with a riband, in one of these examples, which may indicate indifferent character (Tertull. de Virginitas velandis, vii.); but in the other (Bottari, pl. cxxxvii.) she wears a broader kind of fillet.

Woman of Samaria (from Martigny).

One of the frescoes of this subject is in the Callixtine cemetery (Bottari, tav. lxxvi.). Here the woman is alone, and the well open and without windlass. She wears a short wide-sleeved tunic; but in M. Perret's Catacombes, vol. i. pl. 71, the idea and treatment of her figure are different. She is represented as tall and noble-looking, in a long flowing tunic; not as questioning our Lord, but presenting Him with a cup of water, as He raises His hand to her, apparently speaking to her of God's gift of living water.

No less than eight examples of this subject are figured by Rohault de Fleury up to the 9th century, and he gives others of the 11th (see L'Évangile, vol. i. pl. xlvi. xlix.). His fig. 5, pl. xlvi. (6th century), from the tomb of St. Jude at Verona, is identical with the first described and figured by Martigny. His first and second figures are early work from St. Prætextatus and St. Callixtus;* he also gives a 5th-century ivory from the Musée de Cluny, and another carving from that of Arles. His next plate contains an outline from St. Apollinare nella Citta in Ravenna (6th century), the woman wearing a long robe with two stripes, and a disciple standing behind our Lord; and another from a 9th-century MS. of St. Gregory Nazianzen. Our Lord wears a violet robe, the woman a red gown fronted with yellow; the bucket and rope are in gold. The latter winds around a regular drum; and all the four last examples contain the pulley fixed in uprights.

SANCTA. The FERMENTUM, or reserved Eucharist, is so called, which, having been consecrated by the bishop of Rome, was sent to the churches in the city. The word is used as a neuter plural in the most ancient recensions of the Ordo Romanus (O. R. i. 8, 17, 18; ii. 12); but in the gloss (mentioned p. 668) on the epistle of Pseudo-Innocent to Decentius we have, "de ipsa sancta" (Mabill. Iter German. 65, Hambr. 1717).

SANCTA SANCTIS. Cyril of Jerusalem in his description of the liturgy, after commenting on the Lord's Prayer which follows Consecration, proceeds (Catech. Mystag. V. 19): Then the priest says, 'Holy things to holy men' (τὰ ἁγία τοῖς ἁγίοις). Holy are the gifts on the altar, after receiving the influx of the Holy Spirit; holy also are we, to whom the Holy Spirit has been vouchsafed; the two 'holies' correspond one to the other. Then we respond, 'One is holy, One is the Lord, Jesus Christ.'" The Sancta Sanctis, which Cyril here describes, is in nearly all Eastern liturgies the prelude to Communion. See (e.g.) the Greek St. James (Hammond's Liturgies, p. 49). [C.]

SANCTIMONIALIS. The word sanctimonialis, designating a woman of distinguished piety, is applied especially to such as were members of a religious society, or NUNS. It is not, however, limited to that use (Ducange, s. v.). Compare VIRGINS; WIDOWS. [C.]

taining the altar, the word sanctuarium first occurs in c. 13 of the first council of Bracara (563); the corresponding word, sacrarium, in the same sense is found a little earlier in c. 3 of the council of Vaison (442). Many of the Rhenish churches had two sanctuaries, one at the east and the other at the west, and the plan of the abbey of St. Gall, attributed to the abbat Eginhard, who lived in the time of Charlemagne, presents the same arrangement. [CHURCH, p. 383.] (Viолет-le-Duc, Dict. rais. de l'Architecture, s.v. SANCTUAIRE). See PRESBYTERY; SACRARIUM. [H. T. A.]

SANCTUARY, RIGHT OF (Jus asylo-rum). The right to take refuge in a church. Similar rights existed both in Mosaic and in pagan times, and they in some cases extended not only to altars and churches but to persons and things such as statues and standards. (Suetonius, Vita Tiberii, c. 37; Tacitus, Annal. iii. 60). The privilege of affording refuge was conceded to the church from the first ages of the emperors becoming Christian. The codes both of Theodosius and of Justinian contain imperial constitutions for the control of this privilege. In later times the right has been abolished as having led to great abuses. The church was the seat of the bishop, and though the idea of sanctuary was not new, yet Christianity very early felt that the bishop was the natural refuge of those who were in trouble. [INTERCESSION, p. 864.] It was in fact part of the bishop's duty to intercede for those in trouble; and for this reason those who (whether justly or unjustly) had occasion to fear the civil law took refuge in the church. A decree that follows the fifty-sixth canon of the fourth synod of Carthage in 399 enacts that the bishops Epigonius and Vincent should be sent to the emperor to beg for the churches the right of asylum. This seems to shew that the right of sanctuary did not inherently reside in a church, but that it was a specific concession on the part of the civil power. Legal refuge was in point of fact nothing but the intercession of the clergy for men in distress, and, pending the issue of their efforts, the right to protect them from violence. It was in no way intended to obstruct justice, although in course of time it became so abused. A law of Justinian's distinctly affirms this position: "Templorum cautela non nocentibus, sed laesis datur a lege." Sanctuary was intended to be a shelter for the innocent, the weak, and the misunderstood, and not a refuge for systematic or determined criminals.

The right of sanctuary at first attached only to the altar and nave of the church; but in 431 it was decreed by Theodosius II. that the right should be extended also to the court, the gardens, and in fact to the entire precinct of the church.

There is a lengthy edict "concerning those who take refuge in the church" issued by the emperors Theodosius and Valentinian, from which the following passage may be quoted as shewing the boundaries to which the right of sanctuary extended in early times. "Let the temples [vaot] of the great God be open for those who are in fear, and let the common altar [βαυός] receive the suppliants who fly to it; and let no menace presume to remove the divine aid, which is offered to all alike from its abodes.

* Apparently given in Mr. Parker's Photograph No. 1801, and if so, very dubious as to meaning.

In our times, then, we decree to grant for the safety of fugitives not only the divine sanctuaries [θυσιαστήρια] and the oratory of the people [ἐκκλησίον τοῦ λαοῦ, al. ναοῦ, i.e. the nave] which is fenced with a girdle of quadrangular walls; but whatever spot there happens to be beyond these, as far as the extreme doors of the church, where those who intend to pray first enter—we determine that it be an altar of mercy to the fugitive . . . and that the precincts next to the public property about the first doors of the holy church, whether they be in houses or in gardens, or in courts or in baths, or even in porches, shelter fugitives who enter them, just as the inmost part of the church would.” (Labbe, Concil. iii. 1235, ed. Paris, 1671.)

The privilege at first rested on imperial authority; but it contributed so much to the obvious advantage of the church that it was afterwards confirmed by the pope (Pegge on Asylum in Archæologia, vol. viii. p. 13). Boniface V., who became pope in 609, enacted (Platina, Vitæ Pontificum) that “criminals who fled to churches should not be taken thence by force.” From one expression, “quovis crimine patrato,” it appears that no crime was bad enough to exclude a fugitive from the protection of the church (Archæologia, vol. viii. p. 10). This, however, was afterwards modified. Gaillard (Hist. de Charlemagne, tom. iii. p. 80, ap. Pegge), writes: “All churches before the time of Charlemagne were asyla and for all sorts of criminals; but he, by a capitular, A.D. 779, conformable to one of Carloman and Pepin passed about 744, decreed that churches should not be asyla for criminals who had committed such crimes as the law punished with death; and if he did not go so far as to make it lawful to force a criminal from his asylum, yet, what came to the same thing, he prohibited people from giving them any nourishment.”

As to the privilege of sanctuary in Britain, the following particulars are collected by Pegge, u. s. p. 16 ff.). In Druidism certain sacred trees were held to be asyla (Evelyn, Sylva, p. 614). Suspicion attaches to the stories which have been repeated by some historians that the Christian king Lucius (A.D. 180) conferred the privilege of sanctuary upon the church of Winchester, and that Sebert, the first Christian king of Essex (A.D. 604) did the same for the church of Westminster. Ina, king of Wessex, about A.D. 690, enacts that, “if a person who has committed a capital offence shall fly to a church, he shall preserve his life and make satisfaction as right requires. If any one deserving of stripes shall fly to a church, the punishment shall be forgiven him.”

The obligation on the part of the fugitive to make composition for his crime [REDEMPTION] was decreed by the council of Mentz in 813: “Reum confugientem ad ecclesiam nemo abstrahere audeat . . . tamen legitime componat quod inique fecit.”

The early centuries of Christianity furnish many interesting incidents in connexion with the right of sanctuary. A phrase of St. Ambrose's shews that the altar was the particular spot to which the right of asylum especially belonged. He uses the expression “nec altaria tenebo.” It was one of the complaints against the violent Eutychian party that they had violated this right of sanctuary, and dragged their orthodox opponents from their refuge to massacre them. St. Chrysostom, in the troubles which he incurred by his championship of orthodoxy, availed himself of refuge at the altar.

In the time of Justinian a period of thirty days was allowed for sanctuary. In later times it became much less. The Code of Theodosius denies the right of sanctuary to public debtors, that is, those who defrauded the state. Private debtors were allowed the privilege. Converted Jews who pretended to be Christians in order to escape their debts or due punishment were excepted. Apostates and heretics were denied the privilege, and the same prohibition was imposed on runaway slaves and men who had been guilty of heinous crimes. King Childbert II., when inviting two men to quit their refuge in the church of Soissons, professes that “it is wicked to punish men that have been dragged from the church, even though they be guilty”) S. Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. lib. ix. cap. 38). Miracle is alleged in vindication of an outrage upon the right of sanctuary. A runaway slave takes refuge in the church of St. Lupus. His master, with much profane language, would drag him out; when his tongue is rendered powerless, and he can only produce a sound like the lowing of cattle (S. Greg. Turon. Lib. de Gloria Confessorum, cap. 67). The shelter of the church made a king feel quite secure against the poniard of the assassin. Guntram, who became one of the four kings of the Franks in 561, with his throne at Arles, thought his usual guard unnecessary in the church; and though the sanctuary of the church did not save him from attack, yet it saved his would-be assassin, for it was thought to be a violation of the right of asylum to put to death one who had been dragged from the church (S. Greg. Turon. Hist. Francorum, lib. ix. cap. 3).

The text-book on the subject is a small book by Rittershusius, Ἀσυλία, hoc est, De jure Asylorum, Argentorati, 1624. The treatise will be found in Critici Sacri, vol. viii. See the excellent tract by Rev. Sam. Pegge in Archæologia, vol. viii., giving a history of asylum down to its abolition under James I. [H. T. A.]

SANCTUS, July 26, martyr, native of Ravenna in the reign of Marcus Antoninus (Basil. Menol.) [C. H.]

SANCTUS. [PREFACE.]

SANDAPILARII. [OBSEQUIES, ix. p. 1431.]

SANGARA, or ANGARA, NOVATION CONCIL OF, in Bithynia (SANGARENSE CONCILIIUM), A.D. 391, at which the then Novatian bishop, Marcian, called upon one of his presbyters, a converted Jew, named Sabbatius, to defend his views about keeping Easter. After hearing him, it was voted an open question, so that each might keep Easter as he would. This decision suggested to Socrates, the historian who reports it, his well-known chapter on things indifferent. (E. H. v. 21, 22; comp. Mansi, iii. 699; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 367.) [E. S. FF.]

SANTONENSE CONCILIIUM. [SAINTES.]

SAPIENTIA (SOPHIA), Aug. 1, martyr with her children Fides, Spes, Caritas (Mart. Usuard.; Cal. Armen.); Sept. 17 (Cal. Byzant.); Sept. 16 (Basil. Menol.); commemorated June 23 at Nicomedia (Notker.); July 1 at Rome (Flor.).

SARABAITAE were such monks as lived under no settled monastic rule, but collected in little groups of two or three, generally in some populous place, where they found purchasers for their wares, which they sold at more than the market value in consequence of their supposed sanctity. They seem, according to Jerome (Epist. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 15), to have practised all the arts whereby a reputation for sanctity with the vulgar may be won, in dress, appearance, and gesture, while they disparaged those who led more regular lives. The Egyptians called them (says Jerome, u. s.) Remboth or Remoboth. Cassian also (Collat. 18, c. 7) draws an unfavourable picture of them. (Bingham, Antiq. VII. ii. 4.)

SARABALLA, SARABARA. This word, which represents some article of Persian dress, is merely the transliteration of the Chaldee

סַרְבָּלָא, occurring Dan. iii. 21, 27 [94 Vulg.]. The exact meaning is doubtful, but it is most probably to be explained of some kind of hose or other covering of the leg. Thus the Vulgate, in the former of the two passages, renders the word by braccae, and Symmachus by ἀναξυρίδες. A full discussion of the meaning of the Biblical word does not fall within our province—reference may be made to Gesenius, Thesaurus, s. v. The occurrences of the word in the fathers do not help us much, for either they are references to the above passages of Daniel, with the word merely reproduced, or we are distinctly told that the meaning of the word is uncertain. We find the word in Tertullian, with the spelling sarabara (de Orat. 15, de Res. Carnis 58 [of the Three Children]; de Pallio 4 [of Alexander the Great after his eastern conquests]). Jerome adopts the spelling saraballa, or sarabala, and speaks of that with an r as corrupt (Comm. in Dan., in loc.; Patrol. xxv. 508: see also Epist. i. ad Innoc., ib. xxii. 329). Jerome explains the word as meaning coverings for the legs, but we find a curious difference in the explanation of Isidore (Etym. xix. 23. 2), that they are “fluxa ac sinuosa vestimenta,” and that in the opinion of some they are coverings of the head, “qualia videmus in capite magorum picta.” (Cf. also Aug. de Magistro, c. 10; Patrol. xxxii. 1214. Reference may also be made to Ducange’s Glossary, s. v.)

SARAGOSSA, EIGHTEEN MARTYRS OF. Apr. 16 (Mart. Usuard.; Boll. Acta SS. Apr. ii. 406); Apr. 15 (Mart. Adon., the names being somewhat different: Mart. Hieron., the names much different; Mart. Rom.). [C. H.]

SARAGOSSA, COUNCILS OF (CAESARAUGUSTANA CONCILIA). Three are reported.

(1) A.D. 380, or a year earlier or later, according to some: for which Sulpitius Severus (Hist. ii. 47) vouches as having been held against the Priscillianists, and resulted in the condemnation of two bishops, Instantius and Salvianus, and two laymen, Elpidius and Priscillian himself.

“Additum etiam, ut si quis damnatos in communionem recepisset, sciret in se eandem sententiam promendam.” This is the only part of his statement which connects it with the eight canons that have been assigned it, as they are, virtually, the words of the fifth canon. The rest are by no means as “plainly directed against the Priscillianists” as Hefele requires his readers to believe. The preface to them makes only twelve bishops present at their passing. Sulpitius makes his synod attended also by the bishops of Aquitaine (Mansi, iii. 633–40; Hefele, ii. 292, Eng. tr.).

(2) A.D. 592, when three canons were passed, all suggested by the conversions from Arianism that were taking place, and passed in general by those who had subscribed by themselves or their representatives to the third council of Toledo, three years before. Artemius, metropolitan of Tarragona, who had been represented there by his presbyter Stephen, presided now; and most of the eleven bishops who subscribed now subscribed then. Two more who subscribed then sent their representatives (Mansi, x. 471–4).

(3) A.D. 691, by order of king Egica, as we learn from the preface. Five canons or chapters were passed, the fifth of which, referring to the fifth canon of the thirteenth council of Toledo, and confirming it, decrees further that the widows of kings shall take the veil and enter the cloister without delay. But who presided or who subscribed on this occasion, is not stated. It may be observed also that neither of these two last councils appear in the pseudo-Isidorian collection (Mansi, xii. 41–46). [E. SARAH, the wife of Abraham, Aug. 19 (Cal. Ethiop.). [C. H.]

SARAPION. [SERAPION.]

SARBELUS, Jan. 29, martyr under Trajan (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

SARCILIS. A kind of woollen garment, mentioned together with cappae and camisiles in the Rule of Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, according to the text as given by Labbe (c. 29, vol. vii. 1458). Here it is ruled that clerics of higher standing have either sarciles or wool sufficient to make them a couple for the year’s use, and clerics of lower standing are to have one each. It must be stated that the text given by D’Achéry (Spicilegium, i. 235 [here the chapter on Vestments is 41]; reprinted, Patrol. lxxxix. 1075) omits the mention of the sarciles. In a capitulary of Charlemagne of A.D. 813 (c. 19, vol. i. 510, ed. Baluzius), it is ordered that female servants of the Imperial household are to receive wool and flax to make “sarciles (al. sarcillos) et camisiles.” [R. S.]

SARCOPHAGUS. [SCULPTURE.]

SARDICA, COUNCIL OF. (1) Socrates (H. E. ii. 20) and Sozomen (H. E. iii. 11.) state expressly that the council of Sardica (the modern Sophia, in Bulgarian, Triaditza) was held in the eleventh year after the death of Constantine, i. e. A.D. 347. But the fragments discovered by

Scipio Maffei place the second return of Athanasius to Alexandria in the year 346, and we know from Athanasius himself that this return was two years after the council of Sardica. Mansi therefore (iii. 87 ff) places the council in the year 344. The nineteenth of the Festal Letters of Athanasius, that for the Easter of 347, was certainly written in Alexandria. On the whole, it seems necessary to accept the year 344 or the end of 343, as the true date of the council. [See ATHANASIUS in DICT. CHR. BIOG. p. 190.]

(2) That the council of Sardica was summoned by the emperors Constans and Constantius is clear from its own encyclical (in Athanasius, Apol. c. Arrian. c. 44); and that it was summoned at the desire of Paulus and Athanasius is stated both by Socrates and Sozomen (u. s.). Julius, bishop of Rome, was represented by two legates; Hosius of Cordova was president. At the very outset, however, as the Western bishops insisted on giving Athanasius a seat and a voice, the Easterns separated and held a rival council at Philippopolis, where they confirmed the deposition of Athanasius, and drew up a creed in accordance with the fourth symbol of ANTIOCH [p. 93]. It is evident that after this separation the council had no claim to be called oecumenical. The Trullan council (c. 2) adopted the canons of Sardica (as it did those of Carthage and others which have no pretensions to be oecumenical), as of authority in the Eastern as well as the Western church: but they have never been formally recognised as oecumenical. Nay, the Roman censors obelised the passage of Alexander Natalis (H. E. saec. iv., tom. iv. p. 460, ed. Venet. 1778) in which he had expressly stated the council to be oecumenical. This question has been the more hotly debated, as canons 3, 4, 7 [Greek 5] gave to deposed bishops the privilege of appealing to Julius, bishop of Rome. It seems doubtful, however, whether the council intended to do more than confer on Julius a personal privilege, as an expedient for a time of trouble and division [APPEAL, p. 197; POPE, p. 1658]. The canons of Sardica in Western MSS. are commonly appended to those of Nicaea (Maassen, Geschichte der Quellen des canonischen Rechts, i. 50 ff.) [C.]

SARDINIA, COUNCIL OF (SARDINIENSE CONCILIUM), A.D. 521, composed of African bishops then in exile there. Their synodical letter, in reply to John Maxentius and his Scythian monks, on the grace of God and human freewill, is said to have been written by St. Fulgentius (Mansi, viii. 591-600). [E. S. Ff.]

SATAN. (See DEVIL, DEMON, DRAGON, SERPENT.) The evil spirit is represented in his special character, as tempter and enemy of man, in the Book of Kells, in a temptation of our Lord. (Westwood, Anglo-Saxon and Irish MSS.) He is there a black skeleton-goblin with a tail, almost according to modern fancy. In the Psalter of Utrecht (Ps. cix. 6) he is drawn, "standing at the right hand" of the wicked man, apparently in the sense of prevailing over him. Satan is seizing him by the hair from behind, and kicking him with supernatural violence and demoniacal relish in the small of the back. (See Mr. Birch's account of the Utrecht Psalter, p. 264.) Compare DEMON, p. 543, and DEVIL, p. 547. [R. St. J. T.]

SATURDAY. [SABBATH; SABBATUM; WEEK.]

SATURNINUS (1), Jan. 31, martyr with Thyrsus and Victor; commemorated at Alexandria (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Notker., Wand.).

(2) Feb. 2, martyr with Perpetua, Felicitas, and others; commemorated at Tuburum in Africa (Basil. Menol.); Mar. 14 (Basil. Menol., here SATURNILUS); Mar. 7 (Mart. Usuard., Hieron.).

(3) Feb. 12, presbyter, martyr with Dativus and Felix, in Africa (Mart. Usuard.).

(4) Ap. 27, one of seven bandit chiefs, said to have been converted by Jason and Sosipater, disciples of St. Paul (Basil. Menol.).

(5) May 2, martyr with Neopolis; commemorated at Alexandria (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Notker.).

(6) July 7, martyr in the reign of Trajan (Basil. Menol., SATURNILUS; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.).

(7) Aug. 22, martyr; commemorated with Martialis, Epictetus, and others, at Portus Romanus (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Hieron.).

(8) Oct. 6, martyr; commemorated at Capua with Marcellus, Castus, and Emilium (Mart. Usuard., Hieron., Notker.).

(9) Nov. 29, martyr, under Maximian; commemorated at Rome on the Via Salaria with Sisinnius deacon (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Wand.). The Mart. Hieron. adds as his companions Chrysanthus, Daria, Maurus, who are named with Saturninus in the Gelasian Sacramentary in all the special prayers for his commemoration. In the Gregorian Sacramentary the name of Saturninus occurs without the others in the Secreta and Super Oblata.

(10) Nov. 29, martyr at Toulouse in the reign of Decius (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Flor., Hieron.).

(11) Dec. 23, martyr in Crete with Theodulus and others in the reign of Decius (Basil. Menol.). [C. H.]

SATYRIANUS (SATIRIANUS), Oct. 16, martyr with Martianus in the Vandal persecution in Africa (Mart. Usuard., Vet. Rom., Notker.). [C. H.]

SATYRUS (1), Jan. 12, (SATURUS) Arabian martyr; commemorated in Achaia (Mart. Bed., Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Hieron.); in Arabia (Notker.).

(2) Feb. 2, martyr with Saturninus, Perpetua, and others [SATURNINUS (2)].

(3) Mar. 29, martyr in Africa under Genseric (Mart. Usuard., Adon., Vet. Rom., Notker.). [C. H.]

SAUCHES. A name applied (says Jerome's Epist. 22 ad Eustoch. c. 15) by the Egyptians to those monks who lived a common life [COENOBIIUM; MONASTERY]. [C.]

SAULA, Oct. 20, virgin, martyr; commemorated at Cologne with Martha and others (Mart. Usuard.). [C. H.]

SAURCI, COUNCIL OF (SAURICIACUM CONCILIUM), A.D. 589, allowing Droctégisile, bishop of Soissons, to return to his diocese, from which he had been driven by the bishops of his province for drunkenness four years before (Mansi, ix. 1009). [E. S. Ff.]

SAVINA, ST. [SABINA (2).]

SCAPULARE. A garment to cover the shoulders (scapulae), specially in use among monks. The Rule of St. Benedict provided that his monks were to have a scapulare propter opera (c. 55, Patrol. lvi. 771). This regulation is cited in the letter written to Charlemagne by Paul the deacon, acting on behalf of Theodemar, abbot of Monte Cassino (Patrol. xc. 1588). The writer adds that the dress in question is worn by almost all rustics in that country. It appears therefore during the hours of work to have replaced the hood or cowl, as being shorter and more convenient.

We may compare, as more or less equivalent to it in Greek, ἀνάλαβος, ἐπωμίον, ἐπωμόδιον, κατανωτίον. See especially Ménard's notes to the Concordia Regularum (c. 62, Patrol. ciii. 1231). [R. S.]

SCEPTRE. [CORONATION.]

SCUEOPHYLACIUM. Another name for the Diaconicum, or sacristy, as being the repository of the utensils for divine service, τὰ ἱερασκεύη, and the vestments of the priests, from which they were brought by the deacons before the commencement of the rites, and to which they were carried back again by the same minister after their conclusion, or during the singing of the post-communion hymn (Chron. Alexandr. p. 892; Cotel. in Const. Apost. lib. viii. c. 12; Goar, Eucholog. p. 16; Pallad. Vit. S. Chrysost. 92). The ancient liturgies contain special prayers to be said by the ministers in this place. That of St. James gives, εὐχή λεγόμενη ἐν τῷ σκευοφυλακίῳ μετὰ τὴν ἀπόλυσιν. In the scueophylacia of the chief churches were deposited copies of the imperial edicts and laws (Novell. Justin. 8, Edict. 1, in Praefat.). (See Ducange, Constantinop. Christian. lib. iii. § 87.) [DIACONICUM.] [E. V.]

SCUEOPHYLAX. An ecclesiastical officer in the Eastern church corresponding to the sacrista in the Western, to whom was committed the charge of the vessels, utensils, and vestments belonging to divine service. Such an officer is spoken of as κειμηλιάρχης, φύλας τῶν κειμηλίων (Soz. H. E. v. 8), φύλας τῶν ἱερῶν κειμηλίων (Eustath. Vit. S. Eutych. § 8), or κρατῶν τὰ σκεύη τῆς ἐκκλησίας. The authorities given by Ducange (sub voc.) shew that though the care of the sacred furniture was more commonly entrusted to a deacon, it was not unusual for a presbyter to hold the office. The church of St. Sophia at Constantinople had a large number of scueophylaces attached to it, some of whom were presbyters, some deacons, others readers, of whom the chief was called ὁ μέγας σκευοφύλαξ. These were reduced by Heraclius (610–641) to ten, four presbyters, and six deacons (Codin. de Offic. p. 112, ed. Bonn). The "great scueophylax" was always a leading ecclesiastic. Codinus places him (ibid. c. 1) in the first rank of the officers of the church, having a seat in the holy synod with the patriarch himself. Macedonius was scueophylax when he was elected to the see of Constantinople (Theod. Lect. H. E. ii.). When the patriarch celebrated, the great scueophylax stood before the scueophylacium, and supplied him with all that was needful for the service—vessels, books, candles, &c. It was also his duty to take care of the ecclesiastical utensils of churches deprived of their bishop by death, and to see that all the churches of the city had what was needful for divine service (Gretser, Annotat. ad Codin. p. 112; Suicer, sub voc.). [E. V.]

SCHOLA CANTORUM. At Rome, in early days, there was established a school for the education of youths in ecclesiastical chant and sacred learning, who should be able to sing the solemn offices at the several churches of the city on great occasions. It was governed by an officer of great dignity and consideration in the city, who was variously called primicerius, prior scholae cantorum, or simply cantor. The origin of this school has been sometimes thought to be due to Hilarus (ob. A.D. 467), the successor of Leo the Great in the see of Rome. Sometimes it is traced to pope Sylvester (Bona, Rer. Lit. I. xxv. 20). In the Life of St. Gregory the Great, however, written by John the Deacon, the creation of the school is expressly attributed to this great reformer of the church's song himself. In any case, St. Gregory endowed the school—which, if it existed before, depended on a common fund—and constructed a residence for it. His aim appears to have been to abrogate the practice which hitherto had, in some degree at least, prevailed, of the ministers and deacons themselves executing (often inefficiently, as it appears) the singers' part. (See Conc. Rom. A.D. 595; Decret. Greg. cap. i.) From Rome the institution spread to other churches, so that by the time of Charlemagne we find mention of a schola cantorum at Lyons (Ledrad, Archiepisc. Lugd. in Ep. ad Car. Mag.). In this school of Lyons several became so learned, says their archbishop, that they could even instruct others. It was Pipin, the father and predecessor of Charlemagne, who first took measures for the introduction of Roman chanters into France to instruct the Gallicans, who appear to have been far less skilled in the execution of their church music. In a letter of Paul I. to Pipin, the writer has handed to posterity even the name of the master of one singing-school thus established, as Simeon, who is described as scholae cantorum Priori. Amongst the several schools which thus came into being, that of Metz seems speedily to have acquired distinction. For in the time of Charlemagne, we find this boast of a Frank monk, that, "in proportion as the Roman chant surpassed that of Metz, so that of Metz surpassed that of the other schools of the French." Charlemagne himself ordered the establishment of such schools in suitable places throughout his empire, with the object of setting bishops and presbyters free from the necessity of attending to the music, and so enabling them to execute their offices with the greater seemliness and dignity after the Roman model ("sicut psallit Romana ecclesia"). A school of a somewhat similar character appears to have existed in Africa two hundred years before Gregory the Great. In the Arian persecutions, twelve of the children of such a school were tortured to make them renounce the orthodox faith, and were much thought of at Carthage for the strenuous resistance which they made (Bona, Rer. Lit. I. xxv. 20).

The course of instruction is described in the phrase, "pueri in cantu, lectione, et moribus sacris instituebantur," and the life of the house by "in communi vivebant" (Petr. Episc. Urb. in Schol. ad Vit. Leonis IV.). To the instruction Charlemagne adds, "computum, grammaticam" (capit. i. 72).

Persons who afterwards rose to distinction were members of the school. Sergius I., on coming to Rome as a youth, was put into the Schola Cantorum—"quia studiosus erat et capax in officio cantilenae" (Anastasius, Vit.). The same writer records a similar history of Sergius II., Gregory II., Stephen III., and Paul I.

In the time of Stephen VI. we find that the house of the Schola Cantorum "used formerly to be called Orphanotrophium." This term may perhaps indicate that the house also served as a receptacle for the destitute children who fell to the care of the church. By the time of pope Sergius II. (A.D. 844) it appears that the house of the Schola Cantorum had fallen into a state of dilapidation from its excessive age ("prae nimia vetustate paene in ruinam posita atque contracta"). Pope Sergius restored it to a better condition than ever. (Sergii Vita, ap. Labbe, vii. 1796 D, ed. Par. 1671.)

The intention was that the Schola Cantorum should absorb all gifted boys—"in quacunque schola reperti fuerint bene psallentes pueri, tolluntur inde et mittuntur in Schola Cantorum" (rubric in Salzburg pontifical. ap. Martene I. viii. xi. ordo 9). Martene infers from a decree of Gregory the Great that the school included subdeacons and other inferior ministers (De Ant. Eccl. Rit. IV. v. 15). Gregory, however, does not explicitly say so (lib. iv. ep. 44).

An imperial constitution of Louis the Pious is indirectly a witness to the influence exercised by the Schola Cantorum. It is giving directions for the reverent execution of the Psalms in divine service; and in order to secure this end, senior brethren of unexceptionable life are to be appointed "to be in turns with the Schola Cantorum at the prescribed time" (Ludovici Pii Reform. Eccl. de Regula Clericorum, cap. xxiv. ap. Melchior Goldastus, ed. Frankf. 1673, tom. iii. p. 217).

The Schola Cantorum at Rome appears not to have furnished the choir on all great occasions; for example, not at the Stations (when the regionarii did it) nor at the Lateran Church, but only when the pope officiated—"alii (subdiaconi) qui dicuntur Schola Cantorum, qui tantum tantummodo quando summus Pontifex celebrare consuevit" (Martene, de Antiq. Eccl. Rit. I. iii. 8). At ordination in the city of Rome, the schola repeated the litany and sang the Introit (Salzburg pontifical, ap. Martene, I. viii. xi. ordo 9.)

The praecentors of the responsories were in the Roman church taken from the Schola Cantorum. Thomasius quotes from a MS. antiphonary of the Vatican Library a statement that "the usage was for the master of the school to point out to each individual, the day before, what responsory he was to sing in the night office." [H. T. A.]

SCHOLASTICA, Feb. 10, virgin, sister of St. Benedict; commemorated at Castrum Cassinum (Mart. Usuard., Notker., Wand.). [C. H.]

SCHOLASTICUS. (a) The title of a class of Roman lawyers or advocates in the 4th and 5th centuries, against whose exactions and extortions from their clients provisions are enacted in the Codex Theodos. (Lib. viii. tit. 10; tom. ii. p. 598, edit. 1665).

(b) There is a passage in the writings of Gregory the Great in which the composition of the Roman canon of the mass is attributed to a certain scholasticus (Epist. ad Johan. Episc. Syracusanum, lib. ix. ep. xii. indict. 2). It is disputed whether the word as here used is the proper name of an otherwise unknown individual, or whether it refers to a member of the body of professional men called "Scholastici" (Bona, de Rebus Liturg. lib. ii. cap. xi.).

(c) The instructor of the younger members of a monastery was called "Scholasticus," or "Caput scholae." The position and duties of this office are described by Thomassinus (Vetus et Nova Eccles. Disciplina, edit. 1706, vol. i. p. 865). [F. E. W.]

SCHOOLMASTER (Magister Scholae, Scholasticus, Caput Scholae, Capischolus (in France sometimes Capiscolus). Very few Christians during the first four centuries, appeared to have belonged to the profession of the "grammatici" or the "rhetores," as teachers of the traditional pagan learning. Of this, the comparative rarity of Christian monumental inscriptions which distinguish the name recorded as that of a "grammaticus" is significant evidence. Passionei [Inscrizioni antiche (Lucena, 1763), p. 115] gives one of these rare exceptions; and Martianus, a presbyter of the sect of the Novatians, is mentioned by Socrates (H. E. iv. 9) as teaching γραμματικούς λόγους to the two daughters of the emperor Valens. But, in general, the necessity under which those who adopted this profession found themselves of expounding the pagan mythology and observing the pagan festivals, seems to have deterred the Christian teacher from entering upon such a career [see SCHOOLS, II.].

The appointed teacher of a school, from the 5th century onwards, whether monastic or episcopal, was generally known as the "scholasticus," or, in France, as the "capischolus," or "capiscolus." In the cathedral schools he was always selected from the body of the canons, (among whom he was known as "Caput Scholae" or "Magister Scholae"), and was generally one of the senior members, and one whose character and life were especially approved (Keuffel, Hist. Scholarum, pp. 248-249). The "Magister Scholae" is mentioned among seven officials at the church of St. Martin of Tours, known as the "hebdomadarii," who, in turn, once a week, were called upon to celebrate "majorem missam" (Martene, de Ant. Ecc. Ritibus, i. 120).

SCHOOLS. Education among Christian communities during the first eight centuries successively assumes four very distinct phases. First, as limited to instruction in the special tenets of the Christian faith, and altogether dissociated from secular education; secondly, as combined with pagan culture, and aiming at a partial reconciliation of the traditions of that culture with its own; thirdly, as altogether abandoning any such attempt, and restricting itself to religious doctrine, and to the acquirements directly subservient to the purposes of the clerical or the monastic life; fourthly, as resuming in some measure the earlier and more liberal conception, and manifesting an activity productive of important after-results.

I. Of the Christian bishop of the primitive Church it was required, not only that he should himself be "apt to teach," but also that he should provide for the spiritual instruction of his flock. For this purpose he was wont to select, after the custom of pagan philosophers, those among his disciples who by superior acquirements and the possession of the faculty of teaching seemed specially qualified for the work. The method of instruction was catechetical, and a good specimen of its character and range will be found in the Κατηχήσεις Φωτισομένων, or lectures to catechumens, delivered in A.D. 348 by Cyril, afterwards bishop of Jerusalem, when still only a presbyter (Migne, Patr. Series Graeca, xxxiii. 356). The subjects of his discourses, such as the Second Coming of Christ, the Holy Spirit, the Incarnation, Divine Providence, &c., shew that they were designed for those who had passed beyond the elementary stage of doctrinal knowledge. Augustine, in like manner, at a somewhat later period, was accustomed to draw around him in his episcopal house the most promising of the younger clergy, and instruct them in the Scriptures, those who had been thus privileged being specially sought after to fill the different offices of the Church in Africa (Possidius, Vita Aug. c. xi.).

From this method of systematic instruction by the bishop, the school as a distinct institution was a natural development. Of their organisation and method of instruction an account will be found under CATECHUMENS; and a full description of the most celebrated of their number in ALEXANDRIA, CATECHETICAL SCHOOL OF. Origen, when driven from Alexandria, founded such a school at Caesarea in Palestine; it fell into decay, but was restored by his friend Pamphilus, who bestowed on it a valuable library (Eusebius, H. E. vii. 27 and 30). Other examples are perhaps to be recognised in a school established at Jerusalem by Clemens Alexandrinus, about the year 209, over which Cyril, above mentioned, subsequently presided; in that which Rhodon (the last teacher of the school at Alexandria*) founded in the reign of Theodosius the Great at Sida in Pamphylia (Guerike, Schol. Alex. i. 118); in that which it has been supposed Irenaeus founded at Lugdunum (Langemark, Hist. Catech. i. 108); and in that which Tertullian (de Baptismo, c. 18) appears to imply existed at Carthage in the 3rd century.

Of such institutions the one at Alexandria may be accepted as the type, and from that distinguished centre Christian education mainly derived its inspiration during the first three centuries. In Alexandria itself, however, the instruction soon advanced beyond the purely dogmatic character; the dangers with which the faith was menaced by Jewish and pagan opponents, and by the heresies of the Gnostics almost necessarily imposing on the Christian teacher the obligation of assuming a wider range both of culture and teaching.

With respect to the foregoing kind of instruction, it is important to observe generally that it forms a characteristic feature of early Christianity, the education of youth being confided to the ministers of religion. Among pagan communities, whether Greek or Roman, the functions of the priestly office were limited to the superintendence of religious ceremonial or the interpretation of signs and oracles; of any instruction of the people in the traditions of their faith we find no trace.

II. The views expressed by the earlier teachers of the Church with respect to the abstract value of pagan learning are somewhat vague and often conflicting in character. It is obvious, however, that the general conditions under which Christianity existed at this period were such as to render any attempt at founding separate schools of general instruction unadvisable if not impossible. Those parents, therefore, among the Christian community, who could afford the expense, sent their sons to the gymnasium, under the care of a paedagogus, to share with pagan youth the ordinary instruction of the time. This fact is one which must not be lost sight of in any endeavour to estimate the influences under which the teaching of the earlier Fathers was conceived.

In the first century, intercourse with Greece had already somewhat extended the narrow limits of Roman education both in Italy and in Gaul (Horace, Sat. i. vi. 71; Epp. II. ii. 41), and the elementary acquirements of reading, writing, and arithmetic, were followed by a certain amount of instruction in the Greek language and literature. Quintilian (I. i. 12), indeed, advises that such instruction should precede the study of the Latin tongue, inasmuch as a command of the latter could be acquired without any formal teaching whatever; and we learn from Tacitus (de Claris Orat. c. 29) that, probably with the same view, it was customary for the children of the wealthy to have a Greek nurse.

In the days of the empire schools were of two kinds—an elementary and a higher grade. At the elementary school (that of the "grammatista," "magister," or "litterator," styled by Tertullian (de Pallio, c. 5) "litterarum primus informator") the scholars were taught to read intelligently, and with correct accentuation the poets and orators (Quint. I. i. 24; I. viii. 1), and also acquired a certain knowledge of grammar (ib. I. iv. 22). A higher degree of instruction was imparted at the schools of the "grammaticus" and "rhetor." The former explained difficulties, expounded the plots of plays and poems, and gave outlines of histories ("quaestiones explicet, historias exponat, poemata enarret," ib. I. ii. 14), while the scholars translated passages from Greek into Latin and then back again into Greek. Under the guidance of the rhetor they composed themes and declamations (chiefly lifeless and mechanical imitations of standard authors), the whole training of these schools being almost exclusively conceived with reference to the requirements of the forensic orator (Tacitus, de Claris Orat. c. 35; Suetonius, de Claris Rhet. c. 1; Pliny, Ep. i. 13; v. 3; vii. 17; viii. 12 and 26). The authors studied were chiefly Homer and Vergil; the lyric poets, especially Horace, Menander, and Terence; the Sentences of Publius Syrus; the orators, Demosthenes, Cicero, and Caius Gracchus; the historians, Thucydides, Cato, and Sallust. Beyond this no scheme of study has come down to us, and it is probable that the teacher selected his authors at his own discretion.

* That the catechetical school of Alexandria had ceased to exist with the close of the fifth century appears. as Guerike points out, to be a necessary inference from Cassiodorus, Praef. ad Inst. Div. Litt. Migne, Patr. lxx. 537.

Such was the character of the education that prevailed throughout the more civilised parts of the empire during the first three centuries. Liberally aided and endowed by the state in successive enactments of Hadrian, Marcus Aurelius, Vespasian, Valentinian I., Gratian, and Theodosius, it was far too generally diffused and too essential a condition of success in social and public life to admit of its rejection by the Christians of those days. The recognition of Christianity by the state does not appear to have produced any sudden change in these conditions. The schools of the empire, as they were termed, not only continued to exist, but maintained their traditions of education unmodified. At Athens, where the two schools (one for rhetoric, the other for philosophy) founded by Marcus Aurelius represented a kind of university, were gathered many of the most aspiring intellects of the time. Diodorus of Tarsus, Gregory Nazianzen,^c St. Basil, and the emperor Julian attended the same school, and perhaps sat together on the same bench (Baronius, iii. 687; Basil, Ep. 146). The author of the Greek Life of Gregory tells us that he and Basil culled the flower of rhetoric while avoiding the falsity of the art (Migne, Series Graeca, xxxv. 256). He also states that their studies included grammar, philosophy, music, geometry, and astronomy.

The system of instruction pursued at Athens seems to have formed the model for the higher instruction throughout the empire. A similar though less famous school at Rome, founded by the emperor Hadrian, was known as the Athenaeum. Here, in the time of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, Hadrian the sophist taught with great success, and after him, Aspasius.

^b It is important to remember that throughout our period the term "grammaticus" denoted something much more than a teacher of grammar in the modern sense, being really equivalent to a teacher of belles-lettres. See Gräfenhan, Gesch. d. classischen Philologie im Alterthum, iv. 52, 53; Mullinger, Schools of Charles the Great, p. 77.

^c See his poem de Vita Mea, for a description of his college career at Athens.

(Philost. Vitae Sophist. 589, 627). Milan, on account of a like culture, claimed the appellation of "Novae Athenae," and in the time of Theodoric the Great (A.D. 454–526) would appear to have still been distinguished by its forensic orators (Cassiod. Variæ, viii. 19). Cremona and Bergamo enjoyed a like though inferior reputation. The whole of southern Gaul was equally famous, the schools at Marseilles, Autun, Lyons, Bordeaux, Toulouse, and Narbonne being especially celebrated. Those of Carthage were the resort of most students who aspired to distinction either as grammarians or rhetoricians. On the death of the eminent grammarian Euanthius of Constantinople, in 362, one Chrestus was sent for from Africa to fill the vacant chair (Eusebius, Chron. ad ann.).

The office of instructor in pagan schools would appear to have been proscribed by the fathers of the church on account of its intimate connexion with the religious belief and practice of paganism: "Quaerendum autem est," says Tertullian, "etiam de ludi magistris et de caeteris professoribus litterarum, imo non dubitandum affines illos esse multimodae idololatriæ" (de Idol. c. 10; Migne, Patrol. i. 673–675). The pagan schoolmaster, he goes on to say, was constantly under the necessity of referring to the gods of the pagan mythology, of explaining their genealogies and prerogatives, and observing their festivals. At the feast of Flora, it was customary to adorn the schoolroom with garlands; the first payment of a new scholar was devoted to Minerva; the new year, the feasts of the Seven Hills and the summer solstice were all made occasions for the presentation of gifts from the scholar to the "ludi magister."

When, however, it came to a question of the lawfulness of attendance at these schools on the part of the learner, even Tertullian shrank from interdicting the advantages of ordinary education to Christian youth: "Quomodo repudiamus saecularia studia, sine quibus divina esse non possunt?" (ib.). He accordingly decides that the Christian scholar may frequent these schools under the plea of necessity, and he enjoins him to take the good and to reject the bad, "even as one who knowingly receives poison from another who knows it not, but refrains from drinking it." "Hence it was," observes Dr. Newman, "that in the early ages the church allowed her children to attend the heathen schools for the acquisition of secular accomplishments, where, as no one can doubt, evils existed, at least as great evils as can attend on mixed education now. The gravest fathers recommended for Christian youth the use of pagan masters; the most saintly bishops and most authoritative doctors had been sent in their adolescence by Christian parents to pagan lecture halls" (Idea of a University, p. 9).^d

During the first three centuries, therefore, the Christian parent justified himself in sending his sons to pagan schools on the ground of simple necessity; and while Christian doctrine was taught by Christian teachers, secular knowledge was sought in the ordinary channels (Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. III. ii. 923). But in the meantime, the far more difficult question of the desirability of studying, at any period of life, the productions of pagan genius and learning, was debated with considerable ardour, and at the time that Christianity received the recognition of the state, remained still undecided. While a Cyprian insisted on the wide distinction between Christian doctrine and pagan philosophy (ad Anton. Migne, iii. 782), a Celsus reproached his Christian antagonists with their hostility alike to learning, wisdom, and thought (Origen, adv. Cels. bk. vi.). At Alexandria, on the other hand, the study of pagan authors was warmly defended. Clemens cites in its defence the words of Christ (John xv. 1-10), which imply that the vine must be trained and pruned, and the soil cultivated, and argues, that as the physician who studies other arts is thereby better qualified for the profession of his own, so the Christian who familiarises himself with other modes of thought will be all the better able to distinguish the alloy of error from the fine gold of truth (Strom. i. 9; Migne, Series Graeca, viii. 739). These views, says Dr. Newman, were advocated in the early church, "not with the notion that the cultivation which literature gives was any substantial improvement of our moral nature, but as thereby opening the mind and rendering it susceptible of an appeal; not as if the heathen literature itself had any direct connexion with the matter of Christianity, but because it contained in it the scattered fragments of those original traditions which might be made the means of introducing a student to the Christian system, being the ore in which the true metal was found" (Arians, p. 88).

It appears to be beyond doubt that, notwithstanding isolated protests, the education of the clergy throughout the fourth century, and even after that time, continued to be of this more liberal character. Besides the conspicuous instances already noted, we find Jerome, in a remarkable letter to the monk Rusticus, speaking of the education of the latter as having been commenced in Gaul and completed at Rome, "so that the dignity of the Roman discourse might attempt the copiousness and elegance of the Gallic" (Migne, xxii. 935). Of Jerome himself it is to be noted that he received instruction at Rome from Donatus the grammarian (ib. xxiii. 472). Lactantius († aft. 317), Arnobius († circ. 300), Ambrose († 397), Augustine († 430), Hilary of Poitiers († 367), educated at his native city, Hilary of Arles († 449), Sidonius Apollinaris († 489), Salvian († 495), are all examples of ancient writers and ecclesiastics who, while strenuous defenders of Christian doctrine, had received their intellectual training in schools which followed the traditions of pagan culture.

In the meantime the growing importance attached by the church to the whole question of education, is attested by the language of its most eminent teachers. "Parents," says Chrysostom, "will inquire carefully when they hire a herdsman, as to his fitness for the work, but will take little trouble when engaging a tutor for their children, although there is no function of greater importance than this" (Hom. in Matt. ed. BB. vii. 605). Elsewhere (ib. xi. 159), he says that a good education is the best legacy that a parent can bequeath to a son.

This increased interest in the subject was the natural result of the fact that the task of educating the young now began to be more and more confided to the clergy. We find that Julian, when at Macellum, was instructed in the Scriptures by τοῖς ὑφηγηταῖς τῶν ἁγίων Γραφῶν (Sozomen, v. 2); and according to Socrates (H. E. iv. 9) the two daughters of the emperor Valens were instructed by Martianus, a presbyter of the sect of the Novatians, in grammar,—γραμματικούς λόγους.

The policy of Julian (A.D. 361-363) undoubtedly tended to precipitate the decisive struggle as well as to embitter all subsequent discussion of the question. He appears to have noted with displeasure the growing influence of the Christian teacher, and to have sought to convert the scruples of the church with respect to pagan literature into a pretext for excluding her ministers from all share in secular education. The Christian, he asserted, if really convinced that the deities whom the great writers of antiquity worshipped were unworthy of such adoration, could hardly be a fit expounder of the pagan literature. To expound Homer and at the same time denounce what Homer held to be most sacred and venerable, was malevolent and base. He accordingly advised the Christian teachers to restrict themselves to the work of the catechists,^e or, as he expressed it, "to expounding Matthew and Luke in the churches of the Galileans" (Ep. 42; ed. Heyler, p. 81). According to Socrates (H. E. iii. 12; Migne, Series Graeca, lxvii. 412), he also enacted a law excluding Christians from the work of public instruction, and the motive he himself assigned for this enactment is especially deserving of note, namely, that by being thus prevented from acquiring dialectical skill they might be rendered incompetent to contend in argument with their pagan antagonists.

The short reign of Julian was succeeded by that of Valentinian I. (A.D. 364-367), who proclaimed general religious toleration, and that of Gratian (A.D. 367-383), who was the avowed defender of Christianity. The former, in the year 364, rescinded the prohibitory law of Julian (Cod. Theod. ed. Haenel, p. 1322); while the latter, aided by Ausonius, who was of Christian faith, and had taught both as a grammarian and a rhetorician at Bordeaux, reorganised the schools of the empire, and, as far as it lay in his power, sustained and invigorated the traditions of pagan education (ib. vi. tit. 13; Haenel, p. 545; see also pp. 1321, 1322).

A certain dislike and suspicion of the dialectic art is discernible from a very early period in the church. Irenaeus, alluding probably to the Basilidians, complains of those who oppose the faith with an Aristotelian word-chopping (minutiloquium), and excess of refinement in argument (adv. Haer. ii. xviii. 5). Tertullian styles Aristotle "miser" on account of his invention of the traditional logic (de Praescrip. c. 7). Athanasius, in his treatise on the Nicene decrees, speaks of Theognostus as advancing certain opinions with respect to the divine nature, not as his deliberate conviction, but by way of exercise in argument—ὡς ἐν γυμνασίᾳ ἐξερῶν, and implies that Origen sometimes wrote with a like design, ὡς ζητῶν καὶ γυμνάζων (Migne, Series Graeca, xxv. 181 and 183). Eusebius speaks of those who “are ignorant of Christ and adulterate the faith, seeking for that figure of the syllogism which will best support their heresy” (H. E. v. 27). Jerome contrasts the “campum rhetorici eloquii,” the “tendiculae dialectorum,” and the “Aristotelis spineta” with the plain and simple language of Scripture (adv. Helvid. Migne, xxiii. 185). Socrates represents Aetius, the Arian, as relying in argument on the categories of Aristotle (H. E. ii. 25; Migne, Series Graeca, lxvii. 297; see also H. E. v. 10, and Sozomen, H. E. vii. 12). “The two Gregories,” says Dr. Newman (Arians, p. 30), “Basil, Ambrose, and Cyril, protest with one voice against the dialectics of their opponents: and the sum of their declarations is briefly expressed by a writer of the 4th century (Epiphanius, Haer. lxi. 69), who calls Aristotle ‘the bishop of the Arians.’” Even so late as the seventh century we find Theodorus Rhaetensis declaring that his opponent Severus of Antioch estimated a theologian according to his knowledge of the categories, and “of the other refinements of pagan philosophy” (de Incarn. Migne, S. G. xci. 1504).

In the East, owing to the tendency of the Greek and the Oriental mind towards subtle disquisition, this dialectical culture appears to have held its ground much longer than among the Latin races. Socrates the historian, who practised as an advocate in Constantinople, recommends the cultivation of the art as a means of defeating the enemies of the faith with their own weapons, especially, he adds, as the Scriptures themselves do not teach logic (H. E. iii. 16). Eusebius, bishop of Doryleum in the year 441, had, according to Evagrius, taught rhetoric in the public schools, and availed himself of his knowledge of the art in the refutation of Eutyches.

Among the earliest authoritative utterances marking the transition from the pagan to the Christian theory of education is that of St. Basil, who, in his treatise πρὸς τοὺς Νέους (c. 2), distinctly adopts the monastic axiom that all our actions in this life are to be conceived as preparatory to the next. He nevertheless inculcates a certain degree of attention to the best writers of antiquity as sources from whence precepts of excellent morality may be gathered; citing as a precedent the example of Moses, who was learned in all the learning of the Egyptians (cc. 3 and 4; Acts vii. 22).

The language of the Apostolical Constitutions, on the other hand, which were designed for the instruction of catechumens, is authoritative against the reading of pagan authors.^f They enjoin the Christian disciple to “refrain from all the writings of the heathen” (Apost. Const. i. 6; Cotelierus, Pat. Apost. i. 206). [PROHIBITED BOOKS.]

The influence of Ambrose (bishop of Milan, A.D. 374–397) on the literary spirit of his age was comparatively slight, but his writings sufficiently attest his familiarity with the best Latin writers of antiquity.

With Jerome the case is altogether different, and the effect of his views on the subsequent history of Christian culture probably exceeds that of any other father, Augustine not excepted. At Rome the pupil of Donatus the grammarian and of Victorinus the African rhetorician, a scholar at the imperial school at Treves, an attendant on the lectures of Apollinaris (the eminent bishop of Laodicea) at Antioch—his early training and associations must have strongly inclined him to regard with favour the literature of pagan antiquity. His original sentiments are, indeed, clearly attested by his own writings; and during his ascetic retirement in Syria he was often wont to relieve the tedium of his vigils by the perusal of Plautus and Cicero. But the divine warning, communicated as he believed, in a dream, recalled him to a sense of his error, and determined him to abandon such studies and to restrict himself to the sacred authors (Ep. ad Eustoch. Migne, xxii. 416).^g So far, however, as we are able to gather his more mature sentiments on this question, Jerome would appear to have held that the study of pagan literature was a necessary part of education, but that its continued and ardent pursuit by those who had embraced the monastic or clerical life was inconsistent with their profession. He condemns, for example, with severity those ecclesiastics of his day, who, while neglecting the Prophets and the Gospels, indulged in comedies and amatory poetry, “et id quod in pueris necessitatis est, crimen in se facere voluptatis” (ad Damasum, ib. xxii. 76). It is obvious from this passage that Jerome held that in youth the reading of authors like Terence and Vergil was a necessity, a concession which may fairly be interpreted as implying that it was still the practice of Christians to send their sons to schools of the kind already described. Even after his adoption of the monastic life at Bethlehem (A.D. 386), we find him instituting, in connexion with the monastery, a school for boys, whom he himself instructed in grammar, in the classical authors (especially Vergil), and even in the Latin poets (Ebert, Gesch. d. christlich-lat. Lit. p. 182). As regards his own early education, he himself tells us (ad Dammianum, Migne, xxii. 237) that he had studied the Commentaries of Alexander of Aphrodisias on Aristotle and the Introduction of Porphyry; while in his Apologia adversus Rufinum (i. 16; ib. xxiii. 472) he assumes that his former friend had read, when a boy, the Commentaries of Asper on Vergil and Sallust, those of Vulcatius on the orations of Cicero, those of Victorinus on the dialogues of the same writer and on Terence, those of Donatus on Vergil, and those of other commentators on Plautus, Lucretius, Horace, Persius, and Lucan. As this obviously implies

^f The incongruity between these precepts and those of St. Basil, addressed to the same class in the Christian community, may perhaps afford an argument of some weight in connexion with the alleged but disputed antiquity of these writings. [See APOSTOLICAL CONSTITUTIONS.]

^g A precisely similar experience is recorded of Caesarius of Arles by his biographers, and was followed by a like result (Migne, Patr. lxxvii. 1004).

the study of the authors themselves, it is evident that at the close of the 4th century a great proportion of the classical writers were still read with considerable care.

In his letter (circ. A.D. 397) to Magnus (a Roman rhetorician who, at the instigation of Rufinus, had ventured to ask Jerome why he so often introduced allusions to profane literature in his writings), we are presented with what may be termed the stock arguments whereby such culture on the part of the Christian clergy has been defended ever since his time. He alleges that even Moses and the prophets borrow somewhat from the "books of the Gentiles." He quotes the opening verses of the first chapter of Proverbs, Titus, i. 12, and the other Pauline quotations from Aratus and Menander as further examples. Then he brings forward the justification afforded by Cyprian, Origen, Eusebius, Apollinaris—"lege eos, et invenies nos comparatione eorum imperitissimos;" he refers to Josephus and Philo, and, finally, cites the precedents set by Quadratus, Justin Martyr, Dionysius, Tatian, Irenaeus, Clemens, Origen,^h Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Amphilochius, &c.—"qui omnes in tantum philosophorum doctrinis atque sententiis suos resarciunt libros, ut nescias quid in illis primum admirari debeas, eruditionem saeculi, an scientiam Scripturarum." In the Latin Church he brings forward the examples of Tertullian Minucius Felix, Arnobius, Hilary, and Juvencus, and finally forestalls the possible objection that such learning was only resorted to in controversies with pagan antagonists, by observing that it is apparent in nearly all the writings of those whom he has named (ad Magnum, Migne, xxii. 426-430).

It is questionable, however, whether, with advancing age, Jerome's views did not assume a third and yet more austere phase. We find him, for example, recording with manifest exultation the neglect into which the philosophy of paganism, Plato and Aristotle, was already falling (Migne, xxvi. 487), while in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians (vi. 4) he unsparingly rebukes those bishops and presbyters who, instead of instructing their sons in the faith, make them study pagan authors, read comedies, and sing coarse songs, and this, too, at the cost of the Christian Church, the offerings of the devout poor thus finding their way into the hands of the grammarian or rhetorician to be lavished on profane and even immoral indulgences (Migne, xxvi. 666).

The views of Augustine much resembled those of Jerome, but his literary sympathies were less ardent. He altogether condemned the lighter literature of antiquity, and in his Confessions (i. 17) he refers with penitential contrition to the pleasure which, in his youthful days, he had taken in the study of the Latin poets. The slight evidence of a certain care for letters, such as his anxiety for the formation of a library (Ep. 231, Migne, xxxiii. 1026), and the solicitude which he is said by Possidius (Vita, c. 31) to have shewn for its preservation after his death do not certainly prove anything with respect to classical authors. On the other hand, it is undeniable that the sanction of Augustine was given in very explicit terms to the study of rhetoric and to that of the graver writers of antiquity; and two passages in his de Doctrina Christiana became "loci classici" in later ages whenever it was sought to defend the study of pagan literature in the Church.¹ Of these, the first enforces the precept that the writings of the philosophers of paganism, wherever they are found enforcing what is in agreement with the faith, may safely and advantageously be adapted to the Christian use, just as the Israelites, when they went forth from Egypt, though they left behind them the idols and superstitions of their masters, took with them the gold and the raiment (ii. 40; Migne, xxxiv. 63). The second passage (iv. 2) points out the value of a knowledge of rhetoric to the Christian preacher.

III. The course of events after the death of Augustine, when Gaul, Italy and Africa alike became the prey of the barbarian, involved the overthrow of the imperial schools. From this time, at least in the two first-named countries, the profession of the grammarian and the rhetorician, as that of a distinct class, appears to have gradually died out, while the culture which they represented survived only in a few rare and isolated instances among Christian writers and scholars, who, like Claudius Marius Victor, Sedulius, Pomerius of Lyons, Prosper, Claudius Mamertus, and Avitus of Vienne, sought to give to their discourses a certain rhetorical embellishment, or still cultivated the art of original composition. Whatever of education continued to exist among the laity rarely comprised anything more than reading, writing, and ordinary computation. The work of imparting this elementary instruction was carried on chiefly in the episcopal or cathedral schools which bishops, by virtue of their office, were required to institute in the chief city of their respective dioceses, in order that youths might be educated for the priestly office and the laity receive a certain grounding in the knowledge of the faith. The considerable political power which, at the commencement of the 6th century, the episcopal order still retained in Southern Gaul enabled them effectually to protect these institutions. In the year 529, at the council of Vaison, we have evidence that it was sought to raise the standard of education among the clergy by requiring that priests in charge of parishes, according to the custom of Italy, should receive "readers" into their houses and educate them there (Sirmond, i. 226). It appears to be a legitimate inference from the foregoing canon that, prior to the Lombard invasion, the education of the clergy in Italy was carried on in a regular and systematic manner, and that an endeavour was made to introduce a corresponding system into Gaul.

The conquest of Africa by the Vandals (A.D. 429) does not appear to have been attended by ^h If the date assigned to this letter by the Benedictine editors be correct, this mention of Origen, after the dispute with Rufinus with respect to the orthodoxy of the Alexandrine teacher, is somewhat remarkable. (See Ebert, Gesch. d. christlich-lat. Lit. p. 309.)

results equally unfavourable to letters. The Catholic party suffered cruel persecutions, but their Arian antagonists were avowedly friendly to learning, and Carthage still preserved her reputation as one of the chief schools of the empire. Salvian speaks of the city as famed both for philosophy and the cultivation of all the liberal arts (de Gub. Dei, bk. vii., Migne, liii. 161). It is uncertain whether the treatise of Martianus Capella, a rhetorician of Carthage, de Nuptiis Philologice et Mercurii, et de Septem Artibus Liberalibus, Libri Novem, was composed before or after the Vandal invasion, but long after the author's time it continued to enjoy an extensive popularity as a manual of instruction. This fact is alone significant evidence of the permanence of a certain pagan element in education; for the treatise, owing to its speculative character, was always regarded by the Latin Church as a dangerous book (see Mullinger (J. B.) Hist. of the University of Cambridge, i. 23-26). Felicianus appears as an eminent teacher of grammar, whose school was frequented both by the sons of the Vandals and those of Roman extraction (Dracontius, Praef. ad Hylan.). Dracontius himself was a poet of no mean ability in the reign of Gundamund (A.D. 484-496); and the Christian mother of Fulgentius is said by his biographer, Ferreolus, to have caused her son to commit to memory the whole of Homer, together with large portions of Menander. After this early training in Greek, Fulgentius was initiated into Latin literature, and pursued the study with the combined advantages of home instruction and attendance at one of the grammar schools of Carthage—"domo edoctus, artis etiam grammaticae traditur auditorio" (Migne, lxxv. 119).

With the advance of the 6th century, the study of pagan literature and the traditions of pagan education had become yet further circumscribed in Latin Christendom, and the oft-quoted lament of Gregory of Tours ("perit studium litterarum") may be accepted with little reservation as regards his own country. The monastic traditions of education alone survived, although, at the same time, it is evident that they were sustained with some vigour, and that schools for youth (probably of the kind that Caesarius of Arles had instituted and promoted in Aquitaine) were in existence in the time of Clotaire II. (A.D. 613-628), and of Dagobert (A.D. 628-638), which excited the emulation of other lands. We learn, for instance, on the authority of Bede, that Sigebert, king of the East Angles (A.D. 635), being anxious on his return from exile "to imitate the good institutions which he had seen in France," "set up a school for youth to be instructed in literature, and was assisted therein by bishop Felix, who came from Kent, and who provided him with masters and teachers after the manner of that country" (Baeda, E. H. iii. 18; Henry of Huntingdon, Hist. Angl. bk. iii.; Savile, Script. 332). Evidence again, hereafter to be noted, is also to be met with of the survival of a higher culture in Italy, Africa, and Spain.

After the time of the Origenistic controversy, there is to be discerned in the Western Church a growing disposition not only to look with distrust on all secular learning as tending to encourage speculations which too often ended in heterodoxy, but also to adopt a theory of Scriptural interpretation which involved a disparaging estimate of the collateral aid which such learning might supply. In the Institutiones and Collationes of the celebrated Cassian, the combination of these views is clearly to be discerned. Cassian adopted the Alexandrine theory, and taught that beyond the grammatical meaning of the Scriptures there lay hidden a succession of deeper meanings, the tropological, allegorical, and anagogical, which revealed themselves only to the sanctified and purified intellect (Inst. v. 24; Coll. viii. 3). The importance of his adoption of these views lay in the fact that he was also the author of a new rule of monastic life and education in the West, and that consequently those communities which accepted this rule (and they appear to have included the majority of the monasteries in Gaul in the 5th and 6th centuries) cannot but be looked upon as dominated by a narrow and illiberal conception of learning. For a time, indeed, under the influence of a genuine enthusiasm, they rose superior to their traditions. The monastery of St. Victor at Marseilles, founded by Cassian himself, enjoyed a high reputation as a school of education. That of St. Honorat, on one of the Lerins group of islands, was yet more celebrated, and the "Studium Insulanum," under Vincentius, was famous as a centre of semi-Pelagian doctrine in the 5th century. Eucherius, bishop of Lyons about A.D. 449, when writing to Saloniun, speaks of the latter as having received instruction in this school from Hilary of Arles, Salvian, and Vincentius, in all branches of religious knowledge (Praef. ad Salonium, Migne, l. 773).

But the severe manual labour imposed by the rule of Cassian (de Coenob. Inst. ii. 3) alone almost precluded any sustained attention to letters; and the study of the sacred text, the acquirement of the arts of writing and singing, together with such a knowledge of the Computus (see CALENDAR) as would enable the learner to calculate the return of the festivals and fasts, were probably the limits, but rarely exceeded, of monastic education under this rule. At the same time, however, it is to be noted that the importance attached by Cassian to the constant study of the Scriptures, rendered a certain amount of education obligatory, where it had before been discretionary (Coll. xiv. 10; Migne, xlix. 972), and it may probably be safely assumed that wherever after Cassian's time mention occurs of any considerable monastery in the West, there existed in connexion with such monastery a school which imparted at least such an amount of elementary instruction as above described.

The provisions thus laid down were yet more distinctly enforced in the rule of Caesarius of Arles, who, in addition to his efforts above noted, for the spread of education among the clergy, required that both in the monasteries and in the convents of his diocese, certain hours of study should be strictly observed. In the monasteries this time was from the hour of rising until nine o'clock (Regula ad Monachos, reg. 14; Migne, Patr. lxxvii. 1100). In the convents for women it was for two hours, from six to eight o'clock in the morning (Regula ad Virgines, reg. 14; ib. lxxvii. 1110).

But while such were the tendencies of education in the West, we find a far more liberal conception maintaining its ground in many of the churches in the East. In marked contrast to the school of Alexandria, that of Antioch acquired, in the 4th century, scarcely less distinction as a centre of widely different teaching. The teachers of the school of Antioch were distinguished by the high value which they set upon pagan literature, and had their views with respect to Christian education gained the ascendancy, it is no exaggeration to say that the history of the Church, and consequently of Europe at large, throughout the middle ages would have been materially modified. That the profession of instructor in pagan learning did not necessarily involve a departure from orthodox belief is attested by the example of Malchion, a presbyter of the Church, and according to Eusebius (H. E. vii. 29), "head of the profession of the sophists in the schools of pagan learning at Antioch," but who was also distinguished as a refuter of the heresies of Paul of Samosata.

It is, however, with Lucian, presbyter and martyr (†311), that the historical exegesis of Antioch, in conjunction with a recognised school of instruction, is first to be traced with certainty. (Neander, Kirchengesch. I. iii. 825). Lucian, like Origen, was famed as a teacher, and along with Dorotheus, educated a large circle of illustrious disciples (Nicephorus, viii. 31; Theodoret, II. E. i. 5). He was also connected with the schools at Caesarea and Edessa. When Meletius was driven into exile by the Arians, his see was ably guided by Flavian (†403), and both of these bishops, according to Theodoret (E. H. iv. 22), were the instructors or advisers of Diodorus, from whom the high celebrity of the school of Antioch, which lasted from about A.D. 370–428, may be held to date. Diodorus, although described by Jerome as ignorant of secular learning (de Viris Illust. c. 119), was really a man of wide and varied culture, and the instructor of both Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia. While distinguished as an opponent of the Apollinarian heresy, he was also an able defender of the historical school of Scriptural interpretation, a feature which sufficiently accounts for the hostility of Jerome. With the deposition and condemnation of Nestorius (431) the reputation of the school at Antioch appears to have come to an end.

The doctrines taught at Antioch re-appeared, however, in Mesopotamia, and especially at those celebrated centres of theological teaching, Edessa and Nisibis. The history of these two schools is singularly intertwined and somewhat obscure. It has been supposed that Edessa was the original seat whence Antioch first derived its characteristic tradition, and it is beyond doubt that it was here that Lucian received instruction from Macarius (Socrates, H. E. ii. 9). Eusebius of Emesa was also instructed here, not only in religious knowledge but also in pagan learning (ib.). It is not until the 4th century that Nisibis appears to have acquired distinction by the teaching of Jacob, its bishop, who was the instructor of Ephraem the Syrian. Ephraem was subsequently driven from Nisibis and took refuge in Edessa, where the school which he founded or re-established became distinguished for its judicious and scholarly principles of interpretation (Asseman, i. 38; Socrates, II. E. iii. 6). After the year 431, Edessa became a centre of Nestorian doctrine, and the survival of these tenets is attributed by Theodorus Lector to the activity of this school. Its suppression in the year 489 by the emperor Zeno, on this very account (Theod. Lector, E. H. ii. 49; Asseman, i. 406) failed to bring about the extinction of the sect, for its teachers, removing to Nisibis, maintained the same traditions; and a school, in which the Commentaries of Theodore of Mopsuestia were prescribed as sources of doctrine and all divergence from his teaching was forbidden under the pain of anathema (ib. iii. 84), continued to exist until the middle ages. Junilius Africanus, writing about the year 540, speaks of it as a centre of systematic religious instruction, "ubi divina lex per magistros publicos, sicut apud nos in mundanis studiis grammatica et rhetorica ordine et regulariter traditur" (Praef. ad de Part. Div. Leg.; Migne, lxxiii. 15). The foregoing passage from Junilius, who was an African bishop, is of twofold interest, inasmuch as it attests the continued existence and activity not only of the school at Nisibis but also of schools of grammar and rhetoric in Africa in the first half of the 6th century.

Among others whose attention was attracted to the teaching of these remote schools in the East, was Cassiodorus, the eminent minister of Theodoric the Great. It was his endeavour to give to monastic education a more liberal cast than it had received from Cassian, or than it was then receiving from his contemporary, Caesarius of Arles—the latter of whom, notwithstanding his efforts to promote the education of the clergy, was altogether adverse to the study of pagan literature. Cassiodorus appears to have succeeded in carrying his designs into effect in connexion with the monastery which he founded at Viviers in Bruttium; and we learn from the preface to his treatise, de Institutione Divinarum Litterarum, that he had sought, in conjunction with pope Agapetus, to found certain chairs of Christian instruction at Rome, after the fashion, he says, "that long existed at Alexandria, and that now prevails in full force at Nisibis, so that the souls of the faithful might gain eternal salvation and their speech be adorned with chaste eloquence" (Migne, lxx. 537). The schemata, "lectionis ordo," given by Cassiodorus himself, is also in evident agreement with the method and range of instruction which prevailed at Nisibis; and it is worthy of notice that among those to whom he refers as eminent promoters of Scriptural instruction ("introductores Scripturae divinae") is Junilius Africanus. Cassiodorus, however, goes on to state that the outbreak of war had compelled him to abandon the above design, and that he has accordingly put forth his treatise, which he describes as "a compend of Scriptural knowledge and profane learning." The Catholic spirit in which his precepts are conceived is evident in many points; in his advice to the monks to study geography, and in the fact that he had caused Latin translations to be made of Josephus' History of the Jews and of the writings of Theodoret (c. 8). These were placed in the library which he collected, and of which his treatise gives an account. We learn that it included, besides the canonical Scriptures and the Fathers, the encyclic of the council of Chalcedon in the version of Epiphanius, Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, that of Sozomen, together with the works of Orosius, Ammianus Marcellinus, &c. (Migne, Patr. lxx. 1119-1147). He also takes occasion warmly to defend the study of pagan literature, urging that it is often an important aid to that of the Scriptures themselves, and that it had never been the design of the fathers wholly to prohibit it (ib. lxx. 554). He quotes the language of Augustine (de Doct. Christiana, ii. 40), "See we not how richly laden with gold, and silver, and raiment, Cyprian that most sweet teacher and blessed martyr, went forth from Egypt? How also, laden in like manner, Lactantius, Victorinus, Optatus, and Hilarius went forth?"—and concludes, in his own language, "utrasque doctrinas, si possumus, legere festinemus. Quis enim audeat habere dubium, ubi virorum talium multiplex præcedit exemplum?"

In the period directly following upon the invasion of the Lombards (A.D. 568), learning in Italy ebbed to its lowest point; but in the meantime the foundation of the monastery on Monte Cassino (A.D. 529) and the rise of the Benedictine order had inaugurated a new epoch. The rule of St. Benedict was a kind of mean between that of Cassian and that of Cassiodorus. It neither enjoined nor forbade the study of secular literature, but it prescribed, like the rule of Caesarius of Arles, the setting apart of regular hours for reading. The energies of the monk were still mainly to be given to active labour, but the grey dawn of the winter day and the meridian heat of summer were allotted to study; and in the season of Lent the time assigned for this purpose was extended. With the one exception of Cassian, Benedict specified no authors, but only the books of the Old and New Testaments, together with such expositions thereon as "the most illustrious doctors of the orthodox faith and the Catholic fathers had compiled" (Reg. S. Benedicti, c. 8; ed. Waitzmann, p. 32).

The interpretation given by Gregory the Great (A.D. 544-604), the admirer and biographer of St. Benedict, to the monastic theory was probably sufficient to exclude, for a time, all attention to secular learning. Writing and teaching under an exceptionally vivid conviction of the approaching end of the world—a consummation which he held to be plainly foretold by the troubles of the times—he looked upon all studies which did not directly conduce to the purposes of the religious life as worse than useless. We find, it is true, both his biographers, Paul and John, speaking in glowing terms of the flourishing state of learning in Rome in his day. But against these doubtful and vague assertions of a later age, we must place the following facts: (1) that according to John (Vita, iii. 33), Gregory expressly forbade bishops to study pagan literature; (2) that he strongly censured Didier, the eminent bishop of Vienne, for instructing some of his clergy in classical literature, an employment of time which he declares to be unbecoming even in a pious layman (Ep. xi. 54); (3) that by his own admission he was himself ignorant of Greek, although he had resided some years at Constantinople (Ep. vii. 30), and, according to Paulus Diaconus (Vita, c. 2) was "second to none in Rome in polite learning." As a striking illustration of the results of this narrow conception of intellectual culture, his Magna Moralia, or Exposition of the Book of Job, claims a passing notice, as a work conceived in the most daring spirit of allegorical interpretation, to the entire exclusion of the aids that oriental or classical learning might have supplied and which could hardly have failed to restrain the unbounded extravagance which characterises these pages. "It may safely be said," observes Milman, "that according to Gregory's licence of interpretation, there is nothing which might not be found in any book ever written" (Latin Christianity, bk. iii. c. 7).

The unrivalled influence exerted by Gregory over his age is thus to be traced in a two-fold form in relation to learning: (1) as distinctly unfavourable to secular studies; (2) as favouring the allegorical method of interpreting Scripture, and thereby setting an example which operated powerfully on the whole course of mediæval theology; for while the monastic schools which arose in England were modelled mainly on his instructions, it was from England, in turn, that the schools restored or founded by Charles the Great in the latter part of the 8th century derived their method and their traditions.

It is mainly to the efforts of Theodore and Hadrian, in the 7th century, that we must attribute that somewhat more liberal conception of Christian studies which obtained in England at this period. Both these ecclesiastics, of whom the one was from Tarsus, the other from Africa, were Greek as well as Latin scholars (Bright, Early Church History, p. 219). Of the system of education introduced by Theodore it has been said, "that it was in principle substantially the same as that which now prevails" (Hook, Lives of the Archbishops, i. 196). Theodore also augmented the library at Canterbury (Edwards, Hist. of Libraries, i. 101). Of the higher learning which characterised this movement, Aldhelm († 709) and Bede († 735) are the two most conspicuous examples. The former was educated by Hadrian at the monastery school of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, and subsequently, in order to obtain a livelihood, instituted a school at Malmesbury (William of Malmesbury, Gest. Pont. lib. v.). Aldhelm was also the founder of numerous other monastic schools in Wessex, and we still possess an account of his system of instruction (Wright, Intro. to Biog. Brit. Litt. i. 74). According to his biographer, Faricius, he was a competent Greek scholar (c. 1). He, however, so far reflected the influence of Gregory's teaching, that he discouraged the study both of the poets and philosophers of antiquity; in the inflated Latinity which passed for scholarship of this period, he intimates that the rude simplicity of the gospel appears to him far preferable to the slippery byways of pastoral poetry or the thorny winding paths of philosophy. (Malmesbury, Gest. Pont. ed. Hamilton, p. 342). At nearly the same time that Aldhelm was founding schools in Wessex, Felix, the first bishop of the East Angles (A.D. 680), was carrying out a similar work in his diocese, where, says the historian, "barbariem gentis sensim comitate Latina informabat" (ib. 147).

The tradition from Aldhelm was handed down by Albinus († 752), abbat of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, and the literary adviser of Bede. Albinus was instructed in Greek by Theodore, and, according to Bede, "knew the Greek tongue to no small perfection, and the Latin as "thoroughly as the English, which was his native tongue" (E. H. v. 20).

The extensive learning of Bede, which was of a yet higher order, was acquired partly under the tuition of Benedict Biscop, at the monasteries at Wearmouth and Jarrow, and partly at St. Augustine's at Canterbury. Bede himself was subsequently an active founder of the famous school at York, the most distinguished centre of learning in England in the 8th and 9th centuries. It was successively presided over by Egbert, Ethelbert, and Eanbald, each of whom succeeded to the archbishopric of York; but its most distinguished teacher was Alcuin. The school appears to have been open to the secular clergy as well as to those designed to the monastic life, a fact which may to some extent account for the liberal character of the studies pursued by the scholars (Migne, Patr. c. 146; ci. 845; Stubbs, Pref. to de Inventione, p. vi.). Alcuin, who was not a monk, was for some time librarian of the cathedral library, and in his Poëma de Pontificibus Ecclesiae Eboracensis (Migne, ci. 845) has left us a glowing description of its treasures. According to his account it was a complete repository not only of patristic, but also of Greek and Latin, literature.

Such was the institution from whence the light of learning was transmitted to Frankland, and there handed down to the middle ages; but before proceeding to follow this main path, as it may be termed, of our subject, it will be necessary to devote a brief attention to the condition of letters and education in other parts of Europe during the 7th and 8th centuries.

The tradition of important Christian schools in Spain at a very early period in Church history, must stand or fall with that of the early evangelisation of the country [PAGANISM, SURVIVAL OF, sec. iii.]. It appears to have suggested to the author of the spurious Chronicon of Dexter (ann. 185 and 370),—a Jesuit forgery of the 17th century,—the statement that such schools existed in the 2nd and were restored in the 4th century; nor is it easy to believe that, under ecclesiastics like Hosius, the work of education could have failed to be carried on with vigour. Lannoy (de Scholis, &c. c. lvi.) observes, however, that the school of Bracara (now Braga in Portugal) is the only one of which we have any distinct mention prior to the 7th century. This school, where were pursued "optimarum artium studia," attained to yet greater celebrity under its abbat Fructuosus, the contemporary of Isidorus. In the time of Isidorus (A.D. 570–636) a general revival of learning throughout Spain appears to have taken place. The great school of Seville, which had been founded by his brother and predecessor in that see, Leander, exercised considerable influence over education throughout Andalusia. Isidorus himself was undoubtedly the most learned ecclesiastic of the 7th century and an active promoter of learning. He was also the founder of another school in connexion with a large monastery which he built without the walls of Seville. The discipline of this school was remarkable for its severity. The scholars were not permitted to go beyond the walls of the monastery until four years had elapsed from their first admission; and those who evinced a disposition to saunter about and neglect their studies, were compelled to wear iron fetters on their feet (Rod. Cerrat. Vita Isidori, c. xiv.; Migne*, lxxxi. 78). Discipline of this kind, however, was confined to the monastic schools, which appear to have sometimes served the purpose of the modern reformatory. We find, for example, that a decree of the fourth council of Toledo (A.D. 633), over which Isidorus presided, while enjoining the institution of schools for the clergy, directs also that refractory scholars shall be sent to the monasteries (Mansi, x. 626). The first canon of the second council of Toledo, A.D. 615, makes, likewise, express provision for schools for the clergy under the direction of the bishop.

Isidorus says (Sent. iii. 8) that both prayer and reading are duties of the religious life, though preference is to be given to the former. He discourages the perusal of pagan literature (ib. iii. 13), and affirms that the meretricious art of the grammarian must not be preferred to more simple knowledge (ib.). It is, however, a legitimate inference from his Etymologiae (or Origines, as the treatise is sometimes termed), that Isidorus did not consider these injunctions to be equally binding on the clergy. This latter treatise, along with those of Boethius, the de Artibus ac Disciplinis of Cassiodorus, and the de Septem Artibus of Martianus, may be looked upon as completing the list of the ordinary textbooks of instruction up to the 13th century.

On the whole, it may be said that Christian education as conceived by Isidorus rested on a far more liberal basis than that laid down by Gregory,—a fact in some measure attributable to the immunity from war and invasion which Spain, when compared with Italy, at this time enjoyed. As regards the interpretation of Scripture, however, Isidorus followed in the steps of Gregory, a fact of which his Allegoriae affords decisive evidence, and he thus lent the weight of his high authority to the perpetuation of the Alexandrine tradition in the Western Church.

The extant writings of Braulio clearly prove that he had profited largely by the instruction of Isidorus, and the quotations from Terence, Horace, Vergil, and Juvenal, which they contain, shew a fair knowledge of Latin literature. Among Isidorus' other pupils were Sisebut, king of the Visigoths, and the archdeacon Redemptus, author of the Life of St. Didier. Braulio, in his turn, became the founder of an important school in northern Spain, at the city of Saragossa, and among his scholars were Eugenius, third bishop of that name of Toledo (a writer whose metrical compositions are among the most favourable specimens of the literature of the period), and Taïon, Braulio's successor in the see of Saragossa (Bourret, L'École chrét. de Séville, 119–133).

The conquest of the country by the Saracens under Musa, in the year 711, probably involved the extinction of these schools, though traces of learning and culture are discernible even after this time; but throughout the 7th century, Spain may fairly be regarded as an exception to the intellectual darkness that prevailed in Western Europe and almost justifies the observation of the abbé Bourret,—“On dirait que toutes les muses se sont enfuies vers les bords hospitaliers du Bétis, car de là seulement arrivent les échos de la parole antique et les signes de la vie intellectuelle de l'humanité" (ib. p. 203).

* Perhaps one of the passages that may be accepted as genuine in this largely interpolated production.

In the East, and especially at Constantinople, the study of grammar and rhetoric received the countenance of the state long after the imperial schools of the West had ceased to exist. In the year 425, in the reign of Theodosius II., an edict was promulgated, designed apparently to restrict the function of public teaching to those who had been formally appointed to teach in the Capitol at Constantinople. Other teachers are forbidden to assemble their pupils "in publicis magistratibus cellulisque" under pain of infamy and banishment from the city, but are allowed to teach in private dwelling houses, "intra parietes domesticos." This edict has been characterised by Finlay as a tyrannical exercise of power, but he omits to refer to the fact that the same measure makes provision for a fixed number of public instructors, as follows: in Latin, three "oratores" and ten "grammatici"; in Greek, five "sophistae" and one "grammaticus"; one teacher of philosophy; two of civil law. Each of these instructors was to have his appointed "locus," probably a fixed place, in which to assemble his class (Cod. Theod. xiv. tit. 9; ed. Haenel, p. 1389). The suppression of the schools of philosophy at Athens, by Justinian, was probably a blow aimed rather at heresy than at learning, and the grammarian and rhetorician still taught, as in Africa, unmolested, and in some instances with distinguished success. The names of Stobaeus, Theodorus Anagnostes, Agathias, and Evagrius, are sufficient proof of the continuance of a certain cultivation of letters. The schools at Constantinople, known as the oecumenical, were also celebrated, and though the circumstances under which the college of the Octagon in that city was founded are lost in obscurity, its existence in the 8th century, along with that of an extensive library, is sufficiently established. "The classical writers (ἐγκύκλιοι)" says Donaldson, "were taught with a strange mixture of Church fathers and later rhetoricians,—Libanius and Basil being placed on the same footing as Demosthenes, Plutarch and Dion Cassius being preferred to Herodotus and Thucydides, the commentators of Hermogenes and Aphthonius being substituted for the rhetoric of Aristotle, and Plato and Aristotle being seen darkly, if at all, through the clouded glasses of Proclus, Olympiodorus, and Joannes Philoponus" (Hist. of Greek Lit. iii. 373-374).

The accession of the Isaurian dynasty (A.D. 726) and the controversy respecting image worship were eminently unfavourable to letters, and the emperor Leo is accused of burning both the college of the Octagon and its library. Towards the close of the century, however, a considerable revival took place, and it is evident that no small amount of literary culture prevailed. At the commencement of the 9th century the celebrated Theodorus Studites assembled round him at the monastery of Studion a band of disciples, some of whom his biographer describes as devoted to general learning, others to Scriptural studies, and some to manual arts (Migne, Series Graeca, xcix. 168). "A proof," says Finlay, "that learning was still cultivated in the distant parts of the Byzantine empire, and that schools of some eminence existed in Greece, is to be found in the fact that Leo the mathematician, when a layman, retired to a college in the island of Andros to pursue his studies, and there laid the foundation of the scientific knowledge by which he established his reputation. After he was compelled to resign his archbishopric of Thessalonica, the general respect felt for his learning obtained for him from Bardas Caesar the presidency of the new university founded at Constantinople in the reign of Michael III. (A.D. 842-867), in which chairs of geometry and astronomy had been established, as well as the usual instruction in Greek literature." (Hist. of the Byzantine Emp. ed. Tozer, ii. 25; for Leo's attainments see Migne, Series Graeca, cix. 199.)

In northern and central Italy, where the rule of the Lombard supplanted that of the eastern emperor, the course of events could not fail to be unfavourable to learning; but it is evident that traditions of Greek culture lingered in the south long after the time of Gregory the Great. In the Life of John of Damascus there is a remarkable representation given by the monk Cosmas of his attainments and course of study. He had been captured by pirates when sailing from Calabria to the east, and as he stood exposed for sale in the market-place of Damascus, he informed the father of John (by whom he was subsequently ransomed) that his speech had been adorned by the study of rhetoric, his reason trained in dialectical methods and proofs; that he had studied ethics as taught by Aristotle and Plato; had acquired a knowledge of physical philosophy, arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy (τῶν ἀσπέρων περιφορὰν); and, finally, had been initiated into the mysteries of theology, "both," he says, "as handed down by the Greeks and as the teachers of the Latin church had most clearly set them forth" (Migne, Series Graeca, xciv. 430).

In Frankland a continuous state of warfare sufficed to preclude much attention to the education of the people during the rule of Charles Martel and that of Pépin le Bref (A.D. 752-768). Guizot, however, contends that in the preceding century and a half (A.D. 600-750) there is good reason for inferring the continued existence of episcopal schools at Poitiers, Paris, Le Mans, Bourges, Clermont, Vienne, Châlons-sur-Saône, Arles, and Gap; while, besides the monastic schools of St. Médard at Soissons, and that at Lérins, he considers that others are to be traced in connexion with the foundations at Poitiers, Ligugé, Ansion, Luxeuil, Fontenelle, and Sithiu (Hist. de la Civilisat. ii. 3-4). It was reserved, however, for Charles the Great to initiate a series of efforts for the revival of learning, which were destined to be attended by marked success and long-enduring results.

Charles's regard for letters may have been derived, in the first instance, from Peter of Pisa, who appears to have taught grammar at the court of Pépin (Alcuin, Ep. 75); while Paulus Diaconus, the historian Leidradus, a Bavarian, and Theodulfus, a Spanish Goth, were scholars with whom he became acquainted during his campaign in Italy (A.D. 774). But in none of these were there combined the attainments and the energy requisite for carrying out the great work of restoration which Charles had in view. In the year 782, he is accordingly to be found applying to Alcuin of York for further assistance. Ultimately Alcuin acceded to this request, and on repairing to Frankland was installed instructor of the palace school, and also invested with a general superintendence of the work of education throughout the realm.

There can be little doubt that Alcuin was the most accomplished scholar of his time, for, besides considerable theological attainments, he was well read in the Latin classics, and also possessed a slight knowledge of Greek; but his mind was wanting in independence and originality, and his proneness to lean on precedent and authority inclined him rather to follow out the precepts of Gregory the Great than to seek to impart to the studies of his age a more liberal and catholic tone. This must always be regarded as no slight misfortune for Christian education in the middle ages, for the almost unquestioning deference and obedience which his learning, high character, and amiable disposition won for him from his scholars resulted in an influence over education in Frankland which lasted until the rise of scholasticism, and may even be traced after the Renaissance.

The palace school, which included Charles himself, his family, and the leading members of his court, is noticeable as a successful endeavour to raise the standard of lay education at that time. To Alcuin's instructions we may probably attribute the literary tastes of Lewis the Pious; while Adelhard, Wala, Einhard, and Riculfus all perceptibly reflect the same influence. The teacher supplied his class with such knowledge as was to be gathered from the manuals of Boethius, Isidorus, and Cassiodorus on the subjects of the ancient trivium and quadrivium. In connexion with logic and astronomy this was of a very meagre character, and the inquiring intellect of Charles seems, in these branches, to have decidedly outstripped the willingness or the resources of his instructor (see Alcuin, de Dialectica, Migne, ci. 951-979; also ib. c. 275; and Dümmler, Alcuiniana, Epp. 93 to 112).

Aided by the counsels and the pen of Alcuin, Charles next commenced, in the year 787, an endeavour to awaken a more systematic attention to letters in the monasteries of his realm. A copy of the Capitulary designed to promote this object (that addressed to Baugulfus, abbat of Fulda) has been preserved, and supplies us with an important illustration of the actual status of education at this period, the argument for the necessity of improvement being enforced by reference to the uncouth and illiterate diction of the letters from time to time addressed to Charles by the different monastic foundations. It is to be noted, as further illustrating Alcuin's theory of education, that the desirability of the proposed reforms is chiefly insisted on on account of the aid that students would thereby receive in understanding the Scriptures and those deeper hidden meanings which they enfold. "For as these," says the Capitulary, "contain images, tropes, and similar figures, it is impossible to doubt that the reader will arrive far more readily at the spiritual sense according as he is the better instructed in learning" (Constitutio de Scholis per singula Episcopalia et Monasteria instituendis, Baluze, i. 201-204; Pertz, Legg. i. 523). Both the clerical profession and the monasteries at this period were largely recruited from the servile class; and it marks the rising estimation in which education now began to be held, that another of Charles's Capitularies, of the year 789, enjoins the clergy to seek for scholars not only among the sons of slaves but almost among the sons of freemen; it also directs that in connexion with every episcopal see and monastery there shall be a school where boys shall be taught the psalms, notation ("notas"), singing, the use of the Computus, and the Latin tongue, and that they shall be supplied with accurately transcribed text-books, "libros bene emendatos" (Capitula data missi dominicis, Baluze, i. 360).

In the year 796, Alcuin's work of reform in Frankland entered upon its third phase, consequent upon his appointment to the abbacy of St. Martin of Tours. Here he forthwith proceeded to put in practice his more austere conceptions of monastic discipline and education, while his reputation attracted scholars not only from all parts of the empire, but also from England and Ireland. The influence he thus exerted over his disciples during the eight years preceding his death constitutes probably the most enduring impress that he left upon his age; but his mistrust of pagan literature and too deferential adherence to the Gregorian traditions largely tended to cramp and fetter the intellectual energies of subsequent generations.

The movement thus initiated continued to develop itself long after Alcuin's death. In the year in which he died (A.D. 804) fresh injunctions were issued with a view to the more systematic education of the clergy (Baluze, i. 417).¹ In 813 a decree of the council of Châlons enjoined the creation of additional schools for the cultivation of learning and the study of the Scriptures (Labbe, Concilia, vii. 1272). The augmentation in the numbers of the scholars is probably indicated by a canon of the council of Aachen, in 817, requiring that only those who had already embraced the monastic life (the "oblatus") should in future be admitted to the schools within the monastery walls (Pertz, Legg. i. 202). From this time the monastic schools appear to have been of two kinds: the "scholae claustrales" for the "oblatus," and the "scholae canonice" for the secular clergy. In the year 822 Lewis the Pious issued new instructions, affirming that education since his accession had not received due attention, and enjoining that every candidate for holy orders, whether young or old, should have a settled residence and a competent instructor; the parents or masters of scholars were to provide for their maintenance, and if the extent of a bishopric rendered it difficult to assemble the scholars at one centre, additional schools were to be opened (Pertz, Leges, i. 231). Among the episcopal schools in Frankland those of Orleans and Rheims were especially distinguished. The first, under the direction of Theodulfus, the archbishop, was perhaps the chief centre of clerical education up to the university era. Theodulfus was especially active in his endeavours to preserve and restore manuscripts, and those of Orleans were noted for their beauty and accuracy. He was also the author of a compendium of rules for the guidance of the clergy, which was widely circulated throughout the realm (Baunard, Theodulfe, c. 2; Migne, Patr. cv. 191-207). The school at Reims, under the patronage of the celebrated Hincmar, was not less famed, and under the successive teaching of Sigloard, archbishop Fulk, Remy of Auxerre, and Hucbald, enjoyed the proud distinction of having preserved throughout the 9th century that tradition of learning which links the episcopal schools with the university of Paris.

The monastic schools of this period, however, altogether surpassed the episcopal schools both in learning and in celebrity. Foremost in this category stands the school of the abbey at Fulda, under the rule of Rabanus Maurus, the disciple of Alcuin at Tours. He was equally distinguished by his attainments and his ability as a teacher, and his treatise on the education of the clergy, de Institutione Clericorum, contains not a few indications of his desire to set up a somewhat more liberal standard of such education than that which he had received. Among his scholars he numbered many of the most prominent characters of the 9th century, such as Walafrid Strabo, Otfrid of Weissenberg, Rudolfus, Luitpertus, Hartmuat, Meginhard, &c. (Opera, ed. Colvener, 6 vols. 1626; Spengler, Leben des heiligen Rabanus Maurus, 1856). The abbey of Hirsau-giae, an offshoot from Fulda, was also distinguished as a learned community under William, the abbat (Chron. Petershusanum, Migne, cxlii. 338). That at Seligenstadt, under Einhard the historian, was noted for the scholarly and admirable productions of its scriptorium; that at Ferrières, in the Gâtinais, could boast of its abbat, Lupus Servatus, the presence of the most distinguished classical scholar of the time (Nicolas, Étude sur les Lettres de Servat-Loup, 1861). One of his disciples, Eric, afterwards abbat of St. Germain at Auxerre, was the instructor of Lothair, the son of Charles the Bald. At Mayence, the abbey of St. Alban numbered among its scholars Rupertus, known for his Greek learning, and Probus, a devoted student of Cicero and Vergil (Chron. Hirsau-giae, ann. 892; Lupus Servatus, Epp. 20 and 34; Migne, cxix.). The monasteries of St. Germain des Prés and St. Denis at Paris already enjoyed, in the 9th century, a considerable celebrity as schools. At Corbey, near Amiens, under Adelhard and Wala, and Paschasius Radbertus, was gathered a society eminent for its learning and illustrious as a parent foundation. It fell before the Norman invasion; but its namesake, New Corbey, in Saxony, sustained the same traditions with scarcely less distinction (Wala Vita, Pertz, ii. 578-581). The great abbey of St. Riquier, under the rule of Angilbert, another of Alcuin's scholars, was noted for its devotion to letters; an inventory of its possessions, made in the year 831 by the direction of Lewis the Pious, included a library of no less than two hundred and thirty-one volumes (Léon Maître, Les Écoles, &c. p. 67). The abbey of St. Martin at Metz, under the rule of Aldri-cus, was scarcely less celebrated (Baluze, Miscell. i. 19); a bible presented by the community to Charles the Bald, and the missal of bishop Drogo, are still preserved, and rank among the most valued specimens of 9th-century art. The society of St. Mihiel-sur-Meuse enjoyed the instruction of Smaragdus, whose compend of Donatus frequently appears in the catalogues of the libraries of the period. St. Bertin, in the diocese of Cambrai, claimed the distinguished honour of leaving educated Grimbald, whom king Alfred invited to aid him in his efforts towards a restoration of learning in England (Bollandus, Juillet, ii. 651).

A remarkable effort on the part of the episcopal order still further to extend the influences of education was made in the year 829, when at an assembly at Paris it was resolved to petition the emperor to found three large schools at three different centres, to be open to the clergy and the monastic orders alike (Mansi, xiv. 599). The scheme appears to have been frustrated by the outbreak of war.

The principle of the gratuitous instruction of the sons of the poor appears to have been very distinctly on its trial at this period. An inscription over the portals of the monastery at Salzburg contained the verse—on the other hand, the monastery at Tours, under the rule of Fredegis, Alcuin's successor, was unenviably distinguished by its exaction of fees from the scholars. This practice was strongly denounced by Amalaric, who had formerly acted as librarian at the monastery, and had been promoted to the archbishopric of the diocese. In the year 843, he founded a fund for the purpose of providing gratuitous instruction in Tours, and the measure was subsequently sanctioned in a formal enactment by Charles the Bald (Martene, Thes. Anecd. i. ann. 843). At nearly the same time, Theodulfus issued instructions to the clergy of his diocese that they should in no case demand fees for the instruction of children, but only accept them when voluntarily offered by the parents (Mansi, xiii. 388). The Capitulary in which he embodied this proviso was subsequently widely adopted by other dioceses (Baunard, Theodulfe, p. 61).

It still remains briefly to advert to another school of thought, that of the Celtic church, and particularly the Irish monasteries, in order to complete the foregoing outline. With the name of St. Comgall there is associated the great school of Banchor^m or Bensor in the Ards of Ulster, founded in the year 558 (Life of Columba, ed. Reeves, p. 306), and famous as a seat of learning. The yet more celebrated school at Hy or Iona is associated with the name of St. Columba; that of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, with the labours of St. Aidan; those of Luxeuil, on the confines of Burgundy and Austrasia, and Bobbio in the north of Italy, with the missionary career of Columban. St. Gall in Switzerland, which in the 9th century possessed a library of four hundred volumes (Weidmann, Hist. de la Biblioth. de S. Gall, p. 16), still preserves the name of its founder. St. Kilian in Thuringia, and Virgilius in Carinthia, were representatives of the same great movement.

^m This must be carefully distinguished from the monastery at Bangor (the modern Bangor-Isced in Flintshire) mentioned by Bede as numbering upwards of 2,000 monks (E. H. ii. 2); a foundation which possessed no school at all corresponding to its importance as a monastery (Bingham, Ant. ii. 347).

The question of the common origin of this teaching, characterised by a distinctive scholarship and a distinctive theology, in Irish foundations, would involve a more lengthened inquiry than is here admissible, but it may be observed that such evidence as we possess remarkably confirms the traditions which associate the early Irish civilisation with the East, either directly or indirectly through Massilia.

As early as the time of Jerome, there is evidence of an Irish Christian civilisation anterior to St. Patrick, and in the 6th century the "Scotti" as they were termed (Ireland being the original Scotland) were already eminent for their love of learning. An Irish scholar, Maildulf, instructed Aldhelm at Malmesbury in the 7th century; and Theodore, the archbishop, on his arrival, found himself, according to Aldhelm, surrounded by a throng of eager Irish disciples, "Hibernensium globo discipulorum stipatur" (Ussher, Sylog. Ep. p. 38).

The distinguishing features of this Celtic Christianity, so far as related to education and learning, were as follows: (1) the adoption of a text book of secular education which was condemned by the majority of the Latin clergy; (2) a superior knowledge of Greek and also of the Latin classics and of astronomy; (3) a disposition to employ dialectics in theological controversy.

(1) The treatise of Martianus Capella, to which reference has above been made (p. 1851), was a favourite text-book with those who leaned towards the cultivation of pagan learning. We find, for example, one Securus Melior Felix, a rhetorician at Clermont, editing the treatise in the year 534, and distributing copies throughout Frankland (Hist. litt. de la France, iii. 21, 173); so that in the time of Gregory of Tours, it would appear to have become the ordinary manual of all those who among his countrymen still made any profession of learning (Hist. Franc. x. 31). St. Patrick, it has been conjectured, first brought the book to Ireland, where its speculative character recommended it to the native genius. Various features, however, combined to render the volume peculiarly obnoxious to the orthodox party; it contained, for example, a remarkable anticipation of the Copernican theory in a statement that Mercury and Venus revolved round the sun; it asserted the existence of an antipodes, and finally it referred to the Triune God of Christianity in the same category with the gods of paganism (Mart. Cap. ed. Kopp, p. 856). It was from these pages that Virgilius, the Irish bishop of Salzburg, derived his theory of an antipodes, by the maintenance of which he drew down upon himself the enmity of St. Boniface and the anathema of pope Zacharias (Jaffé, Mon. Mogunt. p. 191; see also Gorini, Défense de l'Église, ii. 375-383). Prudentius of Troyes, in his controversy with John Scotus Erigena, broadly accused the latter of having "imbibed the deadly poison" of heresy from the same work (Migne, Patr. cxv. 1294).

(2) The superior scholarship and classical attainments of the Irish scholars are attested by frequent evidence. Columban beguiled his leisure with the composition of Latin verse. The affectation of Greek modes of expression is, however a serious defect in their Latinity, and adds much to the obscurity of their diction. "It is palpable," says Mr. Haddan, "in British writers, as well as in Irish and Saxon, from Gildas down to Ricemarch" (Remains, p. 280). They were often well read in the Greek fathers, and Clement the Scot, when at the court of Carloman in 742, shewed himself familiar with the writings of Origen, and declined to be bound by the dicta of Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory (ib. pp. 274, 286; Jaffé, Mon. Mogunt. p. 140). The translation of the treatises of the pseudo-Dionysius by John Scotus Erigena in the 9th century (a task to which none of the Frankish clergy had been found equal) proves his superior acquaintance with the Greek language, while we may infer from the questions which, at the suggestion of Clement of Ireland, Charles the Great propounded to Alcuin at Tours, a more than ordinary acquaintance with astronomy (Migne, Patrol. c. 266; Jaffé, Alcuiniana, p. 420).

(3) The proneness of the Irish theologians to the use of the syllogism aroused the antipathy which, as we have already seen, was traditional in the Latin church to such modes of discussing theological questions; Benedict of Aniane notes this feature to their discredit: "Apud modernos scholasticos, maxime apud Scotos, iste syllogismus delusionis" (Baluze, Misc. v. 54). The practice, probably carried to its abuse, is discernible from Pelagius down to John Scotus, the latter of whom Prudentius found it necessary to remind that the fathers of the church had enjoined that the faith should be defended, not by sophistic trickeries, but by the plain statements of the Scriptures: "Nequaquam sophisticis illusionibus, sed Scripturarum sanctorum evidentissimis allegationibus" (Migne, cxv. 1013).

But although, in the 8th and 9th centuries, the treatise of Martianus Capella and the employment of dialectics were discouraged by the church, there is sufficient evidence that neither the one nor the other fell into disuse; so that when, at the commencement of the 12th century, William of Champeaux opened his school of logic at Paris, and found both a pupil and a rival in Abelard, the ancient art was revived with new vigour, and the history of Christian education itself entered upon a new phase.

SCRIBHNEOR, SCRIBHNIGH, the Irish scribe, was an important officer in the monastery, and probably took the place of the more ancient Seanchaidhe or historian of pagan times. He was copyist, illuminator, annalist, and in the end of the 10th century became merged in the Ferleighinn or public lecturer in the school (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 631-2). As thus associated with learning, he frequently became abbat and bishop. In the Annals of the Four Masters we find frequent obits of the scribe during the 8th, 9th, and 10th centuries, and he is often (A.D. 803, 820, 828, 871, &c.) called "bishop, scribe, and abbat," or even (A.D. 819) "scribe, bishop, anchorite, and abbat" (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 149 sq. and St. Adamnan, 365; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. iv. 129 sq.). By canon the mulet for the blood of a scribe was equal to that for the blood of a bishop or abbat (see the Irish canon of the 8th century, quoted from D'Achery and Martene by O'Connor, ib. iv. 130, and Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 150 n.), and the manuscripts which still remain, both in our own libraries and in the continental, attest their skill, taste, and assiduity, and their knowledge of the principles of their art, and of the combinations of the colours and colouring matter they used. Chief of these may be enumerated the Book of Kells, the Book of Armagh, and the Book of Lecan, with their ornamentation of Runic knots and animals with elongated and interlacing extremities (O'Curry, Lect. MS. Materials of Anc. Ir. Hist. pass. ed. 1873). [J. G.]

SCRIPTURE, STUDY OF. The object proposed in this article is to throw some light upon the habitual use which was made of Holy Scripture during the early ages of the church, as the subject of the constant study, and as the guide and director of the daily life of its members.

I. As to the numerous versions made in ancient times little needs to be added to the articles which have already appeared in the Dictionary of the Bible. [VERSIONS.] Great importance was attached to the multiplication of versions into the vernacular tongues of those who received Christianity. St. Augustine (De Doctr. Christ. c. xi.) writes: "For the translations of the Scriptures from Hebrew into Greek can be counted, but the Latin translators are out of all number. For in the early days of the faith every man who happened to lay hands upon a Greek manuscript, and who thought he had any knowledge, were it ever so little, of the two languages, ventured upon the work of translation."^a In the fifth chapter of the same work St. Augustine bears witness to the early diffusion of the Holy Scriptures in various tongues. Eusebius also says (De Præparat. Evangel. xii. 1) that the Scriptures were translated into all languages, both of Greeks and barbarians, throughout the world; and Chrysostom (Hom. i. in Joan.) says that the Syrians, the Egyptians, the Indians, the Persians, the Ethiopians, and a multitude of other nations translated them into "their own tongues."

St. Augustine, in his letter to the people of Madaura (Letter ccxxii. vol. ii. p. 446, Clark's ed.), says that the Divine Scriptures had "come into the hands of all."

II. Our next evidence of the actual use made of Holy Scripture in the early Church is derived from the citations both from the Old and New Testament, with which the works of early writers abound. It does not fall within our present province to discuss the import of the references made to apocryphal writings under designations the same as, or similar to, those given to the Canonical Books of Scripture. (See CANONICAL BOOKS, p. 278, and Dict. of the Bible, s. v. CANON.)

The following extract from the Bampton Lectures of Mr. Conybeare bears directly upon the knowledge of Holy Scripture possessed by the members of the Corinthian Church in sub-apostolic days: "It is quite evident (Mr. Conybeare writes) that it (i.e. the first Epistle of Clement) must have been written to a Church, of which a considerable and influential portion of the members had been Jews, or proselytes to that faith, since it throughout supposes the most intimate acquaintance with the Scriptures of the Old Testament; for these, and not the Scriptures of the New, are universally quoted as the written authority for the doctrines it contains. The author indeed very properly refers to the discourses of our blessed Lord as to an authority of equal, and indeed more especial, weight; but he never expressly quotes these from any particular written gospel; and although he always exactly agrees with these evangelical narratives in substance and in sense, yet the verbal discrepancies will shew that he does not transcribe from them; but, as bishop Pearson has well observed, seems to have relied on a memory previously familiar with our Lord's words from the oral communications of the apostles or their disciples" (pp. 55, 56).

The same remarks apply to a considerable extent to other writings of the sub-apostolic age, and of the first three centuries of the Christian era, throughout which we observe that a uniform appeal is made to the Scriptures as the unerring rule of faith, and as the foundation of the various creeds which were composed within that period.

III. The next evidence which will be adduced of the actual use of Holy Scripture in the early Church, is derived from the numerous and earnest exhortations which are found in the homilies and other works of the most celebrated writers to the diligent study of Scripture, from the invitations addressed to the heretics and the heathen to examine the sacred writings for themselves, and from the incidental notices which their writings afford of the extent to which the Scriptures were read and studied in private, and of the effects thus produced.

Clement in his epistle, c. 45, exhorts the Corinthians to "look into the Holy Scriptures, which are the true words of the Holy Ghost." Again in the fifty-third chapter he says, "Ye know full well the Holy Scriptures, and have thoroughly searched into the oracles of God." Polycarp, in his epistle to the Philipppians, c. 12, ^a There is ground for doubt whether by the use of the words interpretes and interpretari, Augustine meant to denote only translators from the original tongues, or whether he included also those who undertook the revision of existing versions.

writes thus: "I trust ye are well exercised in the Holy Scriptures, and that nothing is hid from you." Tatian in his Address to the Greeks (c. 29) bears witness to the practical effect produced upon his own heart and life by the writings with which he happened to meet, "too old to be compared with the opinions of the Greeks, and too divine to be compared with their errors." Theophilus (ad Autolyicum, i. 14) bears similar testimony to that of Tatian to the effect produced on his own mind by the study of the Scriptures, and he urges his friend "to study carefully the prophetic writings," assuring him that they will lead him "more certainly to a way of escape from everlasting punishments, and to the attainment of the everlasting blessings of God." Justin Martyr (Cohort. ad Græcos, c. 35) earnestly exhorts those to whom he writes "as the one thing which remained for them to do," that "renouncing the error of their fathers they would read the prophecies of the sacred writers . . . and learn from them that which will give them everlasting life." Athenagoras in his Plea for the Christians writes thus: "I think that you also cannot be ignorant of the writings either of Moses, or of Isaiah and Jeremiah, and the other prophets," and adds, "But I leave it to you, when you meet with the books themselves, to examine carefully the prophecies contained in them, that you may, on fitting grounds, defend us from the abuse cast upon us" (c. ix.). In like manner Tertullian (Apol. c. 31) invites the Roman presidents or magistrates at Carthage to "look into the words of God," and adds that the Christians did not conceal their Scriptures, and that many accidents brought them before those who were not of their religion. Clement of Alexandria in his Exhortation to the Heathen (c. ix.) not only quotes many of those "ten thousand Scriptures," which, he says, he could adduce, but he addresses them in the following words: "No one will be so impressed by the exhortations of any of the saints as he is by the words of the Lord Himself, the lover of man. . . . Faith will lead you in; experience will teach you; Scripture will train you, for it says, 'Come hither, O children; listen to me, and I will teach you the fear of the Lord.'" And, again, in the Stromateis (i. 7), Clement writes as follows: "Wherefore also the Scriptures were translated into the language of the Greeks in order that they might never be able to allege the excuse of ignorance, inasmuch as they are able to hear also what we have in our hands if they only wish." So also Tertullian (ad Uxorem, ii. 6), when setting forth the dangers arising from marriages between Christians and idolaters, asks, "Ubi fomenta fidei de Scripturarum interlectione?" where he seems to assume as a matter of course that such reading would be common with those of the same faith. Other passages might be adduced from the same writer in proof of the prevalent use of Holy Scripture amongst Christians, and of the appeals made to it in their apologetical and controversial works in terms which imply its accessibility to all. In like manner Origen (in Jerem. Hom. iv.) says: "Let us read the Scriptures of the Old Testament. . . . Let us also read the Scriptures of the New Testament, the words of the apostles; and having read them, let it be our care that they be written in the table of our hearts." And again

(in lib. Jerem. Hom. xx.) he says that "though at the very time of reading them (the Scriptures) there be no sensible advantage, yet in the end they will be found profitable for strengthening virtuous dispositions and weakening the habits of vice." And, once more, he exhorts his hearers to "come daily to the wells of the Scriptures, the waters of the Holy Spirit, and there draw, and carry home a full vessel" (in Gen. Hom. x.). In the letter addressed by Theonas, bishop of Alexandria, about the close of the 3rd century, to Lucianus, the chief chamberlain of the emperor (probably Diocletian), we find some interesting directions given concerning the duties of the person who may be entrusted by the emperor with the custody of his library. Amongst these we find a direction to "laud the Divine Scriptures which Ptolemy Philadelphus caused to be translated into our language; and sometimes, too, the gospel and the apostle will be lauded for their divine oracles" (c. 7). The following advice is also given to Lucianus himself: "Let no day pass by without reading some portion of the sacred Scriptures" (c. 9; in Dacherii Spicilegium, iii. pp. 297-299). Cyprian (de Spectaculis, c. 10) says: "Let the faithful Christian devote himself to the sacred Scriptures, and there he shall find worthy exhibitions for his faith." Origen urges his hearers not only to hear the Scriptures read in the church, but also to exercise themselves in the reading of the same in their houses, and to meditate thereon day and night (cf. Hom. in Levit. ix. tom. vi. pp. 164, 165, ed. Wirceburgi, 1783; cf. Hom. in Gen. x. tom. v. p. 229; Hom. in Ex. xii. tom. v. pp. 465, 466). St. Augustine, writing to Proba (Ep. c. xxxii. ii. p. 300, Ant. 1700), exhorts her specially to read the writings of the apostles, assuring her that by them she will be incited to acquaint herself with the prophets, whose testimonies the apostles used.

The earnest exhortations of St. Chrysostom, addressed to all classes of his hearers, to devote themselves to the diligent study of holy Scripture, are familiar to all who are acquainted with his writings. Such exhortations are found, e.g. in his twenty-first homily on Genesis, and in his thirty-second and forty-first homilies on St. John, and also in the homilies of St. Basil, as e.g. in those on Pss. xxviii. and lix. A more remarkable passage occurs in the third of Chrysostom's sermons on Lazarus, a passage which deserves special consideration in connexion with the present subject, not only by reason of the earnest exhortations of the preacher to the private study of holy Scripture, but also as bearing directly on the interesting and important inquiry respecting the extent to which copies of the Bible were multiplied and circulated in the 4th century. In the beginning of that sermon, Chrysostom assigns as one reason why he did not complete his examination of the parable of Lazarus in one day, his desire that the subject of his discourse might take deeper root in the minds of his hearers by continuous meditation on what he had said. He then goes on to assign as the reason why he frequently announced the subject of his discourse several days before its delivery, his desire that during the intervening days his hearers should take the book into their hands, and by a careful examination of the whole of the pericope, or section, they might become better prepared for what was afterwards to be said (i. p. 903, ed. Paris, 1839). Chrysostom proceeds to exhort his hearers, and to assure them that he will never cease to exhort them, to the constant reading of the Holy Scriptures, and to expose the invalidity of the excuses of those who alleged that the study of the Scriptures was incumbent only upon persons who had retired from the world, and did not appertain to those who were engrossed by its daily cares and anxieties. He proceeds to exhort his hearers to procure the Scriptures for themselves, and points out to them the advantages accruing from their possession, amongst which he alleges that even the sight of the books makes men less prone to fall into sin. It is important to observe that the exhortations of Chrysostom have reference to the Old Testament as well as to the New; that he earnestly exhorts his hearers to continue to read the Scriptures, even though they might not understand much which they read; to have recourse, when needful, to those who were better instructed than themselves; and, finally, he assures them that when the zeal and the diligence to which he encourages them are displayed, if man should be unable to teach them the truths which they desired to learn, God would Himself reveal them. The whole of the first three sections of this sermon deserve special attention.

Another passage bearing upon the multiplicity of copies of the Bible in the 4th century is found in Chrysostom's tenth homily (according to some editions the eleventh) on St. John, where he deals with the excuse for neglecting the study of the Bible grounded on the alleged difficulty of procuring copies. As regards the rich, he says that this excuse is altogether ridiculous. He does not attach much weight to it as regards the poor, but observes that if any are so poor that they cannot purchase copies of the Scriptures for themselves, they might nevertheless, by reason of the continual public reading of them, become acquainted with the whole of their contents. Once more, in his thirty-second homily on St. John, Chrysostom reproves those who cared only for the fineness of the parchment on which copies of the Scriptures were written, or for the beauty of the characters, and who neglected the contents. And, as illustrating his own practice, reference may be made to a passage in his tenth homily on Genesis, in which he says that by taking the sacred books (τὰ θεῖα βιβλία, a term first applied to the entire collection of the books of Scripture by Chrysostom) into our hands, both before and after meals, we shall be able, when at home, to derive profit, and to afford spiritual food to the soul.

More especially the great writers of the early church urged the necessity of the diligent study of Holy Scripture on the part of the clergy. Gregory Nazianzen complains of those who, before they well knew how to read the Scriptures, had the vanity to think that they were qualified for the government of the church (Orat. i. de Fuga). St. Chrysostom, in his treatise de Sacerdotio, earnestly enforces the diligent study of Holy Scripture upon the clergy. He observes that, as spiritual physic for the souls of men, the word of God was instead of everything that was used in the cure of bodily distempers (lib. iv. c. 3), and therefore that it was necessary that the ministers of God should be very diligent in studying the Scriptures, that the word of Christ might dwell in them richly (ib. c. 4). St. Jerome in like manner says that a sermon should be seasoned well with Scripture: "Sermo presbyteri Scripturarum lectione conditus sit" (Ep. ii. ad Nepotian.). And again, "Divinas Scripturas saepius lege; immo nunquam de manibus tuis sacra lectio deponatur" (ad Nepot. de Vita Clericorum, i. p. 16). So, at a later period, the council held at Toledo in A.D. 633 requires, in its twenty-fifth canon, that the clergy should be well acquainted with the sacred Scriptures. St. Gregory the Great, writing to Augustine after he had been made "archbishop of the English nation," as Bede says, assumes that he is "well versed in holy writ, and particularly St. Paul's epistle to Timothy, wherein he endeavours to instruct him how he should behave himself in the house of God" (Bede, Eccl. Hist. p. 46, ed. Giles).

At the designation of Eraclius by St. Augustine, as his colleague in the discharge of some of his responsibilities, and his successor in the episcopate, he reminded the clergy and laity of Hippo that it had been agreed between them that no one should intrude upon him during five days of the week, in order that he might discharge that duty in the study of Holy Scripture which had been assigned to him in two councils of Numidia and Carthage; and he expresses his resolution for the remainder of his days, so far as Eraclius would "kindly give him leave," to devote himself to the study of the sacred Scriptures (Letter ccxiii. vol. ii. pp. 408, 409, Clark's ed.).

The following references throw some light upon the rules and observances of those who adopted the monastic life. In St. Augustine's rules for the observance of the nuns belonging to a monastery in which his sister had been prioress, he says that from the time of their coming to table until that of their rising from it, they should listen to whatever was read to them in course, and that, whilst their mouths were exercised in receiving food, their ears should be occupied in receiving the word of God (Letter cxi. vol. ii. p. 396, Clark's ed.). Cassian says, respecting the monks of Egypt, that their manual labour in their respective cells was so conducted that their meditation on the Psalms and other portions of Scripture was never intermitted (de Instit. Coenob. lib. iii. c. 2). St. Jerome also says of the Egyptian monks: "Post horam nonam in commune concurrunt; Psalmi resonant, Scripturae resonant ex more" (Ep. xxii. ad Eustoch.). The same writer says also that they daily learned some portion of holy Scripture (ib.). Bede says, concerning his own manner of life in the monastery of Weremouth, "I wholly applied myself to the study of Scripture."

IV. The next evidence which shall be adduced of the actual use which was made of Holy Scripture in the early Church is derived from the extent to which it was either committed to memory as a distinct exercise, or, as a result of continuous reading and meditation, became familiar to the mind both of public teachers and also of private individuals.

Eusebius says that Origen's father trained him from his childhood in the Scriptures, appointing him to repeat some passages every day (Hist. Eccles. vi. 2). Socrates also says that Eusebius of Emesa had studied the Holy Scriptures from his infancy and was then taught human learning (Hist. Eccles. ii. 9)^b, and Sozomen, who bears the same testimony, says that this was done "according to the custom of his country" (Hist. Eccles. iii. 6). The same writer says that Marcus the heretic was expert in the Scriptures (vi. 29), and Palladius says that he could repeat all the Old and New Testament without book (Histor. Lausiac. c. xxi. quoted by Bingham, Antiq. iv. p. 176). Gregory Nyssen remarks, in his life of his sister Macrina, that in her infancy she was taught the easy portions of Scripture that were most suitable to her age. Sozomen says of Julian the Apostate (Hist. Eccles. v. 2) that "he had been brought up in the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures under the guidance of priests and bishops." The same writer says of Mark, one of the monks of Scetis, that "he committed the sacred Scriptures to memory" (ib. vi. 29). St. Jerome says that the young virgins whom Paula had collected out of different provinces were obliged to learn the Psalms and some portion of Scripture every day.^c Augustine (de Doct. Christ. ii. ix.) says that the first rule in the study of Holy Scripture is "to read them so as to commit them to memory," though he qualifies this direction by the words which follow, "or at least so as not to remain wholly ignorant of them." He adds: "In this matter memory counts for a great deal; but if the memory be defective, no rules can supply the want."

He refers moreover to the case of those with whom the Holy Scriptures had been so exclusively their text-book that when they met with other and more commonly used forms of speech than those to which they had been accustomed in their Latin Bibles, they were "surprised at them, and thought them less pure Latin than those which they had learnt from Scripture" (De Doct. Christ. ii. 15).

Thus, e.g. in his preface to his work on Christian Doctrine, St. Augustine refers to the case of the Egyptian monk Antony, who, though unable to read himself, "is said to have committed the Scriptures to memory through hearing them read by others, and by dint of wise meditation to have arrived at a thorough understanding of them" (Works, vol. ix. p. 2. Edinburgh, 1873). Gregory the Great, when chiding the abbat Theodore for neglecting to read some of the words of his Saviour daily, mentions the case of Servulus, a palsied man at Rome, who purchased a copy of the Scriptures, and, though unable to read, learned the Holy Scripture through hearing it constantly read to him by the religious men whom he entertained (Hom. xv. in Evangel. Quoted by Bingham, iv. p. 179). Eusebius of Caesarea mentions the case of a blind man who could repeat any part of the Bible, and sometimes supplied the place of a reader in the church (De Martyr. Palaestin. c. xiii. ib.). Socrates makes incidental mention of one Pambos, an illiterate man, who went to some one who could read for the purpose of being taught a Psalm (Hist. Eccl. iv. 23). The same writer says of Didymus, who lost his sight at a very early age, that his acquaintance with the divine oracles, as contained both in the Old and New Testament, was so perfect that he composed several treatises in exposition of them (ib. iv. 25), and of the Emperor Theodosius Junior, A.D. 422, that by his early training "he learnt the Holy Scriptures by heart," and that he was "a more indefatigable collector of the sacred books than even Ptolemy Philadelphus had formerly been" (ib. vii. 22).

Jerome (Ad Gaudentium de Pacatulae Infantulae Educatione, i. pp. 45, 1515) advises that when seven years old Pacatula should learn by heart the Psalms, and should then proceed to make the books of Solomon, the gospels, the Apostles, and the Prophets the treasure of her heart. Again, when writing to Laeta concerning the education of her daughter (i. p. 26), he advises that at a tender age she should be imbued with the sweet Psalms. He prescribes in the following words the order in which he recommends that the Scriptures should be studied and committed to memory: "Discat primo Psalterium: hic se canticis avocet: et in Proverbiis Solomonis erudiatur ad vitam. In Ecclesiaste consuescat quae mundi sunt calcare. In Job, virtutis et patientiae exempla sectetur. Ad Evangelia transeat, nunquam ea positura de manibus. Apostolorum Acta et Epistolae, tota cordis imbibat voluntate. Cumque pectoris sui cellarium his opibus locupletaverit, mandet memoriae Prophetas, Pentateuchum, et Regum et Paralipomenon libros, Esdrae quoque et Hester volumina. Ad ultimum, sine periculo discat Canticum Canticorum, ne si in exordio legerit, sub carnalibus verbis spiritualium nuptiarum epithalamium non intelligens, vulneretur. Caveat omnia Apocrypha" (ib. p. 27). So again (Ad Demetriadem de Virginitate servandâ, i. p. 31) Jerome advises Demetriades thus: "Statue quot horis sanctam Scripturam ediscere debas; quanto tempore legere, non ad laborem, sed ad delectationem et instructionem animae."

Again (Vita Hilar. c. 7) St. Jerome says of Hilarion, a monk of Palestine, "Scripturas sanctas memoriter tenens, post orationem et psalmos, quasi Deo praesente, recitabat."

V. The importance which was attached to the public reading of Holy Scripture in the religious assemblies of the early Christians is abundantly established. [EPISTLE; GOSPEL; LECTION; PROPHECY.]

But besides the public reading of the Scriptures in their assemblies and the earnest exhortations with which the writings of the early Christians abound to the diligent study of the same in private, it appears to have been a custom, adopted in some parts at least, to have copies of the Scriptures in the vernacular tongue placed in convenient parts of the churches so that those who frequented them might have opportunity of reading them for themselves either before or after the public services. The following lines written by Paulinus upon the wall of the church

^b Valesius, in his notes on the second book of Socrates' Ecclesiastical History, says that "it is well known that the boys of Edessa got by heart the books of Sacred Scripture, according to the usage of their ancestors."

^c "Nec licebat cuiquam sororum ignorare psalmos, et non de Scripturis quotidie aliquod discere." (Epitaph. Paulae Opp. tom. i. p. 84. 1513) of Nola bear witness to the existence of this custom :

"Si quem sancta tenet meditandi in lege voluntas;
Hic poterit residens sacris intendere libris." ⁴

VI. The last evidence which will be adduced of the use of Holy Scripture made in the early Church is derived from the eagerness with which the heathen persecutors searched for copies of the Scriptures, the importance which the owners attached to their possession, and the infamy which was incurred by those who voluntarily surrendered them. [TRADITOR.]

Amongst the many passages which might be cited in proof of the practical use of Holy Scripture in the early Church reference may be made to the letter of Innocent bishop of Rome to Chrysostom when expelled from his bishopric, and of Theodoret to Dioscorus bishop of Alexandria. In the former of these letters Innocent reminds Chrysostom that "a good man may be sorely tried, but cannot be overcome, for he is preserved and guarded by the truths of Holy Scripture. The Holy Bible," he continues, "which we expound to the people, affords abundant examples of the afflictions to which the saints have been invariably subjected, and shews that they did not receive their crowns till they had passed with patience through the severest trials" (Soz. Hist. Eccles. viii. 26). In the letter of Theodoret to Dioscorus, written about A.D. 444, he speaks of the great comfort which the examples contained in Scripture afford to those who are calumniated, and cites the case of Joseph when cast into prison by Potiphar, of David when persecuted by Saul, and lastly of our Lord the Saviour Himself when accused by His enemies of deceiving the people (Baronii Annales, vi. pp. 25, 26; 1685).

As a further illustration of the practical use made of Holy Scripture in times of sorrow, reference may be made to an incident recorded in the 'Lives of the Abbats of Weremouth and Jarrow' appended to the works of Bede, to the effect that on the night on which Benedict died, Jan. 12, A.D. 689, some of the brethren met together in the church and passed the night without sleep in praying and singing, whilst others remained in the side chambers awaiting his departure; and it is added, "a portion of Scripture from the Gospels, appointed to be read every evening, was recited by a priest during the whole night to relieve their sorrow" (Bede, Works, iv. 385; ed. Giles). [C. J. E.]

SCROLL. [VOLUME.]

SCRUTINIUM. [MISSA, p. 1203.]

SCULPTURE, CHRISTIAN. The abhorrence of carved representations of the objects of worship inherited by the Christian from the Jewish church was at first so great as almost entirely to forbid the application of the art of sculpture to the service of religion. Early Christian statues, either in marble or bronze, are of the very rarest occurrence. Hardly more than half a dozen examples can be reckoned—enough to shew that the use of the plastic art was not wholly interdicted, but, at the same time, that its use was regarded with grave suspicion and dislike. If we could accept the authenticity of the story related by Eusebius that a statue of our Lord was erected at Paneas by the woman diseased with the issue of blood [JESUS CHRIST, REPRESENTATIONS, p. 877], we should have the earliest possible example of sculpture devoted to Christianity. The tale, however, is totally unworthy of credence. The statues of Christ and other scriptural personages with which Alexander Severus furnished his "lararium" have no claim to belong to the domain of Christian art. The very few early Christian statues that are known to exist exhibit in their form and technical treatment the genius of late Roman art, and possess no individual characteristics. As Lübke remarks (Hist. of Sculpt. i. 335), "the novelty of the subject was not yet powerful enough to evoke new forms or new expressions."

The only early Christian statues we can enumerate are those of the Good Shepherd, of St. Peter, and that of St. Hippolytus. D'Agincourt's researches in Italy during fifty years discovered no other well-authenticated example. For seven or eight centuries the art of sculpture was extinct, except in works in relief on sarcophagi and ivories.

I. STATUES.

(1) Among the earliest and best of these is a small marble statuette of the Good Shepherd, formerly in the Vatican Library, now in the Lateran Museum. "It is a pleasing idyllic figure, with artistic qualities that remind one of the works of a better period" (Appell, Mon. of Early Christian Art, p. 4). The tunic drawn up is fastened round the waist, and the shepherd's scrip hangs behind; he fondly holds the legs of the recovered sheep thrown over his shoulders by both hands. The antique grace it breathes, and the absence of any distinctive marks, have caused its Christian origin to be somewhat needlessly questioned. The legs have been partly restored (Appell, u. s.; Westwood, Early Christian Sculpture, p. 50, apud Parker, Archæology of Rome, "Tombs"; Perkins, Tuscan Sculpture, i. p. xliii.). [SHEPHERD, THE GOOD, p. 1893.]

The Lateran Museum contains another marble statuette of the Good Shepherd, much inferior in execution, which is stiff and rude. The shepherd is young and beardless; he holds the lamb with his right hand on his shoulder, and the "pedum" with his left (Westwood, u. s.; Perret, Catacombes, iv. 4). There is also one of inferior workmanship in the Kircherian Museum (Perkins, u. s. i. xxxix.); and one is mentioned at the end of the 4th century in the collection of the Duke of Medina Coeli at Seville.

(2) St. Peter.—By far the most important early Christian statue as a work of art is the famous bronze figure of St. Peter in the Vatican basilica. It may probably be placed, as it is by Dr. Appell, Perkins, and Lübke, in the 5th century. Mr. J. H. Parker, however, who always regards early dates with suspicion, regards it as "a fine work of the 13th century." It is a close imitation of the ancient Roman portrait statues, and, according to Lübke (u. s. i. 337), "displays a care and accuracy of technical skill astonishing in the 5th century," but a complete absence of originality "we have in every line of the laborious imitation of antique senatorial figures." The figure is in Roman costume, with the right foot extended to receive the kisses of the faithful; the right hand is extended in blessing, and he holds the keys in the left. The marble chair in which it is seated is of the 15th century. According to one tradition, Leo I. melted down the ancient statue of Jupiter Capitolinus and recast it in this form; others hold, with less probability, that it is the old statue with a new head and hands. The celebrated statue of St. Peter which Leo the Isaurian threatened to destroy in the time of Gregory II. (726-730), was probably that preserved in the crypt of St. Peter's, the body of which is antique, the head being an addition of the 13th century.

The royal cabinet at Berlin once contained a small standing bronze statuette of St. Peter, said to have been found in the catacombs. It seems to have been taken by Napoleon I. to Paris, and to have never returned. It is described as being of good style, with drapery of artistic merit. The apostle was clad in the tunic and toga, holding the labarum in the left hand, and giving the benediction with the right. The head displayed the broad features, the short, thick beard and curling hair characteristic of St. Peter (Bartoli, Antiche Lucerne, part iii. pl. 27; Münter, Sinnbilder, ii. 21).

(3) St. Hippolytus.—This is a marble sitting statue, much restored, especially in the upper portions of the figure. It was formerly in the Vatican Library, but is now in the Lateran Museum. The figure is seated in a dignified attitude in a marble cathedra, on which is inscribed the canon Paschalis; and on the other side a list of Hippolytus's writings. It is vested in the philosophic pallium. The right elbow rests on a book held in the left hand, and the right hand is raised to the breast. The date is uncertain, but it is probably not later than the 6th century. Mr. Perkins regards it as devoid of character, while it is pronounced by Winckelmann and other authorities to be "the best known example of early Christian sculpture" (Westwood, u. s. p. 37; Perret, v. pl. i.; Bunsen, Hippolytus, i. frontispiece; Münter, Sinnbilder, ii. 13; D'Agincourt, Sculpt. pl. iii. No. 1).

II. SARCOPHAGI.

The chief field for the exercise of the art of sculpture in the early Christian church was furnished by the sarcophagi, in which the remains of its more wealthy members were deposited. The number of these is very large, especially in Rome, where very many have been discovered in the catacombs and other places of early Christian burial. Examples are also to be found at Ravenna, Milan, and other cities of Italy, as well as in the south of France, where a native school of Christian sculpture, derived from Italy, evidently flourished. There are also a few in Spain. The chief examples in Rome are now collected in the Lateran Museum, where a very interesting series of examples of Christian sculpture are brought under the eye at once, and may be studied and compared at leisure. The most important of these, as well as the other principal sarcophagi now existing in Rome, have been photographed at the cost of Mr. J. H. Parker, and their designs have been thus made accessible to the student at home.

The word "sarcophagus," as well as the mode of burial, was borrowed by the early Christians from heathenism, and passed into the nomenclature of the church. Augustine writes: "Arca in qua mortuus ponitur, quod omnes jam σαρκοφάγον vocant" (De Civit. Dei, xviii. 5). The word is also found in an early epitaph given by De Rossi, "in hoc sarcophago conditur" (Inscr. Christ. Rom. ii. 530).

Nowhere is the rapid decline of art more recognisable than in the sarcophagi. The bas-reliefs, which so lavishly adorn their sides, manifest a lamentable deterioration of style. The compositions are crowded and ill-balanced; the figures are usually ill-drawn, with short, thick bodies and large heads, and stiff draperies, and a general absence of dignity or grace. The compositions are rather architectural and pictorial than sculptural or statuesque. The figures occupy one plane, unrelieved by any depth of backgrounds. The majority of them are seen in front view, instead of the profile, which characterises the Grecian friezes. But with this decided deterioration of style, it is evident that the mode of decoration and its general spirit are directly derived from pagan art, and are in no sense the natural development of the Christian mind. The pose of the figures, their attitudes, the drapery, the types of the heads are inherited from ancient plastic works. The inferiority is due to the want of skill in the sculptors employed, not to the introduction of new forms. As a rule the earliest works are the best, and conform most closely to the pagan type. The later we descend, and the more unmistakable the Christian character of the sculpture, the greater is its inferiority as a work of art. Sarcophagi bearing a distinctly Christian character scarcely appear before the 4th century. Le Blant (Sarcoph. Chrétiens d'Arles, pp. iii. iv.) speaks of the exceeding rarity of earlier examples. He refers to one bearing the date A.D. 273, and regards as belonging to the same primitive type, that of Livia Primitiva, transported from Rome to the Louvre, and one at La Gayole (pl. xxxiv.), but is able to mention no others; and though an earlier date has been confidently affirmed for some others, the most trustworthy authorities agree that there are no well-authenticated examples of Christian sarcophagi which can be assigned to the 2nd century and hardly any to the 3rd.

There is abundant evidence that pagan sarcophagi were used with little scruple for the burial of Christians—"Profanis tumulis Christiani non raro quasi propriis usi sunt" (Mabillon, Iter Ital. § 10, p. 81). The use of the sarcophagus was a mark of wealth, and the desire not to shew any inferiority to their neighbours, which is nowhere more powerful than in funeral rites, would lead Christians of means and position to adopt the mode of the disposal of their dead which was appropriate to their rank, without much regard to the character of the sculptures which decorated their last resting-place. If there had been Christian sarcophagus-makers they would doubtless have employed them by preference; but in the absence of artists of their own faith, they would have recourse to sculptors of the old religion, only taking care to avoid those scenes which had an immoral tendency, and by preference selecting pastoral or vintage scenes, or other subjects into which a symbolical meaning could be easily read. A sarcophagus, discovered in the cemetery of St. Agnes, once containing the body of a Christian virgin, and bearing the inscription "Aurelia Agapetilla, ancilla Dei," is ornamented with figures of Bacchus and naked Amorini, side by side with "orantes" (Boldetti, Osservaz. 466). Another in the Vatican, figured by Cancellieri, exhibits Bacchanalian scenes, and a Christian inscription. One in the grounds of the Villa Medici on the Pincian is mentioned by Martigny, on which both Cupid and Psyche and Jonah appear. There is a very remarkable example of the 4th century at Tortona figured by Mabillon (It. Ital. Mus. It. i. 223), bearing the thoroughly pagan subjects of Leda and the Swan, Phaeton, Castor and Pollux, and boys looking on at a cockfight, together with the neutral subjects of the Vintage, and the Good Shepherd. Bottazzi, a canon of Tortona, has written a lengthy disquisition (Tortona, 1824) to establish the Christian character of this sarcophagus, but it hardly admits a doubt that it was originally a pagan work. The sarcophagus at Aix la Chapelle, in which the body of Charlemagne was first laid, on which the Rape of Proserpine is carved, is a well-known example of the employment of a pagan tomb for a Christian burial. The beauty and sumptuousness of the work overrode all scruples. The earliest dated sarcophagus bearing an undoubted Christian subject is one from the cemetery of SS. Peter and Marcellinus, presenting the Nativity, with the ox and ass standing by the cratch, with the consular date A.D. 343 (NATIVITY). The magnificent sarcophagus of St. Helena, the mother of the Emperor Constantine (d. 328), now in the Vatican, probably the largest ever fashioned with the exception of that of her granddaughter Constantia, is entirely devoid of Christian symbols. It is formed of one enormous block of red porphyry, highly polished, the face of which is covered with groups of armed warriors on horseback striking down their enemies, or driving their captives before them, all, as it were, floating in the air, without any indication of the ground. On the front and back at the upper angles are the busts of Constantine and Helena, and on the lid repose lions, wreaths, and winged genii. Lübke pronounces it to be "full of expression and animation in a good antique style" (i. 338); but Dr. Braun justly remarks that "the tolerable execution of individual parts only renders its want of meaning as a whole still more striking, there being a want of unity of design and conception" (Airinghi, ii. 41; Bottari, iii. pl. 196; Ciampini, iii. 28; Parker, Tombs, pl. xii.).

The sister sarcophagus of St. Constantia (d. 324), sculptured like the last-mentioned out of a solid block of porphyry, is equally wanting in any definite Christian symbolism. It is the earliest example of the vintage scenes with which Christian sarcophagi were so frequently decorated. It is a tasteless work, exhibiting heavy groups of clumsy-winged genii gathering grapes or treading them out (of the same character, but much inferior in style to the scenes on the mosaic vault of the sepulchral chapel where the tomb was found), with arabesque festoons, peacocks, and rams at the angles, all laboriously chiselled out of the unaccommodating material (Airinghi, ii. 157; Bottari, iii. 132; Ciampini, iii. 31). A sarcophagus of much less sumptuous character but of far more graceful design, in the portico of St. Lorenzo, shews similar scenes depicted with considerable life. Small winged genii gather the grapes from the vines in baskets; a goat laden with panniers carries them; one of the genii rides an ass; a cock pecks at a lizard, &c. (Bottari, iii. 19; Agincourt, Sculpt. vi. 1). A very fine example from St. Sebastiano, considered to be of the 4th century, stands in the hall of the Lateran Museum. Here, also, genii are gathering and pressing grapes; one rides a goat; another carries a kid. In the centre and either end of the face stands the Good Shepherd (Garrucci, Monum. del Mus. Lat. tav. xlix. fig. 1-4). Corresponding scenes from the olive harvest are with local propriety carved on a sarcophagus in the museum at Arles. Genii un-winged, naked or lightly clad, some on ladders, pick or carry the fruit to the oil-press (Millin, Voyage, &c., pl. 61, no. 3; Appell, p. 37).

Pastoral scenes are equally abundant, and the Good Shepherd occurs constantly, sometimes with, sometimes without subjects from Holy Scripture. One in the Lateran Museum (photograph 2924) portrays the shepherd character of our Lord and His apostles with unusual distinctness. The Good Shepherd with His "pedum," His right hand on the head of a sheep, stands in the centre, and is repeated with a group of two or three sheep at either end of the face. Between stand the apostles, six on either side, each with a sheep at his feet. Professor Westwood, in the above-quoted essay, supplies a large number of references to pastoral scenes represented on Christian sarcophagi (p. 43).

Many sarcophagi bear in the centre of their face, and sometimes also at the ends, what are known as IMAGINES CLIPEATAE, i. e. the busts of the departed, or in some cases standing figures (e. g. that of Probus and Faltonia, Bottari, 17), contained in a disk or shell, or surrounded with a wreath, sometimes borne by winged genii. In some cases these busts are unfinished, proving that the sarcophagi were ordinarily sold in an incomplete state, leaving the busts to be carved into the likenesses of the defunct (Le Blant, p. 14, pl. viii.; Fabretti, Inscr. p. 124; De Rossi, Bullet. 1865, p. 69; Parker's Photographs, No. 2902). Sometimes the disk bears only the sacred monogram (Bottari, 37). Not a few of the less costly are distinguished only by an "imago clipeata," the remaining surface being incised with curved channels, known as strigils, from their resemblance to the bath instrument of that name. Hardly any of the sarcophagi have inscriptions. The magnificent tomb of Junius Bassus is an exception, as is that already mentioned of Aurelia Agapetilla. The custom of decorating sarcophagi with colours, proved to exist in Syria by Renan (Descr. de Phénicie, pp. 415, 416), has been shewn by Le Blant to have been sometimes adopted, not only in Jewish catacombs (Garrucci, Cimet. d'Antichi Ebrei, p. 21), but also in those of the Christians (Le Blant, p. 37).

One class of sarcophagi have as their only or principal subject figures of our Lord and His apostles. Reference has already been made to that in the Lateran Museum, in which the whole series appear in the character of shepherds. One of the most remarkable of this class, perhaps the very finest of the Roman sarcophagi, is that of sensation is found in sarcophagi out of Rome. The sarcophagus of Titus Gorgonius in the crypt of the cathedral of Ancona represents Christ standing on a mount, with a male and female figure embracing His feet. Near Him stand St. Paul and a disciple with a jewelled cross. Four disciples stand under arches on either side. At Ravenna, where the sarcophagi are of later date, we find our Lord no longer seated but enthroned, and sometimes nimbed; on one at St. Apollinare in Classe, thought by Professor Westwood to be perhaps not earlier than the 7th century, our Lord, represented as a nimbed youth, is seated between St. Paul, who with veiled hand receives a roll, and St. Peter, who bears a key and a cross. Both the apostles approach our Lord with hasty strides, their garments carried by the wind. On either side two figures offer crowns (Appell, p. 28). At "St. Maria in porto fuori" our Lord appears also as a beardless figure enthroned Sarcophagus of Petronius Probus.

The face is divided into compartments by spirally fluted columns supporting arches, in the spandrels of which are birds pecking at baskets of grapes. In the centre compartment our Lord, holding a jewelled cross, stands on a mound from which issue the four rivers of Paradise; on either side of Him stand St. Peter and St. Paul in attitudes of reverential attention. Beyond, to the right and left, are two arches, each enshrining two apostles. Each end has three arches, with two figures. On the back stand Probus himself and his wife Faltonia hand in hand, with a disciple at either end (Bosio, 49, 51, 53; Aringhi, pp. 281, 283, 285; Bottari, tav. 16-18; D'Agincourt, pl. vi. figs. 12-15; Appell, p. 12). A sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum (photograph 29/9) bears on its face Christ and the apostles, each bearing a roll, under arches alternately round and angular. The same system of reprebetween four apostles, one of whom approaches Him bearing a crown. The difference in character between these sarcophagi and those of earlier date is very marked. Fine examples of this mode of treatment are offered by the sarcophagi of Arles. On one we see Christ seated, His feet on a footstool, with the apostles and evangelists seated on either side. Christ holds a book inscribed Dominus Legem dat, the other figures hold rolls, some open, some closed, those of the evangelists inscribed with their names (Le Blant, p. 7, pl. iv.). On another of remarkable beauty of execution, the central place is occupied by a cross surmounted by a chaplet with soldiers below, symbolizing the resurrection. Six apostles stand on either side, raising their right hands in token of adoration. Stars are seen in the background (ibid. p. 27, pl. xiv.). One, divided into six arched panels, contains two apostles on either side of Christ, one presenting a basket of bread, another fish, both with veiled hands. The other two hold rolls. By a remarkable, if not unique, arrangement the extreme compartments are occupied by Abraham and Daniel, indicated respectively by the sword and by the serpent or dragon (ibid. pp. 19–21, pl. x.).

The large majority of the Christian sarcophagi are sculptured with scriptural subjects. These sometimes occupy the face alone, sometimes the face and ends, and there are instances in which all four sides are carved. The reliefs are sometimes in two tiers, one above the other, but more usually there is only one. The subjects sometimes form a continuous frieze-like series, one running into the other without any division; sometimes, and more commonly, they are separated into compartments by an arcade. There are rare instances in which a secondary frieze above the reliefs bears sculptures in more diminutive proportions.

We cannot fail to remark, as in the catacomb frescoes, the limited cycle to which the sculptor was confined by ecclesiastical tradition, as well as the small amount of liberty that was granted him in depicting the selected subjects. Each as a rule conforms more or less closely to one hieratic type. The subjects are derived almost equally from the Old and New Testaments, and are mixed together without any definite system of arrangement, so as best to secure symmetry and balance in the composition. Le Blant has called attention to the large number of examples in which Moses striking the rock with the Israelites eagerly stooping to drink, at one end, is balanced by the raising of Lazarus with the adoring sisters at the other, as well as those in which a Divine Hand issues from the clouds on either side of the central subject, in one case to arrest Abraham's sacrifice, in the other to give the Law to Moses.

The subjoined tabular list shews the comparative frequency of the occurrence of the various scriptural subjects on the sarcophagi of the Lateran Museum and of those given by Bosio chiefly from the Vatican. The list is based on one drawn up by Dean Burgon from an examination of the Lateran examples (Letters from Rome, Letter XX.), corrected by Dr. Northcote, by whom the list from Bosio has been added.^a

One of the most remarkable of this class is the very elaborate tomb of Junius Bassus, prefect of the city, A.D. 359, which "for its style and execution may be regarded as one of the best works of early Christian sculpture," though "it sufficiently betrays the decline of art, especially in the treatment of the nude" (Appell, p. 10). Its face is decorated with two tiers of scriptural subjects, in compartments divided by columns, the lower arched. In the centre of the upper tier our Lord sits enthroned between two apostles, borne up by Uranus, represented as a bearded old man with the canopy of heaven extended above him. The subjects sculptured are—beginning from the left of the upper tier—(1) The sacrifice of Isaac; (2) the apprehension of Peter; (3) Christ before Pilate; (4) Pilate washing his hands. In the lower tier—(1) Job visited by his wife and friends [OLD TESTAMENT IN ART]; (2) the Fall of man; (3) Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem; (4) Daniel in the lions' den; (5) Peter and Christ led to prison. On the two ends are carved genii representing the Four Seasons, engaged in operations suitable to each. The spandrels of the lower tier of panels contain on a diminutive scale one of the most remarkable series of carvings in the whole range of Christian art, and probably unique, indicating in the most unmistakable way the sense entertained by the early church of the unity of the two Testaments and the symbolical meaning of the acts of Moses as a type of our Lord, represented under the figure of the Lamb. In these very interesting and instructive reliefs a lamb holding the rod strikes water from the rock, multiplies the loaves, raises Lazarus, receives the law on Mount Sinai, and baptizes another lamb. As already stated, the sarcophagus is also remarkable from having on it the epitaph of the person found in it, with the interesting fact that he was prefect of the city at the time of his death, and that he had only recently been admitted to the church by baptism. "Jun. Bassus, V. C. qui vixit annis xlii. men. ii in ipsa prefectura urbis neofitus iit ad Deum VIII. kal. Sept. Eusebio et Ypatio. coss" (Bosio, 45; Aringhi, i. 277; Bottari, i. 15; D'Agincourt, vi. 5, 11; Lübke, Hist. of Sculpt. i. 310; Parker, Tombs, pl. xiii.).

A very fine sarcophagus, supposed to be that of Petronius Probus, consul A.D. 341, formerly the altar of the chapel of St. Lucy at St. Mary Major, now in the Lateran Museum, offers one of the very best examples of this mode of treatment. The upper row exhibits the raising of Lazarus, Daniel in the lions' den, the law received from the hand of God, the sacrifice of Isaac, and Pilate washing his hands. A scallop-shell in the centre contains two excellent portrait busts. The Divine Hand issuing from the clouds on either side of the shell shews the usual attention to balance of composition (Le Blant, Sarcoph. p. xv. cf. pl. vi.). In the lower tier we have the combined subject of Moses striking the rock and the apprehension of Peter (see OLD TESTAMENT IN ART, p. 1458), Daniel and the lions, Moses reading the book of the covenant, the healing of the blind man, and the miracle of the loaves and fishes. This last subject is represented in a somewhat unusual manner. Our Lord stands, and puts His right hand on a loaf and His left on a basket of fish (Aringhi, i. 423; Bottari, ii. 49; Lübke, fig. 200, p. 843). The sarcophagus are very differently treated. Each is carved in low relief, with a background full of buildings, including a basilica and a detached baptistery, clumsily executed, but of high interest as contemporary representations of architecture. The one represents our Lord predicting Peter's denial; the cock standing on the top of an Ionic column; the other the woman with the issue of blood, and Moses striking the rock. These reliefs are separated by some centuries from the admirable sculptures on the front. They are placed by Mr. Parker in the 8th century (Bosio, 85, 87; Aringhi, i. 317, 319; Appell, p. 20). Another sarcophagus, of somewhat similar design, deserves especial notice not only for the beauty of its execution, but as exhibiting scenes from the Passion which occur very rarely. The front is divided into five compartments by columns with largest sarcophagus in the Lateran Museum, discovered at St. Paul's outside the walls, also with two tiers of subjects, displays in the centre of the upper tier unfinished busts of a husband and wife in a "clypeus" supported by genii. The subjects belong to the usual cycle, with the addition of the creation of woman (OLD TESTAMENT IN ART), and the adoration of the Magi (Appell, 16, 17; Northcote, p. 200, pl. xix.; Westwood, p. 50).

A somewhat different mode of treatment is shewn in a sarcophagus of the 4th century, discovered at St. Peter's, now in the Lateran Museum, one of the most simple and excellent of the early Christian tombs. The front is divided by eight columns exquisitely carved with foliage and flowers. In the centre the youthful Christ, supported by Uranus bearing the vault of heaven, stands between two apostles. Others stand on either side, one of whom receives a scroll from the hand of Christ. To the left is the sacrifice of Isaac; to the right Christ before Pilate, who washes his hands. The whole are most beautifully designed and sculptured in high relief. The two ends of this very remarkable spiral flutes. In the centre stands the labarum with the crown of immortality. Doves perch on the arms of the cross, and a waking and sleeping soldier sit below. To the right Christ, represented as a youthful figure with His fingers raised in benediction, stands before Pilate, who is preparing to wash his hands; a crown of glory hangs above. To the left we see Christ being crowned with thorns, which is transformed into a victor's chaplet; and Christ bearing His cross, a mere trunk, under a guard of soldiers, a crown hanging above. Few early Christian works of art exhibit a greater union of calm dignity and grace (Appell, 20, 21; Northcote, 307).

One of the most frequently recurring subjects is the history of Jonah, a type of death and resurrection. As an example we may produce one of singular grotesqueness from the Lateran Museum, the face of which is literally crowded with figures of different sizes, of which the Jonah series is the most conspicuous. The sea monster with long sinuous tail and vast yawning mouth, well furnished with teeth, appears twice in the centre, first swallowing the prophet as he is cast out of the ship, above the sails of which are allegorical representations of the sun and wind, and then vomiting him forth. Above, Jonah lies tranquilly sleeping, naked, under the shadow of the gourd. At either extremity fishermen are plying their craft, and snails, crabs, and lizards crawl on the shore. Above and around are the common Biblical scenes on a smaller scale; the raising of Lazarus, Moses smiting the rock, the apprehension of Peter, the Good Shepherd and two sheep in a little box-like shrine, and Noah and the dove floating in the water (Airinghi, i. 335; Bottari, i. 42; Appell, p. 19).

When we quit Rome a different school of art is evidenced by the change in the workmanship and the appearance of new subjects. A sarcophagus in the crypt of the cathedral of Fermo exhibits the raising of Dorcas and the imprisonment and release of St. Peter (De Minicis, Monum. di Fermo, p. 83; Appell, p. 24). At Verona we find in the crypt of St. Giovanni in Valle the very rare subject of Judas' kiss and the SAMARITAN WOMAN with the well-pulley and bucket, which is also seen at Clermont Ferrand (Maffei, Mus. Veron. p. 484; Ver. Illustr. part iii. pl. 2, nos. 1, 2). At St. Ambrogio, at Milan, the very remarkable sarcophagus called by some that of Stilicho and Serena, deserves much attention. The chief subject is a youthful bearded Christ teaching the apostles, with the adoration of the magi on one side, and the three children refusing to worship the golden image on the other. The ends exhibit the Fall, Isaac's sacrifice, Elijah's ascension, and other usual Old Testament subjects. In a pediment to the left is a curious relief of the Nativity (NATIVITY) (Appell, p. 33).

The sarcophagi at Ravenna display a remarkable poverty of invention and feebleness of execution, together with an almost complete absence of decoration. The ornamentation consists chiefly of the meaningless repetition of conventional symbols, crosses and monograms. The limited powers of the Ravenna sculptors is strikingly exhibited in the colossal marble tombs—five in number—in the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, d. 450. Her own sarcophagus, of purest Greek marble, is now perfectly devoid of ornament, but once bore plates of precious metals. That of Honorius, d. 423, has its front divided by fluted columns; in the central compartment the Holy Lamb, with its head awkwardly turned back, stands before a cross, on whose arms doves rest. On either side are simple crosses. That of Constantine III., d. 421, has carved on its face three lambs with palm trees; the central lamb standing on a mount, whence the four rivers issue. The ten large marble sarcophagi of bishops from the 6th to the 8th century, at St. Apollinare in Classe, are characterised by the same extreme poverty of invention and feebleness of treatment. One, already described, exhibits our Lord enthroned; but nearly all are content with the same monogram repeated over and over again, sometimes encircled with wreaths, crosses, doves, and vases, lambs under palm trees, peacocks, and other frigid conventionalisms. It is an interesting fact learnt from Cassiodorus (Varior. lib. iii. ep. 19) that a certain sculptor named Daniel was summoned to Ravenna from Rome by Theodoric for his skill "in excavandis atque ornandis marmoribus," and received from him the privilege of supplying the inhabitants of Ravenna with sarcophagi, which are designated in Theodoric's rescript as "orneae quarum beneficio cadavera in supernis humata sunt; lugentium non parva consolatio." The tomb from St. Apollinare in Classe, already described, displaying our Lord enthroned with a cruciform nimbus, is considered by Martigny to be undoubtedly the work of Daniel the Sculptor. These sarcophagi have usually semi-cylindrical lids with imbricated scales. The tomb of the exarch Isaac at St. Vitalis, d. 644, represents the adoration of the magi. The child is nimbed, and the star stands above the Virgin's head. It is a poor scattered work, weak in design and rude in execution (Appell, pl. 27).

The south of France, as has been already remarked, is peculiarly rich in early Christian sarcophagi of the 4th and 5th century, particularised by Millin and Le Blant, who give engravings of many of the most remarkable. Gregory of Tours mentions such sarcophagi as existing in France in his day. One he speaks of formed of white marble, sculptured with the miracles of Christ and the apostles at St. Verona, near St. Allire (de Glor. Confess. c. 35, cf. c. 42), and in the next chapter records "sepulchrum sculptum meritis gloriosum sanctae memoriae Gallae." The sarcophagi at Arles conform both in style and subjects with those of Rome, in other places they are marked by local peculiarities. That of SS. Chrysanthus and Daria at Marseilles has its face divided into seven compartments by trees, on which are to be seen birds with their nests and young. Up the stems of the two end trees serpents are wriggling towards the young birds. A snail crawls up another. In the centre two harts are drinking from two brooks issuing from a rock; on either side the apostles stand in various attitudes (Appell, 39; Millin, tom. iv. p. 136, pl. xxxviii. no. 4). The same division by trees with birds on their branches and a snake climbing the trunk of one of them towards a bird's nest is found on one of the Arles sarcophagi (Le Blant, p. 9, pl. v.), and on one at Carpentras. The cycle of Biblical subjects is somewhat enlarged. One of the most favourite subjects on these Gaulish sarcophagi is the Destruction of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea. Le Blant mentions three or four examples at Arles itself, and others at Metz and Avignon (pp. 50, 54–57). It is not, however, limited to Gaul. It is found at Rome (Bottari, tav. 40, 94, 199) and Pisa (Lasinio, tav. 128), and appears depicted with much stir and action on a sarcophagus at Spalato. In this last example, as at Arles and often elsewhere, the Red Sea is symbolized by a couchant human figure, as the Jordan frequently is in the subject of the baptism of Christ and the ascension of Elijah (Le Blant, pp. 51, 54). A sarcophagus formerly at Arles, now in the museum at Aix, in addition to the passage of the Red Sea, which occupies the whole face, has on one end Moses before Pharaoh, and on the other the gift of quails and the striking the rock. The pillar of fire is depicted in the most naturalistic manner as an actual column of stone with a blazing light on its summit (Le Blant, pp. 50–52, pl. xxxi., xxxii.; Millin, tom. ii. p. 353, pl. 2, no. 1, 2, 3). The grapes of Eschol is found on one in the Marseilles Museum. Among the scenes from our Lord's history less frequently found elsewhere we may mention the raising of the widow's son (Le Blant, pp. 1, 9, pl. 1, i. v. p. 57), the raising of Jairus's daughter (ibid. p. 29, pl. xvii. ; Millin, t. iii. p. 537, pl. lxvi. 1), Christ and the woman of Samaria (ibid. p. 30, pl. xviii. 2; p. 63), and the washing of Peter's feet (ibid. p. 18, pl. lx). The raising of Dorcas is seen on the tomb assigned to Sidonius Apollinaris in the crypt of St. Maximin (Rostan. Monum. Iconog. pl. xii.), and on one in the Arles Museum (Le Blant, p. 4, pl. ii. 1), as well as at Fermo. On another at Aix there is the massacre of the innocents (Faillons, Monuments inédits de S. M. Maj., and the giving of the keys to St. Peter at Avignon and at Arles (Le Blant, p. 4, pl. ii. 1). One of the most exquisite of extant sarcophagi is in the museum at Bordeaux. It has no figures, but the face is covered by graceful vine branches bearing grapes, issuing from two vases surrounding the crowned monogram, which also appears on the sloping lid (De Caumont, Cours d'Antiquité, vi. 220; Appell, p. 43).

Spain also can shew some early Christian sarcophagi at Toledo, Astorga, Zaragoza, and Marcellus. There has been some difference of opinion as to its date, but it may probably be assigned to the 4th century.

The mode of fabricating Christian sarcophagi is shewn in a very interesting manner on the tomb of a sarcophagus maker named Eutropus, given by Fabretti (Inscr. Ant. c. viii. p. 587, cil.), erected by his son, bearing the inscription ΑΓΙΟΣ ΘΕΟΣΕΒΕC ΕΥΤΡΟΠΟC ΕΝ ΙΡΗΝΗ ΒΙΟC ΕΠΟΙΗΣΕΝ. It represents the sculptor seated on a stool with steps of different heights working out a strigillated sarcophagus ornamented with mask, with a young apprentice turning by a cord and pulley the pointed iron drill he is using. The mallet and other tools lie below. A finished sarcophagus bearing dolphins and the name ΕΥΤΡΟΠΟC stand to the right. Behind the sculptor stands a tall male figure with outstretched arms, holding a small vase (Rom. Sotter. iii. p. 443).

III. Tympana of Doorways, etc.—The introduction of the Lombard style of architecture offered a new field for the Christian sculptor's art in the decoration of the portals, especially the tympana, of the newly-erected churches. The larger part of the existing specimens of this mode of architectural decoration are subsequent to A.D. 800. Some, however, come within our period, and demand a passing reference. One of the most remarkable is the bas-relief which occupies the tympanum of the chief doorway at the cathedral of Monza, to which a date between 591 and 615 may be assigned. This is curious, not only as an example of the rude awkward sculpture of the age, but also as representing in stone the consecrated gifts with which queen Theodolinda enriched the church, some of which may still be Barcelona, but they are described as presenting no remarkable peculiarities. In England a tomb supposed to be Romano-Christian has been discovered at Barming in Kent (Roach Smith, Collect. Ant. i. 184), and a stone cist with a slightly gabled lid, bearing a long cross with a floriated foot, was found at Westminster Abbey (where it is still preserved) in Nov. 1869. The inscription states that it was erected to Valerius Amandinus by his sons Valerius Praeventor and seen in its treasury. The church being dedicated to St. John the Baptist, the principal scene represented is the Baptism of Christ. Our Lord stands in the water, which, in defiance of the laws of gravity, rises in a cone about Him. The Holy Spirit, depicted as a dove, descends on His head, holding a vase in its mouth, from which the sacred effluence descends upon Him. On either hand stand the Virgin Mary, St. John, St. Peter, and St. Paul. Above, Theodolinda herself appears with her second husband Agilulf, and her son and daughters, offering a jewelled crown to St. John the Baptist. Behind are seen the pensile crowns, crosses, vases, as well as the curious chioccia, or hen and chickens, presented by her. Another interesting bas-relief of a coronation, of the same date, exists in the south transept (Perkins, u. s. i. xlv.; D'Agincourt, Sculpture, pl. xxvi. fig. 8). A large number of examples of early Lombard sculpture, thirty-eight in all, are collected by D'Agincourt in the plate just referred to, which show the extreme rudeness of the art at the period.

Other examples are to be found at the baptistery of Cividale in Friuli, erected by Calixtus, patriarch of Aquileia, A.D. 712-744. Here we find the evangelistic symbols, crosses with palms, candelabra, &c., surrounded with circles rudely sculptured in a barbarous kind of relief, formed by lowering the surface round the clumsy figures which rather suggest than imitate real objects, the details being marked by furrows on the stone.

Mr. Perkins cites as other specimens of Lombard sculpture the tomb of Pemmone, duke of Friuli, at St. Mark's in Cividale, of the 8th century; the sculptures at St. Ambrogio at Milan, St. Tommaso in limine near Bergamo, the Well in the Lateran cloisters, &c. [E. V.]

SEAL. (1) The word σφραγίς is frequently used in Greek liturgical language for the sign of the cross, and the person who makes the sign is said σφραγίζειν. [SIGN OF THE CROSS.]

(2) The stamp made on the bread used in the Holy Eucharist is also called σφραγίς, and when the bread is divided in such a way that each portion bears a stamp, the portions are called σφραγίδες. [LAMB, THE HOLY, p. 916.] [C.]

SEALS. (1) Material Seals. During the whole of the Christian period comprised in this work the most common mode of sealing was by rings, whether set with stones or not, the impression being made in wax. * [GEMS; RINGS.]

Wax impressions, however, were not always made from gems or rings. They were occasionally formed by a simple metallic matrix, like official seals in mediæval and modern times. Very few such, being Christian, or indeed of any kind, appear to have come down to us until after the age of Charlemagne. We have, however, the brass matrix of the seal of Macarius, patriarch of Antioch in the seventh century, on which St. Peter is represented seated having a cock near him; it was found near Aintab in Syria by a rustic. (Chandler, Marm. Oxon. præf. p. vii., with a figure.) The following inscription, litteris ligatis, is round the margin: it runs thus in common minuscules: Μακάριος ἐλέφ θεοῦ πατριάρχης τῆς μεγάλης Οὐπώλεως Ἀντιοχείας καὶ πάσης ἀνατολῆς (Böckh, C. I. G. n. 8987). Macarius was condemned in the sixth œcumenical council (A.D. 681) as a Monothelite. Antioch was termed in the age of Justinian, who built very largely there, Theupolis (i.e. Theopolis), as being the see where St. Peter governed the church of God; this explains the device on the seal. M. D'Arc (see below) states that the matrix of Dagobert I. (A.D. 628-638) was discovered in the department of Doubs, but he does not mention the metal. It gives his face, seen in front, with long hair, accompanied by two crosses and the legend DAGOBERTVZ (sic) REX FRANCORUM.

Licetus mentions, on the authority of Petrasanta (De Sym. lib. iii. c. 9), that Charlemagne "non in anuli gemma, sed in gladii capulo sigillum habuisse, ut edicta et leges obsignaret: putabat enim, ejusdem gladii debere esse leges tueri ac eas promulgare" (De Annulis, p. 144).

A. WAX IMPRESSIONS OF SEALS.

Of the wax impressions themselves a greater number has been preserved than might perhaps have been expected: they are mostly in very indifferent condition, and they vary much in quality. The oldest extant are white or pale yellow and pale red or reddish-brown; both colours are found in Merovingian and also in Carolingian times. There are only two essential forms of these impressions, round and oval: the former is Merovingian, the latter Carolingian (Heineccius, de Sigillis, pp. 51-56; Sceaux des Rois de France, p. 2, see below; D'Arcq, see below).

The most ancient mode of fixing the seal to the deed was to make a cruciform incision in the deed itself, usually on the right hand, through which the wax was introduced, and flattened on both sides. The seal was impressed on the written side.^b Before the 11th century all wax seals were thus "plaqués;" the date of perhaps the earliest pendent wax seal being no older than A.D. 1067 (D. D'Arcq, Elém. de Sigillographie, pp. xvii. to xxiii., prefixed to Collection de Sceaux des Archives de l'Empire, Paris, 1863-1868). M. Douet D'Arcq enumerates the seals of the Merovingian and Carolingian sovereigns existing in the archives of France; they comprise (besides the seal of Dagobert I., mentioned above, or rather apparently an impression made from it),^c the following, all of wax and plaqués: Thierry III., Clovis III., Childbert III., Chilperic II., Pepin le Bref, Carloman and Charlemagne. Their names and portraits (more or less obliterated) occur upon nearly all of these, and a cross is still sometimes and was perhaps originally always prefixed. One of the seals of Pepin le Bref has on one side Christ crowned with thorns, seen in front, a person to the right of him is in profile; no legend; it is attached to a deed dated June 20, 750^d (Nos. 1-16). Wailly^e (Elém.

^b The earliest example in the British Museum is of Eudes in the 9th century, just too late for this work.

^c There is also an impression made from a seal ascribed to Sigebert II., reading S. R., preserved in the Bibl. Imp. Cab. des Ant. It is not mentioned by Chabouillet.

^d Another of his seals has a head of Bacchus or Silenus: one of Charlemagne figured by Wailly, pl. A, No. 9, bears a head of Serapis. These were probably impressions from ancient pagan gems. It is difficult to say how extant wax impressions generally were formed. The seal of Dagobert (figured by Wailly, pl. A, fig. 1) is of considerable size, about 3½ inches in diameter; it was probably made from a matrix; but its genuineness is very doubtful. See the remarks in the Sceaux des Rois de France, p. 2. All the other ancient impressions which he figures may have been executed either from gems or from rings.

^e This plate is reproduced in the "Trésor de Numism."

* "In Europe, as far as I know," says Beckmann, "wax has been everywhere used for sealing since the earliest ages." (Beckmann, Hist. of Inventions, vol. i. p. 140, transl. by Johnston, in Bohn's Stand. Libr.) de Paléographie, tom. ii. p. 338, pl. A, No. 8, Paris, 1838), figures a wax seal (plaqué) of Charlemagne, which reads XPE · PROTEGE · CAROL · REG · FRANCR. It is attached to the charter of a gift to the abbey of St. Denys, dated September 14, A.D. 774, it is about 1½ inches by 1; oval, not acuminate. There is an impression of this seal in the British Museum.^f

The only English king within our period of whom any wax seal remains appears to be Offa, king of Mercia; it is described by D'Aroq in vol. iii. of the above-named work, n. 9995; head to r. surrounded by a diadem "à épi," the wax he describes as "rougeâtre, très-consistante, plaqué" on a charter of that king, dated 790, in favour of the abbey of St. Denys.

B. BULLAE OF EARTH AND METAL.

In very early times some kind of earth was employed for the purpose of receiving the impression of the seal; this method, which seems to have originated in Egypt, was occasionally employed in the Greek empire, at least as late as the 8th century. The lump of earth so sealed was attached by a string or strip of cloth or leather to the diploma or other document. Such earth must have been employed in sealing by the Byzantine emperors, for we are told that at the second council of Nice (A.D. 787) Leontius, bishop of Cyprus, defended the worship of images by saying that no one believed that those who received written orders from the emperor and venerated the seal worshipped on that account the sealing-earth, the paper, or the lead. (See Beckmann, u. s., pp. 137, 138. For the original Greek see below.) "Actual examples of such seals belonging to Egyptian and Assyrian times are still in existence, as well as remains of the cloth or strap by which they were appended" (Birch's Ancient Pottery, p. 83, 2nd ed.). No Christian seals of this character belonging to the period with which we are concerned appear to have been preserved. We have, however, a considerable number of such seals in lead, the earlier ones being principally papal bulls beginning by about the 7th century.^g

The earliest leaden bull of certain date known to be now extant,^h whose authenticity is generally acknowledged, is that of pope Deus-dedit (A.D. 614–617); it is figured by Ficoroni (Piombi Antichi, tab. xxiii. fig. 3). It bears on one et de Glypt." in the volume Sceaux des Rois et Reines de France, pl. 1.

^f More than a dozen seals of Charlemagne are known in wax or metal according to the authors of the Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique. Pieresc took impressions of ancient seals (vetera sigilla) which he found in various ancient abbeys; they bore the true likenesses (verae effigies) of Charlemagne and other kings of the second race (Chiffet, Anastasis, p. 112).

^g Rainaldus maintains that papal bulls go still farther back, and affirms that leaden bulls of Sylvester, Leo I., and Gregory I., are kept in "archivo Aretino" and in the Castle of St. Angelo; but Heineccius does not believe in their genuineness (De Signill. p. 48).

^h Heineccius thinks that the Byzantine emperors made the earliest bulls (u. s. p. 42); that the patriarchs of Constantinople followed them, and that the popes of Rome were determined not to be behind these (p. 40). This may possibly be so, but the existing examples and notices suggest a different chronological order.
